In this fact lies the key of the Modjeska Reception riddle, which could have been accordingly solved had the young gentlemen of Virginia City been wise, which they are not.

Why, I have seen that young reprobate, Fred, come out of a mine on the afternoon shift, dressed à la miner—hob-nailed shoes, blue overalls, red flannel shirt, and slouch hat; smoking a short clay pipe and swinging his tin lunch basket—and in that make-up take particular pains to speak to every well-dressed gentleman he had ever met.

After accomplishing this flagrant breach of good breeding—which afforded him, the impenitent rogue, vast amusement—he would go to his room, and, donning his latest and most stylish clothes from San Francisco, which were always of a later cut than any others in town, would repeat the "pave act"—as he neatly expressed it—swinging a dandy cane and smoking a cigarette; but this time would cut dead all of his well-dressed acquaintance, and hold long, confidential interviews with the worst-dressed miners he met. He had thus antagonized every society swell in the city when Modjeska arrived, and he at once assumed the duties and mysterious importance of a first class "agent."

Modjeska appeared, and the Comstock was enraptured. The mining superintendent raved over her beauty, and his wife raved over her wonderful dresses. The mining clerk was enslaved, and planned a reception. To perfect the scheme was but the work of a day; time and place were fixed upon, particulars were arranged, and the "Modjeska Reception" movement was fairly inaugurated. Excitement in the upper ten ran high. Comstock Row—Virginia City's Nob Hill—was in a tremor of delicious anticipation. "A real live countess! One need not be the wife of a bonanza prince, and leave house and friends behind, to entertain a countess nowadays," said the mining superintendent's wife to her friend. "And if she only will wear one of those lovely Adrienne costumes," suggested the friend. The telegraph wires were laden with messages to San Francisco dress-makers, etc. Absent superintendents at the "bay" on "business" returned home, accompanied by numerous mining presidents and directors—suddenly called to the mines on "business." Indeed, my friend Jenkins hinted that there was an easily traceable and direct connection between the "Modjeska Reception" and several assessments shortly afterward levied on certain mines, so that even the San Francisco public had a certain interest, as it were, in the affair. But then Jenkins was not invited to the reception, and I never placed much confidence in his unkind intimations. The number and style of the dresses which arrived by fast express that week was a sight to behold. In point of fact, and entirely "by the way," the well-regulated Virginia City maid or matron who moves in Comstock Row society is as well dressed an individual as one would wish to see. She seems to realize the contrast required by her unlovely surroundings, and, when she walks or drives about the country, makes the dreary sagebrush wastes bloom again.

However, to return to the point of my story from which I too often roam, the invitation committee of the proposed reception was composed of young gentlemen who had been particularly outraged in their finer sensibilities by our friend Fred. The result was as might have been expected—Fred's name was left off the invitation list. He had heard of the great coming event; in fact, that and Modjeska were the only topics of conversation tolerated in polite parlors all that week, and being agent for the fair Countess, expected to be asked to her reception. When he learned his fate he was mad, very mad, and swore revenge.

On the night of the reception, after the theatre, Modjeska sat in her parlor at the International Hotel, looking as though she would thoroughly enjoy a genuine dance after her stage dance in Camille, and awaiting the arrival of her agent to consult him on the advisability of going. I may remark here that Modjeska has vast and new ideas regarding the scope of an agent's duties. In a strange country, her agent not only manages her business, but directs her socially also. I have even heard it said that now upon arriving in a strange town she consults Harry Sargent as to what brand of champagne she shall offer to the local press interviewers who may present themselves, but as the lady has been in this country long enough to observe that no American reporter knows the difference between cider and champagne, and consequently prefers beer to either, I consider the report a libel on her intelligence and entirely untrustworthy.

In due course of time Fred arrived, and, depositing a bag containing thirty-three and one-third per cent. of the night's gross proceeds, handed Modjeska a slip containing an account of the house, whereon was entered in due form as "sundries" the amount expended for beer. Modjeska pocketed the slip and handed Fred the elegantly worded invitation she had received to the reception with the remark: "And how about this?"

Fred's supreme moment had arrived; suppressing a start of delight he took the invitation with the true agent's manner-of-fact manner. When his eyes fell upon the contents of the stylish missive his face changed; indignant amazement followed puzzled astonishment in a manner which doubtless delighted the artistic eye of his beholder. In fact, I have never seen but one better actor off the stage than Fred; that was Signor Majeroni, and he could not act anywhere else. When Fred had carefully re-read the invitation, he slowly and thoughtfully replaced it in its envelope, and holding it in his hand, said sternly:

"Madame, the stupendous, the awful assurance of these—these people astounds me, passes my comprehension. I am, if I may so speak, paralyzed," and then he stalked out of the room.

Modjeska had learned her fate from Fred's face only. Few of his words occurred in the lines of Adrienne, Juliet, or Camille, so she could only guess at their awful significance. It was not until she had thoroughly translated Fred's speech by the aid of dictionaries into both Russian and French that she quite mastered its meaning, when, like the junior class at Vassar College upon a notable occasion, she felt "moved to subside."

In telling her experience to some friends, whom she always begs to correct her English, she said with her delightful and unwritable accent:

"His words were so pig—to be sure, large—that I do—did—not—what is it?—oh, yes, thank you—comprehend. I was quite—quite paralyzed—slang, is it! Pardon, I learn it at the California."

I will remain charitably silent regarding the feelings of the "Modjeska Reception Invitation Committee," but Fred was revenged.

Archery Notes.

The bow dealers have now no reason to fear that their imported tackle was brought to a bad market, and would lie on their hands an unprofitable venture, for the demand for archery material is increasing every day. I advise every one about purchasing a bow to test it well before it leaves the shop, with the understanding that if it breaks in a fair thirty-inch pull, he is not to be held responsible for the damage. Many of the bows here are so dry, that unless rubbed well with oil before using them there is a strong probability that they will snap at the first arrow; and if a bow snaps on the archery ground, and not in the shop, the dealer does not feel inclined to replace it, but in all likelihood will attribute the mishap to the clumsiness of the archer.

Some archers, in discussing the approaching tournament, grumble at the shortness of the ranges, thirty, forty, and fifty yards, and believe that it should be shot on the English rule, the "York Round," which consists of sixty, eighty, and one hundred yards. But they must remember that archery is only just born on this coast, and the good old maxim of "learning to creep before you walk" is applicable to the Pacific slope archers. The rules of the English archery tournaments are: For gentlemen, 6 dozen arrows, at 100 yards; 4 dozen, at 80 yards, and 2 dozen, at 60 yards; and for ladies, 4 dozen arrows, at 60 yards, and 2 dozen, at 50 yards. The shooting continues for two days, and it is on the result of a "double round" that the Grand National prizes are awarded on "value" alone, as the best criterion of good and central shooting. The points are counted in the following manner: Two for the gross score, two for the gross hits, one for the best score at 100 yards, one for the best hits at ditto, and the same at 80 and 60 yards, making ten points in all.

Mr. Horace A. Ford, the author of the Theory and Practice of Archery, speaks thus of his favorite sport as an exercise for ladies: "It brings all the muscles into healthy action, and is admirably suited to meet the requirements of the fair sex—general, equal, and without being violent—calling the faculties, both of mind and body, into gentle and healthy play, yet oppressing none—withal most elegant and graceful." Ford won the medal of Great Britain eleven times, and his highest score—1,251, with 245 hits, at Cheltenham in 1857—has never been equaled. Mrs. Horniblow won the lady's champion's bracer no less than ten times. Her highest score was 764, at Leamington, in 1873. Here is a glowing example for our lady archers to follow.

A letter from a friend in New York, who is a member of one of the first organized archery clubs in that State, contains the following: "The outlook for archery this season is most promising. We have been already in the field, and I assure you the scores that some of our ladies of the Long Island Club have made would astonish you. The English bowyers are unable to supply the demand for archery tackle, so our own people have begun to place American-made bows in the market. I am glad to see that you are to have a Pacific Coast tournament. As yet, our contests have been between clubs, but I expect that in August we will have a grand shoot, North, South, East, and West competing. Could you send us a team from California, just to let us see of what material your archers are made? Your fellows carried off the rifle trophy; perhaps they might walk away with the gold arrow; but I tell you they must shoot well to do it."

The practice matches on Saturday were, as far as I have heard from the various clubs, very satisfactory; all showing improvement on the average, and steady shooting. There is a legend among archers that the "Man from Santa Cruz"—the best shot in that well trained club—will turn up some day at one or other of the ranges, and make the gold circle on our targets look like a kitchen strainer. One stormy afternoon last winter this mysterious person appeared in Albert Havens' office, informed him that he had his bow and quiver at a hotel close by, and wanted to try a flight with some of our San Francisco archers. But, alas, the rain kept falling, and when the clouds at last disappeared, with them vanished the "Man from Santa Cruz."

QUIVER.

Richard Cœur de Lion was the most stylish man in England of his time. When he put on his tin helmet and cast-iron ulster, and a pair of laminated steel boots, and picked up a club with an iron knob and a steel spike in the end, and set forth on a crusade, the fashionable society of that day considered him just "dressed to kill." And so he was. And one time when he was dressed up that way a fellow killed him.

LA CRÈME DES CHRONIQUES.

What the Alleged Wits of Paris find to Say in their Newspapers.

A restaurateur at Berlin has devised an ingenious plan for keeping his place free from beggars, street nuisances, dead beats, and other undesirable customers. He just puts a policeman's hat on a table near the door, and when the undesirable customer looks in it meets his fascinated gaze, and he closes the door gently and departs holding his breath.

Mr. X. comes to be the victim of an accident, and as they are placing him on a stretcher to carry him up stairs from the back he summons the servant girl, an honest young peasant, and tells her:

"Hurry up stairs and let my wife know about this accident to me, but don't give her a shock—put on a cheerful face while you are telling her."

The faithful domestic discharges her mission with enthusiasm, and remarks in a husky voice:

"My master sent me—he! he! he!—to tell you that—ha! ha! ha! he had—ho! ho! ho!—he had—(there I've burst my stay-laces)—he had—it was too funny, and I've laughed till my sides are sore—he had broken his leg—ho! ho!" (Rolls over upon the carpet in ecstasies of laughter.)

"Yes, your Honor," says the prisoner, "I admit that I broke into his house to rob it, but I did not intend to add violence to my crime."

"You did not intend—of course you didn't. But if the witness had heard you; had called out 'Who's there?' had—"

"Oh, of course, if he'd begun it I should have had to defend myself, and so would you if any man attacked you while you were peaceably going through his house."

(Held in $10,000.)

It was after a concert at which some of Berlioz's pieces had been produced, when a friend met the composer.

"Well, how did they execute your pieces?"

"Like criminals, sir; like criminals."

At Monte-Carlo a traveler meets, in single combat with the tiger, a recently-made widower. He can hardly repress an exclamation of surprise.

"I know," says the other, with a sigh, "it looks a little heartless, but I only do it to forget my great sorrow. She, sir, was a woman that—well, well, you knew her, and her loss I deeply feel. Never shall I find such another wife, sir; losing her has cast a gloom over all my life. In fact, if you will but observe it, so anxious am I to show respect to that excellent woman's memory that I play nothing but rouge et noir and bet on nothing but the black."

The Hungarian Deputy, Szedenyi, has just died, leaving 6,000,000 francs to his nephew. He was the most economical man in the country, and the shocking badness of his hat—within the memory of man he had never worn a new tile—was historical.

"Great heavens!" said a friend, on meeting him in the streets of Pesth, "why don't you shoot that hat and get one about a quarter way decent?"

"Oh, it makes no difference what sort of a hat I wear in Pesth," replied the millionaire; "every one knows me, and my reception doesn't depend on my head-gear."

A couple of months later the same friend met him again, this time on a Parisian boulevard, in the height and heyday of the Exposition. All was different except the hat.

The friend repeated the protest against the unseemly head-covering.

"Oh, bless you," replied Szedenyi, "there's not a soul out here knows me from Adam, and it makes no earthly difference what sort of a hat I wear."

For twenty-five years the old man was a member of the Budget Commission; if he had not been there would have been risk of a rising of tax-payers. Only a few weeks ago, when the appropriation for pensions was under discussion, the vigilant Deputy observed that the total for 1879 exceeded that for 1878.

"What," exclaimed the watch-dog of the treasury, "17 florins more than last year for pensions! Do none of these devouring myriads ever die?"

One pleasant night, in a lonely spot in the Faubourg du Temple, a pedestrian was halted by a robber who threatened to kill him unless he voluntarily subscribed to the campaign fund. The pedestrian calmly drew a pistol from his pocket, and placing it to the highwayman's head, marched him to the nearest police station, where he gave him in charge and told the story to the sergeant.

"Very good," said that vigorous official; "and now have you a permit to carry a pistol?"

"I have not."

"In that case I shall be compelled to hold you on a charge of carrying concealed weapons."

"But if I hadn't had my pistol with me I would probably have been murdered."

"That is quite likely, but the law takes no cognizance of little things like that. The law is the law, and must be obeyed."

"Very well; but is there any ordinance against carrying a pistol that won't shoot?"

"No; of course not."

"Then if you will be so good as to examine this deadly weapon, you will perceive that there is no trigger to it. It is one a friend gave me to take to the armorer's and have repaired."

"Lemme go!" yelled the captive highwayman; "I was kidnapped and inveigled here under false pretences. This is a charge of fraud by a fraud."

The vigilant sergeant was about as deeply disgusted.

A gentleman presents himself at Police Headquarters to leave a description of his daughter, who has been missing for two or three days, and was thought to have got her hence with all-advised celerity and the coachman.

"Describe her minutely, if you please," says the clerk.

"Well," says the parent, "she's pretty tall and well-complexioned, and is about three or four years young—take her to be."

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1879.

The question of the adoption or rejection of the new Constitution is a practical one, addressing itself to the personal interest of the individual voter. Almost every elector will ask himself the question, how is the result likely to affect my interest? Arguments that involve abstruse questions of political economy will be either unread or unheeded by the great mass of voters. Arguments coming from politicians, from capitalists, from owners of real estate, from managers of corporations, from manufacturing or mechanical organizations, or from editors, will be listened to with a deal of suspicion, because the hearer will, in his own mind, ask himself the question—is what I hear or read dictated by the personal interest of the speaker or writer? Hence, we suggest to every man to reflect for himself, and consider how am I and my family, and my business, and my future, to be influenced by the result?

We lay down this general proposition that the entire change of an organic law—that affects all existing laws, makes an entire new departure for all coming legislation, creates new officials both State and municipal, new judges under a new plan, to decide new questions; that changes the entire legislative, judicial, and executive system; that proposes an entirely new code, gives us a new revenue system, disturbs from the bottom all existing institutions, schools, banks, industrial organizations, insurance companies, lien laws—must of necessity be bad. Great injury would result in such an organic upheaval if the proposed Constitution is perfect. Its injurious effect can not be doubted if the Constitution is not perfect. It will lead most certainly to disastrous consequences if the new Constitution is no better than the old one. We have lived under the old Constitution for thirty years. Some have prospered and some have been unfortunate. Those who have prospered may well determine that the old law is good enough for them. Those who have not prospered owe it to themselves and to fair play to ask whether their personal misfortunes have resulted from the operation of existing laws or from themselves? The men of money, the millionaires, the bankers, the men of large accumulations, the manufacturers in established industries, the mechanics in continuous occupation, the merchants who have thrived in commercial pursuits, professional men, the laborer who finds continual employment, the owner of a farm, the teamster, the small navigator, the clerk, the bookkeeper, the prosperous miner, the vine-grower, the gardener, and all the other lesser and greater toilers will naturally say to themselves, I will let well enough alone, I will not disturb the present condition of affairs, I will favor constitutional amendments by legislative action, I will vote against the adoption of the new Constitution.

A change such as is contemplated will create temporary derangement and great confusion—will destroy confidence and produce financial disorder. Money, always sensitive and always cowardly, will hide itself till the storm blows over. The largest portion of our banking, insurance, and loaning capital is from abroad, is here for profitable investment, has no sensibilities, no patriotism, and only looks for safe occupation and profitable use. The first result of any political change is to drive this capital from active circulation. Our own money will withdraw itself from all venturesome and speculative enterprise until the result is known, and, in event of the adoption of the new Constitution, till judicial interpretation shall invite it to come forth. The result will be that all enterprise and all speculative adventures will be held in abeyance. Lands in the country and lots in the town will not command prices. Sales will be arrested, and forced sacrifices will result to all except the strong holders. This gives advantage to those who have money, and all transactions in changing of real property will inure to the benefit of capitalists. Under these circumstances every man with encumbered property will be liable to the calamity of foreclosure. If my mortgage becomes due to the money-lender, and he refuses to take my note—and no money-lender will take his place and advance upon my security—I am ruined by a foreclosure, while abundant money lies unused in the vaults of the banker or money-lender. The savings banks have received $40,000,000 of the people's money to invest on mortgage in town and country. They have not $40,000,000, nor $4,000,000, but they have $40,000,000 of securities, representing the hard-earned dollars of the working class. These paper notes are evidences of value, and are to be taxed by the new Constitution, while all the land upon which this money is loaned is taxed as a matter of course. The new Constitution passes, a money panic is created, the savings banks can not pay depositors because their borrowers can not pay them; foreclosures follow, lands and lots are sacrificed. The owner of a homestead or farm loses it because there is no buyer. The bank depositor loses because the bank can not realize on its sales under foreclosure. Now, who loses? We answer, the savings-bank depositor and the borrower whose property is sacrificed. Who gains? We answer, the shylocks and money grubbs who have coin to purchase property at forced sales. When the sand-lot and demagogues rail at banks, they forget that the people are their own bankers. Commercial banks may weather the storm; savings banks will go to the devil.

Neither under the old or new Constitution is there any power to compel the circulation of money, or to make the owner of unproductive property improve it. If I own a vacant lot in San Francisco, which under normal conditions I would improve, the improvement of it naturally puts a hundred different machines in motion. To illustrate: I grade my lot with the common laborer at two dollars per day. I hire double teams or single carts to haul away my dirt. The horses consume grain and hay. I build my foundation of brick, and employ the brick-maker, the wood-chopper and the wood-hauler that supplies the kiln. I purchase lumber for my house, and this gives employment to the axe and the whip-saw, to the teamster and the saw-mill, to the railroads, and sloops, and ships that transport it; to the dealer that traffics in it, to the storekeeper and merchant who furnish supplies, and to the farmer who raises horses and food for man and beast. I employ architects, draymen, carpenters, masons, plasterers, plumbers, painters, and glaziers. I pay out money for lime to the lime-burners; hardware I buy at the stores, and they pay rent, clerks, and porters. This gives money to the landlord. The clerk and porter pay their board or supply their families, and thus the grocer, the butcher, the fruit-vender, the clothing-dealer, the shoemaker, the hatter, the dry goods man, the milliner, the dressmaker, all get a share of the money I am placing in circulation. My contractor, employé, teamster, laborer, and material man, in turn buys himself a lot, and builds a house, and furnishes it, and thus goes on the endless chain of industry propelled by the perpetual motion of my money. When my house is built I employ a gardener to adorn the grounds, and a coachman to drive my carriage. I send my money to the farmer for hay and grain. I furnish my house, and from the cabinet-maker, carpet, and furniture, and hardware, and crockery dealers I purchase my goods. I employ the upholsterer to furnish my parlors, the artist to fresco my walls, the plumber, the painter, and when I get into my domicile, then comes the butcher, the baker, the candlestick-maker, the assessor, and the tax-collector. The wife has a baby; then, O Lord! there comes the monthly nurse, who takes possession of my house, the doctor, the sewing-woman, the apothecary, and the preacher to baptize the precious infant.

Now, just before I conclude to build my house Mr. Dennis Kearney drops in from Ireland, and having convened all these farmers, mill-men, lumber dealers, mechanics, tradesmen, teamsters, merchants, and laborers, upon the sand-lot, says: "The Chinese must go—all hands up." Governor "Stanford, James C. Flood, and D. O. Mills are hell-born" and hell-bound villains, they are bloated monopolists and lecherous bondholders. Railroad owners are thieves. The "Stock Exchange is a nest of gambling villains. Landrats" and water rats infest the country. Let us burn their property, and hang their miserable, rotting carcasses to the "nearest lamp-post." Wellock from England cries, "Hemp, hemp." Beerstecher from Germany shouts, "And then let us divide the ashes to make ley, to make soap, to wash ourselves for the first time." And then Clitus Barbour from Nova Scotia shouts, "Blood! blood!! knee 'deep!!!" And Antoine Fischer says, "Let us call out 'the militia forces of the W. P. C. to protect us Americans.'" And the vile, ignorant, unwashed, propertyless, idle, vagabond tramps, and loafers, of all the nationalities from Scandinavia to Portugal unite with the full force of their brass-banded throats, and acclaim their approval of these devilish threats against me and my property. And then I won't build my house. I will keep my money. I will await the issue of this conflict. I will hold back from making a home amid this wilderness of untamed foreign beasts. I will go back to the East; or if I am foreign-born, I will go back to my native land, and take my money with me. I will seek the security and repose of a government like England, that knows how to deal with the wild Irish. I will go back to Bismarck and the German Empire, where laws are enforced, and where the twinkle of the bayonet at once meets the agi-tator's eye. And who suffers from this withdrawal of capital? Do I? Does Governor Stanford, or Mr. Flood, or D. O. Mills? Certainly not. But the first who suffers is the laboring man. The poorest suffer most. The mechanic, the artisan, the material man, the farmer, all suffer under the conditions that result from the threats of the sand-lot. I have endeavored to show how the laborer, mechanic, material man, and tradesman, are affected if, owning a vacant lot, I refuse to build upon it; that, with the $20,000 I would expend for a dwelling, the $10,000 to be put in furniture, and the $5,000 in horses and carriages, I might live comfortably in Paris, or elsewhere, and enjoy my money as an absentee, while the very poor laborer left behind would suffer for want of employment, and all others be embarrassed; and if this suspension of enterprise was general all would be ruined. San Francisco can never stand still. We must all move on together, or all that can not get away must suffer together. If San Francisco stagnates, the country is injured. If San Francisco is ruined, the country is paralyzed. It is the old fable of the belly and the members. Let the old Constitution alone. Let confidences be restored, and let the honest working masses sit down upon these sand-lot bums, loafers, and political vagrants, and we have promise of the best and most prosperous season that California has ever had. Let this reign of terror go on, and we shall have a temporary panic that will injure us all, except the very rich.

And why should I be driven out of the country by the working class. With my $25,000 laid out in a house, and my income expended here, I am contributing to the prosperity of all. I am not dangerous even if I am rich. I am not an enemy to my neighbors if I spend my money among them. My money is not opposed to my neighbors' labor. I spend it and they earn it. I can not enjoy it except I do spend it. I can injure them only in being a miser and hoarding my money, or by going out of the State and taking my money with me. And then again I am, so long as I stay here, under the political control of the people I have named. These laborers, mechanics, tradesmen, material men, farmers, and merchants out-number and out-vote all all other classes. My coachman, my gardener, and the laborer whom I employ each has a vote. At the ballot-box he is my equal, and even in the moderate way in which I live I give employment to five men, every one of whom has as much political power as I. Governor Stanford and Charles Crocker have eleven thousand voters on their pay-rolls. Flood, Mackey, and Fair have many thousand voters in their employ. Mrs. Mark Hopkins employs some hundreds of mechanics in building her elegant house, costing millions, all of which has been spent for labor, and has no vote. Then why allow sand-lot orators and vicious newspapers to excite such a feeling of prejudice and alarm as shall drive capital away or withdraw it from active circulation? The Chronicle says that it can not be driven away—that this is a menace. Property can not be driven away, but money can. I can not take away my vacant lot, but I can take away my money or I can hide it here. The London and San Francisco Bank can not remove its banking-house, but it can padlock its vaults. Messrs. Flood and Fair can not remove Nevada Block, but they can refuse to spend a million of dollars each among laborers and mechanics to build elegant mansions on Nob Hill. Labor strikes, and labor agitations, and labor demagogues can arrest business and prevent capital from use and from the earning of interest, and can hurt the capitalist, but the blow is aimed directly at labor, and the laborer is the only person really injured—for while capital lies idle labor starves. The question of three meals a day is a practical one to the unemployed laborer: it is not to the capitalist. It is a great mistake for labor to endeavor to employ threats and force, or to endeavor to bring about a violent and radical change of law in order to make better terms for itself. It is a mistake for any community to think it can take money by the throat and garrote it from its owner, by taxation, by fixing the hours of labor, or by any other political device. It can not be done, and if it could the laborer would starve before the result could be attained. Let rich men build palaces, drive fours-in-hand, keep servants, live luxuriously, spend freely. This keeps money in circulation, and is vastly better for the poor than that they should live poorly, miserly, economically, and sweat their money at usury. The wealthy miser who lives at a restaurant and takes his exercise on foot is an enemy to all the interests of the community. Go blindly and criminally and vote for this new Constitution, and what becomes of the sixty millions of money in savings banks loaned upon town and country property? What becomes of farms and homes under mortgage to money lenders? What becomes of laborers and their families with all industries arrested and all enterprises brought to a standstill? Let Kearney, Wellock, Tinnin, Larkin, Judge Terry, and Volney F. Howard answer.

We are not of the class that believes this State or this city is to have any permanent set back from the passage of any law or any Constitution. We are destined to an immense and splendid future, and this city to a magnificent destiny. It is to be the commercial emporium of a great, broad, wealthy, and populous empire. It is to be the home of wealth, luxury, extravagance, and architectural display. Its prosperity is based upon its lands and mines and commerce; it is built upon the broad, stalwart shoulders of labor, that will develop from lands and mines and oceans material values. There will be thieves in office, tramps upon the highways, demagogues upon the sand-lot, orators who only labor with their tongues, and editors who would let labor want that laborers might advertise their wants; there will be rich men and fools with colossal fortunes; there will be insolence in office, and beggars will ride on horseback, and vile women will be clad in velvet gowns—but these things are not to be remedied by constitutional enactments; they are not to be improved by an overturning of the organic law; they are not to be avoided by elevating a set of old broken down political hacks to office, nor by putting snide lawyers and police court pettifoggers into judicial position to expound laws made by ignorant, native-born scoundrels and vicious foreign agitators. The true remedy lies in another direction. It is in the hands of the toiling farmers and the honest workers of the town. It is with the intelligent of all classes and all nationalities, when they shall combine and unite for honest legislation; when they shall demand honest officials to economically administer the government in all its departments. All the encroachments of capital, the oppressions of corporations, and the exactions of monopolists—whether monopolists of land, or money, or franchises—can be cured by one session of honest legislation. The new Constitution will only illustrate to us the fable of Æsop. We shall get rid of one class of blood-suckers, only to be fastened upon by another and more hungry swarm. It is unfortunate that all this agitation has arisen over the adoption of a Constitution. It is an unfortunate thing that an organic law should be born in an hour of excitement, and in the midst of passion, jealousy, and social and political agitation, lest there should be stamped upon the child the birth-mark of its base paternity.

They tell us that the farmers are going for the new Constitution because it will reduce their taxes. Now let us, for the argument, admit the fact as stated. A farmer now pays upon a valuation of $5,000, $100 per annum taxes. The new Constitution will so reduce the tax that he will place half this burden upon the bank or the railroad company, or the money-lender, and he will save $50 per annum. Can the farmer afford for this small premium of saving to risk the confusion, loss, and danger of a financial panic? Can he, in order to put off this paltry payment of half a hundred dollars, afford to involve the State in the chaos of an entire change of an organic law? Can he, for this, risk the experiment of precipitating the whole machinery of government into the whirling maelstrom of political contention, party strife, and class dissension? Would the farmer wish to ruin the commerce and business of the city, bankrupt the merchants, close up the shops, put out the fires of the foundries, silence the music of the anvils, and paralyze labor in order that he might stand to win the possible chance of a lesser tax? Would the man who produces from the soil the food we consume, the fruit we eat, the wool we wear, the horses we buy, the meat, the vegetables we daily demand, set himself up to destroy his own and his only consumers? Would the farmers break our banks, break our merchants, drive money away from the State, drive foreign banks and insurance companies away, in hope of reducing their taxes? The farmer who would do this is an idiot, and does not reason. The farmer who would do this would fire his own barn and hay-stack because a tramp had hidden in or under it. The farmer who has no more sense than to war against capital and money because it is abused, would burn his own grain-bin to free himself from the annoyance of rats. This reasoning presumes that the farmer is a fool; that he follows demagogues, and does not think; that he takes his ideas of political economy from the ignorant, and his morals from the vicious. The farmer is American, native-born, educated; he reads, he thinks, and he is not a destructive pessimist who hopes to better his condition by the new deal that comes from overturning the laws. To the farmers we look for good sound sense, and for honorable conduct. They are men of property. Their interest lies with property and not with the sand-lot demagogue, the political demagogue, or the foreign tramp.

The new party of misrule assumes another shape. David S. Terry succeeds Denis Kearney, and steps to the front as its leader. He brings no reinforcements. He has no retainers, no men-at-arms who gather around his banner. He is the black unplumed knight who rides into the arena with visor down. His leadership is appropriate. His career is not a bloodless one. From Lone Mountain there rises a silent shaft of marble bearing on it the name of a dead Senator who fell by his hand. Other memories crowd upon us as we peruse his speech at Platt's Hall, and amid the acclamations of the crowd hear him denounce "those fellows" who compose what we have been taught to regard as the best gentlemen of our State. Our Bourse is a "bunko shop," and its members "gamblers." The press that approves the adoption of the Constitution is "subsidized," its writers are "scribblers." After arraying bankers, merchants, land-owners, and business men, he says: "I would like to see some of these fellows go over to San Quentin, and I would "like to volunteer to prosecute them. And, then, when they went over to San Quentin, I would go over there and see them [applause], and see whether they had the same smile and the same self-satisfied smirk when dressed in striped clothes as when dressed in black broadcloth." We remember the time when this gentleman was prisoner-of-war to these same merchants whom he now denounces; when his life hung upon the wound made by his bloody knife in the throat of one Hopkins; when—brave man as we believe him to be—his face was pale with terror lest the funeral procession of his victim should witness a scene like that which occurred when the murdered body of James King of William passed to its burial. We remember, and was one of an earnest band, that tried to bridge this fearful chasm that divided classes then. Were Judge Terry's sympathies then with those who composed the party of Misrule vs. Law and Order? We thought not, and in our mind had condoned the offense. In the long and bloody civil strife, Judge Terry was again in opposition to our ideas of national duty. This chasm, too, we have aided to bridge. And now upon this question of the adoption of a new Constitution, we suggest that there should be no occasion to stir up the passions and resentments of the mob; that a calmer discussion is more becoming to gentlemen with histories; and that the last person in California to suggest the sending to the State Prison of "those fellows" who, in defense of property, and in the exercise of political privileges, happen to differ from him in their opinions of an organic law, is the Hon. David S. Terry.

The Chronicle is bloody, bold, and resolute. It has risked its existence upon the issue of the constitutional fight. It defies an hundred Richmonds. It is inexpressibly eager for the fray. It has staked its kingdom for a (hobby) horse, and it is riding it to death. Lance in hand, and mounted on its Rozinante, it defies giant-armed windmills of its own imagination. It plunges with reckless audacity into innumerable flocks of bloody-minded and desperate sheep. It strikes about itself with the energy of unutterable despair, and wades fingers deep in ink. One of its profoundest strategies is to proclaim victory before the battle is fought. It prophesies. It names the counties where majorities are to be had, and gives the figures of an assured triumph. It has gathered, through its agents and subscribers, three hundred and thirty-five letters—some gushing, some doubtful, some sanguine—and from them all computes a triumph to the party of misrule. In the first place, no one writes other than partial letters to the Chronicle. If they were received, they would not be published. Carefully examined, they do not justify the figures made upon them. We venture the prophecy that the Constitution will not be adopted, and from the following statement our readers can make their own figures. We marshal the friends and enemies of this hotch-potch work of Kearney as follows:

FOR THE CONSTITUTION.

The San Francisco Chronicle	0,000

We shall rejoice when this constitutional fight is over, and the victory won. That it will terminate in victory we can not doubt, for we have an abiding faith in the intelligent judgment of all the honest-minded classes of our California community. The most unpleasant feature of this conflict is that it has become a class conflict. Demagogues and selfish persons have successfully stirred the passions and excited the jealousy of the less intelligent and less prosperous portion of our people, till they are now conducting a political campaign with all the vindictiveness of personal hate. It is especially unfortunate that in such a campaign the organic law of our State should be determined. We shall be delighted when the thing is over and we can sink back into the healthful repose of our industrial pursuits; when our nerves can be relaxed from the strain and tension of this abnormal and excited condition of public affairs. If the newly-proposed experiment of constitutional enactment is defeated, we shall at once, and with earnest vigor, resume our wonted vocations, and the one hundred and fifty thousand men now in unrest, doubt, and agitation, as the outcome of an election involving the prosperity of the State, will be prepared to go to work with new energy. Our national finances are in a prosperous condition, as indicated by the fact that one hundred and ninety millions of dollars are offered for our four per cent. bonds. Prosperity has returned to the East, and its swelling wave will soon be upon us. Our city is full of money, awaiting the time when, confidence being restored, it may step out and engage itself in industrial enterprises. Our season promises us a plentiful harvest. Millions of cents of grain will employ hundreds of ships; wool, wine, and fruit will be produced in abundance; labor will be plentiful; real estate values will recuperate, and California will become what it was before an unfortunate season prompted the demagogical to stir the hateful passions of the vicious and the idle. The undeniably good features of the new Constitution may, by Legislative amendments, be engrafted upon the old. Labor and capital will come into more friendly relations. Prosperity and progress will be renewed, and life once more become endurable in a country where every condition should contribute to the happiness of its people.

The following article from the Evening Bulletin is the clear expression of an important truth. It furnishes a germ of thought for wise and prudent citizens to consider: "There never was a new Constitution drafted in America under the circumstances which attended that proceeding in California. The Convention was the outcome of a class fight, as bitter and uncompromising as ever took place in the older civilizations of Europe. This is something that never before occurred in the United States. All the other 'Conventions' that ever met were embodied according to American methods. The divisions were for the most part 'on general questions of policy, finance and administration.' The California Convention, on the contrary, was 'controlled by one class, by reason of its superior organization, meditating aggression upon all the others. The Constitution thus drafted corresponds with the peculiar circumstances of its evolution. It is intended to 'cinch' the industrious, prudent, and thrifty classes of the community for the benefit of the idle, vicious and reckless. The new Constitution is not only a wretched bungle and jumble, but it is wholly and absolutely un-American. It is the evidence that we have caught a foreign disease, against which our political constitution was heretofore considered 'to be proof. It may be an anomaly that there should be class animosity in a form of society in which there are 'practically no classes, and in which the best man, no matter what his station may be, wins. But however we may philosophize on the subject, we have it. The proposed new Constitution for California is the first real manifestation of European Communism in America. As such, it ought at least to be met with a full knowledge of all that such a curious political phenomenon implies."

There is great and growing dissatisfaction with the recently inaugurated Grand Opera season at Baldwin's. In the first place, there is nothing grand about it but the prices charged. In the second place, there is very little of opera about it, either in the voicing of the artists or their dramatic action. In the third place, the season is a swindle on those who have paid $50 a seat for twenty nights of something that the Strakosch contingent is not capable of presenting. The new opera—Carmen—is to be kept in the background evidently, till the first catch of subscribers have been buried in their disgust, and their seats are for sale a second time. And then who will sing the score? The few operas already presented have been so badly cut that it is horrible to contemplate the mutilation in the future; and as for the dramatic interpretation, may memory in mercy spare us. But this is the first week, and the ducats of the innocent are in the box office. When the tide turns, there may be better satisfaction given for the money.

In this uprising of our discontented and criminal element, which has given us just cause for alarm, the Catholic clergy have done most excellent service on the side of good government. The Archbishop of the diocese and the lesser clergy—as we are informed—without exception, have done all they could to instruct the intelligent of their different congregations of the effects of this constitutional change, and have advised them properly in this connection. Whatever may be the result of this election, it is a pleasurable duty to admit that the laymen and clergymen of the Roman Catholic Church have done society a lasting service.

The following, from the Petaluma Argus, is a specimen of the candidacy of the Honorable John F. Swift for Governor. The interior journals are with great unanimity giving him a very kindly mention in this connection: "John F. Swift, of San Francisco, will be a prominent candidate before the Republican State Convention for Governor of the State. Mr. Swift is a man of acknowledged ability, and has an excellent general reputation. There are found in this county many who are his warm personal and political friends, and we believe he would lead the party to victory if he should receive the nomination."

The old Constitution renders any person who has fought a duel for ever ineligible to office in California. The Constitution contains no such provision. Hence the Hon. David S. Terry's political cocoanut.

KISSING.

"One may know by your kiss that your gin is excellent."—Boggar's Opera.

Kisses, according to scripture, are divided into eight kinds—the writer can not find mention of more—viz: Adoration, 1 Kings, xix, 18; Approbation, Proverbs, ii, 4; Reconciliation, 2 Sam., xiv, 33; Treachery, Matt., xxvi, 49; Salutation, Sam., xx, 41; Affection, Gen., xlv, 15; Subjection, Psalms, ii, 12, and Valediction, Ruth, ii, 9. Kissing is a very dangerous subject for an old bachelor to write upon, inasmuch as the freedom of a fair maiden's lips is often the provocative to the commission of matrimony. But, lest the reader be disappointed that we have no personal recollections to unfold, and therefore disinclined to read this article, we may as well remark that it is intended more to collect other's opinions than to give our own crude ideas. We believe it will scarcely be disputed that the female sex is much more fond of this harmless amusement than their sterner brethren:

"Men scorn to kiss among themselves,
And scarce will kiss a brother;
Women often want to kiss so bad,
They smack and kiss each other!"

Nor is this entirely out of nature. Were we inclined to be a kissist—which by our snowy beard is impossible—we think, nay, we feel positive, that we should prefer a youthful maiden to receive our salute. The insinuation that some young ladies are fond of mouths thatched with a hideous moustache is doubtless a contemptible slander. Their own smooth cheeks and rosy mouths are far preferable and so they must feel. Sidney Smith says: "There is much virtue in a kiss when well delivered. We have had the memory of one we received in our youth, which has lasted us forty years, and we believe it will be one of the last things we think of when we die."

"This is no world," as Hotspur said,
"For kissing lips and mammetts maid."

Yet how fond was Shakspeare of this "lip-business." You can not read a single play of the great master without finding a world of talk about lips and kisses. There are an infinity of examples:

"He kissed—the last of many doubled kisses."

"We'll e'en butt kiss Octavia, and we'll follow."

"There is gold, and here
My bluest veins to kiss: a hand that kings
Have lipp'd, and trembled kissing."

"Give me a kiss—e'en this repays me."

"I shall return once more to kiss these lips."

"This is a soldier's kiss."

"Commend unto his lips thy favoring hand;
Kiss it, my warrior."

"Come, then, and take the last warmth of my lips."

All this, and more, in one play—and that a very deep tragedy. It is said that the true origin of this gracious interchange of soul comes from the far east, and that it is symbolic of the sun's rays greeting the earth:

"Kiss, sunbeams, kiss
The dear old face of earth,
And bring the sap to the bursting bud,
And bring the flower to birth!
Kiss, kiss, and kiss!"

Kissing among the heathens was a religious ceremony. Cicero tells us of the statue of Hercules, of which the chin and lips were worn away by the constant kissing of the worshippers. The refined Greeks celebrated nothing so much as the kiss. Anacreon tells us that he dreamed of asking a beautiful girl for a kiss, and just as he was about to receive it he unfortunately awoke and lost it, and he "felt in vain the torturing wish to sleep again." John Milton! "Glorious John!" You were a married man; you knew it to your cost. How, then, with a Xantippe of a wife before your eyes, and her harsh voice ringing in your ears—how could you paint the delights (?) of matrimony with those beautiful lines from Paradise Lost:

"In delight,
Both of her beauty and submissive charms,
Smiled with superior love, as Jupiter
On Juno smiles, when he impregns the clouds
That shed May-flowers, and pressed her matron lip
With kisses pure."

The kiss matrimonial is of the greatest moment, and should be guarded carefully, as often depends on it the weal or woe of the future happiness of Hymen's representatives. It nourishes the affections and revives "love's young dreams," which, without the natural stimulants, would smoulder upon the altar of hope until the ashes of remembrance only were left to mark its presence. Who does not remember "rare Ben Jonson's" song:

"Drink to me only with thine eyes,
And I will pledge with mine;
Or leave a kiss within the cup,
And I'll not look for wine."

"In the time of Tudor, kissing for good manners' sake was the rule of society. The victor of the tournament could challenge the lips of the fairest fair whose bright eyes looked down upon his doughty deeds, and the proudest dame had to yield to his demand."—London Mirror. And before footing it in the dance the ladies curtsied, and were kissed by their partners. Many of the dances had kissing accompaniments, and gentlemen were held unmannerly if they refrained to kiss again at the end of the dance. There must have been rather strong kissing going on in Shakspeare's time.

"Then kissed me hard,
As if he plucked up kisses by the roots,
That grew upon my lips."

From the following we may conclude that in Beaumont's day some of the ladies, at least, had a prudent and economical idea on this subject:

"Kiss you first, my lord? 'tis no fair fashion;
Our lips are like rose-buds; blown with men's breaths
They lose both sap and savor."

Tom Moore was no friend to bashful and timid kissing. He says:

"We'll kiss, and kiss in quick delight,
And murmur, while we kiss, good night."

"Once he drew
With one long kiss my whole soul through
My lips, as the sunlight drinketh dew."

But enough of that. Lest the youthful reader may be weary of the garrulous disquisition of such an old fellow, we will create a diversion by introducing the following story, which is as short as it is heart-rending:

"Abigail Brown,
In a bran new gown,
Went down to see her sister;
When Jonathan Lee,
As brisk as a flea,
Jumped right up and kissed her."

We never learned whether Abigail survived the assault. The fashionable kiss is a very common method of salutation among ladies, which occurs generally upon every encounter, whether public or private, and is excessively violent after an absence of seven entire days:

"And parting—what deceit is this?
Each wiped away the other's kiss."

The lover's kiss is the first offering he makes upon the altar whereon he worships, and is sometimes bestowed indiscriminately when the senses and judgment are greatly at variance, much to the mystifying of many fair ones. Young ladies, generally, whatever relish they may have for kisses from their cher amant, are not wont to publish the fact. The philosophers and fools of all nations have acknowledged the delight of kissing; though not, perhaps, in the same degree, as we suppose that must depend, in a great measure, upon the culture and refinement of the heart and brain. The first lesson in kissing is taught in our very infancy, and we all bear the imprint of a mother's kiss—that sacred, passionless kiss that is so full of earnestness, deep love, and quiet joy—that bears with it a love unfathomable and undying. Truly, a mother's love is unselfish, and the only one that can be considered so. Though sometimes dimmed, it is as imperishable as the glance of a diamond. C. S.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 6, 1879.

What a wonderful list of crotchety, soured, dyspeptic, poor, and disappointed old curmudgeons have crawled out of the shadows of their disappointed lives to work against the old law. They have been neglected by the people, or fancy they have; they are poor, and don't like it; they are not in office, and think they ought to be; they are great men in their own opinions, and in no one else's. One is at war with God, another with his fellow-man, and all with fate. Nearly every mother's son of them have been in office, and every one thinks he ought to have the privilege of dying in office. Some have wrecked themselves with drink; some have at heart the undying worm of a great crime that burdens their conscience and blights their lives; some are wicked, and all are dyspeptic, sour, and jealous. We do not know of a single prominent citizen who, possessing all the following qualifications of happiness, favors the new Constitution: Sound health, a competency, a happy home, a belief in God, a conscience void of offense, a good digestion, honest and profitable employment, and good sound sense.

The fuss that the Swiss are making over the chapel of William Tell is amusing, for the said William is only not one of the meanest scamps that ever lived because in all probability he never did live. According to tradition this hero flourished in 1307, but this tradition never assumed an historical form until it was incorporated by Müller into his History of Switzerland, in 1781. Now, if there is one thing more positive than another, it is that verbal traditions above one century old are absolutely worthless. But what is the tradition? Tell was told that he must either lose his own life or risk that of his own child by firing at an apple placed on the child's head. He did not hesitate a moment, but accepted the latter alternative. He had not even confidence in his own skill, for he kept another arrow, with which he intended to kill Gessler if his first arrow had entered the brain of his child. Then later on, to avenge himself, he skulked behind a rock, and as Gessler was unsuspectingly passing along the road assassinated him. And this is the traditional hero of Switzerland! Had he been alive to-day he would be a Swiss landlord.—Truth.

A negro minister, who married rather sooner after the death of his wife than some of the sisters thought proper and becoming, excused himself as follows: "My dear brethren and sisters, my grief was greater than I could bear. I turned every way for peace and comfort, but none came. I searched de scriptures from Genisis to Revelation; plenty of promises to de widder, but nary one to the widderer. So I took it dat de Lord didn't waste sympathy on a man when it was in his power to comfort himself, and having a first-rate chance to marry in de Lord I did so, and would do it again. Besides, brethren, I consider that poor Betsy was just as dead as she would ever be."

A teacher in one of the public schools was startled the other day at the answer she got from one bright little fellow. On the black-board was the picture of an ostrich, and the teacher described its great strength and power of endurance, closing by saying it was the only bird upon which a man could ride. "I know another," spoke up a little chap. "Well, what is it?" "A lark." Unsuspectingly, the teacher asked, "How can you prove that, Johnny?" "All I know about it," said the boy, "is that mother every little while says father's off on a lark, and when he comes home he looks as if he had rode awful fast."

A fashion which has spread rapidly in France is that of paying calls and taking afternoon tea in bonnet and gloves, without any cloak or jacket. Parisian ladies can not any longer endure the temporary sacrifice of outline which an out-door garment entails. The visitor, therefore, drops her wrap in the hall or ante-room; so that un cachemire, which was thirty years ago the one joy in the life of a Parisienne, is likely to become so again.

An Albany clergyman told his congregation that "notwithstanding the hard times the wages of sin had not been cut down one iota." True, but there's a heap more work done for the money than there used to be.

ABOUT WOMEN.

Lady Dufferin is said to be extravagantly fond of dress.

The Boston girls take their knitting work to morning lectures.

It used to be rather bluntly put, "Wine and Women." Now it is liquor and ladies.

A Flatbush man's wife has borne him twenty children, and now he calls her "baby mine."

It is whispered around that Doctress Mary Walker wears hat-rack hooks where her suspender-buttons ought to be.

"We old maids," remarked Miss Stebbins, "love cats because we have no husbands, and cats are almost as treacherous as men."

Miss Backus trains the Vassar girls in elocution. She whistles to the trains four times, and they understand that it means "Back-us!"

Mrs. Lockwood, the only lady ever admitted to practice in the Supreme Court of the United States, is fifty years old, is tall, has gray hair and fine eyes.

A young woman at Williams, Iowa, in returning her beau's ring, sent it to him through the mail with a tag tied to it, saying on its reverse, "I hate to, but I must!"

The last sensation in Paris is Cora, "the lions' bride." She claims to be an American, and lives in a den with hyenas, bears, lions, and other ferocious beasts.

The man who told his wife that she had made a fool of him was answered with positive denial: "Because," said the lady, "in that respect you are a self-made man." Which was repartee to a husband.

Miss Phoebe Cousins is lecturing on "The Mistakes of Eve." She and Bob Ingersoll should hunt in couples. What Robert and Phoebe don't know about the mistakes of Moses and Eve is scarcely worth knowing.

A Minnesota man found a beautiful young squaw almost frozen to death. He took her to his camp-fire and tried to thaw her out. When she had melted a little he proposed marriage and was accepted. They are now 1.

Mrs. Willis, an aged lady of Cumberland County, Ky., died recently and left $1,000 to the editor of the Glasgow (Ky.) Times in token of the comfort she had found in reading his paper in her sorrow. Now, every paper in that section of the country is catering to the comfort of aged women.

This is from the advertisement of a concert in Machias, N. Y.: "Miss Julia A. Moore will delight with two hours of song, including the latest and best, 'Grandfather's Clock,' which will be sung with a power and pathos seldom heard in this country, even from the much-advertised Italian opera singers."

A gentleman, having occasion to praise a kind-hearted Irish woman for her good deeds, said to her: "Well, well, Kate, if there is a heaven in the next world you will get to it." As quick as lightning came the reply, with all the heartiness of her race: "God bless you, Mr. P., an' sure if I do, I'll lave the gate open for you."

The proudest moment of a mother's life is just after she has trimmed the bair of her young hopeful, using the edge of a bowl to guide the shears evenly around the intellectual forehead. It is then she gazes on him with the fondest maternal hopes, and sees a strong and striking resemblance to Mr. Charley Warren Stoddard.

The Empress of Austria and Queen Victoria have had a little tiff. The Empress can not forget that the Queen let her remain in the railway station waiting for a train a year since, after she had called at Windsor Castle; and when an invitation was sent to her to attend the recent royal wedding at the same place, she declined very curtly, as any other woman would do under similar circumstances.

"Oh, I am going to die. Won't you all forgive me? The grave will be so lonesome," said Maggie Silvers, of Zanesville, when her friends found her in the agonies of self-inflicted death at midnight. She was eighteen years old, and had some trouble, no one knew what. At two o'clock she died. The world must have looked very dark to the young girl when it drove her to the grave which she dreaded because it would be "so lonesome."

A New York lady, who is passing the winter in Florence, recently gave a grand ball which was attended by a very large and distinguished company. A surprise figure in the cotillion excited much sensation by its novelty. A large tree was brought in, from which were hung paper baskets, that, on being pulled, divided into halves and gave escape to numbers of little birds that flew about the ball-room until let out of the window or rescued by some fair hand to be taken home and cared for.

The following American ladies have been married to British peers or the sons of peers since 1825: In 1825, Mrs. Patterson, eldest daughter of Richard Caton, of Maryland, to the Marquis of Wellesley; in 1828, Louisa, third daughter of Richard Caton, and widow of Sir Felton Bathurst Hervey, bart., to the Duke of Leeds; in 1836, Louisa, second daughter of Richard Caton, to Lord Stafford; in 1845, Mary, daughter of John McTavish, of Baltimore, to the Hon. Henry John Howland, brother of the late Earl of Carlisle and the Duchess of Sutherland; in 1850, Elizabeth, sister to the late Gen. Wadsworth, of Geneseo, to the Hon. Sir Charles Augustus Murray, son of the Earl of Dunmore; in 1852, Ellen, daughter of Edmund Dwight, of Boston, to the Hon. Edward Turner Boyd Twistleton, son of Lord Saye and Sele; in 1874, Miss Jerome, daughter of Leonard Jerome, of New York, to Lord Randolph Churchill, son of the Duke of Marlborough; in 1876, Miss Consuelo Yznaga, of New York, to Viscount Mandeville, heir apparent of the Duke of Manchester; and in 1877, Sophia, daughter of S. Wells Williams, of New Haven, to the Hon. Thomas George Grosvenor, son of Lord Ebury. If to these should be added the names of American ladies wedded to grandsons of peers, baronets or knights, the list would be considerably extended.

Recently a young man was presented in a family where there is a marriageable daughter, and as soon as he had taken his leave the friend who had introduced him said to the father, "Well, how would he suit you for a son-in-law, hey?"

"Very well, indeed," says the father.

"All right," suppose he comes round to-morrow and proposes?"

Father (with dignity)—"To-morrow? Pooh, pooh! what are you thinking of? That would be indecent haste. Say the day after to-morrow."

When the triangle had called the meeting to order, Brother Gardner arose with his usual sleekness, and said:

"Gentlemen, if it wasn't for de wheels on a waggin, de waggin wouldn't move. When de wheels am on, den what?"

"Grease," solemnly exclaimed the old man Toots, "K'rect," whispered the president, softly rubbing his hands together. "We has de waggin and de wheels. We now pass de hat aroun' for de grease."

THE MASONIC SAVINGS AND LOAN BANK, Plaintiff, vs. EDWARD MAGUIRE and ELIZA MAGUIRE, Defendants.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to Edward Maguire and Eliza Maguire.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein (a copy of which accompanies this summons) within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons; if served within this county; if served out of this county, but within this judicial district, within twenty days; or if served out of said district, then within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court for the foreclosure of a certain mortgage described in the complaint and executed by the said Edward Maguire and Eliza Maguire on the 4th day of June, A. D. 1877, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note made by said Edward Maguire at the same time for the sum of three thousand dollars cash, and interest, provided in said note, payable to plaintiff, or its order, and taxes, street assessments, and attorneys' fees at ten per cent, on the amount found due, and costs, all in gold coin; that the premises conveyed by said mortgage may be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of said promissory note, interest, taxes, street assessments, and attorneys' fees, and costs, all in gold coin; and in case the proceeds are not sufficient to pay the same, then to obtain an execution against said Edward Maguire for the balance remaining due; and also that the said defendants, and all persons claiming by, through, or under them may be barred and foreclosed of all right, title, claim, lien, equity of redemption, and interest to said mortgage premises, and for other and further relief.

And if you fail to appear and answer said complaint, as above required, the plaintiff will take default against you and apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 13th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY A. WOOTEN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN WOOTEN, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to John Wooten, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons; if served within this county; or if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made, and for costs of this suit, counsel fees, and alimony; also for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 13th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

AN INTERCEPTED LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 17, 1879.

MY DEAR GIRL:—The great Strakosch Opera Troupe, following upon the trail of all the advertisements, the puffery, and the lithographs, is here at last, and, if ever you saw Emerson's beatitude in the human face, it was in the faces of at least fifteen hundred people, on Monday night, at Baldwin's Theatre. The consciousness of being well-dressed is, indeed, a glorifier and a beautifier, and what not else. Everybody who is anybody was there, and so were the half nobodies, who hang like fringe upon the petticoats of the somebodies. There were people floating around who are worth so many millions that it makes a poor body's brain reel to estimate them; and there were people there worth so few cents that I could see their neighbors look at them speculatively through their iorgnettes, and wonder how they got in. As usual, they enjoyed themselves in their three several ways. There were those who understand music, and who, though coldly keenly critical, enjoy it. There were those of that other and larger class to whom the opera is an undefinable ecstasy, who thrill with enjoyment to their finger tips without attempting to analyze the sensation. You can see their gleaming eyes, their flushed cheeks, their parted lips all around you. They love the sextet in Lucia, the quintet in Martha, the inspiring Faust choruses, the weird Aida strains. The dramatic action, the lights, the costumes, the thread of the story are not bare accessories to the noble art of music, but parts of one harmonious whole. They revel in a mystery of sound, which they do not seek to understand, yet intuitively they are critics, and their judgment is infallible. These are they who make or mar an artist's first night. They are not to be stirred by bouquets or claque. They are as irresponsible as a cracked drum to anything but the soul of the singer. The third class of opera-goers were abroad that night as well. They go to the opera because it is the correct thing. They fear to consult the libretto lest they be suspected of not knowing the score. They enjoy themselves during the first hour; after that the whole affair is an ineffable bore. I got a peep at the gallery the other night, the way-up-top-high-as-Haman gallery, and there were not many of its usual tenants. I observed, instead, a number of young men of musical taste, who preferred six operas at fifty cents apiece to one opera at three dollars. Sensible move. These are of the kind who really enjoy the music. There was intense expectancy in every eye, as we all sat gazing at the red lambrquin a little after eight o'clock. By the way, what an improvement it would be to that great satin marvel of upholstery, if some one would get up and brush the dust off. It is an offense to the eye as it stands. When it did swing the familiar faces that have beamed upon us all our lives from the opera stage were discovered, arranged in an exact semicircle, with their eyes all fastened upon the conductor with that basilisk gaze which distinguishes the chorus singer who has hammered away at these familiar airs for half a century, and does not yet know at which bar to begin. One by one in their proper order were introduced to the various artists. Pantaleoni, the baritone, has thus far carried off the honors, if such things have been going about, but more by force of contrast than anything else. He is a strapping big fellow, as they all are, and is chiefly remarkable for a pair of muscular extremities in which the vertical line is much disturbed by curvilinear variations. He has a big, well-trained voice, but rugged as an untamed rock. However, Madge, I will not weary you with technicalities. If you want to know the Italian name of his arias, consult your libretto; and if you want to know how he sang them, read the musical criticisms. You know, Madge, I never see anything from a string and brass point of view. Therefore, to me, Pantaleoni was simply a well-looking man with a big, un-mellow voice, which he managed artistically. He is a good actor as actors go in opera, where they are generally such unpardonable sticks. I liked him better as "Alphonso of Castile" in La Favorita on Wednesday night; but, but, he is not, as a Belfast girl would say, "anything to make a song about." Now, the tenor is a real nice little boy with a nice little voice, and he sings in such a nice little way while the little organ holds out, that an audience really feels quite like patronizing him. But Lazzarini must be kept carefully put away. He can only sing one night a week, for on Wednesday night the little voice could not stand the strain of the last act of La Favorita, and two or three little breaks betrayed its weakness. To say truth, however, he did sing "Spirito gentil" very prettily. I will say that much in Italian because there seems to be no English for it. There was something else there which came to the front as "Lucia's" bridegroom, and emitted a faint noise on a false key, something between a shriek and a howl. It had the temerity to appear again on Wednesday night, when I looked at the bills and found that its name was Barberis. I also consulted the prints, and found it ranked as a tenore leggero. Dear girl, it was the legere-iest tenor I ever heard. And for this we pay $3 a night. However, his feet seemed as weak and uncertain as his voice, and there are strong hopes that he will soon give out. Then came Litta. I could feel the wave of disappointment surge through the house as she came in, a little pale and a little trembling. Poor girl, she has nothing on earth to recommend her at first sight. A prima donna more hopelessly and irredeemably plain I never saw. But this very plainness had in it a sort of an appeal which softened the heart, for we knew that of one woman's weakness, at least, she must be utterly guiltless. Marie Roze, in white satin and diamonds and in all the glory of her acknowledged beauty, sat not five feet distant in a stage box, and the contrast made it an ordeal. In addition, poor Litta was dressed like a guy. It is all very well to say that these things should not be regarded or spoken of. They have their effect; and any woman badly dressed, in whatever position of life or under whatever circumstances, is placed at a signal disadvantage. If the apparel oft proclaims the man, it always proclaims the woman, so far as a first appearance before a public is concerned. No management has a right to permit a woman with God-given talent to array herself in a garment which some of the chorus singers around her would reject. If she has neither the taste, the sense, nor the money to dress herself, the management should do it for her. And Litta is worthy the attention. She is not a great artist, and perhaps never will be, but she is very pleasing. Her voice, though light, is sweet and well-cultured; and, wonderful to say, she knows just how much voice she has. Of course she acts mechanically; we never expect anything else. The divine afflatus fills the lyric breast but in one form, save only now and then, as in the case of Annie Louise Cary. She sang the mad scene in such a way as to call forth the only tempest of applause which has sounded within the walls of Baldwin's Theatre this week. Marie Roze's reception was actually frigid. Perhaps in all the range of opera she could not have selected one less favorable for a first appearance than La Favorita. She has been heralded as a soprano assoluta, and she elects an opera in which "O mio Fernando," the contralto's darling, is the principal aria. Ah, when I thought of Anna Drasilli's deep, rich, soul-moving voice thrilling through the great pavilion, I yearned to hear the real music of this beautiful air once more; but I was obliged to "tell my soul to cease its yearning" and listen to Marie Roze. She is as pretty as the first peach-blossom, but she has a short fat throat and a small mouth, and you know the voice that always accompanies these. She has a few rich velvety notes, but velvet is really not a good thing in voices, and there is no thing to hers. It is empty, expressionless. It never peals out with elastic effect; it never startles you out of yourself. You never feel that the lyre in her throat will break with the flood of sound; that the fable of the dying swan is no myth; in fact, you feel nothing in particular. Can it be possible that this woman has sung on two continents and the big little island with success, and can give us nothing more than she gave us as "Leonora"? It is true, it is not a showy opera, and that the tenor has the best part, and that nearly all the good music is in the last act; and even with the last act, with a monk and a nun in unbecoming costume having a love quarrel at the foot of a rickety-looking cross, is not unspeakably attractive. Upon the whole, Madge, I think I will defer forming my prejudices, for I opine that I have seen Litta at her best and Roze at her worst. Cary comes out tonight in Il Trovatore, when she will have to brown up and make herself look as hideous as possible. But what matter? The public will be so glad to see her, and she is so incomparably the best of the troupe, that she can tattoo herself and it will be all right. She and Conly are all that come back of the old troupe, and there is a hail and welcome for both. You will think, Madge, that with everybody gone to the opera there was no one left to see Boucicault, but it is astonishing what a lot of people are left after "everybody" is gone. Firstly, the regular "caryatids" of the California, as Mirger styles them, never abandon the place on an opening night. Come weal or come woe, they are there at their posts. Then the decorations had their attraction. They are not any more beautiful than the old, but they are new and handsome, and the place is deliciously clean. A tiled floor has been laid in the vestibule, and it is once again the pleasant theatre to town. What is the charm of the rollicking "Shanghrai" that he draws crowds wherever he goes to witness his impossible adventures and hair-breadth escapes? It can't be in the play, for it is like twenty others, with the stereotyped cast of characters taken from different degrees of Irish life—the priest, the peasant, the gentry, and the villain. Ah, the charm is in the little old man himself, who has a dexterous way of his own of weaving mother-wit and a three-fold tale with a new warp. They may call him the arch plagiarist if they will, but the same materials have lain under the hands of every man to profit by it if he had brains enough to use them. A wonderful make up, this of "Conn's," at a little distance, but as we draw nearer there are multitudes of crows' feet peering through the paint; yet the wrinkles make twinkles, and he has a merry eye as well as a keen one. He is something of a humbug, too, as one must be to succeed. I like to see him play upon the audience. He catches its spirit so quickly; he gauges it so accurately. What fol-de-rol is all this stuff about his interest in Fenianism and the Irish cause! No public man of to-day is more eminently a citizen of the world than Dion Boucicault. But as everything about the theatre is sham and unreal a bit of clap-trap sentiment now and then will do no harm, especially if it pleases some one. "Conn" is not a part which requires much more than a good brogue. It is incident which carries the play, and the characters, with truest art, reveal themselves by the action. In any case there is not much to them, for they are a very real set of people, though placed in exceptional circumstances. As a matter of course, the distinguished characteristic is a fusillade of Irish wit. Next to this in point of interest comes the scenery. Boucicault has a fancy for eccentric scenic effects. Who will ever forget the first sight of the treadmill ivy wall up which "Shano the Post" climbed. The revolving prison in The Shaughraun is its twin. The moonlit ruins of St. Bridget's Abbey, and the sudden fire on the great rock headland in the distance, made a striking picture—as, for that matter, all the scenes did. Next to the wit and the scenery came the people. They have secured a charming little soubrette. She is full of life, action, expression, vim. She is not pretty, strictly speaking, but she has a pair of nice big eyes, and she is as trim and neat as a little doll. Perhaps her charm is that she is perfectly at home upon the stage, and understands its business to a nicety. Jeffreys-Lewis played "Clare," and it brought Miss Pateman back so strongly. Miss Lewis is very nice, of course—nice is such a nice, easy word—and she looks very pretty, and she is a very spirited and piquant "Clare." She has the pedestrian mania badly. The amount of vigorous exercise which this young woman accomplishes in one evening in those long strides of hers is something extraordinary. A gallery boy, in the ardor of appreciation the other night, called out "Go it, O'Leary," and she went it. Miss Prescott plays "Arte O'Neal," and wears her black eyebrows. I observed nothing else remarkable enough about the impersonation to report to you. Charles Welles, who, they say, has been promoted to be leading man, had rather a difficult task to replace Montague in a not difficult part, and the young man really did it rather well. He has a way of shouting as if at a signal master in the distance, which makes him distinctly, if not painfully, audible, and has not an exactly colloquial effect. But he is trim, always well dressed, has a good carriage, and rather good address, though with not quite the deference sometimes that might be desired, and is altogether a very acceptable young man. They might easily have done worse than to make him leading man. The villains I need tell you nothing about. All Irish rascals—in plays—are alike. I suppose The Shaughraun will run a fabulous length of time. Meanwhile the Bush St. Theatre is being closed for repairs, and we shall not have much drama for a time, since the last I heard of the Baldwin regulars they had all arrested for playing in the Passion Play. I think an actor is reducing his standard to a pretty low level when he panders to vulgar curiosity by playing in the Passion Play if he can help himself, and yet, perhaps, he is doing better than in supporting Tom Fitch in his burlesque of so great a part as that of "Richelieu." Dear Madge, fancy if you can that "My Lord Cardinal Armand Duc de Richelieu" on the stump making an apostrophe to the American eagle about election time, and you will have some idea of the travesty. Where is the famous voice of this silver-tongued orator? It is as harsh as a cracked bell, and as uncontrollable as a pranksy hoodlum. It would not out, but fled back in his throat with every speech, and struggled there with guttural tones and short breath. How exquisitely modulated seemed Robinson's voice in contrast, and what a queer old cardinal Fitch was any how. Absolutely, it was not worth criticism, and he had the grace to say as much himself when, for some reason or other, the legal fraternity called him before the curtain. Then his foot was upon his native heath, so to speak, and he made a speech singularly truthful and clever. I almost believed that he knew what a really bad piece of work he had made of it till he announced his intention of playing it again the next night. I would give you a resumé of its faults but that I do not care to make a "corner" in paper; so I desist and bid you good-bye. Truly yours, BETSY B.

THE OPERA SEASON.

At last, then, after a grand flourish of trumpets in all conceivable keys, relieved by a fortissimo of trombones and horns and tremendous rattle of side-drums, we have our season of Italian Grand Opera in full swing, everybody—including "books of the op—" ticket speculators, and picture hawkers—in line of battle, and the first attack given with the customary Strakoschian elan. And a right plucky attack it was, too, that of last Monday evening; one delivered straight at the weak point of our public, with its heart of the coquilles and ear of the province; one that proved the manager an expert at his business, and we a good-natured set of gulls who deserve to be served in precisely this manner, since we seem to like it; one that leaves it pretty clear that this is a good town for an operatic manager with never so weak a company so that he have but plenty of assurance and the ear of the public. Not but that the performance of last Monday was a respectable one. It was just that and no more. It was an evenly mediocre, second rate opera (excepting, perhaps, the orchestra, which, all things considered, was very good, and the chorus, which was evenly bad) at first rate prices. Wednesday ditto, with chorus a little better, and orchestra not by far so good. Again at three dollars a seat! Which, with Baldwin's filled as it was, and will probably be for some time, represents nightly receipts of at least three thousand dollars for opera that ought not to cost more than twelve hundred dollars a night to produce, and would be dear at that. I fancy that Mr. Strakosch likes San Francisco, and don't wonder at it, either.

Monday evening's performance of Lucia brought the debut of Miss Maria Litta, a young American soprano of whom much has been made in some of our Eastern cities, and who is even said to have had a good debut in Paris. Miss Litta may have sung in Paris, and may even have had fair success there; that is not so difficult to obtain—if one manages rightly. But for all that she is a singer whom I fancy no one will care to hear a second time, and who I think must be considered unfortunate in the great ecclat that attended her first appearance here, since I can not imagine her success as enduring past a few representations. She has a pure, high soprano voice, plenty of execution, and sings well in time. But the voice is not in any sense a beautiful one; it has neither richness of timbre nor sympathetic quality. It is simply a good average soprano in good training. This might be very well if its possessor were personally attractive, or, lacking this, a good actress. But Miss Litta is neither of these. She is simply a plain young lady, of gauche manners and unlovely appearance, who has evidently not the first idea of acting. She did not even make, in her songs, the dramatic points that we are accustomed to in the concert room. She sung in the ensembles as though she were thinking only of the soprano part; as though the others could very well take care of themselves, and were welcome to do it, too. It was the "Lucia" of the conservatoire, given with the correctness of a lesson newly learned, and the awkwardness of one who does not seem to have the capacity to do more than merely sing the music correctly. To do anything with the part one should make of it something besides a mere exhibition of correct vocalization, a footlight display of scales and trills. This, however, is all that Miss Litta can do. But this she does well.

Madame Marie Roze, for whose debut La Favorita was given on Wednesday evening, lacking, as she does, the qualities that made the success of Miss Litta on Monday, viz., the higher register and florid school of the soprano legere, possesses in an eminent degree others for which our public does not much care, and was consequently received in a very frigid manner. Madame Roze has a mezzo-soprano voice of no great power, but exquisitely sympathetic; a technique entirely adequate for dramatic parts, but not sufficient to compel admiration; a beautiful mobile face, and the dramatic feeling that makes her one with her part. She is not by any means a great singer, but she has all the qualities that go to the making of a fine artist. I do not feel that it would be quite right to attempt a criticism of an artist whom I have seen only in the very trying situation of being obliged to face an audience which, feeling that it has made an absurd display of gush over a crude singer one night, was more conservative the next. Madame Roze felt this from the moment of her first entry upon the stage; it interfered with the free delivery of her voice, and made it clearly impossible for her to do full justice either to herself or her part, for she expected an enthusiastic reception. Yet she sang very beautifully. The voice, as I said before, is not strong and of very limited register. But it has lovely quality, is exceedingly sympathetic, and has an artist behind it. I can not but think that the great dramatic parts, "Aida," "Valentine," and others of like calibre will be too much for Madame Roze—in fact I know they will.

The error in the case of Madame Roze may, without question, be set down to the account of Mr. Strakosch, who, knowing precisely what she could do, had no sort of right to bring her out here in the capacity of dramatic prima donna in a company for which he makes the claims and charges that he does for this one. Mr. Strakosch knows perfectly well that he can not give a good representation of the Huguenots with Madame Roze as "Valentine" and Miss Litta as the "Queen," nor can he have any hope of even a fair performance of Don Giovanni. Yet both of these operas are announced, besides others of like difficulty. I doubt whether either of these ladies have ever sung the parts assigned to them in these operas; I have never heard of their doing so, and don't believe they would attempt it elsewhere. But for San Francisco almost anything is considered good enough. So that plenty of names are announced and plenty of ecclat made in order to secure the first subscription, what follows may take care of itself. Madame Roze is made to debut with a Tenor who has never sung the part before; with a conductor and a basso who only arrived the previous night, and with whom she has never sung, and consequently has a bad debut. But Madame Roze does not belong to Mr. Strakosch; she is only a temporary engagement, and consequently n'importe. The operas are given with every possible cut—even to the verge of absurdity—and (especially Lucia) with the shabbiest old scenery in the theatre. But it will do for San Francisco. Will it?

The orchestra is really very good, and—especially on Monday night—has done its work admirably, considering. Signor de Novellis proves himself an excellent conductor, who is in thorough sympathy with his singers, has the hand under perfect control, and is evidently quite at home in his work. I do not know when I have seen a better conductor of Italian opera; in this city we have had none so good.

Signor Lazzarini, whom we have now heard as "Edgardo" and "Fernando," has in these two parts had a fine opportunity to show himself at his best, since Donizetti has favored the tenor in both operas, although in La Favorita he gives him more than the lion's share of the work. Of his "Fernando" let me say here that it was sung for the first time and at very short notice, as an act of courtesy toward Mr. Adams, whose part it is, but who could not possibly arrive in time to sing it. When this is considered, it must be allowed that he sang the part extremely well. But as there did not seem to be the slightest point of difference between the "Fernando" of Wednesday and the "Edgardo" of Monday, I am inclined to think that in these two parts we have heard and seen all that there is of Signor Lazzarini, which is: a tenorino of very good timbre and even quality, limited register—a fairly good A natural at times, and once oo Wednesday, and with great effort, a B in chest—a dapper little figure and pleasing countenance, both of which are immobile to a painful degree, and a very correct intonation. He has youth in his favor, and, with two other tenors in the company, will do very well. That he has been cast for parts that are immeasurably beyond his present powers is probably no fault of his; a tenor is, after all, the servant of his master, the impresario, and Mr. Strakosch seems to be quite well aware of what is good enough for us—at $3 a seat.

With Signor Pantaleoni, the new baritone, we have many reasons to be content. He is not a great singer in any sense of the word. He is not even a great Italian baritone (they are never good singers), since his voice, although there are some fine upper notes (say from C upward), has no longer any depth (if it ever had much), and is weak in the middle register. But he is a singer of routine, who knows how to use what voice he has to the best advantage; sings carefully, has a fine stage presence, and acts fairly well. Signor Pantaleoni will be a success—already a success. He has precisely those vices that our public invariably accepts as virtues; he has the fine swagger that we love, and makes his vocal points with empressment. He delivers his E flats and F's with all the verve of the Verdi school, and makes a stunning effect with them. That he sings sharp whenever he forces his voice, and oftentimes a trifle flat when he does not, is a small matter when compared with a round, ringing F at the end of a cadenza. This is what the public understands to be Grand Italian Opera, and this Signor Pantaleoni can give us to our heart's content. And so Signor Pantaleoni is a success.

As far as heard from—"Balthazar" in La Favorita—Mr. Conly returns to us the same careful, painstaking artist we have known him in former seasons, with his fine bass voice—albeit, perhaps, showing somewhat of the weariness inseparable from the long journey which only brought him into town on Tuesday night—as pleasing and satisfying as ever. He gave his "Balthazar" with much dignity and earnestness, bringing it into bold relief as a character, and making some fine dramatic points. Signor Barberis, the second tenor, has a nice voice, which he uses with excellent discretion, and sang his bit in Lucia quite effectively. That he can not act goes without saying; second tenors never can.

I must get in a word of praise for the prompter, who has a fine, ringing voice, that was heard in the most remote part of the theatre throughout Wednesday's performance. I found it somewhat difficult to distinguish clearly whether he was prompting in tenor or bass, since the people on the stage would sing and the orchestra play during his solos (which, to say the least, was discourteous), but heard enough to convince me that he knew his part thoroughly and was determined that the audience should be made aware that he knew it. I take it to be an essential feature of Grand Italian Opera, that the grander the opera the louder the voice of the prompter; when we have the Huguenots, Aida, and all the other operas that the singers don't know, I suppose we shall have a brace of prompters at least (one shouting from each side of the stage), besides our friend of the green hood, around whom the singers hover so anxiously whenever they have a dozen bars to sing. If they have only good voices we ought not to mind it very much; it would not be difficult for them to be better than some of those on the stage.

A reporter of the Cincinnati Enquirer was sent to a hotel to interview General Sherman. The reporter sent up his card, and a young lady, attended by a footman, who was also in the reception-room, sent up her card at the same time. The messenger soon returned with two cards from General Sherman, and the clerk handed one to the reporter, the other to the footman. The reporter read the card that had been handed to him, while his hair stood on end:

"Regret exceedingly that I can't come. Give my love to your mother and assure her I have not forgotten old times. Hope the soirée will be a success, as I'm sure it will be. Pardon the witticism when I say that yours truly is very soiree he can't be present."

"W. T. S."

The reporter had just finished reading, and realized the mistake that had been made, when, looking up, he saw whirl away the carriage which contained the young lady. Just then a card bearing the following rude inscription dropped from the lady's nerveless hand and fluttered to the ground:

"Go to h—l! What do I care about the army, the Chinese bill, the coolie trade, the Presidential question, or any other d—d question! Again I say, as I said in the beginning, go there yourself!"

"W. T. S."

TOM FITCH AS RICHELIEU.

By Richelieu Himself.

The world is full of misdirected efforts. There are blacksmiths who might have been lawyers, and lawyers who ought to be blacksmiths. There are poor dry goods merchants who would have achieved distinction as highway robbers, and robbers who have failed in their profession, but who yet would have made successful savings bank directors. We must regard the appearance of Mr. Fitch as "Richelieu" as an example and illustration of misdirected effort. We have no personal hostility to the gentleman. He has, doubtless, friends who are more discreet, but he can have none who are more entirely committed to his interests than the writer of this article. Exactly why the Arizonan in question should have chosen to step from the stump, the lyceum platform, and the bar to make a spectacle, and, to all intents, a failure of himself upon the boards of the Baldwin, is to us inexplicable. We say a failure. It is true that the audience was large, and composed of the creme de la creme of intellectual San Francisco, and that such an audience applauded him vigorously, and called him before the curtain at the close of every act; nevertheless we are thoroughly conscious of the fact that Mr. Fitch did not realize the true conception of the character of the great Cardinal, did not realize his own conception of it, and considered as a dramatic representation, his performance, judged by the ordinary standards of criticism, was a failure. If Mr. Fitch had followed stage traditions closely, he might have produced a barely tolerable imitation of some other actor. If he had discarded stage traditions altogether, he might have given us a performance that would have been unique, to say the least. But in the attempt to combine the two he tumbled to the ground. The usual stage gestures and facial contortions, which are supposed to express emotion to the audience, were altogether wanting in him, and we suspect that their use by some of the actors who supported him confused him to that extent that he was uncertain whether he was surrounded by the courtiers of "Louis XIII," or the festive occupants of the cages at North Beach. Not that his support was not excellent. There was scarcely an artist in the cast whose part was not better rendered—according to popular stage methods—than Mr. Fitch rendered "Richelieu," but the kind of a mirror which stage usage demands shall be held up to nature was not calculated to improve the acting of a man who had obtained his ideas of the character of "Richelieu" from other sources than those of the stage. If Mr. Fitch should ever be tempted to repeat the "lark" of which he was guilty at Baldwin's Theatre, we suggest to him to amend his "stage business." Because Bulwer departed from history in representing Richelieu (who was less than fifty years of age at the time of the Cinq Mars conspiracy) as a very aged and feeble man, it does not follow that Mr. Fitch had any license to depart from Bulwer, and represent the Cardinal as a robust and muscular personage. Nor is it any excuse for Mr. Fitch to say, that certain physical peculiarities preclude him from playing a tottering consumptive to any great extent. If the actor cannot choose his part to fit his physique, let him follow the Banting system, or otherwise reduce his adipose tissues to fit his part. Again, we suggest to Mr. Fitch, that whenever the exigencies of stage business require a lady to throw herself into his arms, it is his duty to support her, and that seizing her by the nape of the neck, or grasping wildly at her shoulder blade is not sanctioned by the usages of polite society, nor in accordance with the customs of the modern standard drama. But these were minor faults. His "make up" was bad. Every true critic knows that Richelieu always washed his face in a chalk pit, and dried it with a wisp of India ink, whereas Mr. Fitch was guilty of the inexcusable negligence of exposing a portion of his cuticle.

[DEAR : Please finish this, I am called off, and have not time for anything.—FITCH.]

EDITORIAL NOTE.—We are heartily glad that Mr. Fitch was "called off" before he had time to complete this criticism and abuse himself any further. If he had been similarly called off in his "Richelieu" robes during the first act, it need never have been written. As it is, the criticism is worse than the Richelieu and the good Goddess of the Drama, as well as Mr. Fitch himself, knows that was bad enough.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y..

People are just beginning to find out that the best place to sit for their photographs is at T. H. Boyd's Yosemite Art Gallery, 26 Montgomery Street. This conclusion is arrived at from personal experience and a comparison of the work produced at all the galleries of the city. When an artist triumphs over such competition as this there is presumptive evidence that he makes a good picture; and if this is what people are after, this little hint as to the best photographer will be of practical value.

We have received from the firm of Bradley & Rolison portraits of Marie Roze-Mapleson and Maria Litta, prime donne of the Grand Italian Opera Company, now at Baldwin's. Both of the pictures are good ones, that of Litta being the best we have yet seen. Roze is naturally "as pretty as a picture," but Litta tests the photographers' skill.

FASHION GOSSIP.

Coiffures.

The latest styles of hair dressing are varied as well as very pretty. The fashionable idea of arranging the hair in knots seems to prevail to some extent. This style of coiffure is easily arranged by the aid of a false switch. The shape is somewhat oblong. Where this shape is neglected a very ungraceful style is the result. The most popular head-dress for street wear is the chataleine braids—narrower than the heavy braid once so fashionable some years ago. The braids now extend—narrow and in light puffs—down the back. An elaborate hair bow is placed on the crown of the head, while the front is arranged in scallops, Montague curls, frizzes, or waves, to harmonize with the features. For evening wear, the hair is dressed in light, fluffy puffs and ringlets—interspersed with bows and knots of hair—placed high upon the head and sloping down the neck, finishing with short bob curls at the back. Any of these styles, or, in fact, all the latest modes of dressing the hair, may be obtained at the fashionable establishment of Shepard & Co., No. 8 Stockton Street, near Market. As everything depends upon the artistic taste of the hair dresser, we would recommend our lady readers to try the above establishment, and we have no doubt that they will be both pleased and satisfied with their visit at the last named fashionable establishment.

Latest in Millinery.

Since spring has opened many new styles in ladies' head-wear, with novel and unique shapes, appear. We again give to our lady readers the result of our investigations in this department. One of the prettiest that we note is the Empress, with alternate brown and cream-colored stripes on the body of the bonnet. The trimmings are a brown ostrich tip, and brown and cream satin bow, with a large cluster of crushed roses in front, and streamers with the two colors. We saw a rich bonnet of the La Mode pattern, just imported from the establishment of Madame Lechevalier, Paris. The trimmings at the back are a rich silk of a light cream-colored gray tint laid diagonally in plaits, and secured behind with cupid's arrow. On the front and reaching down the left side a severed wreath of wild flowers is seen, while the front appears plain with two large bows of light blue and bronze satin intermingled. Another very pretty style of bonnet is the "Fascinator," trimmed with delicate pink ribbon, and moss rosebuds and leaves with dew sparkling on their shapings. The styles approaching masculine head-wear will have seen their day, it is to be hoped, in the Edinboro, Jerome, and Wellington for misses. All the latest styles and recent importations may be seen and obtained at Madame Skidmore's, 1114 Market Street.

Important to Amateur Artists.—Wonderful Invention.

Messrs. King & Bowley, No. 918 Market Street, San Francisco, have on exhibition and for sale the most wonderful instrument ever invented for drawing, enlarging, or diminishing pictures, patterns, portraits, etc., upon every kind of material; also for embroidery and braiding. Portrait and landscape drawing in detail is made so easy that a child of nine years of age may execute perfect copies of the masters, sketches, and finished works of art, without any previous knowledge of drawing.

Great Sacrifice of Books.

We regret to be called upon to notice the closing out of the establishment of A. Roman & Co., on Montgomery Street. The failure of an Eastern house for which Messrs. A. Roman & Co. were heavy endorsers has brought this disaster upon the above-named popular establishment. The store will be compelled to close by the first of May, and consequently the sales are positive and at prices that are ruinously apparently. A large and fine collection of juveniles are here being sacrificed, with all the standard works of the greatest English and American authors, in costly and elaborate binding. This is unquestionably the best opportunity ever offered to our readers to obtain private libraries, stationery, Russia and ivory goods, and novelties of every description in this line, as we are informed that the stock must be sold by the first of next month, regardless of cost.

What the Irish Should Be in America.

On the 27th of this month the frequenters of the California Theatre will be entertained by Mr. H. J. Mohan, the popular and talented young Irish orator, on "What the Irish should be in America." Mr. Mohan has not failed to please and instruct every audience that has had the pleasure of listening to his lectures, which are invariably embellished with Irish wit, rich and genuine. The famed Irish way of putting humorous puns and anecdotes has always given pleasure to an American audience. Mr. Mohan was introduced by the Lieutenant-Governor of Nevada to a fashionable audience in Carson, comprising the Governor and members of the Legislature, and in Virginia City was requested by the Mayor and prominent citizens to deliver his lecture to the most fashionable audience ever assembled in that city. We are sure our readers will be pleased with the subject-matter and the orator at the California Theatre.

AN UNCOMMON SORT OF SPECTRE.

I.

The ancient castle of Weinstein, on the upper Rhine, was, as everybody knows, inhabited in the autumn of 1352 by the powerful Baron Kalbsbraten, better known in those parts as Old Twenty Flasks, a sobriquet derived from his reputed daily capacity for the product of the vineyard. The Baron had many other admirable qualities. He was a genial, whole-souled, public-spirited gentleman, and robbed, murdered, burned, pillaged, and drove up the steep sides of the Weinstein his neighbors' cattle, wives, and sisters, with a hearty bonhomme that won for him the unaffected esteem of his contemporaries.

One evening the good Baron sat alone in the great hall of Weinstein, in a particularly happy mood. He had dined well, as was his habit, and twenty empty bottles stood before him in a row upon the table, like a train of delightful memories of the recent past. But the Baron had another reason to be satisfied with himself and with the world. The consciousness that he had that day become a parent lit up his countenance with a tender glow that mere wine can not impart.

"What ho! Without! Hi! Seneschal!" he presently shouted in a tone that made the twenty empty bottles ring as if they were musical glasses, while a score of suits of his ancestors' armor hanging around the walls gave out in accompaniment a deep metallic bass. The Seneschal was speedily at his side.

"Seneschal," said Old Twenty Flasks, "you gave me to understand that the Baroness was doing finely?"

"I am told," replied the Seneschal, "that her ladyship is doing as well as could be expected."

The Baron mused in silence for a moment, absently regarding the empty bottles. "You also gave me to understand," he continued, "that there were —"

"Four," said the Seneschal, gravely, "I am credibly informed that there are four, all boys."

"That," exclaimed the Baron, with a glow of honest pride, bringing a brawny fist down upon the table—"that, in these days, when the abominable doctrines of Malthus are gaining ground among the upper classes, is what I call creditable—creditable, by Saint Christopher, if I do say it!" His eyes rested again upon the empty bottles. "I think, Seneschal," he added, after a brief pause, "that under the circumstances we may venture —"

"Nothing could be more eminently proper," rejoined the Seneschal. "I will fetch another flask forthwith, and of the best. What says your Excellency to the vintage of 1304, the year of the comet?"

"But," hesitated the Baron, toying with his moustache, "I understood you to say that there were four of 'em—four boys?"

"True, my lord," replied the Seneschal, catching the idea with the readiness of a well-trained domestic; "I will fetch four more flasks."

As the excellent retainer deposited four fresh bottles upon the table within the radius of the Baron's reach, he casually remarked:

"A pious old man, a traveler, is in the castle-yard, my lord, seeking shelter and a supper. He comes from beyond the Alps, and fares toward Cologne."

"I presume," said the Baron, with an air of indifference, "that he had been duly searched for plunder."

"He passed this morning," replied the retainer, "through the domain of your well-born cousin, Count Conrad of Schwinkenfels. Your lordship will readily understand that he has nothing now save a few beggarly Swiss coins of copper."

"My worthy Cousin Conrad!" exclaimed the Baron, affectionately. "It is the one great misfortune of my life that I live to the leeward of Schwinkenfels. But you relieved the pious man of his copper?"

"My lord," said the Seneschal, with an apologetic smile, "it was not worth the taking."

"Now, by my soul!" roared the Baron, "you exasperate me. Coin, and not worth the taking! Perhaps not for its intrinsic value, but you should have cleaned him out as a matter of principle, you fool!"

The Seneschal hung his head and muttered an explanation. At the same time he opened the twenty-first bottle.

"Never," continued the Baron, less violently but still severely, "if you value my esteem and your own paltry skin, suffer yourself to be swerved a hair's breadth from principle by the apparent insignificance of the loot. A conscientious attention to details is one of the fundamental elements of a prosperous career—in fact, it underlies all political economy."

The withdrawal of the cork from the twenty-second bottle emphasized this sentiment.

"However," the Baron went on, somewhat mollified, "this is not a day on which I can afford to make a fuss over a trifle. Four, all boys! This is a glorious day for Weinstein. Open the two remaining flasks, Seneschal, and show the pious stranger in. I fain would amuse myself with him."

II.

Viewed through the Baron's twenty odd bottles, the stranger appeared to be an aged man—eighty years, if a day. He wore a shabby gray cloak and carried a palmer's staff, and seemed an innocuous old fellow, cast in too commonplace a mould to furnish even a few minutes' diversion. The Baron regretted sending for him, but being a person of unflinching politeness, when not upon the rampage, he bade his guest be seated, and filled him a beaker of the comet wine.

After an obeisance, profound yet not servile, the pilgrim took the glass and critically tasted the wine. He held the beaker up athwart the light with trembling hand, and then tasted again. The trial seemed to afford him great satisfaction, and he stroked his long white beard.

"Perhaps you are a connoisseur. It pleases your palate, eh?" said the Baron, winking at the full-length portrait of one of his ancestors.

"Proper well," replied the pilgrim, "though it is a trifle syrupy from too long keeping. By the bouquet and the tint I should pronounce it of the vintage of 1304, grown on the steep slope south southeast of the castle, in the fork of the two pathways that lead to under the hill. The sun's rays reflected from the turret give a peculiar excellence to the growth of that particular spot. But your rascally varlets have shelved the bottle on the wrong side of the cellar. It should have been put on the dry side, near where your doughty grandsire, Sigismund von Weinstein, the Hairy Handed, walled his third wife in preparation for a fourth."

The Baron regarded his guest with a look of amazement. "Upon my life," said he, "but you appear to be familiar with the ins and outs of this establishment."

"If I do," rejoined the stranger, composedly sipping his wine, "tis no more than natural, for I lived more than sixty years under this roof, and know its every leak. I happen to be a von Weinstein myself."

The Baron crossed himself, and pulled his chair a little further away from the bottles and the stranger.

"Oh, no!" said the pilgrim, laughing; "quiet your fears. I am aware that every well regulated castle has an ancestral ghost, but my flesh and blood are honest. I was lord of Weinstein till I went, twelve years ago, to study metaphysics in the Arabic schools, and the cursed scribes wrote me out of the estate. Why, I know this hall from infancy. Yonder is the fire-place at which I used to warm my baby toes. There is the identical suit of armor into which I crawled when a boy of six and hid till my sainted mother—heaven rest her!—nigh died of fright. It seems but yesterday. There on the wall hangs the sharp two-handed sword of our ancestor, Franz, the One Eared, with which I cut off the moustaches of my tipsy sire as he sat muddled over his twentieth bottle. There is the very casque—but perhaps these reminiscences weary you. You must pardon the garrulity of an old man who has come to revisit the home of his childhood and prime."

The Baron pressed his hand to his head. "I have lived in this castle myself for half a century," said he, "and am tolerably familiar with the history of my immediate progenitors, but I can't say I ever had the pleasure of your acquaintance. However, permit me to fill your glass."

"It is good wine," said the pilgrim, bolding out his glass. "Except, perhaps, the vintage of 1392, when the grapes—"

The Baron stared at his guest. "The grapes of 1392," he said, dryly, "lack forty years of ripening. You are aged, my friend, and your mind wanders."

"Excuse me, worthy host," calmly replied the pilgrim. "The vintage of 1392 has been forty years cellared. You have no memory for dates."

"What call you this year?" demanded the Baron.

"By the almanacs, and the stars, and precedent, and common consent, it is the year of grace fourteen hundred three and thirty."

"By my soul and hope of salvation," ejaculated the Baron, "It is the year of grace thirteen hundred two and fifty."

"There is evidently a misunderstanding somewhere," remarked the venerable stranger. "I was born here in the year 1352, the year the Turks invaded Europe."

"No Turk has invaded Europe, thanks be to Heaven," replied Old Twenty Flasks, recovering his self-control. "You are a magician or an impostor. In either case I shall order you drawn and quartered as soon as we have finished this bottle. Pray proceed with your very interesting reminiscences, and do not spare the wine."

"I never practice magic," quietly replied the pilgrim, "and as to being an impostor, scan well my face. Don't you recognize the family nose, thick, short, and generously colored? How about the three lateral and two diagonal wrinkles on my brow? I see them there on yours. Are not my chaps Weinstein chaps? Look closely. I court investigation."

"You do look damnably like us," the Baron admitted.

"I was the youngest," the stranger went on, of quadruplets. My three brothers were puny, sickly things, and did not long survive their birth. As a child I was the idol of my poor father, who had some traits worthy of respectful mention, guzzling old toper and unconscionable thief though he was."

The Baron winced.

"They used to call him Old Twenty Flasks. It is my candid opinion, based on memory, that Old Forty Flasks would have been nearer the truth."

"It's a lie!" shouted the Baron. "I rarely exceeded twenty bottles."

"And as for his standing in the community," the pilgrim went on, without taking heed of the interruption, "it must be confessed that nothing could be worse. He was the terror of honest folk for miles around. Property rights were extremely insecure in this neighborhood, for the rapacity of my lamented parent knew no bounds. Yet nobody dared to complain aloud, for lives were not much safer than sheep or ducats. How the people hated his shadow, and roundly cursed him behind his back! I remember well that, when I was about fourteen—it must have been in '66, the year the Grand Turk occupied Adrianople—tall Hugo, the miller, called me up to him, and said: 'Boy, thou hast a right pretty nose.' 'It is a pretty nose, Hugo,' said I, straightening up. 'Is it on firm and strong?' asked Hugo, with a sneer. 'Firm enough, and strong enough, I dare say,' I answered; 'but why ask such a fool's question?' 'Well, well, boy,' said Hugo, turning away; 'look sharp with thine eyes after thy nose when thy father is unoccupied, for he has just that conscience to steal the nose off his son's face in lack of better plunder.'"

"By St. Christopher!" roared the Baron. "tall Hugo, the miller, shall pay for this. I always suspected him. By St. Christopher's burden, I'll break every bone in his villainous body."

"'Twould be an ignoble vengeance," replied the pilgrim, quietly, "for tall Hugo has been in his grave these sixty years."

"True," said the Baron, putting both hands to his head, and gazing at his guest with a look of utter helplessness. "I forgot that it is now next century—that is to say, if you be not a spectre."

"You will excuse me, my respected parent," returned the pilgrim, "if I subject your hypothesis to the test of logic, for it touches me upon a very tender spot, impugning, as it does, my physical verity and my status as an actual individualized Ego. Now, what is our relative position? You acknowledge the date of my birth to have been the year of grace 1352. That is a matter in which your memory is not likely to be at fault. On the other hand, with a strange inconsistency, you maintain, in the face of almanacs, chronologies, and the march of events, that it is still the year of grace 1352. Were you one of the seven sleepers, your hallucination (to use no harsher term) might be pardoned; but you are neither a sleeper nor a saint. Now, every one of the eighty years that are packed away in the carpet bag of my experience protests against your extraordinary error. It is I who have a prima facie right to question your physical existence, not you mine. Did you ever hear of a ghost, spectre, wraith, apparition, eidolon, or spook coming out of the future to haunt, annoy, or frighten individuals of an earlier generation?"

The Baron was obliged to admit that he never had.

"But you have heard of instances where apparitions, ghosts, spooks—call them what you will—have invaded the Present from out the limbo of the Past?"

The Baron crossed himself a second time, and peered anxiously into the dark corners of the apartment. "If you are a genuine von Weinstein," he whispered, "you already know that this castle is overrun with spectres of that sort. It is difficult to move after night-fall without tumbling over half a dozen of them."

"Then," said the placid logician, "you surrender your case. You commit what my revered preceptor in dialectics, the learned Arabian, Ben Dusty, used to style syllogistic suicide. For you allow that, while ghosts out of the future are unheard of, ghosts from the past are not infrequently encountered. Now, I submit to you, as a candid man, this proposition: That it is infinitely more probable that you are a ghost than that I am one!"

The Baron turned very red. "Is this filial," he demanded, "to deny the flesh and blood of your own father?"

"Is it paternal," retorted the pilgrim, not losing his composure, "to insinuate the unreasonableness of the son of your own begetting?"

"By all the saints!" growled the Baron, growing still redder, "this question shall be settled, and speedily. Halloo, there, Seneschal!" He called again and again, but in vain.

"Spare your lungs," calmly suggested the pilgrim. "The best trained domestic in the world will not stir from beneath the sod for all your shouting."

Twenty Flasks sank back helplessly in his chair. He tried to speak, but his tongue and throat repudiated their functions. They only gurgled.

"That is right," said his guest, approvingly. "Conduct yourself as befits a venerable and respectable ghost from the last century. A well-behaved apparition neither blusters nor is violent. You can well afford to be peaceable in your deportment now; you were turbulent enough before your death."

"My death?" gasped the Baron.

"Excuse me," apologized the pilgrim, "for referring to that unpleasant event."

"My death!" stammered the Baron, his hair standing on end. "I should like to hear the particulars."

"I was hardly more than fifteen at the time," said the pilgrim musingly; "but I shall never forget the most trifling circumstance of the great popular uprising that put an end to my worthy sire's career. Exasperated beyond endurance by your outrageous crimes, the people for miles around at last rose in a body, and led by my old friend, tall Hugo, the miller, flocked to Schwinkenfels, and appealed to your cousin, Count Conrad, for protection against yourself, their natural protector. Von Schwinkenfels heard their complaints with great gravity. He replied that he had long watched your abominable actions with distress and consternation; that he had frequently remonstrated with you, but in vain; that he regarded you as the scourge of the neighborhood; that your castle was full of blood-stained treasure and shamefully acquired booty; and that he now regarded it as the personal duty of himself, the conservator of lawful order and good morals, to march against Weinstein, and exterminate you for the common good."

"The hypocritical pirate!" exclaimed Twenty Flasks. "Which he proceeded to do," continued the pilgrim, "supported not only by his retainers, but by your own. I must say that you made a sturdy defense. Had not your rascally Seneschal sold you out to Schwinkenfels, and let down the drawbridge one evening when you were as usual fuddling your brains with your twenty bottles, perhaps Conrad never would have gained an entrance, and my young eyes would have been spared the horrid task of watching the body of my venerated parent dangling at the end of a rope from the topmost turret of the north-west tower."

The Baron buried his face in his hands and began to cry like a baby. "They hanged me, did they?" he faltered.

"I am afraid no other construction can be put on it," said the pilgrim. "It was the inevitable termination of such a career as yours had been. They hanged you, they strangled you, they choked you to death with a rope; and the unanimous verdict of the community was Justifiable Homicide. You weep! Behold, father, I also weep for the shame of the house of von Weinstein! Come to my arms."

Father and son clasped each other in a long, affectionate embrace, and mingled their tears over the disgrace of Weinstein. When the Baron recovered from his emotion he found himself alone with his conscience and twenty-four empty bottles. The pilgrim had disappeared.

III.

Meanwhile in the apartments consecrated to the offices of maternity, all had been confusion, turmoil, and distress. In four huge armchairs sat four experienced matrons, each holding in her lap a pillow of swansdown. On each pillow had reposed an infinitesimal fraction of humanity, recently added to the sum total of von Weinstein. One experienced matron had dozed over her charge; when she woke the pillow in her lap was unoccupied. An immediate census taken by the alarmed attendants disclosed the startling fact that, although there were still four armchairs, and four sage women, and four pillows of swansdown, there were but three infants. The Seneschal, as an expert in mathematics and accounts, was hastily summoned from below. His reckoning merely confirmed the appalling suspicion. One of the quadruplets was gone.

Prompt measure was taken in this fearful emergency. The corners of the rooms were ransacked in vain. Piles of bedclothing and baskets of linen were searched through and through. The hunt extended to other parts of the castle. The Seneschal even sent out trusted and discreet retainers on horseback to scour the country. They returned with downcast countenances; no trace of the lost von Weinstein had been found.

During one terrible hour the wails of the three neglected infants mingled with the screams of the hysterical mother, to whom the attention of the four sage women was exclusively directed. At the end of the hour her ladyship had sufficiently recovered to implore her attendants to make a last, though hopeless, count. On three pillows lay three babies howling lustily in unison. On the fourth pillow reposed a fourth infant, with a mysterious smile upon its face, but cheeks that bore traces of recent tears.—N. Y. Sun.

VOL. IV. NO. 17.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 26, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

SHALL THE JUDICIARY BE DEGRADED?

The Question Considered.—By E. L. Goold.

Sec. 17. The Justice of the Supreme Court and Judges of the Superior Court shall severally, at stated times during their continuance in office, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be increased or diminished after election nor during the term for which they shall have been elected. The salaries of the Justices of the Supreme Court shall be paid by the State. One-half of the salary of each Superior Court Judge shall be paid by the State; the other half thereof shall be paid by the county for which he is elected.

Sec. 24. No Judge of a Superior Court nor of the Supreme Court shall, after the first day of July, 1880, be allowed to draw or receive any monthly salary unless he shall take and subscribe an affidavit before an officer entitled to administer oaths, that no cause in his Court remains undecided that has been submitted for decision for the period of ninety days.

It is the purpose of this paper to demonstrate that the sanction by which one article of the new Constitution is to be enforced is a blemish of so grave a character as justifies a rejection of the entire instrument. It is our boast that we live under a government of laws; that we have the capacity of making laws for ourselves, and of enforcing them ourselves, and that we yield a prompt and cheerful obedience to the salutary restraints good government imposes. But, if this be not destined to become an idle boast, we must see to it that that branch of our government to which is confided the interpretation of the laws we make be not enfeebled by the degradation of the judges empowered to enforce them. Disguise the fact as we may, the judicial office, in the popular mind, takes character and complexion from the person who holds it. To be respected as a judge he must be respected as a man; the two characters can not be separated; in the nature of things—in the constitution of man—they are intimately blended. Whatever tends to diminish that just respect which should be due the incumbent of the judicial office breeds indifference to the station itself, and consequently, to the mandates of the law of which it is the exponent. If, then, there be anything in this new-born organic law, the enforcement of which will finally result in the wasting away of one-third of the governmental system itself, a native sense of self-protection will drive all thinking men to its instant rejection. Let us then inquire if, in the proposed instrument, there be anything obnoxious to the charge involved in this suggestion. For ours is a country in which liberty is enjoyed only according to law. Ours is a regulated, and not a licentious, liberty. When, then, the courts of justice lose their powers, even by a partial diminution, and the people at large cease to tremble at the majesty of the law, one-third of the government is, practically, gone. How long the remaining two-thirds may last, then, becomes a question of time; and that determined, a despot grasps the sceptre, and from his own breast ordains the punishment, after inventing the crime, and otherwise fulminates his governmental thunders in harmony with his own despotic nature—doing, at his own whim and caprice, just that which was laid at the door of the British monarch against whom the colonies rebelled, and which was denounced, in the nervous language of Mr. Jefferson, as "Every art which may define a tyrant." From these evils we must guard ourselves, by timely and cautious examination, and a rejection of every plan containing the seminal principle that may breed their recurrence. The maxim can not be too often repeated, that the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial branches of the government must be kept absolutely independent of each other. Every one who thinks, knows it and feels it. The officers who sit to administer the justice of the country must be dependent on the will of no man for their pay. If they be, then the fundamental rule of independence of the different departments of the government suffers a violation. The person chosen as judge is, of course, taken from the ranks of the bar. It is there he has employed the learning in the acquisition of which his youth was spent, and it is there he has acquired the experience and the knowledge of the virtues and the vices which at once adorn and disgrace humanity—knowledge, without the possession of which he can not shine in the magisterial office. To that he must devote all his energies and dedicate his time. He can not practice his profession. His salary is the only income he can earn. That is his sole dependence, and, together with the plaudits of his fellows, his only reward. Therefore, his thoughts must not be diverted from his judicial duties by fears of a failure of his sole means of subsistence.

The ancients personified justice in the form of a goddess. They called her "Themis." And there has come to us the saying, "Themis is a jealous mistress." That only means that those who worship at her shrine must give themselves entirely to her service. She brooks no rival. And so, the lawyer who becomes the judge, still bound to the duty of bringing his offering to the altar, must consecrate his thoughts and bring his oblation alone to the deity there presiding. When the question of the adoption of the Federal Constitution was under debate, Alexander Hamilton considered the character of the judicial office, and the mode by which the judges were to be supported. By consulting No. LXXIX of the Federalist it will be seen that he used the following language: "Next to permanency in office, nothing can contribute more to the independence of the judges than a fixed provision for their support. The remark made in relation to the President is equally applicable here. In the general course of human nature a power over a man's subsistence amounts to a power over his will. And we can never hope to see realized in practice the complete separation of the judicial from the legislative power in any system which leaves the former dependent for pecuniary resource on the occasional grants of the latter." The wisdom of this observation is manifest. The judge must be dependent on the will of no one for his means of subsistence. His time is devoted to the public. His thoughts are dedicated to the public service. The son of toil, on the other hand, the man of physical occupation, works eight hours a day; but when his working hour expires his labor expires with it. Not so the judge. The intellectual collision, the novel question, the new phase of humanity, the unheard-of development of vice, the refreshing evidence of truth, virtue, and benevolence, that have combined to stir his emotions, and absorb his faculties during the day, follow him to his pillow at night, and so, his work is never done. The absolute devotion to a single duty exacted from a judge may be well impressed upon the mind by recalling the words of the gentle Desdemona. Referring to her complex relations to her husband and her father, she says:

"My noble father,
I do perceive here a divided duty:
To you I am bound for life and education;
My life and education both do learn me
How to respect you; you are the lord of duty;
I am, hitherto, your daughter; but here's my husband,
And so much duty as my mother showed
To you, preferring you before her father,
So much I challenge that I may profess
Due to the Moor, my lord."

Now, a divided duty is just the thing a judge should not be compelled to see. The duty before his vision should be one wholly undivided. He should not be compelled, in the performance of the duties of his ermined office, or in the act of receiving its reward, to pay homage to any man. But this is the very thing he will be forced to do by the clause under consideration. He is to receive no salary unless he will make and produce an affidavit touching his conduct. To whom is this affidavit to be presented? The Controller. This officer must, of course, examine and pass judgment upon its form and sufficiency. Suppose he decide it to be informal or insufficient, what is the judge to do? Suppose the Controller to have a suit then pending before the judge's court, and the Controller should slyly intimate to him that he will be too busy to attend to that affidavit until he can have a decision; is his Honor to wait? And suppose the decision to come, hostile to the Controller, who then says: "Judge, the notary who took your affidavit has not had his commission renewed." Is the judge to apply for a writ of mandate to compel the Controller to act? And if he must, who is to advance the costs, and pay the counsel fees?

The truth is that this clause of the new Constitution drags the judicial office in the mire. The Superior Judge stands before the Controller of the State for one-half his salary, and before the county treasurer for the other half, as it were in forma pauperis. There are fifty-three counties in this State. Twelve times a year the judges will ask for their salaries. That will make, with the San Francisco judges, eight hundred and fifty-two applications a year, and exclusive of those of the Supreme Judges. Each of them stands before his fiscal master, shamed by a presumption of infidelity to his trust, and bound to remove it by a satisfactory oath before he can touch one dollar for subsistence! In a few years the people at large will become accustomed to this indecent exhibition, and, as the State increases in population, and the judges in number, the populace will become familiar with the melancholy panorama of the obsequious ministers of justice pleading for their little stipends on affidavits made—according to law; and so there will be engendered a corresponding contempt for each and all of them, and for all the rules they may make, and all the decisions they may endeavor to enforce. The fundamental law should reflect the superior wisdom of the commonwealth. To secure justice is one of the purposes of its creation. All legislative enactments must bend to it, and all courts yield to its behests. But how can we hope that judicial mandates or legislative rules will be distinguished by justice and wisdom, if the organic law—their source and fountain—be itself deformed by injustice and folly? The instrument contains no clause enjoining it upon the judges as a duty to decide causes within a specified period of time. Nor is there anything in the nature of the office requiring this of the incumbent. The duty of the judge is to dispatch the business before him with all "convenient speed;" that is, to render judgments touching all issues submitted to him as soon as he may, by ordinary industry, be able to reach a conclusion in harmony with justice, according to law. But, by this new Constitution, the judges are to undergo a kind of punishment for omitting to do that the doing of which is nowhere made a part of their duty. Here, then, is a penalty where there is no offense—a punishment without delinquency. Had it been the sense of the Convention that judges be commanded to decide in a given time, nothing would have been more easy than to say so. The clause might have run, "Every judge in this State shall decide all causes submitted to him within ninety days from the date of their submission." This language would have been unmistakable. The candidate for judicial position would, before assuming the ermine, know the thing expected of him. He would know it would be his duty to control his will in the domination of his judgment, and so, compel his mental vision to a perception of the right before a day named in the almanac. Should he suspect this to be something beyond the power of mortality, he could, by declining a nomination, escape the sordid penalty imposed upon a judge. But nothing of the kind is found in the new-born organic law. If it were so found, then in case of sickness, accident, or any of the casualties incident to human nature, intervening to render a decision impossible within the allotted time, the judge would have an opportunity to explain the delay, and so save himself the mortification of a pecuniary punishment for an occurrence beyond his control. Should he be unable to make a satisfactory explanation, then the ordinary remedy of impeachment would follow as in other cases of imputed official misconduct. And then, it would be determined whether or not, a magistrate or any other human creature can think by the hour-glass and be convinced on schedule time.

We have seen that the judge is to "take and subscribe to an affidavit" before receiving his salary. But what is finally to become of this document? The judge of the Superior Court, obviously, must present it to the officer who makes the payment. But there are two officers. The State pays one half, the county the other. Now, should the county pay first, the county treasurer would, for his own protection, file the document among the public archives as proof that he had not parted with the public money without warrant of law. Should the State pay first, the controller would do the same thing. Certainly, neither of these officers would send the document to the other, for both would require its possession. Then how, upon the production of the affidavit, could the judge get more than half his salary? Will it be contended that he should make two affidavits to get one salary? That duty makes no part of his bargain with the public. He never agreed to swear twice. And what is the value of an affidavit made pursuant to no law whatever? When the judge has presided and sworn once, his whole duty is performed, humiliating though it be. A few weeks since, there was argued and submitted to the Supreme Court of this State, a case, the record of which comprehended two thousand one hundred and fifty-six folios of one hundred words each, numbering two hundred and fifteen thousand six hundred words—more than double the number of words composing the English language! And, quite lately, there were filed two records: one, the case of Scott vs. Gonzales, comprising eighteen hundred and eight folios, or one hundred and eighty thousand words; the other, Thompson vs. Paterson, comprising three thousand two hundred and eight folios, or three hundred and twenty thousand words. Any person can see these records by applying to the clerk of the court. Suppose three cases such as these should be argued and submitted during the next month, and the thirty days to be allowed for an application for a re-hearing be added to the time consumed in preparing and delivering the opinions, how much of the remainder of the term of ninety days, is it likely, would be left within which to consider and pass upon the three applications? Plainly, all the other cases argued and submitted during the succeeding two months must remain undecided, and the judges be denied their salaries. Suppose a Superior Court judge to have, before him, a complicated and difficult case, one involving some puzzling problems through which he should see something like judicial daylight on the ninetieth day after submission, and when he had his opinion about half formed, his home is invaded by sickness, and finally the angel of death carries away one of his children, shall he finish his opinion that day in order to entitle himself to his salary on the next? But why should the judge swear that not one of his multitudinous causes, great and small, remains undecided for ninety days, when he has not promised the public that he would nor been told that he should decide them all in that period? Certainly, to take from a man the money that is his, and to detain from him the money to which he is entitled, are acts equally injurious to him, and amount practically to the same thing. The trite saying that "history repeats itself" is apposite on this occasion. We have seen that the founders of our nation, when colonists, saw the necessity of the absolute independence of the judges, so far as concerned the emoluments by which they were to be supported. The British king assumed to dictate the time and mode of payment of the judges' salaries. This assumption was, by the American colonists, classed among the grievances deemed by them intolerable, and which led to revolution. "He has made judges dependent on his will alone for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries." Although, on this occasion, the tenure and amount are fixed, the payment is contingent. The sum fixed is not to be paid absolutely. The recompense is a dependent one. It depends on the judgment of a man who belongs to another branch of the government.

We have already seen that nothing in the instrument obliges the judge to decide within a specified period, and that a decision rendered after the lapse of ninety days is as much within the line of his duty as is one rendered in nine. The truth is, that the instrument is, upon the whole, a grave mistake. It is a capital blunder. The men who stand before the public as its authors are responsible in theory, but not in fact. For they were the men of brains who, in reference to the objectionable parts of the instrument, were, in the main, overshadowed, overcome, supplanted, and displaced, and reduced to an emaciated minority by a numerical force composed of persons who though animated by honest intentions, yet are not trained to affairs; not given to habits of reflection touching the public welfare; not possessed of a general acquaintance with the history of nations, or of mankind in general; destitute of all knowledge of finance; wholly ignorant of every element of jurisprudence; not one of them having ever fulfilled a public trust, or graced a public office—municipal, State, or national; with no public experience, great or small; with no deep stake in the community, and no moving sense of obligation as to the part they assumed in this semi-revolution. Such are the men who, by mere force of numbers, made and enforced the crudities by which this project of a Constitution is deformed. They are the offspring of a public spasm; and their conduct adds but another evidence of the theory that towns, cities, states, and nations, like individuals, are periodically the victims of a partial mental alienation. Some of the features of the one presented are really excellent. No candid person will say the contrary. They ought to be a part of the fundamental law; but the degradation of the judiciary is a price too high to pay for them. They hereafter will be a part of the fundamental law, for this discussion has attracted to this subject the general attention, and men heretofore too much immersed in business, or too sluggish to think of their duties as members of a nation whose boast is self-government, will now arc use themselves to a sense of their duty as good citizens, and will join in a stern demand that the abuses which have been exposed shall be done away with by such salutary amendments as shall strike down the offenders against the public welfare, secure the greatest good to the greatest number, and the fundamental rule be distinguished by such marks of completeness and neatness as shall satisfy, gratify, and content every interest and every aspiration of the State.

THE POOR VS. THE RICH.

The Doctrines and Theories of Communism.

In the ARGONAUT some weeks ago, in an article under the head of "Tar Flat vs. Nob Hill," I entered upon the discussion of communism by attempting to show that there were two great theories of society—one founded upon law, which favors the strong as against the weak, the other upon sympathy, which favors the weak as against the strong—and that as society is now organized it is founded upon the former rather than the latter theory; that notwithstanding the great weight and power of Jesus and his disciples, who advocated a system of society founded upon sympathy and unselfishness (which they understood led to communism), the verdict of mankind had ever been against communism, and Jesus had been accepted merely as a "religionist," but not as a political economist. The seemingly irrepressible agitation which for some time past has been going on among the so-called "poor working-men" against their employers, the so-called "rich capitalists," throughout the United States, and especially in San Francisco, leads me to continue a discussion, certainly worth the attention of every thinking man, as to what are the "rights" of the poor against the rich.

(1) What constitutes poverty, and what is wealth? Not all those who dwell on the heights of "Nob Hill" are rich, nor all those who live in the valley of "Tar Flat" are poor. There may be gilded poverty on "Nob Hill." There is substantial wealth on "Tar Flat." There are numerous grades of poverty, and numberless degrees of wealth. How much money it requires to constitute wealth, and how little to constitute poverty, depend upon locality, intelligence, civilization, and a myriad other conditions. The gradations leading up from poverty to wealth are as numerous and varied as the shades and degrees of virtue and vice. Few of us are thoroughly vicious or infinitely virtuous. Any discussion of this subject, therefore, based upon the idea that there is an absolute point where poverty ceases and wealth begins, would necessarily be unsatisfactory and impracticable. There are, however, well-defined species of rich and strongly marked subdivisions of poor which lead us naturally to inquire—

(2) Who are the poor, and who are the rich? Of the poor there are:

First—The vicious poor—including tramps, thieves, and other outlaws whose lives are steeped in crime—acquired or inherited.

Second—The imbecile poor—those who have no vicious proclivities, but are absolutely without talents or abilities of any character—who always were poor and always expect to remain so.

Third—The more or less respectable poor—including those who possess talents, genius, and culture in various degrees, but have no taste or inclination for money-getting; or, possessing genius and the disposition to obtain wealth, their talents have little or no marketable value.

Fourth—That large class of poor, who dwell on the borderland of wealth, and are striving more or less successfully to attain it.

Of the rich there are:

First—Those who were born rich and have never known poverty.

Second—Those who by patient industry and self-denying economy have become rich.

Third—Those who by some fortunate circumstance, lucky marriage, death, speculation, or successful fraud, have suddenly become rich.

Fourth—Those whose talents and genius possess so marketable a value as to render them a necessity to the rich, either in acquiring or maintaining their possessions, or contributing to their enjoyment.

Fifth—Corporations and joint-stock companies, which are artificial persons, with existences separate and distinct from those who hold stock in them.

Having thus subdivided and set apart the rich from the poor, let us next inquire:

What are the alleged grievances of the poor as against the rich? It is claimed by the communistic advocates of the poor that society, as now organized, is afflicted with a most serious disease, viz: unlimited selfishness and greed of gain; that the mild, the gentle, the weak, the modest, the sympathetic, the fine-grained people, including those who have taste and genius for something higher than mere acquisition of wealth, are jostled aside in the race of life, and the strong, the bold, the hardy, the cold and unscrupulous, the greedy, and the coarse-grained, rush in and acquire the wealth. It is further claimed that they who devote their energies most relentlessly to the acquisition of wealth, and shut their hearts most closely against all noble and generous impulses, become wealthy; while those who are kind, good, sympathetic, and helpful, are usually counted among the poor. It is further claimed that society, as now organized, is based upon the idea that these same selfish, greedy, money-getting people must be fostered and protected with the most tender care, or society would go into spasms at once, and die in agony or anarchy. It is further claimed that ever since society was organized there has been a conflict going on between the rulers and the people—the minority and the majority—the minority trying to retain power, with which to tyrannize over and oppress the majority, and the majority trying to wrest it from them; that age after age this old conflict continued between the rulers and the people until at last the majority gained the victory, and are to-day throughout the entire civilized world comparatively free from political oppression. The liberties of the humblest man are now protected by the most sacred guarantees; but that modern civilization has developed a species of despotism equally, if not more, galling than that exercised by the ancient kings—the tyranny and oppression of wealth. The tyrant who domineered over the weak in governments now reigns supreme behind money-bags. The power which was once wielded by the sword is now enforced by the slavish submission to coin. The tyrants before whom men formerly trembled were kings, nobles, and priests; now they are corporations, joint-stock companies, and despotic millionaires. Civilization has grown to be a complex system of commerce, business, and exchange, and the relations of men are so entangled that no man dares rebel against any system of tyranny imposed by capital, without feeling the weight of some great power which may crush his family into poverty. The environments of our modern civilization demand an income; incomes arise from commerce and exchange; commerce and exchange are controlled by capital; capital is selfish, greedy, and despotic.

I have thus fairly, I think, presented the indictment of the poor against the rich as drawn by the communists. The charges preferred are rather against "society" as now organized than against the rich; but any attempt to reorganize society and place it upon a more equitable basis for the poor would necessarily involve the interests and accumulations of the rich, and, therefore, is in effect an indictment by the poor against the rich. The communists have, in all ages, been enthusiasts and impracticables, but they have generally been regarded as sincere. Many of them have been eminent as scholars, philosophers, and reformers. Lycurgus, the legislator of Sparta, was full of communistic ideas. Plato, the greatest of the Greek philosophers, conceived of an ideal state of society, in which the communistic idea forms a prominent part. The noble Gracchi among the Romans, in their efforts to redistribute the land and help the poor, became martyrs to the cause of communism. Jesus and Paul, as we have already seen, were practical as well as theoretical communists—the early disciples "holding all things in common." Sir Thomas Moore, an English statesman of the fourteenth century, conceived of a "Utopia" in which communism would have prevailed. Lord Bacon, in his "New Atlantis," outlines a model community decidedly communistic. David Humé longed for a reorganization of society. Robert Owen, of New Lanark (father of the late Robert Dale Owen), devoted an immense fortune to the founding of communistic societies. Saint Simon, a Frenchman, who lived in the early part of the present century, was an eminent scholar and communist. He was followed by Charles Fourier and others, who taught and practiced communism in various forms, and died in the faith. In this country the choicest spirits and noblest minds have been tainted with communism. Ralph Waldo Emerson, Channing, Dana, Parker, Dwight, Hawthorne, Margaret Fuller, and George Ripley entered heart and soul into the Brook Farm experiment. The great, good, and sincere Horace Greeley was more than suspected of sympathy with Fourierism. Robert Dale Owen, who devoted his life to elevating and benefiting his race, was a communist. Indeed, in all ages and in all countries, there has been a longing among the noblest minds for a state of society formed upon some other basis than that of pure, unadulterated selfishness. Our modern agitators, however, are not so much philosophers or thinkers as practical "agitators." They do not lay so much stress upon the fundamental inequities of the present system as upon the fact that the rich have violated the original agreement upon which society was based by obtaining their property by unfair means, then using it to bribe society to permit them to keep it. They also claim that this unlimited avarice ought by some means to be curbed; that the wealth even rightfully obtained is used to corrupt legislators and officials, and secure still other advantages. It is further stated that to prevent property from being inalienable, passing down from father to son, perpetuating aristocracy and caste as in England and Continental Europe, we changed our laws of primogeniture in this country, whereby all our children should inherit equally, and by our Constitution enacted as a fundamental law that there should be no perpetuities, but that our modern system of corporations, with their immense combinations of capital, their never-ending, never-dying, soulless existence, are evils tenfold worse than the feudal system from which the world has just escaped; that corporations have no individuality except a name, no conscience, no soul, no responsibility save that arising from their ownership of property; that evil-minded men hide behind a corporate name as a screen to enable them to work all sorts of inequities; that the modern conscience is becoming seared; that modern morals are becoming corrupted; that honor, truth, and genuine integrity is becoming scarce—all by reason of the polluting influences of unchecked avarice and greed of gain.

Such are the complaints of our modern agitators. I have given them the benefit of the strongest statement of their case. It amounts simply to a protest against a power which they can not understand, and the injustice of which they can not fathom. What merit, if any, is there in these charges? What justice, if any, is there in these complaints? I will attempt to answer these questions.

Is society based upon, and does it permit, unlimited selfishness and greed of gain? The basis of organized society is in human nature. Human nature is more or less selfish. Selfishness is that faculty which leads to self-protection. Self-protection led to the organization of society. Human beings were drawn together, not for the benefit of the weak, nor for any noble and sympathetic purpose, but solely and simply for self-protection. Society is, therefore, not a charitable institution. It was not organized for the purpose of distributing alms. It was not the outgrowth of a necessity, more or less felt and realized, of mutual protection. Nor is selfishness an unmitigated evil. It forms the basis of a large number of our so-called virtues. Selfishness is the basis of sympathy as well as of love. It is by realizing how we ourselves would feel under certain circumstances of pain and suffering that we instinctively feel impelled to help our neighbor who suffers. It is by telling us that "Jesus first loved us" that our Christian brethren incite us to love Him. It is by recurring to ourselves and our own selfish wants that we are able to judge of what others have a right to expect of us, and hence selfishness is the foundation of our sense of justice. The "golden rule" is based upon an appeal to our selfishness: "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you." Herbert Spencer, in his "Social Statics," formulates a complete system of moral philosophy founded upon the instincts and faculties of human nature, showing that every motive and every action of humanity is based upon some principle or faculty implanted within us, and not upon any abstract motive or extraneous sense of duty. Everything we do is done in some higher or lower sense to gratify ourselves. We eat our food, not that we may become strong, robust, and healthy, but because we are hungry. We marry, not to aid in building up society or to assist in replenishing the earth, but because we love the object of our choice; and procreation is not an abstract duty, but results as one of the choicest fruits of love. We become religious, not to perfect ourselves in the Christian graces so that we may become abstractly good, but because it gives us pleasure; we obtain the praises of God and men; we insure eternal felicity, and escape the torments of hell. We work, toil, economize, lie, steal, beg, or kill for money, not simply to purchase the necessities of life, but to gratify an absorbing passion, or for the love of acquisition. The soldier who rushes into the thickest of the battle, and recklessly exposes himself to the bullets of the enemy, is actuated by a noble motive—the love of country, the hope of glory; but it is because it is his country, and because he will be glorified, and not somebody else. We can thus conceive of no virtue that is not, in a higher or lower sense, selfish. Society is organized and laws enacted with reference to these well-established principles of human nature. It has been found necessary to curb and restrain these selfish human passions. One of the most prolific sources of conflict among men has been difference of opinion as to the true criterion of restraint to be imposed upon selfishness. Every man has an inalienable right to eat, drink, and live, but he must eat his own and not his neighbor's food. He may drink intoxicating liquors until he is drunk, but he must not disturb the peace and quiet of his neighbors. He may live as long as life is granted to him, but he must live peaceably. Every man has an inalienable right to bestow his affections upon whomsoever he pleases, but he must not demand a requital from his neighbor's wife. Every man may indulge to the utmost his propensity for acquiring wealth, but he must not rob, steal, or defraud. Thus society imposes restrictions upon the selfish at every hand, and it is, therefore, not true that society is based upon unlimited selfishness. If selfishness and greed of gain were unlimited, the question of who should obtain all the wealth would resolve itself into a brutal contest between the strong and the weak. But the strong are curbed by the restrictions imposed by society, and they dare not take property by force, stealth, or fraud. As a matter of fact, then, the weak, the mild, and the gentle, who could not succeed in a hand-to-hand combat with the strong, are favored by society, and placed upon an equal footing with the strong, the greedy, and the unscrupulous. It is not true that society fosters the greedy, the unscrupulous, and the money-getting at the expense of the modest, the sympathetic, and the fine-grained. On the contrary, society constantly favors the weak by protecting them against the frauds, the tricks, and the machinations of the unscrupulous. Let us go now one step farther, and see whether society is just to the poor and the weak in the matter of recognizing the right of exclusive ownership of property.

Is it right for any one person to exercise exclusive dominion over property? The communists assert that "all property is robbery." Locke so fully exposes the bad logic of this assertion that I can not help quoting the passage: "If all property is robbery, than no one can become the owner of anything. It therefore follows that no man can have a right to the things he consumes for food. If so, when do they begin to be his?—when he brings them home?—when he eats?—or when he digests? If no previous act can make them property, neither can any process of assimilation do it; not even their absorption into the tissues. Wherefore, pursuing the idea, we arrive at the singular conclusion that as the whole of a man's bones, muscles, skin, etc., have been built up from nutriment not belonging to him, a man has no property in his own flesh and blood, can have no valid title to himself, and has as good a right to his neighbor's body as his own." If Locke's refutation of communism is too narrow, there are still broader reasons upon which to base a refutation. If all property should belong to society as a whole, and not to its individual members, then each member should contribute equally to its production. If one man, by reason of his greater strength, reaps three acres of grain per day, while his fellow-workmen reap but two, he has a right to feel dissatisfied with only an equal share of the general store. If one man works industriously ten hours per day, and produces two pairs of shoes, while his fellow-laborers work but six hours and produce but one pair, he will justly feel that society "is not organized on a fair and equitable basis." If one man, by reason of peculiar talent, invents a machine that will perform the work of ten men per day, he will naturally feel that he has earned the right to retire on a pension and live in ease and luxury the residue of his days; and if his most reasonable request is not granted, who could blame him for inciting a rebellion against a tyranny which grants no reward for talent. If there is no reward for industry, there will be no industry; if there is no industry, there will be no property, for property is the result of industry. Then, again, if the idle and dissolute are sure of a provision being made for all their wants, there is a premium offered for idleness. If there is no reward for industry, there is an incentive to idleness, and a discount on industry. Here, then, arises another conflict between the industrious and the idle; the industrious will join the talented and strong, and create a rebellion against so despotic and unjust a government. Any society organized on the hypothesis that men will labor for an abstract principle—for the general good and without some specific reward—is not founded on the principles of human nature, and must fail, as all such experiments have failed. There is something so inherently just and equitable in the proposition that every man shall enjoy the fruits of his own industry, that few have ever ventured to dispute it. Experience teaches us that barbarism ignores property, while civilization recognizes it; law and order accumulate it, while anarchy disperses it; commerce distributes it, while war destroys it. It is therefore associated with the peace, prosperity, and advancement of mankind.

Are the existing methods of acquiring property just and equitable? In this country any man may acquire as much or as little property as he pleases, in any manner he pleases, by discovering and occupying it a series of years, by producing or earning it, purchasing or inheriting it, or in any other way except by force, stealth, or fraud. The law also gives him the largest liberty of disposing of it. He may, as has been quaintly observed, "endow a college or a cat" with it. These are the great fundamental principles upon which wealth or "capital" are founded. If wealth is obtained fairly, and not in violation of these restrictions, it justly and rightfully belongs to the owner; and it is the duty of society to protect him in its ownership. If, however, it has been obtained by robbery, burglary, theft, or fraud, society is bound to see that it is restored to its true owner. It is not robbery or theft, but fraud that puzzles the brain, eludes the grasp, and defeats

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

The Conquered Banner.

[These sweet and melancholy lines were written at the close of our late war, and published in the Freeman's Journal.]

Furl that Banner, for 'tis weary,
Round its staff 'tis drooping dreary;
Furl it, fold it, it is best.
For there's not a man to wave it,
And there's not a soul to save it,
And there's not one left to have it
In the blood which heroes gave it;
And its foes now scorn and brave it;
Furl it, hide it, let it rest.

Take that Banner down, 'tis tattered!
Broken is its staff and shattered!
And the valiant hosts are scattered
Over whom it floated high.
Oh, 'tis hard for us to fold it;
Hard to think there's none to hold it;
Hard that those who once unrolled it
Now must furl it with a sigh.

Furl that Banner, furl it sadly;
Once ten thousands hailed it gladly,
And ten thousands wildly, madly.
Swore it should forever wave—
Swore that foemen's swords could never Hearts like theirs entwined dis sever,
Till that flag should float forever
O'er their freedom or their grave.

Furl it, for the hands that grasped it,
And the hearts that fondly clasped it,
Cold and dead are lying low;
And that Banner, it is trailing,
While around it sounds the wailing
Of its people in their woe.

For, though conquered, they adore it;
Low the cold, dead hands that bore it;
Weep for those who fell before it;
Pardon those who trailed and tore it;
But, oh! wildly they deplore it
Now who furl and fold it so.

Furl that Banner—true 'tis gory,
Yet 'tis wreathed around with glory,
And 'twill live in song and story.
Though its folds are in the dust;
For its fame, on brightest pages,
Penned by poets and by sages,
Shall go sounding down the ages—
Furl its folds though now we must.

Furl that Banner softly, slowly;
Treat it gently—it is holy—
For it droops above the dead.
Touch it not—until it never,
Let it droop there furled forever,
For its people's hopes are dead!

Golden Shoes.

May bought golden shoes for her boy,
Golden leather from heel to toe,
With silver tassel to tie at the top,
And dainty lining as white as snow.
I bought a pair of shoes as well
For the restless feet of a little lad,
Common and coarse and iron tipped—
The best I could for the sum I had.

"Golden," May said, "to match his curls."
I never saw her petted boy;
I warrant he is but a puny elf,
And pink and white, like a china toy;
And who is he, that he should walk
All shod in gold on the king's highway,
While little Fred, with a king's own grace,
Must wear rough brogans every day?

And why can May from her little hand
Fling baubles at her idol's feet,
While I can hardly shelter Fred
From the cruel stones of the broken street?
I envy not her silken robe,
Nor the jewels' shine, nor the handmaid's care;
But ah! to give what I can not—
This, this is so hard to bear.

But down I'll crush this bitter thought,
And bear no grudge to pretty May,
Though she is rich and I am poor,
Since we were girls at Clover Bay—
And ask the Lord to guide the feet,
So painfully and coarsely shod,
Till they are fit to walk the street
That runs hard by the throne of God.

"Good-bye, friend Ellen!" "Good-bye, May!"
What dims her eyes so bright and blue,
As she looks at the rugged shoes askance?
"I wish my boy could wear these, too,
But he will never walk, they say."
So, May, with a little sigh, is gone,
And I am left in a wondering mood
To think of my wicked thoughts alone.

It needs not that I tell you how
I clasped my sturdy rogue that night,
And thanked the God who gave him strength,
And made him such a merry wight;
Nor envied May one gift she held,
If with it I must also choose
That sight of little crippled feet,
Albeit shod in golden shoes.

ANONYMOUS.

That Holy Thing.

They all were looking for a king
To slay their foes and lift them high;
Thou canst a little baby thing
That made a woman cry.

O Son of Man, to right my lot
Naught but thy presence can avail;
Yet on the road thy wheels are not,
Nor on the sea thy sail.

My how or when thou wilt not heed,
But come down thine own secret stair,
That thou mayst answer all my need,
Yea, every by-gone prayer.

Julia A. Moore, the Sweet Singer of Michigan, was nearly paralyzed with astonishment when recently informed that "éclat" didn't rhyme with "he cat." She has not sufficiently recovered to finish her half-completed poem "On the Birth of a New Spring."

PARISIAN BONBONS.

Riding in a railroad car:

Husband.—You are quite comfortable, dear?

Wife.—Yes, love.

Husband.—The cushions are easy and soft, ducky?

Wife.—Yes, darling.

Husband.—You don't feel any jolts, pet?

Wife.—No, sweetest.

Husband.—And there is no draught on my lamb, is there, angel?

Wife.—No, my ownest own.

Husband.—Then change seats with me!

In the course of his travels in Equatorial Africa, an explorer meets a bright, intelligent mulatto, who was the slave and body-servant of a negro king.

"Come with me to Europe," he says to the slave; "you may be happy yet."

The mulatto hesitated.

"Come," repeated the traveler; "here you are but a slave, yonder you will be a servant."

In the Pyrenees there is an interesting stage line between two villages, one on each side of a mountain 16,000 feet high. After the coach has proceeded a little distance and reached the steep part of the ascent the conductor begs the passengers to get out so as to ease the horses; they are even requested to push behind and help the poor animals to drag the huge vehicle up hill.

When at last the summit is reached each traveler, wiping from his forehead drops of sweat as big as kidney-beans, congratulates himself on the breezy ride down the steep slopes of the descent which awaits him.

There is where he fools himself, for the conductor, with a sweet smile, begs the gentlemen to be kind enough to hang on the coach behind and act the part of a Westinghouse air-brake, or else the horses may be injured.

In this manner the terminus of the line is reached, the passengers having pushed the coach all the way up one side of the mountain, and held it back all the way down the other.

In spite of this there is a rush for places on the stage daily, as there has been for half a century.

A dancress—it there has some years—was having embarked herself for New York. To the end of dazzling the Yankees she took with her household, her carriage and horses—everything.

Her first appearance was an immense success. She was called before the curtain four—eleven—forty-four times, and flowers, doves, evergreens, bonbons, and seven-thirty bonds were rained down upon her in deluges.

She was delighted, but her ecstasies were redoubled when she beheld a frenzied crowd, hoarse with cheering, precipitate itself toward her carriage, unharness the horses, and insist on drawing her to her hotel, amid cries of "This way for the City Hall!" "Here's yer nice new receptions!"

Intoxicated with her triumph, the dancress sleeps late next morning, and after breakfast orders her carriage, meaning to take a short drive through the city.

"Your carriage is in the hotel stables," says the servant; "have you any choice of horses?"

"Certainly; harness my own team, those splendid blood bays, the gift of Prince Whazinzanski!"

"Oh! those that were unharnessed last night?"

"Yes. I no longer need envy Fanny Ellsler; for, if the gentlemen of Philadelphia turned out to draw her carriage, mine has been drawn in triumph by the honorable aldermen of New York."

"Yes, ma'am," says the servant; "but the gentlemen who took your horses out haven't brought them back—c'est cela qu'a Hannah."

A high-toned valet, smiling and bowing with exquisite grace, to his bourgeoise mistress:

"You know, madame, that with our masters it is not permitted us to say everything; but it is permitted, madame, to think everything."

At the police court:

The Judge.—What is your age, madam?

Lady.—Whatever you please, your honor.

Judge.—Forty-five years. Your business?

Lady.—Hold on a minute, your honor; you've made a mistake of ten years in my age.

Judge.—Well, then, fifty-five years.

Lady (furious).—I tell you, sir, on my oath, I'm only thirty-five.

Judge.—Ah; so you have finished by answering my question.

Z. loses one of his friends from whom he has time and again borrowed a V until he had sold his dog, or until Saturday after 2 o'clock, and bitterly mourns his loss.

"You seem deeply afflicted?" said a lady.

"Afflicted? Oh, madam, if you only knew how much I owe that man!"

Peroration of the Spartan uncle's lecture to his scapegrace nephew:

"Finally, sirrah, you should endeavor to understand that it is infinitely better, instead of making pledges you always break, to make no promises at all—and keep them."

In a barber's shop. Chief barber out. Young lady cashier at the counter. Enter a gentleman who is always shaved by the proprietor.

Customer.—I see Mr. X. is not in.

Young Lady at the Counter [graciously].—Will you please sit down and wait a few minutes? He won't be long; [still more graciously] he's only gone out to shave a man who's been taken with the small-pox!

"Marie, my boots," said Madame D. to her friend in the chambre; "hurry up, for I have asked you for them times."

"Why, ma'am, I thought I would help you but I've laced them up while you were putting on your shoes."

the purposes of modern society. Individuals have their besetting sins; so have nations and ages. The besetting sin of this nation and of this age is fraud. In former ages it was force. We now obtain by indirect and secret methods what was formerly obtained by force. Fraud is the result of education planted in bad soil. We are educating the masses. In our American common schools are the children of thieves, wretches, and villains, in whose blood courses whole centuries of vice. We sharpen their faculties by education to enable them to defraud us, to keep them from boldly and openly killing us. Now, it is the settled rule of the courts never to interfere to relieve parties of "hard bargains." The courts will not make bargains for men. They must make their own bargains, and they will never be set aside unless there is clear evidence of fraud. The courts have purposely refrained from defining fraud, and it is, therefore, a very difficult subject to deal with. It is on this dim, uncertain, shadowy boundary line between what is permitted and what is prohibited that frauds are perpetrated. The law can not favor the perpetrator of frauds, and yet it expects every man to beware and guard against them. It will not relieve a man from a contract entered into upon false representations made by another as to facts equally palpable to both. It is upon this uncertain ground that the strong, the sharp, and the shrewd gain their victories over the weak. Society does not assume to be perfect. Neither judges or jurors (especially the latter) can look into the hearts of men. The ignorant, the stupid, and the weak must therefore pay the penalty of their weakness by suffering the ills of poverty, and who will say in the face and eyes of all animate nature that it is not just and proper that they should?

Who is to blame for the deprivations and sufferings of the poor? The poor, as we stated above, may be divided into three classes, viz.: the vicious, the imbecile, and the respectable but unfortunate.

First—The vicious poor. Among these are the tramps, vagrants, thieves, and other outlaws, whose lives are steeped in generations and centuries of crime. Each succeeding generation has added to their inherited load of vicious propensities, until they are born outlaws. Bavaria, at one time, swarmed with "tramps," whose fathers, grandfathers, and great-grandfathers were tramps before them. It required an iron hand to subdue them. Recent investigations in Massachusetts demonstrated that there were organized bands of vagrants, thousands in number, natives of various countries, but chiefly Irish, roaming over the hills and through the woods of Berkshire, ostensibly "seeking work," and yet systematically refusing it when offered. Italy has its "royal" families of lazzaroni who have begged from generation to generation. A most remarkable book is the annals of the "Jukes" (a pseudonym adopted to protect worthy members of the real family), a criminal family of New York, compiled from authentic sources by Mr. Dugdale, a member of the Prison Association of New York. In this book the genealogy of the family, originally consisting of six sisters, is traced down for seven generations, through prisons, almshouses, and brothels. Five of these original sisters were married, three of them were harlots, and their descendants, numbering over seven hundred, included among their number thieves, murderers, robbers, prostitutes, and outlaws of every description. The most startling disclosures are made of the power of inherited criminal tendencies and the predispositions to crime, even in the absence of criminal environments. Now what can society do for these outlaws? To feed tramps is to increase the tribe. Charity breeds beggars. Sympathy for criminals is a premium to crime. The penny given to the beggars in Europe is a dime here. The streets of our American cities swarm with European mendicants. We are offering a premium to them by our munificence. The European passport system was the outgrowth of an imperative necessity to prevent vagrancy and crime. We, too, shall soon be forced to adopt the same measures to protect organized society. Is there a higher or better method? Can they be reformed? Can they be raised? To cure organic diseases by transfusion of blood is a modern discovery. By what system of transfusion can we put honest blood in the veins of inherited criminals? To kill the children of such people as did the ancient Spartans might be wise and merciful, but it would be inhuman. To depend upon the gentle influences of Christianity to reform them has proved ineffectual. Our free school system does not reach them. Our sheriffs can not catch them. The Japanese are the only people on earth who have gone to the foundation of the disease by depriving certain portions of their criminal classes of the power to procreate.

Second—The imbeciles are neither vagrants nor criminals; they are simply weaklings. They have no brains, no power of thought, no idea of what to do or how to do it. It was found impossible four thousand years ago to "make bricks without straw." It remained for Pennsylvania, in its palmy days of oil wells, to produce a genius to suggest a method of supplying a lack of brains when he said to the instructor of his daughter, who complained that she had no "capacity," "Hang it all, buy her one; I will pay for it." What can be done for a people who, if set upon their feet, immediately fall down? or, if clothed, fed, or pampered, at once become charges upon the community? Shall we stand by and see them multiply and increase, generation after generation, without devising some method of lifting them up? or shall we let the law of nature have its cold, undeviating way? Has society done enough by simply providing poor-houses for the helpless, prisons for the vicious, and schools for the young? Is there any other way than to let the strong subside upon the weak, limited only by such restrictions as it is within the power of man to enforce? I am forced to the conclusion, in view of the foregoing facts, that there is no other way. As La Rochefoucauld well says: "Weakness is the only fault which can not be cured."

Third—The respectable but unfortunate poor must content themselves with the inscription which shall be engraved upon their tombs: "Poor but honest." Verily they have their reward. "The rich man can no more enter the kingdom of heaven than a camel can go through the eye of a needle." These are the sweet words of consolation—not unmixed, perhaps, with revenge—which we poor can fall asleep while nestling in the bosom of Abraham.

Poverty, like selfishness, is by no means an unmitigated evil. There are far worse ills than to be poor. There are far higher pleasures than to be rich.

HENRY N. CLEMENT.

AN INTERCEPTED LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 25, 1879.

DEAREST MADGE:—Are you sitting up in your own mountain eyrie longing to be in town, and dreaming of the opera? I wish the Arabian's magic cloak could have been at your call last Wednesday night that you might be transported to Baldwin's Theatre to see Faust. Nothing could have made you better satisfied with your fate; nothing could be more disillusionizing. It is pleasant to go to the opera because every one you see there is happy on the surface at least. No one looks poor, no one looks hungry, no one looks distract. One loses sight and sound of all the sorrow in the world. It is a perfect picture of prosperity. I was thinking the other night, in that same lunatic way I have of communing with my imagination when you are not by to listen to my ramblings, what a glittering pile it would make every woman in the audience were seized with one of those spasms of charity of which we read sometimes, and would, like the Lady Clare,

"Pull off, pull off the brooch of gold,
And fling the diamond necklace by,"

and contribute them to some of the numerous sufferers by fire, flood, or pestilence. I do not believe there were twenty women in the dress circle who did not wear diamonds. What a fine charity pyramid they would make! But then of course people never do that sort of thing except in steel engravings. I wish you could see the house on a good night, a first night, for they are repeating the operas with a carelessness which will wreck them when the new subscription time comes. White is the rage this season. People are swathed in billows and billows of it. Now and then there is a dash of blue or pink or cardinal, but like the mystic arm which rose from out the bosom of the lake people seem to be "clothed all in white samite." Samite poetically speaking, of course, for the white is in all materials from satin to bunting, and in all the variety of tints of this capricious colorless color which workers in crevices find so hard to match. It is a wonderfully becoming uniform. It freshens aged faces; it softens the rosier tints of younger cheeks; it gives the eyes a deeper hue, and the hair a more pronounced color. You will think I am a long time getting to the stage, Madge, but really there is so little when you get there that the subject is not alluring. The operas themselves are the most fragmentary affairs possible. Such hacking and hewing and mutilation you never saw. They gave us a bit of Rigoletto on Monday, and a section of Faust on Wednesday, sandwiching it on Tuesday with Il Trovatore comparatively intact. It would hardly do to carve this as they have the others. People are so familiar with the dear old score that I believe the audience would get up and sing it for the company if they undertook to cut too much of it. What a picture that would be! The patient, long-suffering, liberal San Francisco public retaliating on that awful chorus after all these years by giving them a bit of Il Trovatore without rehearsal. You should have heard the Faust choruses on Wednesday; or rather, for your tympanum's sake, I am glad you did not. Would you not think, Madge, that those old girls, after twenty years of it, would have some sort of a hazy idea of the Faust melodies? Not a bit of it. It might as well have been "La gazza ladra," which nobody ever sings, as the well-known French music of this German tale. And Faust is such a beautiful opera, and it has been so exquisitely sung so many times. Liitta had almost completely subjugated the public until she played "Marguerite." There is something very captivating in her fresh, young, unjaded voice, which has been so thoroughly schooled; but she places herself at fearful odds in attempting "Marguerite." It is so essentially a dramatic part, and the world is so familiar with a dramatic interpretation, that it peculiarly resents anything else. Is it not strange what a hold this story of a village girl has taken upon the world. She seems as real as the Cenci herself; and, although her story is the story of many a simple maid, it has a surpassing interest which can not be defined. There are two Faust operas, are there not? And how many and many an artist has painted a "Marguerite!" Even the writers can not resist trying to transmute this simple German maid by the touch of their own fancy. A San Francisco writer undertook once to dramatize Faust, eliminating from it entirely the supernatural. The result is a common-place story, which might as well take place in New England as in Germany, and the heroine might as well be called "Priscilla" as "Marguerite." W. S. Gilbert, whose fecund imagination should not find it necessary to borrow material from Goethe, has written a new comedy on this old theme called Gretchen. I believe his idea has been to make "Faust" a possible person without destroying the poetico-philosophical element of the poem. I borrow that expression from some one, I know, I can not recall whom; but this I know, that, however clever Mr. Gilbert's Gretchen may be from a literary point of view, he can not, if he has modernized it, have preserved the poetico-philosophical element, and if he has left that out, he has simply knocked the bottom out of the whole affair. I do know where I got that expression, Madge. I got it from a stock-dealer, not from a poem. To return to Liitta. She sang the jewel song admirably, and that is all that the most partial admirer can claim her to have done well. In fact, no one did well, excepting Miss Cary, who never does anything ill, who is always reliable, always artistic, and in "Amneris" and "Azucena" something superb. She and the music itself carry Il Trovatore, and no one else in the cast furnishes any material assistance. As for Madame Roze, I can not tell you anything about her voice, for she has not enough to rave about. I could fancy her to be something charming in a light French opera comique, for I know she would be a good actress in comedy, but she is no more tragic than a cherub. But, oh, Madge, she is the most bewildering creature in the matter of raiment and jewels that ever you saw. Girdles, necklaces, rings, bracelets, tiaras without end, each one more beautiful, more brilliant than the last. Then she loves satin—rich, thick, sheeny satin. She wears a pale creamy yellow as "Leonora," trimmed in silver lace, set in such fashion as to mitigate her embroiderment. She has a white bridal dress, of course. There are more brides on the stage than anything else nowadays, and an endless lot of pretty things. I wish Roze had a little more voice, and Liitta a little more clothes and jewelry, and the coming programme had a little more variety, and there were longer parts for the contralto than "Madelina" or "Siebel." The subscription people are furious. Next week they are to give Il Trovatore, Faust, and Lucia di Lammermoor again. Thus in three weeks they will have had Lucia twice, Martha twice, Il Trovatore three times, and Faust twice; and such a Faust! People yawned during the first half, and got up and left during the last half. In addition to all its other faults, Gottschalk played "Valentine." We wanted Pantaleoni. In point of fact, Cary and Pantaleoni are about all the people do want. He was rather good as "Rigoletto" on Monday. His ideas of comedy are confined to skipping the tra-la-la-loo around the stage, but in the more serious portions he was really impressive, and he knows how to sing, which, as the season goes, is quite a pleasing variation on the usual order of things. As another diversion we are to have Un Ballo in Maschera to-night with three prime donne. The third prima donna is Miss Lancaster, ha-ha-ha! I wish I had only here to give the proper expression of Mephistophelian mockery to this hollow mirth. He is such an awfully bad "Mephisto," and his laugh is so funny; so is his Italian, so is his acting. But he has a delightful voice, and he can carry it down, down, down to the thirteen hundred-foot level so easily that one doesn't really mind the rest.

"What passion can not music raise and quell?
When Jubal struck the chorded shell,
His listening brethren stood around,
And, wondering, on their faces fell,
To worship that celestial sound."

If Jubal played an old shell so well as all that, we must accept Conly, "Mephisto," and all. The theatres, with the exception of the California, are having rather a monotonous time of it. As for the Passion Play, first the Supervisors tabooed it, and then the Judge did the same. Truly, righteousness is beginning to sit in high places. The consequence is that the Grand Opera House is closed until the Opera Company is ready to move in, and the Easter morning curtain will be sent up among the rubbish. I am so glad of it. Quite aside from any sacrilegious, or rather religious, scruples, there was something inexpressibly vulgar—in the true acceptance of the word—in the Passion Play that jarred upon all one's finer feelings. In a fortnight or so we shall have opera at the Grand, and perhaps we shall have a bit of scenery now and then, which they refuse us at the Baldwin, and perhaps, after the unhappy subscriptionists are exasperated to the last degree, we shall have a new opera or two. Hope on, hope over. At the California Boucicault is crowding the houses. There is but one Dion, and his name is Boucicault. They say Mr. Barton Hill will return soon, after a singularly lucky trip to the East. It is to be hoped his engagements will turn out well, but there is ordinarily nothing so fatal as repeating a mistake. It is true Fanny Davenport and Lester Wallack, and perhaps some others, are coming, but he has been pursuing precisely the same policy that wrecked the fortunes of this house once. Tom Keene is coming out to play a star engagement. Harry Edwards has been invited. Perhaps inducements have been held out to Ellie Wilton and Alice Harrison. Carrie Wyatt is not heard from, and who knows but that he may have been in treaty with Murray Wood's advance agent. The California Theatre is a charming house as it stands, and the present Shanghaun company is undoubtedly good, while many who are not on-lookers only would be glad to shake hands with some few of the old company.

"Everything is spoilt by use.
Where's the cheek that does not fade
Too much gazed at? Where's the maid Whose lip nature is ever new?
Where's the eye, however blue,
Doth not weary? Where's the face
One would meet in every place?
Where's the voice, however soft,
One would hear so very oft?"

Unless the voice, the eye, and the lip appertained to one's own ingle nook, nowhere! With which sage conclusion, dear Madge, I will bid you good day, and go read up Un Ballo until next time. Yours, devotedly, BETSY B.

Mme. C., dressmaker, has a great deal of trouble with her sewing girls. The other day one of them came to her to say, "Madame, I fear that I will not be able to work much longer. I think I am getting blind." "Why, how is that?" You seem to get along pretty well with your work." "Yes; but I can no longer see my meat on my plate at dinner." Mme. C. understood, and the next day the young ladies were served with very large but very thin pieces of meat. "What happiness," exclaimed our Miss. "My sight has come back. I can now see better than ever." "How is that, Mademoiselle?" "Why, at this moment, I can see the plate through the meat!"

Miss Ada Hungerford, a sister-in-law of Mackay of the millions, has become Countess Telfener. The marriage took place in Rome the other day with rather more prelates to help than is usual with us when heirs to the throne are throwing themselves away. The King of Italy sent an aide-de-camp to the ceremony, and after it went to the races held on the occasion in the Count's private park. For an American, and her brother-in-law's sister-in-law, Miss Hungerford has been exceedingly moderate. She might have had her pick of the dukes of the Continent; it was evidently a marriage of affection.—London World.

Little pigs in gold and silver are now worn by everybody in Vienna as jewelry. Pins, charms, bracelets, stick-handles—everything is for the moment porcine. The Court began, and the rest of the world naturally followed the lead. The fashion has come from Germany, and was introduced to commemorate the happy escape of the Emperor William from all the risks and dangers he has lately run, and his "Schweins' glück," or pigs' luck—meaning splendid luck—as the German phrase goes, in coming out of it all so well.

A man named Clare had raised a large family of boys. He had desired a girl, but the fates had gone against him. At last, after six boy babies had come to bless him and keep him buying bread and dealing out pennies, a girl put in an appearance. He was so delighted and surprised that he raised up his voice and exclaimed: "Well, I declare." And so they named her Ida Clare.

"ULTIMATE AMERICA."

A Lecture by the Reverend Joseph Cook.

[We take it that the following is a fair sample of the unmitigated balderdash of that colossal humbug who dazzles by grandiloquent words the cultured brainless of Boston—the Reverend Joseph Cook:]

Gladstone says, and I repeat it boldly and fearlessly, that twelve is more than eleven!!! I am in the presence of scholars [approving nod from the scholars], and it is with bated breath I make this statement. Bear it well in mind, for on this it is that I base the astounding ideas to BE ADVANCED THIS EVENING!!!!!! As I sat in my study in Water Street, in BOSTON, not a long while since, holding in my right hand a long and affectionate letter from Dickens—no, he's dead—from Caesar—not from him either, but from Thomas Carlyle, in my left hand a copy of that vile, filthy, and vulgar sheet, the New York World, I mused as became ME to muse. I REPEAT, AND DARE A SUCCESSFUL CONTRADICTION, I MUSED over the dead of my generation. Beside the graves of that generation let us muse. [All muse.] CAESAR'S EMPIRE WAS NOT AS LARGE AS THE UNITED STATES!!!!!! Oh, Ultimate, Ultimate America. Beside the graves of the departed and fast thinning generation I say this. YET WHO DARE CONTRADICT????!!!!!! In a recent conversation with Ruth. Hayes and Carl Schurz, Hayes said that as soon as Conkling and Blaine were arrested, imprisoned, or banished, all would be well. The other day, while enjoying a social game of seven-up with that pure and gentle poet, Jim Lowell, I said, "Jim, let's take a drink." Tears bedimmed his gentle and pure orbs, as in faltering accents he replied: "I'm your huckleberry." DOES THIS NOT PROVE THAT AS WE HAVE GREAT RIVER SYSTEMS, WE MUST, AND I SAY IT BOLDLY, HAVE PLENTY OF WATER!!!!!! Ah! Ultimate, Ultimate America. By the grave of the departed let us muse. Carlyle, Macaulay, Mills, Gladstone, Huxley, Tyn-dall, Tom Paine, Webster (all friends of mine), from the dim and shadowy dimness of the misty dim distance, beckon us on in this noble road. I FOR ONE, THOUGH ALONE AND FRIENDLESS, SHALL FOLLOW IN THEIR FOOTSTEPS! I AM A LONE ORPHAN, AND MY STRONG RIGHT ARM IS GONE (caused by the f. t. g.—fast thinning generation). YET, I SAY RIGHT HERE, I AM PROUD OF AMERICA, AND HAD RATHER BE AN AMERICAN, CONTEMPTIBLE AS WE ARE, THAN TO BE AN AFRICAN!!!!!! [Thunder upon thunder of applause for the man's boldness.] By the graves of the f. t. g. let us muse. Ah! Ultimate, Ultimate, Ultimate America. I shudder to think of you in the year 1236. Yet I give no date. I could if I would, but time forbids, say in ten or twelve thousand years, with the population 927 to the square inch. I shudder [all the scholars shudder] to think of the crowding there will be. I SAY IT BOLDLY, THERE WOULD THEN BE A CROWD!!!!!! [All the scholars admit it.] Some of my hearers may live till then, and will then ponder over my present speaking. Civil Service REFORM must come, yet until this weary heart, sad with long musing over the departed generation, finds a home in some fat—fat—No—I am NOT a candidate for any office—all is BAD, AND REFORM IS A SHAM!!!!!! YET I HAD RATHER BE AN AMERICAN WITH A GOOD THING UNDER HAYES, THAN TO BE AN AFRICAN!!!!!! By the graves of the departed and fast thinning generation let us muse. America is dear to me. Oh!!! how dear. As dear "as the ruddy blood which swashes in and out of this sad, sad heart of mine." Again seated in study, within a stone's-throw of Jim Lowell, I dreamt a dream. I SAY BOLDLY, I WAS NOT ASLEEP! 'TIS ONLY A POLITICAL AND METAPHORICAL WAY I HAVE OF CALLING ATTENTION TO ENDING OF THIS RAMBLING DISCOURSE. So here goes for something exquisitely fine, the result of æsthetic culture and long musing over the f. t. g. I saw three Bumpers come shuffling into a warm and gigantic bar-room: their throats were parched with long and enforced temperance. For the NECTAR of the gods they longed. Without it life became but as a mockery. Alas! can such things be in America? The black angel trusted their promises not. "No soap, no drink!" was his jeering reply. They passed sadly, madly out, and from the streets and doors came the fiendish laugh of ten thousand times ten thousand gamins and ill-natured men. This teaches the distribution of property. They would have been EFFICIENT, but had not SUFFICIENT wealth!!!!!! I am about to leave you soon, soon, soon—soon Joseph Cook will be heard no more. This sad heart will at last, thank God, find a resting-place, this weary brain be rested!!! Ah! Ultimate, Ultimate, Ultimate America!!!!!!—Puck.

A London paper in noticing the death of Mrs. Morrel, in her youth a member of Lord Byron's household, says her account of the separation between Lord and Lady Byron was very simple. After the birth of their only child, Ada, the looseness of Lord Byron's life led to occasional scenes, which culminated as follows: "One morning at breakfast when Lord Byron was in one of his tantrums, Lady Byron brought matters to a crisis by asking, pointedly: 'Byron am I in your way?' Byron, who was leaning against the mantel-piece, answered, savagely: 'Yes; damnably!' Lady Byron immediately rose and left the room. She communicated with her family, and they sent a carriage and pair, and brought her away. She never saw her husband, and 'damnably' was the last word from Lord Byron's lips which fell upon her ear."

A Louisville young woman writes to a modest and stupid youth: "Yes, when you asked me if I would marry you—oh! I ought not to have done it, I suppose—but then it was such an opportunity, and so I smiled the cue to you and answered, 'Never!' And you stupid, you froze and bowed like a telegraph pole and left. Oh, dear me! and I certainly thought that at this day there was nobody under the sun so unparadoxically obtuse, so far behind the age and the rage, that he would not have instantly met me with, 'What, never and given me the chance to reply, 'Well, hardly ever.'"

The ceremony of baptism by immersion was celebrated in western Texas the other day, and when the fourteen candidates walked down to the water fifteen revolvers were deposited on the bank of the stream, that of the preacher making the fifteenth.

AN ADDRESS.

To the Workmen and Farmers of California.

In addressing the following to you, you will understand that those only who really do work, who earn their daily bread by manual labor, are included. Those hangers-on, idle, dissipated, and perverted, who have placed themselves under the banner of the honest workingman, and who greatly detract from that party, are too abject to be noticed. Before proceeding permit me to call your attention to the following axiom: Every man in California is a workingman.

The capitalist, banker, merchant, jobber, or grocer is a workingman as well as the artisan. If they do not actually handle the pick, shovel, sledge-hammer, or any other implement representative of manual labor, you can not deny that they certainly do heavy brain labor. You know very well that this is not a community composed of retired gentlemen, living in elegant leisure, on princely incomes derived from vast estates. You can hardly find in the whole State a retired capitalist, or banker, or merchant. All are actually engaged in their respective branches of business, striving to one end, the general prosperity of this great country. The very great and surprising energy that is so noticeable and preponderant in the Californian cause them to eschew anything verging on a life of idleness or leisure, and they all die in the harness. Look around you, look into the past, and you will find that those who have been called away were at the time engaged in active business. You will, therefore, comprehend that we are all workingmen, each one in his respective sphere, struggling along, hand in hand and shoulder to shoulder, for the common good, to promote and increase individual and collective prosperity.

You will also readily understand that some of us have to do the manual labor, and some the thinking, in order that every enterprise that is undertaken shall result as satisfactorily as possible to all concerned. We can not all be capitalists, nor can we all be laboring men, for the reason that the Almighty, in His wisdom, has constituted us differently—yes, different in character, disposition, energy, intellect, etc.—and those who have been the most favored must rise above the ordinary level, and by their superiority must necessarily command their inferiors, in every vocation in life.

You will, no doubt, agree with me on this very plain and natural conclusion; and doing so, you will see that whenever there is anything to interfere with the relations between the laborer and the thinking man, whenever the harmony, that it is absolutely necessary should exist at all times between them, is interrupted or destroyed, then affairs assume a very unsatisfactory and unhealthy state, the general prosperity of the community suffers, and the laborer feels always more quickly and more keenly the result of such unfortunate misunderstanding. Bear in mind, also, that labor and capital must go together, bravely and confidently. General content and prosperity are born of their union; discontent, suffering, and misery result from any separation. It is a fortunate thing, however, that all differences between labor and capital, in this and other parts of the world, have always been short-lived, for the simple reason that one can not live without the other. Such estrangements have, as a rule, been settled amicably, both pausing to consider the results, which have invariably proved to be much more detrimental to labor than to capital. This is the world's history, and history repeats itself.

A man has happened to be with us, who has assumed to be the leader and champion of the workingmen of California. This man is a foreigner by birth, and in the way of education, understanding, and common sense, is far below your level. He has seen fit, with the encouragement that most of you have thoughtlessly given to him, to attempt to usurp power, to slander, to vilify, and violently threaten many of our most respectable and influential citizens who have resided here from the earliest times, who came to this coast poor, young workingmen, like many of you, who have struggled with the vicissitudes of early California life, with energy and integrity, and who have contributed immensely to our unprecedented and enviable prosperity. Is this proper, is it noble, is it worthy of you, and do you wish it to continue? No, you can not. You have listened to this man, and he has grown bold and presumptuous to almost an unlimited extent. You have tacitly upheld his wicked and false views as expressed on the sand-lot. You have, to a certain extent, allowed yourselves to be imbued with his corrupting spirit of discontent and rebellion. You have gradually become uneasy, imagining great wrongs that really do not exist, and have become dissatisfied with your condition through the subtle, false, delusive theories advanced by this man; you have, some of you, good creatures of impulse and not of thought, allowed yourselves to drink of the rank poison that it has been the will of this individual to hand to you.

It is not too late for you to pause in a body, and fully weigh the consequences that are sure to overtake you if you will persist in following the teachings of this man, who is proving himself to be the most dangerous enemy that you have ever had. Is it not surprising that you, hard-working, sober, and intelligent men, with interests at stake in the way of comfortable homesteads and deposits in our savings banks, should allow yourselves to be led astray, to have your understandings warped by the rapid and pernicious promises of such a very inferior person? Why is it? Is it because you have not the time to give the matter the serious attention it is entitled to, to arrive at the merits or demerits of the new Constitution. If such is the case with many of you, go to your legal advisers, go to your priests, your ministers, go to those of your acquaintance and friends in whom you have confidence, who, by their known integrity and honesty of purpose, you know will not mislead you; ask them for a frank expression of their opinion on this very important subject, and be guided thereby. Do not apply to those who are making use of you to support their private, selfish, and rather crooked purposes, who are known to have the most exalted political aspirations, and whose motto is "rule or ruin." You can not draw pure water from such an impure source, and it is useless—yes, and I will say, criminal—on your part, to attempt it. There are thousands in our community who have the interests of the State at heart, who are known to be unprejudiced, just, and free from all political duplicity, and ambition, who could not be made to accept, at the hands of the people, the highest political office within their gift. Go to them, and do not hesitate to follow their sound and disinterested advice, because those men, who have been with us from the earliest times, have reputations for veracity and honesty that have never been doubted, and much less assailed. These men only you will find to be the true friends of the laboring man, and they certainly will not deceive you, rest assured. All these men, who have everything at stake, who are the true representatives of the financial credit and mercantile honor of this coast, are not all "bloated bondholders," and "aristocrats," "arrant blackguards," and "damned rascals," as your would-be leader pleases to style them. Is it possible that we have all been living in a community of thieves ever since California became a State, a community of everything that is disreputable, despicable, and vile? Is it not strange that this very alarming state of affairs was not found out until the advent of your would-be leader, and that it was the fertility of his prolific brain that dotted your i's, and crossed your t's? Is it not very surprising that he opened your eyes to the glaring fact that you are sorely oppressed? Can you be so very blind as to continue to be the main stay of a man who will be guilty of uttering such nonsense to you, men of superior intelligence? No; if you will but pause to give the matter a few moments of serious thought your common sense will revolt, and you will not belittle yourselves and stultify your manhood any longer. Be the same steadfast, honorable, hard-working, and law-abiding citizens, true to yourselves and to your neighbors, as you have been from the commencement, and once and for ever throw aside, and treat with contempt, the teachings of this individual who would misguide you for his private purposes. Do this, and hard times will disappear, and work will be plentiful at increased wages; quiet and unprecedented prosperity will reign supreme. I say this because we are on the eve of the most abundant harvest that we have ever had, and the indications are that very extensive developments will soon be made on the Comstock, besides which gold mining in this State will receive increased attention, provided such serious attacks against this very important branch of industry are stopped as are embodied in this new Constitution.

In a great country like ours, where nature in every respect has been so lavish, and where the chances for fortune are so great, what prevents many of you who have been made discontented to become capitalists? Nothing in the world but your own actions; and here I will predict that many of you, even in spite of your injudicious actions, will in the course of time be well to do—yes, rich men. You will, perforce, be carried along by the tide of general prosperity. In the meantime do not diminish the chances by your thoughtless agitations. As you are sensible men, you can not fail to see that whatever is gained by violence has no foundation, and can only be used by the usurper at the peril of being stung and cursed by it. You will also understand that usurpation means "anarchy," and when this commences where will it end? Can any one of you tell who so hastily join in with your would-be leader in his frantic and criminal cries of hemp, hemp? No. You know full well that law and order must and will prevail.

In Naples once a humble fisherman, Masaniello by name, wishing to assume the reins of what he supposed was a very corrupt and oppressive government with the view to "reform," accomplished his end through violence and with the assistance of those in whom he had incultured the germ of discontent and rebellion. With the crown, intoxicated by success, position, and power, he inaugurated a system of dire oppression and injustice toward those who elevated him, and the consequence was that they, misguided and in turn oppressed more than they had ever been before, turned on the usurper and made him their victim. I have already stated that history repeats itself. What is to-day going on here coincides to a great extent with what occurred in Naples many, many years ago. Some one will be made to suffer and atone for the very great deception that has lately been practiced, and for the very great injury that has been inflicted, on the people by such rank duplicity.

Workingmen and farmers of California, the old Constitution, under which this noble State has grown into power and enviable prosperity, has been thoroughly tested and is now well understood. It is, in the main, sound and good; and, having so prospered under it, we can continue to do so. Therefore why discard it for a new one, untried, dangerous in the extreme—arraying, as it does, labor against capital—adopted and put before the people, to say the least, without sufficient thought by the framers thereof; or, if properly understood by them, then it was placed before you with the intent to undo in one day what it has taken years of hard work to accomplish—to bring turmoil and want of confidence throughout the country, with the view, no doubt, of selfishly fishing in troubled waters; otherwise, for the benefit of the unprincipled few at the expense of you laboring men. This is the true state of affairs, and it is high time for you to put an end to it.

It is not my intention to enter into the very great and very numerous demerits of the new Constitution. They have been written upon and explained by much abler pens than mine; but I will again repeat, that any instrument having, from its very beginning to the end, the element of antagonism so strongly marked between labor and capital, is so pernicious, so very dangerous to the common good, that all those who truly have anything at stake, and who desire to live in quiet and contentment and see the country continue to prosper, should now, and without further delay, take a bold stand against it, and contribute to defeat it.

It has ever been the strenuous endeavor of every capitalist, banker, and merchant in this State, to attract all the foreign capital possible, and it is now attempted, by those who favor the new Constitution, to destroy what it has taken so many years to accomplish. Is all this to be blotted out for ever? Do you wish all the foreign, as well as the greater part of our local, capital to be withdrawn from this State to be directed to other channels of safer investment? If you do, what will become of real estate, and what will become of the savings banks—custodians of the hard earnings of the laboring man, and certainly not of the capital of the rich? What will become of the true workingman? Ruin.

Again, and for the last time, I appeal to you in the name of yourselves, your wives, your children, and in the name of our common prosperity, think, think well, be advised, and act accordingly.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

Wen Mister Gipple was in Affica he was a scientifficle man, and he had a magnify glas, and there was a natif nigger wich was the king, and he let him look, Mister Gipple did, and the natif nigger was a stonish. Then he ast Mister Gipple mite he keep it for to be hisn, but Mister Gipple he sed he wude giv him a uther one. So he tole his boy for to take the king to his tent and giv him one, and the boy done it.

Bime by the natif nigger wich was the king he come to Mister Gipple and he sed: "I hav cum for to be baptize."

Mister Gipple he sed: "My Guvment dident gif me any sech instructions, wher is all them preachers wich was sent here?"

The king he rubbed the stummack of his belly and sed: "I thot thay was lyin and I et em, but I beg their parden. Thay tole me lots about a fritefele lookn feller wich is the Devle, did you ever see him?"

Mister Gipple he sed: "No, he is unvisible."

Then the natif nigger he spok up and sed: "There's jest were you is mistook, he is evry where, and if you had took the trubble for to look thru the magnify glas wich you giv me you wude hav saw him."

But wen Mister Gipple he took it he seen that the boy had giv the king a lookn glas.

Mister Gipple he says one day a nigger cheef cum to the camp and found their provisions, and he hung blony sossidge a round his neck, the cheef did, and tide a cod fish onto his belly, and plastered his face with jam, and pored out a can of tomatosses in to his hair, and made a cow tail for hisself out of a string of dride apples. And then he wocked up prety near to were Mister Gipple was, and the cook, and set down were he cude be see, like he thot hissef mity fine. After a wile Mister Gipple he pinto to the cheef, and he sed to the cook: "Do you notice that fellers joolry?"

Then the cook he was hopn mad, and he went to the cheef and pulld em all of, and kicked the end of the cheefs back, and sed: "Thats the way you try to git to be a ingredient in one of my stews, is it, you sneek? Sech ambishin I never did saw!"

A uther time Mister Gipple and his party they had a big tock with the King and all the hi cheefs, and made a treety. Wen it was made thay of done sum thing for to sho it was their sentmts, like sining a paper. One cheef he stuck up his speer in the ground and left it stickin, and a other he cut of a lock of his hair and lade it down, and a uther he wacked his hatchit into a tre for to make his mark. And wen thay had all got done the king he wocked up to wher he seen a big wuden bole ful of weat flour, and he rose his britch clowt and set down in it a little wile, reel solem, much as to say, "Witness my hand and seel."

One day I wrote "Johnny" that way in the snow, and Mary thats the house maid she wrote hern, and Uncle Ned he says thats the way Genl John McComb sined hsn on the page of histry in a mity bold hand.

One time ole Gaffer Peters he was here, and he had got a news paper spred onto the table like he was mity intrested, but he was to the top side of the paper. My father he cum in and sed: "Wel, Gaffer, wots the news?"

Gaffer he put on his speticles and looked real close, and then he sed: "The niggers is all movin up to Kansas, and Mister Gorem hes a comin out west," wich was jest wot he had herd Uncle Ned say.

Then my father he took hold of the paper and turned it a round the other way, rite side up, and Gaffer he sed: "Thanky, my eys is gittin mity pore, I see now the niggers is a moonn back into Mississipp, and Mister Gorem is a goin east to Erole, lifely."

Then ole Gaffer he shook his hed mity wise and looked like owls, but Missis Doppys is red like fier, and our baker he wears a paper cap on hsn.

You jest ot to see Sammy Doppy at school with his new slate, cos its like a circus for to see him rwite, and one of the big boys he sed: "Sammy," and Sammy he said: "Wot?"

So the big boy he sed: "Here, you jest take that to yure mother, cos she is a poet, and thats poetry too, jest like Missis Windle wich rites for the Call."

So Sammy he take it home and giv it to Missis Doppy, and it was this way, you never see nicer poetry:

"Little Sammy Doppy,
Artin out his copy,
Put his pensle in his eye
And his mouth was all awry.
And wen he rote he slung about
A haf a yard of tung about
With his wig, wag, wosher—
With his long Tom Slosker—
With his flip, flopper,
Slack, slacker,
Lollipopper, Slappjacker,
Lappy licker slung about!"

Missis Doppy she was furious like she wude bust, and brot it rite over to our house for to know wot she shude do. Uncle Ned he sed he thot the first thing to be did was for me an Billy to git it all by hart, so we cude be a wtnes in cort, and I tel you it didnt take us but jest a little tiny wile for to quolify. Wen we had lert it Uncle Ned he burnt up the paper it was rote on and then he sed: "Now, Missis Doppy, me and you controle all the evidence in this case, and all we got to do is to see that the libel dont go no further."

Wen Missis Doppy was gon Uncle Ned he sed: "Wel, boys, she has got a red hed and a mity meen boy, but she is yuman, and if I was you I wudent sing it to nobody only but jest Jack Brily, the wicked sailer."

So we dident, but that mean feller he jest up and started a Sundy school for teechin it.

The new daily paper called The Morning Herald is under the direction of Mr. George C. Gorham, who is, on his way to this State to assume its management and control. It will be in the interest of that wing of the Republican party of which Mr. Gorham is so prominent a leader.

"What a beautiful baptismal font," said a lady from the country, while inspecting furniture in one of our palatial stores. "That is a flower-stand, madam," responded the polite clerk, as he smilingly brushed the hay seed from the shawl.

HIS MISTAKE.

Come in and sit down, my boy. Glad to see you. Feeling pretty well cut up, are you? Well, I guess so; 'tain't the pleasantest thing in the world to have the girl you love go back on you, and marry another chap. But there's rougher things than that, I can tell you.

No, no! Drop that bottle! Some men can use liquor, and some can't. As for me, I can drink it, and I can let it alone; but there's no knowing the stuff that's in you—you're not half ripe yet. And I'm not the man to put temptation in the way of any one, least of all a boy feeling sore over his first disappointment—you'll get used to having 'em by 'n by.

So I'm an old bachelor, am I, that never had a wife, nor wanted one, and don't know how you feel? You're out there, boy. I have had a wife. I didn't marry her—another fellow did that; but she was my wife just as much as if the parson had tied the knot. How was it? Well, I don't mind telling you; 'praps it'll do you good, and it can't harm her.

When I was a young chap of about twenty-six or seven (I never kept much track of my birth-days), I used to be brakeman on the local train over the road here. I was a tall, well-made, strong fellow; some good-looking, I judge, from the sly glances I used to catch through the end windows of the car. I had too hard a head to make a beast of myself with liquor, and too many strings to my bow to go to the devil for a woman; but I was a wild chap, with no home or home ties, and not looked upon as just the person a careful mamma would choose for her daughter to travel round with.

We get pretty well used to the faces of the passengers on the local trains, and among the most regular ones were the scholars of a young ladies' seminary, up at the end of the road. I got to knowing 'em all by sight, so I could pick out the new ones at the beginning of the term. Good enough girls they were, I guess; rather given to giggling; and every now and then one of 'em would get soft on my moustache, and moon through the window at me—but no more harm in 'em than in so much sugar and water. Bless you, I got so used to their little ways that I didn't mind 'em no more than I did the birds' twittering.

One morning in July we had an unusually full train, and I had just stepped up on the lower step and was turning round to speak a word to Bill Lake about a game of draw he wanted me to come up and finish that night, when I felt a light touch on my arm, with the words, "May I trouble you to let me pass, sir?" and I faced round, to find myself looking right into the eyes of a girl that was standing on the platform, waiting to get off.

What did she look like? How do I know? A man can't pick the woman he loves to pieces, and tell her good points as if she was a trotting horse. She had a glint of reddish-gold in her hair—I know that; and the pink on her cheek was never two minutes alike. Her eyes—well, I can't tell the color; I've seen pansies just like them, but never such eyes.

As I moved out of the way, she swept past me with a slight bend of the head and that little air of dignity a lady puts on when she feels that she's being eyed by two or three men who ain't exactly gentlemen. I looked after her long enough to see her join the rest of the girls, and then swung myself on the train.

You never knew I'd been to college, did you? Well, I was laid out to be a lawyer, but the professors and I had a little falling out the year before I should have graduated, and they told my step-father (my mother died when I was a little shaver) that it would be healthier for me to retire into private life. So the old man said it was a waste of time to try to make me a gentleman, and he washed his hands of me. I expect he was about right. Anyhow, I didn't stop to argue the point, but just took myself out of his way with a surveying party that was going out on the line of the new railroad.

I stayed with that crowd—and a mighty rough set they were—quite a while, learning surveying and considerable else that isn't in the prayer book, till the line was finished, when I took this place as brakeman. I prided myself on being as rough as any of 'em, and, by this time, had got all the "gentleman" that I brought from home thoroughly rubbed out.

But it's a strange thing, my boy, that, while I knew that the rest of the girls who were so willing to smile and bow, and exchange flowers and glances with me in the cars, would cut me dead the next minute if I met them with their parents or gentlemen of their set, and it didn't rile me a bit, that stately movement of her body when she passed, which told me she didn't think me a gentleman, cut me to the quick. We were near to the next station before the flush that it brought was gone from my cheek.

I went to my room that evening, meaning to go down to Bill's and play poker till near morning; but somehow, when I thought of the boys and their talk, and the smell of pipes and whisky and all that kind of thing, it disgusted me.

I wonder why, just then, I should think of my dead mother—I hadn't before since I entered college—and how I had gone to her crying once with something of mine that had got mixed up and useless, my kite-string I think, and how she lifted me up on her lap and petted me into smiles again, while she straightened out the string till it was as good as new. With the thought came such a sense of the loss and tangle in my life (I think the feeling had been there some ever since she passed me), that if I'd been a woman I'd have cried. But instead, I just took up my pipe and bag of killikinnick, tramped down to the end of the wharf, and had a square talk with myself in the moonlight.

Go back to my folks?

I had now but my step-mother, and I couldn't come the prodigal son worth a cent, for I wa'n't fool enough to think that a fellow could root round with the hogs as long as I'd done, and then go home and fit into the best robe comfortably, even if the old man had been inclined to trot out the fatted calf and fixin's—which I doubt; so I looked the thing square in the face, sunk "the gentleman" in the Bay, and went home and took a rousing hot whisky to make me sleep.

She came reg'lar after this with the others in the mornings. I knew when she got on the train, for I watched her, and when I saw her I always had that wish to show her that I was born her equal. I'd have given worlds to speak to her, but she never gave me a show. I might have been the iron brake for all the notice she took of me. But one morning she dropped her veil as she was getting on the train, and if any one had left me a fortune it wouldn't have made me happier. As I handed it to her I said: "Excuse me, Madam, I think this belongs to you." I saw a shade of surprise in her eyes as she thanked me, and knew by that, and a look of curiosity she gave, that she had found out by my words what I meant she should. After this she'd show a little consciousness of me when she passed, and once in a while, when she thought I wasn't looking, I'd catch a rare glance, as if I puzzled her some.

I never shall forget one day. She was two trains later than usual. I'd missed her from the rest that morning, and my heart sunk down heavy as lead for fear she was sick. There was a lot of roughs on a picnic, and the cars were well crowded with the worst sort of whisky and human nature mixed. I knew fights would be plenty, and I was glad of it, for those days I was ugly with myself and every one else—but one—and thrashing a fellow lets off steam better than anything else. I was watching the folks push into the car, when of a sudden I caught sight of a girl's figure jostled in among them, and standing in a kind of uncertain way in the aisle looking for an empty seat. I was by her side in a minute. "This way, if you please," and she was settled in the single seat in the end of the car, with her shawl and books to keep the other place. She had hardly got quietly settled when a great brute came along, lifted her books, and with a low expression sat down by her side. He was up again, though, and off to the other end of the car before he knew who helped him there, and—

No, I wasn't afraid of his crowd. They weren't so flush of pistols then as they are nowadays, and I hadn't run with the set I did at college, and lived with the boys on the plains, so long for nothing. I was handy with my fists, and no light weight either, and they knew it.

Well, after I had pitched that fellow out of the way, "Come, Miss Nellie," said I, "I'll find you a seat in another car." (I knew her name from hearing the girls call her, you see.) But the next car was just as bad, and she drew back with an appealing look. "Mayn't I stay on the platform with you?" she said. "It's only three stations, and I'm afraid of those men."

Might she! The thought that she'd be alone with me for even so few minutes, that I could look in her sweet face and speak to her if I wanted, was heaven to me, and I cursed the way the train seemed to fly over the ground. Not that I said much of anything to her. She was quivering all over like a hunted bird, and I only told her there was no danger of any of those brutes coming out on the platform, for it was against the company's rules; and once showed her how the different shades of brown mixed in a mountain we saw in the distance. But I did look at her from under my broad straw hat (we didn't wear uniform then). I fed my hungry eyes on her face till I knew every line of it, even the little marks where the sun had kissed her. Whether she was handsome to others I don't know, but hers was the loveliest face in the world to me. When she got off she thanked me with a smile, and after she had gone the day seemed gloomy, and I felt ugly as the devil.

She got after this to giving me a graceful little bow when she'd meet me, and I took care that should be as often as I could manage without any one noticing it. I wouldn't have had the boys on the train get to joking about her for anything.

So the weeks went on till a year had gone, and it was Commencement at the Seminary. They came down on our train that day, for they weren't out as early as usual; and it was a pretty sight to see the graduates in their white dresses, with arms full of flowers, each with a little crowd of friends around her. All glowing and eager they were; glad to leave the happiest part of their life, so as to eat of the tree of knowledge, and find the stings under the flowers.

Among the party round her was an elderly lady, dressed in widow's weeds, and several gentlemen; one, in particular, I'd seen come up on the train two or three times with her. He was clean shaved, with very black eyes, and very white teeth. I hated him, he had such an air of over-shadowing and owning her when he carried her basket and books. But, as to that, I hated every one then that I thought had a show to win the woman I loved and couldn't try to get.

Of course, the other girls hadn't noticed me as they went by. But when I saw her coming along with his head bending so close to hers, pretending to admire the flowers she was holding, though he had handsomer ones in his own hand, and his black eyes gloating over the face I had felt belonged to me ever since the day of that picnic, I grew desperate for fear she would pass me without a word. So, stepping right up in front of her, I said, lifting my hat and holding out a bunch of pansies, "Is it too late, Miss Nellie, to offer my congratulations upon your successful graduation?" The girls around turned and stared at us, and her mother straightened up an inch taller and looked black as thunder. But, though her sweet wild-rose color grew deeper and deeper, till it had spread all over her face, and even down to the kind of cloudy ruffle around her neck, she took the flowers, and said "Thank you" in her own quiet, lady-like way. I hadn't meant to say a word more (twas mighty cheeky in me to speak to her at all), but as I looked into her lovely eyes for the last time, as I thought, I stammered out, "I shall miss you on the train," and she held out her hand to me with a sudden motion, said "Good-bye," and passed on.

I heard one of the men with her say: "Miss Nellie wins hearts among all classes;" and he, with his cursed face all teeth and eyes, said: "Nellie, like Orpheus, attracts even the—"
"O hush!" said she, in a pained voice; "pray hush! He is a gentleman. Don't—" and they passed out of my hearing, up to the car.

I got sick of the cars after that. You see, I'd been so used to watching for her in the mornings, and living all day on the look of her I had then, that I couldn't content myself without it. So I went off to Southern California to survey on a new railroad there, and after I got through with that job I had an offer to go to South America, where I found I remembered enough of my college work to get into two or three pretty good things. So when I drifted back here again I brought enough money with me to take care of me if I should be laid up, and bury me when I die. And I bought a share in the business I'm in now, because the hours are short, and it don't do much harm to have me leave everything to my partner when the wandering fit takes me, as it does every month or two.

I had promised Charley Woods, an old railroad chum of mine, who was mashed to death between some cars he was coupling, that I would live with his mother. And when I got to Aunt Woods' cottage and saw my room, a pleasant one with a side window, I felt more at home than I thought was in me.

After dinner that evening I was sitting at the open window, smoking my pipe and enjoying a bed of pansies, which lay under my window, in the side garden of the next house, when I saw, looking out of the window opposite mine, the same two faces I'd seen going down the car together that day in June.

She knew me, and turned with a pleasant smile to point me out to her husband—for that I saw he was. He looked up at the window, and, with that devilish grin of his, said something that drove the color from her cheek, and brought the look of wonder and grief into her eyes that you see in babies' when they first find any one cruel enough to strike them; then they passed out of sight.

Strange chance? 'Twa'n't chance that brought me way from South America, to land me next door to the woman who had pulled at my heart-strings ever since the first time I saw her! What was it? It's hard telling. That election the preachers talk so much about, perhaps. Anyway, there I was, with a harder pull than ever, and on an up grade.

No, boy, not her marriage—that wasn't my trouble. I never tried to get her for myself, and I wasn't such a selfish animal as to want her to go all her life without the care and protection all women crave, and most of all, such a gentle, loving nature as hers, because I couldn't be the one to give them to her. No! No! If he had been kind to her and made her happy, I'd have given him my life, if he needed it. But I knew, when first I met his eye, that he was a devil, and I saw enough, in that moment at the window, to tell me that, short a time as they had been married, he had commenced to show her his nature, and that it wouldn't take him very long to kill her—my tender blossom!

Well, I kept out of their way as much as I could, for I couldn't bear to see them together. Sometimes when I sat in my room, I could see her at her sewing in the bay window, now and then, stopping to look at the tiny clothes she was making, with a half sad, half tender smile that made her face look so holy, that she'd have been a good enough saint for me to worship, if I'd been in the religious line. I met her once in a while, of course, I couldn't very well help it, and we always bowed, and sometimes exchanged a word about the weather; and, once she asked me if I was on the cars yet. But I never dared trust myself to speak much to her, and I knew, what she was too pure-minded to see, that the brute that owned her would be glad to get the excuse our stopping to talk together would give him for making some of those cowardly speeches that outraged her delicacy and broke her heart.

I have heard things, as the summer days came on and windows were left open, that sent me up and down my room, raging like a madman at my own powerlessness; and, as the time came along when she was more and more delicate, and her very looks would have made any one with a spark of manhood in him gentle to her, I've seen him push her off with an oath when she'd come and lean her head on his shoulder. He really hated her because she wasn't well.

That I couldn't stand, and when it would happen I'd go off somewhere; on a ranch, maybe, and break horses; or run with a chap I knew that was engineer on an express train; or anything else that gave me a good chance to break my neck.

Once, when I was coming home after one of these trips, I met them at the station. He was just going off hunting (how I wished he'd blow his cursed brains out), and she had come to the cars with him. Turning into a short cut through the fields as I went home, I found that she had taken the same way; so there was nothing to do but to walk along with her.

It was just the cool of a September day, and the air had that golden haze which comes with sunset on the fall months. The path lay part of the way through fields of mustard that grew taller than she was, and it was hard to tell where the still, sweet, glow of the yellow flowers ended, and that of the setting sun began. Except for the bees, drowsily humming, and the big "Japan" butterflies that lifted themselves lazily as we stirred the flowers in passing, we were alone. The air was full of the smell of the blossoms, and it seemed as if we two were in a world of our own that was throbbing with love. It was tough work I tell you to keep my eyes and voice just what they ought to be.

She talked mostly of her "happy girlhood" (not three years ago, poor child), and said she was glad to have me for a neighbor, for she had not forgotten how bravely I took care of her that day on the cars, and she didn't feel at all afraid of her husband gone, knowing I was so near. I answered as well as I could, till it got too hard for me, and we walked on in silence as the glow was dying slowly out of the sky, never looking at each other—close together, for the path under the trees was narrow. But, somehow, when we got to the gate at the end of the fields, both starting to lift the latch, our hands came together, and as she looked up with a shadow of her old arch smile, our glances met, and all the woman in her eyes leaped out to meet the man in mine, and I knew, then, that she loved me, that she was mine—my wife—and that I had let that wretch take her, when if I had called her, she would have come with me.

What I said, I don't remember; nothing I think that her tender heart could grieve over. But I gathered her little hands to my breast, and crushed them with kisses, read once more the bitter-sweet news her eyes told me, and left her.

I didn't go home that night. I couldn't risk it, for I read in her eyes more than she knew they told me. She felt that she belonged to me, and I had a big devil to put under my feet before I could go back.

What! Open your lips to say another such word as that, and I'll shake the heart out of ye!

There! there! Don't say any more about it. You don't know any better yet, I suppose; but when you really love a woman, you'll know that a man will suffer death itself before he will let, or tempt, his wife to lose one shade of her purity in the world's eyes or his own.

How's that? She wasn't really my wife? I say she was. Let me tell you, young fellow, that if a man and woman ain't married before they go to church, no words of the minister's can marry them. And she was my wife by a higher law than that of any court.

That night they sent over for Aunt Woods in a great hurry, and I knew that, for hours, it was an even thing whether my darling would live or die. I hoped for her death;

but toward morning Aunt came up to my room to see if her boy was all right, and told me that "the poor young thing across the way" was about out of danger, the doctor said, and it was a little girl.

"But I doubt she'll raise her," said she.

"Why not, Aunt?"

"She's too handsome. Them handsome chil'ren never live. An' they don't know where that husband of hers is, nuther. And a good job it is, the nuss says, if she needs to be kep' quiet. She has putty hard lines, I guess, poor young creetur."

Aunt's old-time wisdom told her true; the baby was buried three weeks after that, and a week before her husband came home. He wouldn't have come then if he hadn't seen her mother's death in the paper, and wanted to look after the money.

When I got back (I'd gone on a tramp the day after she was taken sick), Aunt was full of news from next door. She told me of her sweetness and patience in her sorrow, and how, when the news of her mother's death came so soon after her baby's, she just dropped like a white lily, and wasn't strong from the shock when her husband came. And here Aunt stopped; when she could say no good of any one she was silent.

About a week after, I wasn't feeling very well—hadn't slept any, in fact, all night, and had no head for business; so I went home earlier than usual. As I stepped into the hall, I heard her voice in the dining-room. It never needed words for her to tell me what was in her mind, and I had to stand still a minute till I'd braced myself up for the toughest work I ever did. As I went in she turned and commenced talking in a hurried way about coming over to see Mrs. Woods' flowers (a pot of mignonette, and a couple of beds of thyme and parsley!), and Aunt stood listening to her with a look of perplexity and pity, that changed to one of relief when I entered and she was free to attend to the bread.

When we were alone together, my darling stood for a moment, nervously crushing her handkerchief; then moved slowly toward where I was standing with both hands gripped tight on the back of the arm-chair.

"I came," she faltered; then her courage failed her, and the red blood surged all up over her pale face, bringing out, plainer, the cruel, livid streak across her cheek; and she reached her hand toward mine with a timid, fluttering motion, looking me full in the face the while. Such a look! Have I told you that her eyes darkened when she felt deeply? They were almost black now, with an awful longing in them—like a hunted, tortured creature that sees its home in sight; and there came over them such a look of rest and trust when they met mine!

No, I didn't move. I held on to that chair as if it was my only chance for life. I didn't dare; I didn't dare, my boy; for, if I'd felt the clasp of her hand, I'd have had her in my arms, and 'twouldn't have been in the power of mortal man to put her from me then.

You didn't know I was so very moral, eh? Keep a civil tongue in your head, young one. My morality 'll never get me into heaven; you know that as well as I, but I'm no coward; and I'd as soon have called a baby to me and cut its throat while it smiled up in my face, as to have taken advantage of her tender, trusting love for me to drag her down to a life her innocent heart had no idea of. When she asked me to take her from the man that the law called her husband, she didn't think what the reality of the thing would be. She'd have waked up to it some day, and it would have driven her crazy.

So I stood, shaking like a leaf, with my hands glued to the back of the chair, and as soon as I could moisten my parched lips enough to get a sound out I called: "Aunt, I wish you'd see Mrs. Barley home. It's getting dusk, and she mustn't be out late." All the light faded out of her face, and, dropping her arms with a hopeless gesture, she turned, with a gentle patience that touched me more than words could, and went out with Aunt.

That was a hard fight. Likely you'll never see any such in your life. I don't think you are the breed to have 'em.

I had sent to her death the creature I loved better than all the world. I had heard him the night before, in his mad rage at being disappointed about her mother's money, taunting her with tying him to a beggar, and keeping him from marrying a woman that was good for something, and worth a thousand white-faced fools like her. And then, when his fury was at its height, came the sound of that cruel blow. Then silence, except now and then a low moan, and "thank God! my baby didn't live."

You think I was too hard? You're wrong there. True, I knew when I sent her back that before long he'd have killed all of her he owned—her body. But dearly as we loved each other, boy, if she'd stayed with me I should have killed both body and soul. I knew she'd want her baby again, and I was more merciful than you think when I sent her home.

When Aunt came back she found me in my room crying like a child—no, like a man whose tears are drops of his heart's blood.

"Did you know her before she was married, Harry?" she asked. I nodded my head, and like a wise old soul as she was, she left me with no more questions.

Late in the morning when I came down I handed her my will to keep. In it I left her everything as if she had been my mother. She tried, with many tears, to keep me at home; it was no use. I should have gone mad if I'd stayed in sight of the next house.

Though I didn't allow it to myself then, I tried for weeks to drink myself to death as hard as ever man did, but all I got by it was a fever that laid me up for so long, that when I could be moved home to Aunt's, she had been freed from all suffering for two weeks. "Heart disease," the doctors said, and that her pretty changing color was a sure sign of trouble there. They buried her with her baby.

When she thought I was able to bear it, Aunt brought me a box with a bunch of dried pansies, a lock of hair, and one of her pictures taken when a school-girl, in it. On the back of the picture was traced, in a trembling hand, the words, "You were right." (You needn't have told me, Nellie; I knew you'd understand me, dear.)

No, I won't show you the picture. No eye sees it but mine until I die, and then it goes to my grave with me.

I guess you'd better be traveling, youngster; I'm going to shut up the shanty.

OUR OWN POETS.

Mealy Nose.—A Legend of the Coast Range.

I heard—amid the rock-ribbed hills
From whence "La Putah" swiftly flows,
From purling springs, in leaping rills—
The tale of Mealy Nose.

I tell it as 'twas told to me
By one of those old border men;
A few are left who love the lee,
The corpse, the crag, and glen.

His hunter's heritage had been
A border life, for years two score;
Each craggy crest was dear to him,
Each glen a legend bore.

Well was he known, both far and near,
And hunters said—yes, every one:
"No hand so true, no eye so clear,
No gun like Walter's gun."

We were a hunting party, three,
Camped on the creek at "Sulphur Spring;"
Our camp a mighty, spreading tree,
Of forest oaks the king.

One eve the hunter strolled our way;
His length upon the grass he throws,
With, "Boys, I've seen big game to-day,
I started Mealy Nose."

"Pray, what is Mealy Nose?" I ask,
As 'round the speaker all drew near;
"Well, boys, it's not a braggin' task,
To tell you of that deer."

"You know my daughter Fanny? Well,
When she was on her mother's knee,
The strangest thing that e'er befell,
The queerest happen'd me."

"One day, while hunting on the crest
Of Pope, I had the drollest luck;
I shot three times—once from a rest—
And missed a spike-horn buck."

"He was not thirty steps from where
I quiet stood beneath a tree,
Yet for my shooting did not care,
But seemed to laugh at me."

"Twice did I miss—how could I fail?
When I dropped down and to a rest,
And shot from there! He raised his tail,
And trotted o'er the crest."

"That buck is eighteen now, and grey;
That is the reason, I suppose,
He's known through all the range to-day
Only as Mealy Nose."

"Good hunters oft have tried their skill
Without avail; to me it's clear
No bullet has been made to kill;
Or wound that mighty deer."

"He's ne'er been touched—not even creased;
We spring him up, away he runs;
He's run the gauntlet of at least
A hundred hunters' guns."

"E'en now he 'uses' in this range,
And still unharmed; to me it's queer;
It's more than that, its more than strange;
He's not like other deer."

"I ain't no scholar, but I heard
My Fanny reading, at my home,
How once a man changed to a bird
When on an island lone."

"And how a man, changed to a beast,
Was doomed to run a thousand year;
What kind? It did not say—at least,
It might have been a deer."

"Now, I don't say such things are true,
But if they are, why, just suppose;
I can't deny, nor yet can you,
It might be Mealy Nose."

"Do I believe in phantoms? Well,
I've Scripture for it, and I've seen
Strange sights myself, which, should I tell,
Would seem most like a dream."

"You'd like to try that deer, you think.
Well, if you will by me be led,
To-morrow you shall see him drink
The dew on Devil's Head."

Each stretched himself upon the ground
And sought forgetfulness in sleep.
"Old Drive," the hunter's faithful hound,
Slept ready for a leap.

With morn's first light, soft, pale, and dim,
Each hastened to his chosen place;
The hunter led, I followed him,
To open up the chase.

Four miles were passed, o'er scarp and fell,
Before we reached the mountain side;
Then up we climbed the rocky swell,
A deer trail for our guide.

We gained the crest. An open glade Spread fair before us. Standing there
A noble huck, who, undismayed,
Drank in the morning air.

I heard the hunter's rifle ring;
The deer made one swift graceful bound,
Then cleared the bush with easy spring,
Close followed by the hound.

"What did I tell you? Now, you see,
He's gone like eagle on the wing,"
Then slower spake: "Well, follow me,
He'll make for Reagan's Spring."

Six rugged miles of crag and glen
Before we reach the Reagan Spring;
And, when 'tis gained, two weary men
Their length beside it fling.

And drink as only thirsty men
Can drink—when, hark! another gun
Booms far below us in the glen,
The head of Soda Run.

Hark! once again. We hear the hound.
See yonder bushes how they sway;
The buck breaks cover with a bound
And swiftly speeds away.

Two rifles ring out loud and clear;
Two bullets whistle on the wind;
Unharm'd speeds on the gallant deer,
With Old Drive far behind.

Away for Putah Creek we speed,
Which far below us, soft and still,
Swung in the gorge, a silver thread,
At base of Lawley's Hill.

We cross the stream, nor pause to rest,
But slowly climb the mountain, when
A heavy gun rang o'er the crest,
Turning the deer again.

Horns low on neck, foam-flecked his flank,
The weary monarch turned nigh way,
Above me, on a sloping bank,
Where fading sunbeams play.

Quick was my rifle poised, and then
One instant plummet-like it hung;
The next, o'er crag and crest and glen,
Its murderous echoes rung.

A fearful bound—high in the air;
Some wild blind leaps adown the hill;
A crashing fall; the sunbeams fair
Flee from him with a chill.

With bleeding feet and bloodshot eye
The tireless hound was drawing near
With gleaming fangs. I turned him by—
No dog should tear that deer.

Around our camp-fire late we stayed;
And when the sad moon softly rose,
She cast from crag and crest a shade
Enshrouding Mealy Nose.

WALACE ATWELL.

Dream.

The Spirit of Dream,
Born of stars and the night,
Sang low to my soul
This song of delight:

"To the one who loves
I bring sweet flowers,
Fast fleeting moments,
And languid hours.
To the one who loves
I bring kisses sweet,
And wreathing arms,
And a life complete."

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1879.

SIGNA.

Forsaken.

[Translated from the German of Traeger.]

The voice of Spring is speaking
Again as seasons roll,
In gentle tones is seeking Admission to my soul;
But what are now the breezes
That softly round me play?
What longer now that pleases?
He's lost and far away.

But thy affection's stronger,
My dove, true to me still;
That faith is mine no longer
Which soothes the heart at will;
Could I upon thy pinions
Seek through the lofty air
Remotest of dominions,
His heart would not be there.

The village church just yonder
The shafts of death surround;
From those beneath that slumber
Forever comes no sound.
Where dust with dust is blended
Now rest they all in peace,
Where every pain is ended
There mine shall also cease.

GEORGE C. CRESSEY.

Welcome.

Buttercups, don your yellowest dresses,
To shine from the grass as your lover comes by,
Blackbird, wear your glossiest plumage,
And whistle softly when he is nigh.
For he who left you with last year's daisies,
To wander where desert sands spread wide,
Is coming to-day, his tryst keeping with you—
So blossom, my beauties, in golden pride.

Brooklet, winding and wandering seaward,
Past hillsides tangled with bracken and fern,
Have you missed his step as months sped slowly?
Do you murmur so loudly for his return?
Skies of April, beam blue and cloudless;
No more weeping this happy year;
He comes! O buttercups, blossom and brighten,
Winter is ended and Hope is here!

Inconsistency.

'Mid golden splendor the weary day dies,
Through grief and sorrow the soul upward flies;
Day-time is saddened when life outward goes,
Night-time is saddened when life inward flows;
In the sweet May-time when fond lovers part,
Life's chill November creeps over the heart;
Flowers may be blooming and birds singing gay,
But, oh, in the heart, it can not be May!

In the sweet summer, when fairest flowers bloom,
Some deck the cradle, some cover the tomb;
Youth quickly gathers the flowers of May,
Mid-life sees only the thorns by the way;
Old age is grasping the wet, withered leaves,
While through the branches the chilly wind grieves,
Oh, that life's windows should e'er darkened be—
Summer-clouds o'er me, but storm-clouds o'er thee!

The wind drives two ships far over the wave,
To port it blows one, and one to the grave;
Over the valley the summer-clouds go,
Sunshine and shadow swift dance to and fro;
Fair Life and grim Death together take wing
Old men are dying while young children sing
So o'er the wide world, wherever we stray,
Living is dying, November is May!

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1879.

If it be true that the Chancellor of the German Empire, alarmed for the safety of his own State, is exiling the dangerous teachers of a dangerous political doctrine to America, we have just cause of alarm. If Socialism is so much to be feared that Prince Bismarck is justified in protecting German society by the passage of stringent laws, increasing the severity of his police régime, suppressing journals, forbidding and destroying literary, social, benevolent, and trades associations for their socialistic teachings, and in exiling from the empire socialistic leaders, assuredly we here in America have a reason for concern. If Socialism is a menace to this colossal military empire, with its compact system of laws, its prompt administration of executive power, its marvelous police, and its great standing army, then assuredly the immigration of this people to America would be a possible danger to the continuance of Republican government. It is said to be an open secret among the diplomats and statesmen of Europe that Prince Bismarck is expending, from a vast secret service fund, generous amounts of money to promote an emigration from Germany to America of this class of dangerous and evil-disposed persons. Our country is no longer able to digest and assimilate the paupers and criminals of Europe. Some years ago the Grand Duke of Hesse emptied his prisons upon our shores; and more than one European State has regarded America as its Botany Bay for the receptacle of their mendicants and their criminals. It is time that the United States of America had a policy upon this subject. It is time that we rid ourselves of all that spurious sentimentality that invites the debauched and worthless of other nationalities to come to our land and become citizens and sovereigns in it. It is time to make a careful revision of our naturalization laws, and to exclude from immigration all but desirable persons, and to declare war against any power, whether England at Hongkong or Germany at Berlin, if they adopt the policy of pouring upon our shores the mendicants or criminals of their own. This should be esteemed the last worst act of international hostility, and the deliberate sending by the German Empire of one of its socialistic criminals should be a casus belli. There are political crimes in Europe that we Americans esteem as virtues; there are political criminals, who in the past have risen up in arms against the tyranny of despots and in resistance to the wrongful exactions of power, that we have esteemed as martyrs to principle and have welcomed as citizens to our country. The Social Democrats of Germany do not belong to this class of political exiles; they are not martyrs to the love of liberty, and they bring to our land opinions a thousand times more dangerous to a free republic than to a military power like that of the German Empire. What these principles are, and to what they lead, is a profitable inquiry just now when all the nations of Europe are vomiting out upon our land the discontented and dangerous political criminals of their own.

The Social Democrat threatens the destruction of all private property, and would, had he the power, declare all private accumulations to belong to the State. He would annul all laws of personal ownership of property. There should be no laws of inheritance for transmitting the earnings of parents to their children. He would destroy the family relation; marriage ties he would utterly despise; children should be parentless wards of the State; personal liberty there should be none; government should be modeled like an army, and become a gigantic engine of labor. To this army all should belong; into its commissariat all earnings of labor should be contributed, and from this great magazine rations should be distributed; every man's occupation, time, labor, talent, or genius should be under the control of the thing called government. In this political grave should be buried all hopes, all aims, all ambitions. None should aspire for wealth, because when earned the wealth would belong to the public and not the person who had earned it. This novel and startling doctrine has never been advanced. Says a writer in the North American Review: "Never had it been known to cast before it the faintest shadow. Neither the republican society of Plato or Fourier, or of Babeuf; nor the hierarchical and aristocratic of St. Simon; nor the theocratic of the Essenians; nor the despotic of the Peruvians or the Jesuits; nor the polygamous of the Mormons; nor the materialistic of Robert Owen; nor the terrorism of Robespierre, had ever contemplated universal and equal distribution of property, coupled with a general and coercive recruiting of its members." This new political doctrine may be realized in any community where those who have nothing exceed in numbers those who have something. In America, where all may vote and all may bear arms, this alluring scheme is especially pernicious and peculiarly dangerous. To illustrate how alluring and dangerous it is, it is only necessary to state the facts as to its birth and rapid growth. Originating in Germany within the last thirty years, it now numbers three millions of adherents, and has polled in Germany six hundred thousand votes. This sentiment, called Nihilism in Russia, Socialism in Germany, Communism in France, and Kearneyism or Chronicleism in California, has attempted the assassination of six kings. It has brought immediate danger to the social condition of two great empires. It has disturbed the finances of three. It has brought a crisis to all departments of trade, manufactures, and commerce throughout the civilized world. It has created riots and social disturbances. It has tied the fire-brand of passion to the tail of ignorance and sent it flaming through society. It has arrayed labor against capital. It has depreciated property values, and set class in hateful jealous contention with class.

Prince Bismarck having, by his repressive measures in the Reichstag, disfranchised two millions of Social Democrats who have endeavored to undermine and destroy his empire, undertakes to send them here. He has succeeded, and in every great American city of the North is found the nucleus of this band of incendiaries, who are plotting to destroy and undermine our fabric of constitutional government. In every city of the North there is a circle of plotting conspirators who are deliberately endeavoring to overthrow and destroy this commonwealth, divide its property, and plunder its people, that they may be placed in the unlimited enjoyment of beer, tobacco, blood-pudding, Schweitzer-kase, music, pretzels, and kroust. To these socialistic German conspirators our broad empire, with its freedom and its plenty, its opportunity for the wealth that comes from labor, and the accumulation that comes from industrious toil, presents no inducements. They will not leave the vicinage of the lager cellar and the brewery to wrench wealth by toil from lands, and mines, and forests. Already we have six millions of Germans in America, the best and worst class of all our immigrants. Socialism is advancing faster and spreading more rapidly here than in Germany. Our liberal form of government is ill adapted to contend with it. It has no patriotism, no principle, no morals, no religion. It is an organized, disciplined conspiracy against this country and against God. It has learned, subtle, unscrupulous, and unprincipled leaders. It has a military organization bearing arms of precision, and boldly expressing its determination to use force in acquiring and maintaining its party supremacy. It has its central headquarters in Chicago, where in a recent municipal election it cast 12,000 votes for one Dr. Schmidt, an exiled German revolutionist of 1848, to be Mayor of that city. It has carried five wards, and holds the balance of power in Chicago. It is extending to Milwaukee, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and all the great cities of the Northwest. It has a strong party in New York and Philadelphia. It has held two national conventions. It will run a presidential candidate at the next election with a view to a more perfect national organization. Lasalle and Carl Marx are its apostles. Its leaders in America embrace none but German names. Leib, Grottkau, Lyser, Eude, Sorge, Schmidt, Schwab, and others, are some of the familiar names unfamiliar to our tongue. The names of their official journals—the Arbeiter's-Timme, the Delnické Listy, the Amerikanische, the Volks Zeitung convey—to us Americans an unpronounceable terror. The rank and file in Chicago of this transplanted political crime is composed of all the idle, criminal, unambitious, beer-drinking, sausage-stuffing, low Germans. Its allies are all the unthrifty, criminal, whisky-drinking, low-browed, ignorant, apostate Catholic Irish, and all the vicious, bumbling, ignorant, demoralized, and worthless native-born Americans. The German of intelligence and property is not a Socialist. The Catholic German or Irishman who is true to his religion does not join the Social Democrats, and there is no native-born American in their ranks who is not either a knave or a villain.

This organization is just now formidable by reason of divisions among those who are opposed to it. Americans, respectable and intelligent foreigners, Jews, reputable Catholics, and all classes who love their country, and who are not utterly infidel to every honorable relation of life, will oppose it. It will be infidel Germany against America—America as composed of the classes we have named. And when these classes unite—as they will in time—they will sit down upon the foreign conspiracy, and will crush it out of existence.

The Americans are a people hard to arouse; they are slow to anger; but when they do feel called upon to hunt these miserable foreign and native-born miscreants to their holes, they will avenge with fierce and bloody resolve this mad attempt to steal away a nation's liberty, in order that they may riot in unearned beer and bread. In this conflict Catholic Irishmen will be one of America's best allies; for whatever may be said of our most vexatious and over-political Irish fellow-citizens, they are at least loyal to the country of their adoption. When they forswear allegiance to Victoria, Queen of Great Britain and Empress of India, they do it with no mental reserve. They are fully American at the baptism of their first declaration of intention to become citizens; there is no lingering memory of regret at severance of political ties from the land of their birth. Their hatred of England assumes the shape of patriotism to America; and whatever faults they have, it is not among them that they transplant their political conspiracies to the soil of their adoption. Sometimes we fear, and sometimes for party purposes we affect to fear, that in the religious faith of the Irish Catholic he admits a spiritual allegiance to Rome that does, or may, disturb his allegiance to our government. Sometimes we fear, or for party purposes we affect to fear, that the free common schools and the free press are not able to cope with the Church in teaching our adopted youth in their catechism of liberty. Sometimes we think, or when warmed by the passions of a heated party conflict we affect to think, that Catholics are dangerous to our free institutions. And yet it is within the possibilities of the future that the Roman Catholic Church in America will be one of the powerful bulwarks behind which liberty and social order will fight for its preservation and defense. It is within the possibilities of the future that this fixed institution, which dates back to the time when the smoke of sacrifice rose from the Pantheon, and when camelpards and tigers bounded in the Flavian amphitheatre; this institution, the line of whose Popes crowned Pepin and Napoleon, and, passing the age of fable, shed its lustre upon Venice; that confronted Atilla the barbarian; that accompanied the Saxon to Britain, the Frank to Gaul; that lived when Grecian eloquence flourished at Antioch, when idols were worshiped in the temple of Mecca—it is, we say, within the possibility of its accomplishments that in its own interest, and long before the traveling New Zealander shall be called upon to sketch the ruins of St. Paul from a broken arch of London Bridge, it shall, in alliance with American patriotism, be called upon to throw the protective mantle of its great power over the fainting, wounded, bleeding form of American liberty. So long as the Roman Church is our ally here to-day, against its own apostate members, and so long as it throws its influence and its power in defense of property, social order, and good government, we may afford at least to accord to it a position of honor in the battle-line, and speak well of it till our danger is passed. Catholic clergy and Catholic laymen are doing us good service in this time of our peril, and we are not ashamed to admit that we are grateful for it.

This outburst of socialistic disorder in California is the growth of a transplanted cutting of this infidel upas tree. It is the inoculation of the virus of a foreign political poison that our institutions are not prepared to contend against. It seems to the last degree strange that a country like ours—so broad in its domain, so sparsely settled, with such wide opportunities of profitable labor, offering to foreigners such splendid chances for the realization of their dreams of political freedom and personal liberty—should have been chosen as the battle-field for the destruction of the social organization, and for tearing down the temple of constitutional freedom; that this, of all other lands—where there is no aristocracy, no inherited estates, no entailed privileges of class, no family born to rule, where all wealth has been acquired with the personal toil of its owner—should be chosen for an attempt at the enforced distribution of property. We can understand Communism in France, as we contemplate its long and bloody history of wars for dynasty, empire, and ambition. We can understand how the persecutions of the bloody line of barbarous Romanoffs—their dreadful police, their arbitrary decrees of exile to Siberia, their oppressions to all classes—may produce the desperate conspiracy of Nihilism. We can understand the growth of a political discontent in Germany that demands freedom of the press, freedom of speech, and freedom of association, general industrial and secular education, exemption from enforced military service; a discontent that grows out of a great standing army and an ever-present possibility that, in the interest of an ambitious sovereign and a plotting premier, they may be driven to the battle-field to fight for dynasty or an extension of empire. We can understand the discontent that comes to populous and redundant communities from the inability of its working masses to obtain remunerative employment, where their daily bread is dependent upon their daily toil. But we fail entirely to understand our sand-lot uprising, in face of freedom, plenty, remunerative labor, free schools, free speech, free association, broad lands inviting occupation, and absolute personal and political independence of action. Of all the places on God's beautiful earth where there ought to be happiness and content, it seems to us that California is the one chosen spot.

Of all the lands in God's broad empire where harmony should dwell, and from which jealous passion should be forever banished, it seems that here beside the Pacific, between the ocean and the Sierra, should be the place. If, among all God's people, there should be a race resolute for the right, brave in the vindication of principles, intelligent enough to appreciate and guard the magnificent heritage received from our forefathers, it is the Americans—Americans of the Saxon stock, intermarried and affiliated with all that is best and most vigorous of all other races.

And yet, we are told that in this uprising of the discontented and vicious idlers who would plunge us into financial chaos, and drag our industrial occupations into confusion—that would give us an organic law inspired by defeated hopes, blasted ambitions, and ruined fortunes; that is the creation of ignorance under the spur of passion; that overturns all that has been regarded as settled; that sets us afloat upon an unknown sea of litigation; that gives us the possibility of an ignorant judiciary, an agrarian legislature, and a revolutionary executive; that the farmers of the country are divided in their opinions; that they hate the city of San Francisco, and will do all they can to injure it; that, in order to punish great land-owners and bankers, they will follow the councils of an Irish drayman, an English cobbler, a German beer-seller, a French hair-frizzer, an American demagogue, and a Jewish newspaper to destroy all of us, their fellow-citizens, of the middle and industrial class; that the native-born American farmers are sitting upon this cockatrice egg, laid in the foul nest of the sand-lot, to hatch from it a venomous serpent that shall sting us, their brethren; that because wealth is greedy and power is insolent; because they, like us, have suffered from the exactions of capital, and the abuse of corporations—they will in their blind rage confound us, all of us, toiling like themselves, merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, laborers, editors, as their enemies, and like the blind, shorn, passionate Samson tear down the pillars of the temple, instead of joining with us to drive these socialistic German fiends, these communistic rascals of plunder, these bandits of Nihilism, out of the land they have beleaguered, dishonored, and disgraced. We do not believe this thing against native-born American farmers; we do not believe it of intelligent, property-owning, liberty-loving Germans; we do not accept it as true that any such sentiment animates honest and patriotic Irishmen, nor that any foreign-born gentleman is the enemy of any State and its institutions in this conflict.

And just here we desire all honest men of foreign birth, no matter what their nationality or what their religious faith—all men of intelligence and of property; all industrious and working men who have declared in good faith their intentions to become American citizens, and who are truly loyal to this country, its institutions, and its laws; all who will obey the present authorities, and all who will only seek to reform existing abuses by legal means—to fully understand that we regard them as American citizens, as upon an equality with ourselves, entitled to all the privileges that we enjoy. We desire them to know that we would not curtail or limit them in the enjoyment of any right we possess. We would not entrench upon any right they have acquired under our republican form of government. We are sorry if those who can not read, or those who, reading, can not understand the position we are assuming as an American; and we shall regret it if they be carried away by the statement of selfish persons to believe that when we use the term "low Germans," or "low Irish," or "low foreigners," or "low Americans," we mean to denounce or misrepresent any good citizen, or excite against him or the class to which he belongs any prejudice, or stir up against him or his native land or his church any sentiment calculated to work him mischief. But we want everybody to most distinctly understand that we interpret the freedom of speech in our native land to mean an absolute and unrestrained personal liberty of utterance within the limitations of the law, holding ourselves responsible to the law for any abuse of that liberty, and that this is to us a privilege more dear than life and more sacred than property.

The calling of a State Convention and the presentation of a new Constitution have given us a sharp conflict. Like Minerva from the head of Jupiter, a new party leaped forth, full grown and full armed for the conflict. All the elements of social and political discontent were, by an unhappy combination of circumstances, crystallized into a political organization. It will remain forever an unsolved riddle how it could be that an unknown, uneducated, and unprincipled Irish adventurer, and a few foreign, ignorant associates more unprincipled than himself, could have so arrested public attention as to become leaders even of the ignorant mob that has followed them. Had there not been among the 21,000 foreign-born citizens of San Francisco great ignorance, and had there not existed some secret conspiracy to advance selfish, personal aims, such a history could not have been enacted. The crisis is passed, and the danger is happily over. The new Constitution will be repudiated by a very large majority in nearly every county in the State. The bluster of the Chronicle and its braggadocio, its passionate abuse of all classes who do not lay down under the swing of its lash, evidence a lost cause. Brave and honest men fighting at the ballot-box for principle never lose their temper upon the eve of victory. The blind and bloody prize-fighter, as he comes up reeling and groggy for his last round, finding that defeat is inevitable, is quite apt to strike a foul blow. The Chronicle has staked its life upon the issue of this contest. If it wins it will esteem itself to be a power, and think to control the political and financial policy of this growing empire of the Pacific. It will fail. It has failed. For this Constitution will be defeated, and the Chronicle will hope to crawl back again to its former position. We think it has made a mistake. No journal in America—certainly not in any commercial city—ever flourished in antagonism to the business interests of that city. Whether the merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, and property-owners be right or wrong, it is certain that they are almost unanimous in opposition to the proposed law. We have never seen, since the Vigilance days of 1856, the people in such entire accord. The Chronicle has assaulted and insulted all those classes with a vindictiveness and a degree of personal animosity and hate that we find it impossible to understand. We do not at all comprehend the reason why two young men like Charles and Michel de Young should assail with such vituperation and denunciatory language nearly all of our wealthiest citizens. These young men have been more than ordinarily prosperous, and being of alien birth, they had, it seems to us, a right to have been somewhat grateful to a community that to a great degree encouraged and supported them. They have aroused all the worst and meanest elements of our city, and we think we may fairly say they have encouraged riot and disorder. We know that on one or two occasions they have affected to hold their hounds in leash, and perhaps prevented them from leaping at the throats of our citizens, but the course of the Chronicle for the last year has been directed with the evident purpose of inciting the vicious and disorderly classes to violation of order, and to an insurrection against the law.

The lines are now as distinctly drawn between intelligence and ignorance, between order and disorder, between property-owners and the propertyless, as they were in 1856. There were some respectable citizens opposed to the Vigilance Committee then, and it is a curious fact that the same respectability is in a marked degree with the disorderly, ignorant, vicious, and propertyless now. Judge Terry, Volney E. Howard, Alexander Campbell, Wm. A. Piper, Samuel Soule, ex-Governor Downey, O. C. Pratt, Charles Tuttle, Zach. Montgomery, M. M. Estee, John Lord Love, D. W. C. Thompson, and others whom we know, that are in sympathy with the sand-lot, are disappointed, sour, and angry men—men of uneasy conscience, defeated, ambitious, of dissipated habits, and bad digestion—men who are not distinguished for the amiability of their characters, or their kindly sympathy for their fellow-men. This is a war of the sand-lot—the Chronicle and the dyspeptic old fossils against all that is good in society. The assault upon corporations and upon the wealthy is a blind; it is a feint, a strategy to cover up ulterior designs. The idle sand-lot is determined to live without labor. The Chronicle is determined to rule this city, and every man we have named has held office, and wants office, and is unhappy out of office. We can not doubt the result of a conflict in California between intelligence and ignorance, and between wealth and nothing, between dyspepsia and a healthy digestion. We have ten days more before the election, and in every hour of this time the opponents of the new experiment will strengthen. Every farmer who owns his land, or who expects to free it from incumbrance, will array himself with the commercial and industrial classes of the cities in opposition to this new Constitution.

This defeat of an agrarian Constitution is but the first victory of a long and continuous struggle. It is the sharp, decisive fight of the picket guard. It is the conflict of the skirmish line thrown out in advance of the heavy battalions. We may look forward in the future to severe and perhaps bloody struggles. Free government is a prize not lightly kept nor easily defended. It is not improbable that within the lives of our young men there will be stirring scenes enacted in the United States in defense of the heritage of freedom that we have received from our ancestors. Upon the native-born American boys, sons of the soil, sons of foreign and native sires, will devolve the privilege and the responsibility of guarding this sacred trust. From our free common schools will be enlisted the rank and file of an army of freemen that must fight in defense of freedom. The dark and ominous cloud that now lowers in our horizon is not bigger than a man's hand, but it is charged with lightnings of a swift and desolating wrath if it be allowed to gain headway. It is from infidel and socialistic Germany that this cloud is drifting. We do not fear the storm that shall burst from it in our day, nor do we look forward with any questioning faith as to the ultimate outcome of a political conflict the result of which depends upon the rising generation of Americans to determine. Out of this agitation and discord will grow an American sentiment, and it will crystallize into an American party. It will be composed of the patriotic and native-born, and those patriotic and foreign-born in affiliation with it, who have deliberately chosen this land of freedom as their home. It will be the party of national devotion; the party of intelligence, wealth, social order, veneration for religious opinions; the party of brave men and honest women; the party of law, order, and justice. To it—this phalanx of civilization—we intrust the defense in America, of American liberty, of property, and of law.

The new Constitution people are out with a cartoon. It is the newly launched piratical craft darting out from the Isle of Pines, where it has been lying in wait for the old Ship of State. It bears down upon the old vessel, and it sinks with all its cargo and passengers on board. It is not quite as exact in its drawing nor as complete in detail as it might have been. This is the way we would have drawn it: A great ocean, covered with commerce, teeming with industry; all kinds of vessels, magnificent steamships freighted with bales of silk and spices from India; stately vessels, with their bellying sails, full laden with grain for Liverpool; swift-sailing clippers bearing to and fro the commerce of the world; double-ender ferryboats, running to and from our suburban villages of Oakland, Alameda, Berkeley, Saucelito, and San Rafael; beautiful pleasure yachts dancing upon the blue waves of our bay to the music of lively breezes; a stately city, with its churches and palaces, beautiful mansions crowning the summit of hills around, at the base of which busy industry plied its thousand vocations. On board the ships, and on the ferries, looking out from the balconies of palaces, and peeping through the rose-embowered and vine-clad cottages, we would paint the happy faces of prosperous, well fed, and well clad men and women, the laughing faces of happy children. And the central figure of all this scene of beauty would be our grand and stately ship the OLD CONSTITUTION, and flying at its masthead the banner of the law, the stars and stripes of our nation's flag. On the reverse of the picture we would have the low, black schooner, the pirate's craft, crawling with muffled oars, impelled by low-browed villains out from its hiding-place amid muddy reeds, flying as its pennant the death's head and cross-bones upon its black flag, and on its deck we would have a scowling monster in command. Lying low under the bulwarks, hiding from the light of the sun, we would paint a crew of treacherous bandits, holding in their gleaming teeth sharp knives, and in their hands murderous cutlasses, and overhead there would be a black and menacing sky, in the shadows of which the black-winged fiends of famine, death, and disorder would be outlined. We would make ours a moving panorama, and we would see this devilish craft attack all these ships, and bring confusion to them. We would see the pale faces of all on deck and shore, and then we would see this pirate schooner, with its crew of demagogues, criminals, idlers, thieves, and other pirates, assault the oak-ribbed sides of our old ship THE CONSTITUTION. We would hear the quick command, the tramp of armed men, see the quick flash, and hear the deep roar of its iron-mouthed defenders, and as the clouds of smoke and battle lifted from the scene, we would see the pirate craft foundering in a sea incarnadined with the blood of its dying bandits; and the thing called the New Constitution on its beam ends, bottom up, masts gone, sides stove in, on fire, sinking. We would hear the shrieks of its drowning criminals upon the shore; from city and suburban village, from palace balcony and from mart of trade, from cottage homes and farms, we would hear the loud acclaim of triumph go up in one wild, welcome "whoop up" along the whole shore line. And then we would look again, and there would be quiet, order, prosperity, good feeling, industry, content, happiness, and plenty on the land, and a booming commerce on the sea. The dark clouds that lowered over the combat would pass away, and the bright sun would disclose in the heavens the forms of white-winged angels of peace smiling down upon a happy and prosperous State.

Mr. James R. Kelley, an Irish adopted citizen, merchant, and gentleman, presided over the large meeting on Thursday night at Union Hall. When Governor Irwin was interrupted by disorderly persons, he said: "I can advise the ruffians who came here to disturb the peace that there are enough American citizens present to preserve their rights. 'I would ask every lover of order to assist in preserving order, and I will tell the ruffians that they shall be hustled from the doors, and that with few whole bones.' This style of language suits us, and we are glad to hear it come from an adopted citizen. We will help when it comes to the 'whoop up'."

"I hope this audience does not intend to prevent free speech. It may be inopportune. * * * I do not intend to permit persons in this audience to dictate what I shall say." These were remarks made by the Governor of this State at a public meeting at Union Hall, called to discuss the new Constitution, directed to a class of ruffians who endeavored to break up and disturb the audience. We commend thinking people to consider whether a class who would insult the Governor by cat-calls, yells, and laughter, who would interrupt free discussion and silence free speech are fit to be intrusted with the important duty of organic law.

A HERO OF BRUSH CAÑON.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

May—and Ezekiel Purley still was fireman on Fethering's train. The hills were full of wild-flowers. As the train wound down the cañon, between shaggy slopes, hoary with southern-wood in patches, and ablaze with poppies on all the bare, exposed places, Fethering—always careless of orders—used to make Joe stop the train, while he ran to some nook, where blackberry vines trailed over a spring, or little streams came trickling down narrow ravines, filled with laurel, and came back with hands full of fronds of maiden-hair, and scarlet columbines, and sky-blue nemophilas, or purple larkspur—all of which bloomed the day through in the little telegraph office. He did not give them to Ruth as an offering, but as a favor, and she took them so.

One morning he accompanied her, as usual, toward the office. The train waited here three hours for a passenger train, and Joe used to have long talks with Ruth about her affairs and his. But what could he do now, when Fethering lifted her out of the train, and walked at her side to the office? Ruth tried to remonstrate, but Fethering would say: "Why, did you have anything you wanted to say to Brown?"

"No—nothing particular," she would stammer, cowering before his stern tone.

"Brown," he would call out, "did you have anything to say to Miss Purley?"

And if Brown said "No," he would smile down at her, and say:

"There, Ruthie; and I have lots to say to you."

But if Brown said "Yes," he would stand still and say:

"Well, say ahead."

But this morning Joe said:

"I think I've a right to have the company o' the girl I'm engaged to, an' to have it to myself."

Fethering answered: "Oh, certainly," and drew his arm from Ruth's, and left her without a glance; while she trembled at his freezing tone and abrupt departure. So when she and Joe sat facing each other, she could not think of him at all for wondering whether Mr. Fethering would ever like her again; and poor Joe he could not find a word to say. So half an hour passed in dreadful attempts at conversation, while every minute Ruth's desperation lest Mr. Fethering were forever estranged grew more intolerable. Then Joe blundered into some appeal to her, something derogatory to Fethering. Whereupon she broke out crying, and said he was very unkind and unjust to say wrong things of Mr. Fethering, who was very, very good, and who never said unkind things of him. Joe was repentant again. He went over and stood by her; he looked at the fair, curly head, lying on her desk, and longed inexpressibly to touch it caressingly, but he was as reverentially afraid of her as if she had not been his betrothed wife.

"I never want to worry you, Ruthie," he said, in his slow, puzzled way, "but I'm a clumsy sort o' fellow, an' hurt you when I don't mean to. An' if I could be sure what was best for you, I don't think I'd stick at doing of it."

"I don't know what you're talking about, Joe," she said, lifting her tear-stained face. "Doing what?"

"Well," said he, slowly, "if you'd made a mistake, you know—if you liked—somebody else—better'n me—I wouldn't like you to feel bound, you know, Ruthie; I never want to worry you."

"I don't know what you mean, Joe," she cried again. "I don't like you not to like my friends—that's all."

"If you liked him, I mean—the conductor—" began Joe; but she interrupted him with hot cheeks.

"I never 'd ha' thought you 'd say such a thing to me, Joe Brown! I don't like him the same way. I like you, but I look way up to him, as if he was George Washington or somebody; an' if you only would feel to him as you ought, then we could be like two common soldiers an' he the general."

Joe stood still and looked at her, and the depth of her infatuation gradually dawned upon him. He had thought he understood that a brighter, handsomer man than he, troubled with no modesty, could better take a girl's fancy; but that a hero-worship could possibly be gotten up for the conductor for whom he had felt such honest contempt would have seemed to him nothing short of magic, like that which befell Titania, if he had ever heard of the bewitched queen. The absurd shape which the possible relations between himself, herself, and Fethering had assumed in her innocent heart, struck even him, void of humor though he was, as a grim irony.

"It seems right down wicked," she said, coloring, "to talk of such a man as Mr. Fethering making love to a girl like me—as if a king should make love to a servant girl!"

Simple-hearted Joe Brown looked at her, and realized—as many a man has blundered fearfully by failing to realize—the invincible force of an idea in a human mind and the hopelessness of combating it.

"Oh, my poor Ruthie!" he said in his heart, with a piteous pain. But aloud he only said, "Good-bye, Ruthie."

He felt as if he were saying good-bye for ever, and longed with all his great, true heart for one close, parting clasp and kiss; but Ruthie seldom kissed him, and he dared not ask it. He turned hopelessly away, carrying the hungry ache with him.

Ruthie had felt her heart throb with relief when he said "Good-bye," for now, perhaps, Mr. Fethering would come back. Then she felt ashamed of her relief, and called after him, "Joe!"

He was near her instantly.

"Joe, dear," she said, with a little quiver, "I know how good you are. I don't want you ever to think I meant to speak cross to you, my good old Joe."

For once fate was kind to him. Ruth was thankful all her life to remember that he did not go away from her that morning without one token of affection. She put her two hands on his shoulders and kissed him twice, regardless of smoke and soot.

"Good-bye, my little Ruthie," he said wistfully, and went away.

The two girls from Wheat Valley were pacing the platform again, and he caught bits of their loud-toned conversation.

"What a little fool to throw away a good, steady fellow like Brown for that conceited idiot!"

"Oh, Ruth Purley always did like to be petted, of all things. I've seen her in the train; she hardly dares open her lips to him till he speaks to her; and if she's got anything to say, she just looks at him and blushes till he asks her what it is, and she likes him all the better for being so afraid of him. When he puts his hand on her, or says something soft, that baby face of hers shines all over as if somebody 'd given her a bonanza; and she watches every step he takes when he goes away from her. He does behave pretty well to her for him—he knows she adores him."

"And don't you know, Ruth always believed whatever anybody told her. Now, Joe always thinks he's stupid and good for nothing, and says so, so she believes him; and Fethering thinks he's the biggest man in California, so she believes that, too."

Meanwhile Ruthie was working her telegraph, with tears dropping over her cheeks. Usually Fethering was with her at this hour, and she missed him dreadfully. To be sure, she was always afraid, every minute he was with her, but she was happy, too—perhaps all the happier for her adoring fear. She felt, now, somehow to blame for his not coming, and hoped he would forgive her. At last, the door opened, and she knew, without turning her head, that he was there. She rose and stood before him, like a little culprit before a judge, with her eyes dropped, and her pretty lips quivering, while her hands hung loosely clasped before her.

He stood still and looked at her, watching the color come hotter and hotter into her cheeks, and her lips quiver more pitifully as the silence lasted. He liked her confusion; he was angry at Brown's visit, and meant that she should repent it; he quite shared her feeling about culprit and judge. He knew that she was growing more and more distressed that he did not speak, and more and more repentant for she knew not what, and that she did not dare raise her eyes to see if he were angry; he was well-pleased to know it; his heart swelled with a realization of his complete ownership of the pretty creature; he felt that she answered, line for line, to his ideal of a wife. He looked her over from head to foot with complete satisfaction; the trim little figure, in pink calico and white apron, with his flowers, knotted at the collar, the sweet, pitiful face, and the fair, curly hair. He saw the tension on her nerves growing greater every minute; she was fairly trembling.

"Look up, Ruthie," he said, in his confident way.

She looked eagerly, pleadingly to his face. He made no farther advance, but waited for her, and she dared not speak till she knew whether he wanted her to. At last he said:

"Well?"

"I'm sorry, Mr. Fethering," she whispered. She had not the least idea what she was begging pardon for; she only knew that he was offended, and therefore she must have sinned.

He sat down in the only chair.

"Come here, Ruthie."

She came instantly, and stood before him. He took both her hands in his.

"Now, Ruthie, don't you think it's time that nonsense with the engineer was stopped?"

"But I'm engaged to him, Mr. Fethering, I'm going to marry him, whenever I can."

"You're not going to do any such thing, you silly girl. I don't approve of it at all."

"But I'm engaged to him, Mr. Fethering."

"All right. And I tell you to break the engagement. Now, are you going to be my good little girl, who always mudds what I say?"

Some women would have been outrageously angry; but Ruthie, you know, was a very silly little girl, and she was only cruelly distressed.

"Oh, please, Mr. Fethering, don't tell me to!" she cried, tearfully. "You know I promised. It wouldn't be right."

"Do you think I would ask you to do anything wrong?" said this most audacious man, severely.

Here was a poser.

"Oh, no, no!" sobbed Ruthie, horrified. "But I promised."

He dropped the two hands he was bolding.

"Stop crying, Ruth."

Her tears were instantly scared away.

"Now kneel down here, where I can look into your face, and give me both your hands again, and keep your eyes on mine. Now, are you ready to listen to me?"

"Yes, sir."

He sat still a moment, holding the little hands with an increasing covetousness for possession, and watching her expectant face and weak attitude as she knelt close to him.

"Now, Ruthie, I want you to break your engagement, because you can't marry a man you don't love, and you know you don't love Brown."

"Oh, yes, Mr.—"

"Hush. You think you're fond of him, but you don't love him the way you love me. And I know well enough you never tried to make me love you, as so many girls have done, and I like you all the better for it. I don't believe you ever thought of such a thing as my marrying you, my modest little girl. But I love you just because you are a modest, dear little girl, and I want a modest, dear little wife. So get you out of your snarl with your smutty engineer, and you shall be my very own little Ruthie."

Poor little Ruthie! She did not grasp his meaning word by word; she only felt that heaven had stooped down to her. She had no words; but her face satisfied him. He leaned down and kissed her.

"I wanted you to mind me about breaking the engagement without asking any questions or making me give you any reasons; but you were a little bit naughty for once, my Ruthie."

She started to her feet, putting her hands wildly to her head.

"Oh, Mr. Fethering!" Oh, Mr. Fethering!" she wailed. A cloud gathered on his face.

"What's this, Ruthie?" he said, displeased.

"Oh, I can't! I can't! I promised. He has done so much for pa."

"Is that all, kitten? Have I done nothing for 'pa'?"

"Oh, I know; I never forget how kind you were." A mere refraining from injury and some empty words weighed more to the child than all Joe's faithful years of service.

She came back to Fethering's side, and stood with her hands clasped and her eyes raised to his with timid love and entreaty.

"Let me tell you how it was," she said hurriedly. "We were just like brother and sister, Joe and I; and I always knew he was wrapped up in me, ever since I was a little girl. And when he was on the road, and pa was his fireman, before he knew pa's trouble, he got into a scrape on pa's account, and I knew it was because of me. And then I was so sorry for him; he hadn't anybody at all, only his step-mother, and her daughter that's half-witted, and he had to take care of them both. And you know I'd never seen you, and I didn't know girls ever felt any different to men from the way I felt to Joe."

"Then you hadn't rather marry him than me?"

"Rather!" she cried, amazed that he should ask. "Did you think that? Why, I'd rather be yours than go to heaven! I never dreamed you could want a silly little thing like me any more'n that I could go right up through that sky. But, don't you see, Mr. Fethering?"—she came a step closer, and put her hand on the wooden chair-arm; she was too timid to touch him—"don't you see, it can't make much difference to you, because, of course, I can't be to you like I am to Joe. It's good of you to want me"—her voice trembled eloquently; "but Joe's wrapped up in me, heart and soul, and I couldn't bear to break his heart just to make myself happy. It's because I promised him, and I can't break my promise now, and he so good."

"Ah! then I'm not good?" he said sharply, standing up. Ruthie threw herself on her knees before him on the dusty floor.

"Good? Oh, sir, you are good like the angels. I think of you at night, and feel as if I prayed to you. You're my king, and Joe and I are like your servants. I'll be such a servant as never was; I'll do anything you tell me, and be gladder the harder it is; I'd be so glad if anything that hurt me did you good, to feel the hurting in these very hands or head; I'd be glad to die for you, sir, right here. But I promised, you know. Forgive me, Mr. Fethering, it can't be."

He pulled his hands away.

"Get up," he said; and she obeyed.

"Now, once more: break off with him, and I'll love you and hold you always. Refuse me for him, and have your own way when I tell you what's right, and I wash my hands of you. Choose low, quick. Shall I kiss my own little one and go? Or will you see me go off forever, not liking you any more?"

Ruthie was not logical. She believed implicitly that he could not do, nor wish, nor think anything wrong; yet she believed that this thing he asked would be wrong for her to do. It was like the fires of Smithfield to her, but these little people with only a few illogical ideas hold these few very fast, and Joe's claims were among her ideas.

"I can't break the engagement," she said, despairingly.

"Have your own way," Fethering said, white with anger, feeling for the harshest words. "I've been fooled in you. I thought you were a good, loving little thing, and you are really the most obstinate, disagreeable woman I ever met. I don't want anything more to do with you. If I can't avoid meeting you, please consider yourself a stranger hereafter."

She came close to him, speaking in a low, excited tone. "You've got a pistol! I saw it. Kill me right here, I shan't mind, I shall like it because you do it. Kill me, but don't hate me."

Even Arthur Fethering was moved. He meant, in his heart, to keep up his suit—yes, even if she married Brown, he would accept her fealty, and press his kingship to the utmost. But, meanwhile, let her break her heart for a few months to punish her for refusing him. So he just gave her one sarcastic smile and walked out. Joe Brown was standing outside.

"Look here, Brown," he said, with an insulting air of command, "get up steam and start off. I won't wait for that train. We can just as well let her pass at the next station."

"It's agin' orders, and there hain't time to get there, neither," said Joe, not over respectfully.

Fethering hated his engineer just then. He turned on him, cursing.

"Do you think I'll knuckle to you in big things or little? I'd go now if a million trains were at our heels, since your lordship disapproves. Up with steam, I say."

"I won't do it. Report me if you like."

Fethering turned to Purley.

"You can run an engine, I think. Crowd on all steam, and take charge of that engine, or I'll report your case."

Joe Brown stood still a minute wrestling with himself, then he went to Fethering, and said:

"I'll run her sooner than trust her in his hands, but what happens is what you'll have to count for."

"Go to your business."

Ruthie came creeping out to see the train off, looking crushed and hopeless.

"Ruthie," said Joe, leaning out from his place, "telegraph to Wheat Valley that we've started, and put up a red flag on the main track here."

"Come here, Ruth," said Fethering, recklessly determined to cross Joe, and proud to display his power over Ruth. "I forbid you to do it. Will you mind me?"

"Yes, sir," cried Ruthie, delighted to have an opportunity to show her submission, and too dazed and crushed to get the full import of the situation.

Up and down grades and around curves again, the engine spinning at her utmost rate. Joe Brown was not really himself this morning; never before had it escaped his notice that his fireman was not quite himself. Even when Purley spoke, the thing that was said arrested Joe's whole attention, so that the thickened voice fell unheeded on his numb brain.

"Joe," said Purley, "do you know what th' engineer an' Ruth's been sayin' to each other? I kin tell you; I listened at her winder. He wants her to throw off on you an' marry him; an' she cries like a widdler, an' vows she 'd give her eyes to do it; but 'twould be too rough on you, so she won't."

He watched Joe, with drunken cunning, as he spoke. But Joe answered not one word. It was only what he had himself suspected; yet this definite certainty came on him with almost the force of a new shock. He knew that Purley never lied; Ruthie's implicit truth and reverence for a promise were inherited traits. Mile after mile he hardly thought; he only suffered. At last his dim pain began to shape itself into thought. Should he set her free? If Fethering were really bad it would be different; but he had taken pains to investigate, and found that, though selfish and boastful and domineering, he was a good enough man in his way. "He'd always be kind in his bossing way, when he wasn't crossed," thought poor Joe, candidly, "an' she'd never cross him. An' as to his bein' a fool, she'd never know it; I see that now. She'd put herself under his feet an' like it—my little Ruthie, that might ha' walked on me to keep her out o' the mud! She wouldn't give him a chance to be selfish; she'd lay herself out so to give him all he wanted; an' if he was ugly, she'd blame herself till he couldn't help comin' round; an' if he got into trouble with his reckless ways, she'd think it was all the company's fault." Yet, on the other hand, he knew that, as Fethering's wife, she would not be cherished and cared for as he himself would care for her: he knew that many a grief and care would meet her that he would have sheltered her from. Besides, she was his, and his blood boiled at the idea of giving over his treasure into the hands of his selfish, unscrupulous enemy. Then he knew that tender-hearted Ruthie would torture herself always over the hurt she had caused him, in case he should tear his heart to set her free. He remembered what he had heard a traveling colporteur read, and he repeated it, half-understanding, half vaguely:

"Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy water spouts; all thy waves and thy billows have gone over me—all thy waves and thy billows have gone over me."

The engine took to rattling it out—"All thy waves and thy billows have gone over me." And then Joe started and looked around, dismayed. That slow beat was not the time in which the engine should have rattled it; how came they to be creeping along thus? He glanced at his fireman, and saw that he had been slyly fortifying himself from a flask he had somehow obtained. Joe had not expected it, for it was only three months since Purley's last spree, and it was true that these sprees seldom occurred more than twice a year. Out of the cab went the flask, rolling down toward the creek.

"What have you been doin' to the fire?" shouted Joe.

"Doin' m' best to let it go out," responded Purley, cheerfully. "Chucked wood out doors, when you thought I's pu'n it in fire—see? Fethering's in las' car, you'n I'n front. Let 'em run us down—see? That's all right."

Joe threw open the furnace-door and saw that Purley spoke the truth.

"Get up that fire, an' quick," he said, in a low, resolute voice.

"Said I'd kill 'im some time when you wasn' roun'. Man o' my word, I am," went on Purley, with a good-natured leer. "Make 't all right 'bout Ruthie, you know."

With bent brows, Joe cast aside every other thought to recover his control over the inebriate, and to meet the emergency he had slipped into. The bushy slopes grew lower, receded, softened; there was young wheat waving over them. They were nearing the foot of a grade, and the station was in sight. A long roar behind them, and the passenger train, utterly unwarned (for "Brush" is only a flag-station for passengers), comes flying down the grade.

"Curse my folly," said Fethering, in the last car, and then he knew that there was noise, and breaking, and splitting around him; and then he knew no more till he waked again to find that the sun shone to him through crevices in heaps of debris. He heard moaning and crying. He sat up, but could not find that he was hurt beyond a headache, where he had been struck and stunned. Some one spoke outside.

"It's the conductor I'm after. We'd really ought to get him out, because there's a girl that'd break her heart."

It was Joe Brown's grave, slow voice. Fethering did not stop to consider the motives of Brown, but cried out at once for help. They found where he was after a little search, and a group collected with crowbars and ropes.

"It's a rather ugly job," said Joe, addressing the invisible prisoner, "because, you see, the pieces of the car is on top of you, an' the passenger engine is on top o' them. The two girls in the car crawled out o' the heap, but you was stunned, I reckon, an' the weight o' the engine's made the pile sag down till there ain't no show for you to crawl out."

"Stop your chattering and be quick," shouted Fethering; "there's a piece of car over me that's sagging down and will crush me."

The men outside looked sober.

"I see what he means, but there ain't no way to get at it without bringing the whole heap down on him."

They tried, however, but in vain. At last Joe said:

"I see a place there where a strong man could creep under and h'st up things enough to give him room to creep out."

"Yes, and how's the strong man to get out? The whole thing'd come down as soon as he let go."

"Well, I'll try it; it's nobody's business but my own."

Some one caught his arm—a black-coated, ministerial-looking man from the passenger train.

"My good man, to risk one's life for another may be good, but this is not risking—it is giving your life in exchange for his."

"No 'tain't; it's giving it for a girl that'd grieve to death if he was killed." He stood still a few seconds, and went on, slowly: "I wouldn't think of doin' it for a fellow like him, but, you see, I've been a thinking of it over all the while we was lookin' round here, and specially while we was workin' to get him out, and it struck me this'd fix it all right—all the snarl—if I was dead, you know."

He broke off abruptly.

"I do not understand you," said the clerical gentleman, puzzled.

"Didn't suppose you would," said Joe, pulling himself away from the hand that still held his arm.

In a few moments the fragments of debris near Fethering stirred, rose slightly, and opened a passage to the free world. He crawled eagerly out. No one was looking at him; every one was gazing at a spot where some heavy pieces of the car's roof, pressed on indirectly by the wrecked engine, were swaying as if upheld from beneath.

"Can't somebody help him?" cried the excited group, "Hitch on ropes, or something."

Suddenly the whole mass settled down, and a cry of horror went up from the lookers-on, while Fethering, now first realizing what his rival had done, staggered back, with whitening lips.

"Oh! I ain't dead yet," said a feeble voice from the darkness. "I couldn't hang on any longer; I've got five or ten minutes left, I guess, an' I want to talk to Fethering."

Fethering, awed and abashed, crept as close as he could.

"I want to say something to you, Brown," he said, "but I don't know how to say it. What I think of you, I mean."

"Oh, we hain't no time for fooling," came the feeble voice. "I only wanted to say that you must be good to her. You ain't noways worth her, but she won't never find it out. Remember, I don't owe you no good, and I didn't get you out for love of you, but for love of her. I don't pretend to be gospel man enough to mash myself for fellows that have acted like you."

"Brown, I'm sorry I was ugly to you; you're a grand fellow; I'm contemptible compared to you." He was egotistic even in his humiliation, and felt that he was saying the utmost when he thus compared himself with Brown.

"Who wants to talk about you an' me? What I want (an' I haven't so much breath left to fool away) is to have you feel that it's the least you kin do (after I've cleared out o' the way to make her happy) is to be mighty good to her. I want you to promise."

"I promise you upon my sacred word, Joe Brown, that I will be as good to her as I know how to be," Fethering said solemnly, thinking more of Ruthie's happiness and less of his own than he had ever done.

"Then that's all I've got to say to you."

The black-coated gentleman had knelt down now, listening for any further words. As Fethering drew back, some one touched his arm, and he turned to see Ruthie's white face timidly uplifted. She had been telegraphed word of the collision, and had come down in a hand-car. As she pressed through the crowd, she caught enough of what they were saying to know vaguely what had happened. She did not know how Fethering would meet her, after his angry leave-taking, but she could not believe he would be harsh to her at such a time. He saw her frightened, pleading look, and caught her in his arms, feeling a deeper tenderness for her than he had ever imagined, and remembering his solemn promise, in presence of death.

"Why, little girl!" he said. She clung to him.

"He died for you!" she cried. "Oh, my good, good Joe."

Fethering was a small enough man to feel a sharp jealousy of the heroism that made Joe so great in her eyes. But he was not contemptible enough to indulge it.

"Yes," he said; "we will always remember him."

"He did care for you, after all!" she said. "Poor Joe! And you are not angry with me now?"

The kneeling man looked up.

"Hush—he is speaking."

There was a faint, wandering murmur from the darkness. "I wanted to have a good name in my business. . . . and I wanted—oh, I wanted you, Ruthie. . . . All thy waves and thy billows—" The voice faded a little; then clearer, "She kissed me good-bye—he can't take that away. . . . I never wanted to worry you, my little Ruthie."

"What is it?" asked the sympathetic listener, not catching his words.

But no answer ever came.

There was silence over the soft, green slopes, brilliant with orange of poppies and blue of lupine, and the steep sides of the cañon whence the train had emerged; over the wide grain-sown acres on the other hand; over the two partially-wrecked trains, and the great crowd of people—a few, from the foremost passenger cars, hurt, and lying on the grass, breaking the silence with low moans now and then; over the workmen and passengers gathering in awe nearer to Joe Brown's tomb; over the black-coated man who knelt close to where the engineer's voice had last been heard; over the dark-eyed conductor, with the bruise on his forehead, and the fair girl who clung sobbing to him; deepest silence of all over one or two crushed corpses, lying at one side, under an oak. At last the black-coated man from the passenger train rose to his feet:

"Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend," he said solemnly.

All the men in the crowd bared their heads; even Ruthie's sohs stopped, as she hid her face on her lover's shoulder.

"My darling," he whispered, "I will try to be good to you—as good as he would have had me be."

MILICENT W. SHINN.

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1879.

A young lady was sitting with a gallant captain in a charmingly decorated recess. On her knee was a diminutive niece, placed there pour les convenances. In the adjoining room, with the door open, were the rest of the company. Says the little niece, in a jealous and very audible voice, "Auntie, kiss me, too." I leave you to imagine what had just happened. "You should say twice, Ethel dear; two is not grammar," was the immediate rejoinder. Clever girl, that!

At a concert a young female was engaged in torturing the grand air from the "Sermont."

"I sing well when he is here."

A gentleman in the audience arose impatiently at this point and remarked in a loud voice:

"It appears that he hasn't arrived yet."

[Laughter.]

One of the saddest and most vexatious trials that come to a girl when she marries is that she has to discharge her mother and depend upon a hired girl.

LXXVI.—Sunday, April 27.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Soup a l'Hollandaise.
Smelts a l'Espagnole.
Broiled Beesteak. Potatoes a la Maitaise.
Green Peas. Summer Squash.
Roast Ducks, Apple Sauce.
Oyster Plant Salad.
Blanc Mange, Whipped Cream.
Orange Cake.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Cherries, and Oranges.

T. PREPARE MASHED AND BAKED POTATOES A LA MANTAISE.—Cook and mash potatoes of sufficient quantity, pretty thick and well savored. Put nearly all of them into a deep buttered baking-dish, and form into a dome. Save a few tablespoonsful in the stewpan, add to them an ounce of butter and the yolks of three eggs well beaten, mix well and cook two minutes. Beat very hard the whites of three eggs, mix them lightly and carefully with the rest of the potatoes in the stewpan; then spread this preparation of an even thickness over the dome of potatoes, smooth with the blade of a knife, sprinkle fine fresh bread crumbs over, put a few pieces of butter upon the top, and bake in a moderate oven fifteen minutes. Serve immediately.

In cooking smelts it is always better to cut down the back and remove the backbone, as during certain months they have a small red thread-like worm, which can only be discovered by removing the backbone.

NOTE AND COMMENT.

Sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. The sand-lot has, in its rude and vulgar way, silenced all discussion in reference to the adoption of the new Constitution. No man adhering to the old law and opposing the new is allowed to open his mouth either at the sand-lot or at the ward meetings. He is driven out of the Workingmen's Party if his judgment does not accord with that of Kearney. The Chronicle, with a passionate vindictiveness, pursues with personal denunciation every prominent man who is not in harmony upon this question with it. Yet because bankers, manufacturers, merchants, mechanics, and contractors seek to direct public opinion in the way of their interest they are savagely and brutally maligned, charged with attempts at bribery, with intention to defraud at the ballot box, and to intimidate electors by menace and terror. The Chronicle hires a hall, and employs orators at public meetings in town and country, but if the opposition does the same thing it is dishonest. It is dishonorable to form opposing clubs, though the workingmen's (?) clubs exist in every ward. The Chronicle and the Sand Lot are the only respectable journals; all the others are "chickadees." The Chamber of Commerce and the Mechanics' Institute, the School Department, the legal, clerical, and medical professions, the Draymen's Association, all persons and classes of men who do not take their opinions from Kearney, David S. Terry, and the Chronicle, are denounced as composed of idiots and knaves.

A number of men are employed at Golden Gate Park from the funds turned over to the Park Commissioners by the Yellow Fever Relief Committee of San Francisco, and which funds are now nearly exhausted. Aside from this contribution there is not now, nor has there been the current year, any money at the disposal of the Park Commissioners beyond the amount required for keeping the park in order. The reason for this failure of resources lies in the reduction of the Park appropriations by the city. The tax-levy for this purpose is limited by statute to 2½ cents on each $100, but the city reduced the rate to 2 cents—the reduction amounting to $11,000. Besides this diminution, the Park received last year from the General Fund the sum of $10,000, which this year is withheld. The total reduction is thus seen to be $21,000, equal, for the remainder of the year, to nearly $2,500 per month. In anticipation of the deficiency the Park Commissioners had reduced their current expenses (aside from the yellow fever funds) to the rate of $2,700 per month for maintenance—the average of the past three years having been $4,000 per month. Consequently the laborers now employed out of the yellow fever fund must be discharged unless an appropriation to maintain the improvements on which they are engaged be made out of the General Fund. The present moment of depression is not a propitious one at which to add to the number of the unemployed. In short, it does appear that enough money to go on for the present with the very limited improvements that are in progress should be made out of the $21,000 heretofore deducted from the year's proper appropriation—the more so as these improvements are for the behoof of pedestrian visitors to the Park.

There is no such thing as "luck." The word is used as a refuge for the incompetent, the lazy, or the peculiarly unfortunate. You are not one of the peculiarly unfortunate. That you have had what you call "ill-luck," is either because your conceit has not been appreciated, your supposed shrewdness is all in your eye, or your industry and sacrifice are all in your mind. Do not waste ten years in finding out that you are a fool; do the same work in five; or, believe me now when I tell you it is so. Feel not bitter that your greatness is not appreciated—it is appreciated; you are probably selling now for more than you are worth.

Did you ever hear a man who had made a success of life speak of "luck"? Is it not always the one with no record, with little past, less present, and no future, that is constantly using the word?

According to your idea a well-to-do man must soliloquize in this manner: "When I arose early and worked late; when I saved, planned, and failed; when my heart grew faint and my brain sick; when my faith died and hope resurrected it; when, at last, with my gray hairs, came success—it was only my good luck!"

Two young men leave school. Neither have talent, neither have genius, but both are young. One thinks what will he do—the other does it. One has intentions and announces them—"next spring" he will achieve wonders; the other does something humble this winter. The first, though not dissipated, likes the theatre, his cigar, his billiards, his club. "One must see the world," says he to his conscience. "But get into it first," thinks the other, who knows that these indulgences are only the handicaps chosen by the foolish. Five years pass, only a bite out of life. The first spits vigorously, as he says of the second, "A lucky fellow that; he owns a house and lot." And he spits again—he has learned to do this in the last five years—and marvels at his own lack of fortune. But, can we? J. C. C.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 16, 1879.

Ben. Butler was called on by a person who wanted to have a talk with him.

"Mr. Butler," said he, "one of my neighbor's cows jumped my garden gate last night, and completely destroyed my flower beds. The gate was of the height required by law, and was closed. Now I wish to know whether I can obtain damages?"

"Most assuredly," replied the widow's friend.

"Well, Mr. Butler, how much?"

"Oh, about ten dollars."

"But, Mr. Butler," triumphantly, "the cow was yours."

"Ah!" said Mr. Butler, thoughtfully; and he looked unutterable things out of his bad eye. Then he turned to his desk, scratched off a few lines on a piece of paper, and handed it to his visitor. It was in the form of an account, and read as follows:

"B. F. Butler to Mr. —, Dr: To damages done by cow, $10. Cr., by legal advice, $15. Balance

"Mr. —," said Mr. Butler, softly, "about the payment."

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

I observe that in some of his advertisements Mr. Strakosch calls it "The greatest operatic success ever known in San Francisco." And, coming out of the theatre after Faust on last Wednesday evening, I heard several parties, before and behind me, speaking of what had just been presented to us as Gounod's masterpiece as "a swindle." I wonder which statement is correct! I have no doubt that the affair is, so far, a great success for Mr. Strakosch. He has brought a second-rate company to a very good market, where he can give as much of each opera as suits his convenience or the capacity of his people; with weak principals, incomplete orchestra, a miserably inefficient chorus (inefficient mainly through the parsimony of a manager who endeavors to rush through no less than seven different operas in two weeks without any preparation of them except what can be had between performances), and a mise en scene that is simply disgraceful. At $3 a seat, and full houses—up to Wednesday's Faust, when there was a decided falling off. Mr. Strakosch is quite right—the affair is a success. But the others are also not far wrong; and as far as Grand Opera is concerned, or the promised perfection of the representations, it is just a swindle—nothing more and nothing less.

This performance of Faust, on Wednesday evening, must be accepted as in some sense a foretaste of what we may anticipate in the other greater operas promised in the repertoire, and the prospect is not edifying by any means. The chorus, as I said before, was something shocking. I do not recollect a Bouffe season (excepting perhaps the last one of Oates) when it was not infinitely better, and for Faust I have never heard it so bad. They were ever together, rarely well in tune. There seemed to exist an irreconcilable difference of opinion as to pitch and tempo between them and the orchestra, the argument being carried out in presence of the audience, and both parties clamoring for their rights at the same time and with indomitable perseverance. The orchestra triumphed eventually, and proved to the satisfaction of everybody that the chorus did not know its business. But the discussion was not a pleasant one to listen to. As for the orchestra, since the performance of Lucia on the opening night it has not been itself. On that occasion it was handled with great care and evident intelligence; it sympathized with the singers, and fell into its proper role of accompanist. Since then, however, it has grown nightly more and more obstreperous and insubordinate, until at last, on Wednesday, it may be said to have fairly ruled the roost. It was coarse, noisy, and generally absolutely inflexible and unyielding; it went right ahead with its work, with more or less of general correctness and an occasional loose entry of a voice here or there, letting the singers manage as best they might, and bullying them out of almost every possibility of singing their parts with any freedom of delivery. To make points under such iron rule of the baton is impossible, and as a consequence none but the regular conventional ones were successful. Mr. Adams, who was painfully hoarse, but was on this account entitled to the greater consideration on part of the conductor, and who should have been accompanied with the greatest care, suffered most from this condition of affairs. Despite his hoarseness his singing of the part might have been very enjoyable, since it was by far the most artistic and musicianlike we have ever heard here. But it was slaughtered from beginning to end; to be heard he was obliged to shout, and the more he shouted the hoarser he grew. Mr. Gottschalk, who has next to no voice at all, found himself in the same predicament. In his case I did not so much regret it, since his "Plunkett" of last Saturday convinced me that there is nothing of him (save legs, perhaps), and for all operatic purposes he might as well be buried under an orchestra as a feather bed. What Mr. Strakosch means by putting him forward to sing "Plunkett," and "Valentine"—unless it be to prove that when he once has an audience by the nose he can twist it as he likes—I can not imagine. We have a score of better baritones among our amateurs here, and Mr. Lafontaine, who sings subordinate parts, is worth a dozen of him.

There were redeeming features in Faust. Miss Cary, who is an admirable "Siebel," carried the opera in as far as her unimportant part made this possible; her singing and acting were delightful. From the moment of her enthusiastic reception in the Trovatore up to the present she has been in every cast, and has done everything—as she generally does—well. Miss Cary is an invaluable artist to a manager; her extensive register and telling quality of voice makes almost all things possible to her; she acts well, sings well, is generally in good spirits and voice, and can always count on the favor of her audience. If the voice lacks warmth and spiritual quality we should rather be grateful than otherwise, since with these qualities added to those which she has she would be worth so much to Europe that we should never have an opportunity of hearing her here. And for what she gives us we can very well afford to forget that there might be something more, and be very grateful for what we get.

Miss Maria Litta, as "Martha" and "Margherita" (I did not hear Rigoletto) confirms the impression which her "Lucia" made on me. She is a careful, conscientious singer of fairly good school, without any charm of voice; a very crude actress, who, with but one color in her voice, has two—intense joy and the most abject misery—in her emotional scale, and who sadly needs the advice of a good costumer. Some things in Martha were very nicely done, and a few bits in Faust—the garden scene and the end of the last finale—better than I had anticipated. But throughout both operas her singing, when there are no tours de force to be made, is flat and monotonous—the scene in the first act of Faust absolutely stupid. I was glad to see her looking really pretty in Faust (when not singing) despite her absurd costume and general air. Her "Margherita" is a dejected, prudish young woman from the first, who meets her fate—"Faust"—as though he were a funeral in which she had not the remotest interest, and whose one idea in this world were to properly manage the ridiculously long train of her white merino gown. And when, on sitting down to the spinning wheel, she threw her prayer-book on the ground beside her, I knew that she would sing her "King of Thule," as she did, as though the song were all about a bundle of hay and she supremely indifferent as to which calf got it for supper. The fact is that Miss Litta, who is a very good (vocal) "Lucia," is only a passable "Martha," and very second-rate "Margherita."

In this opera Mr. Cooley is also very much overweighted. He struggles bravely with "Mephistopheles"; he strains every nerve to act and sing it, but he can really do neither. It is a part for a primo basso, and Mr. Cooley is not quite that, although a careful, reliable artist. That he applied to sing a great part is no fault of his, any more than it will be if he has to do "Marcel," "Leporello," and others that are too much for him. It costs so much to over-advertise the people who come that it would really be too much to ask that a manager should pay besides for really capable ones. So Mr. Cooley is made to do all the bass parts, whether they fit him or not.

Mr. Westberg, the "Lionel" of Martha, has such a pleasant and altogether musical little tenor voice that I am inclined to hope that we shall have some more light operas in which he may be heard. He requires more careful nursing in the orchestra than he got on Saturday, and would be none the worse for a high B flat in his voice. But it is such a smooth, musical little organ that it is delightful to listen to and wins one's sympathy at once. He sings very well, too; with an evident consciousness of just what he can do well, and a modesty that restrains him from attempting too much.

Madame Roze, who made what may be termed a fiasco d'estime with her first "Leonora" (in the Favorita), well nigh redeemed herself with the second (in Il Trovatore), and certainly proved herself possessed of some delightful qualities. I am inclined to think that if this lady had not been killed in advance by the extravagant terms in which she was announced she would have proved a reasonable success. More than this could scarcely be hoped for in this city, since her best qualities—artistic intelligence and a refined, sympathetic voice—are not in demand here. Apart from the fact that Madame Roze has not the adequate voice for the part, her "Leonora" in Il Trovatore is immeasurably the best we have seen in San Francisco. But a "Leonora" with a small voice is hardly a "Leonora" at all. The successful singing of the rôle depends so largely upon the possession of great volume of tone as well as timbre, that the attempt to get through it without these qualities can bring nothing but failure. Il Trovatore is a series of tours de force; Madame Roze has no force. She sings beautifully, acts beautifully, looks beautiful. But she is out of her proper place when she endeavors to fill that of prima donna dramatica, and she knows it, Mr. Strakosch knows it, we know it, and the public knows it—at $3 a seat.

The fact is that Mr. Strakosch has but one available artist of the first rank in his company. This is Miss Cary. Of the others, Mr. Adams in his prime was confessedly a very fine singer, who for a long time held his own as primo tenore at Vienna, where they are very critical, and was considered one of the best singers and actors in Germany. But his voice is not only considerably worn, but also so very sensitive to climatic influence as to cause his audience constant distress. His artistic methods are admirable; to me his singing as well as his acting is a constant delight. But in the hero parts of Grand Opera an audience is entitled to voice, and in this Mr. Adams is a continual disappointment. Madame Roze disappoints in the same way, only that she has not the reputation of ever having had the voice. Signor Pantaleoni has been a first-rate Italian baritone—which means a second-rate one generally—but is also no longer fresh, and has some foot-light mannerisms in his vocal method that are positively detestable. Miss Litta is very well in her place; a good average second-rate artist. The rest—well, they don't help to make a first-rate company of it, by any means.

In the matter of "cuts" I think the superlative of managerial assurance was attained on Wednesday last, when the entire cathedral scene—one of the most important as well as beautiful of the opera—was quietly dropped out of Faust, and the matter permitted to proceed as though there had never been a note of it written. With almost any foreign audience this moment would have been the turning point of the season; it would have stopped right there. But we swallowed it, as we had the clipping of the first scene of Lucia, the lopping off of the entire first scene of the third act, and most of the chorus and other music of the "mad scene" in the same opera, before; we did not miss the great slices of the Favorita that remained in the prompter's box—were not so badly off, perhaps, on the whole, since of the quality of what we received a little goes a great way. Still, there is a point at which a manager's scissors should stop, and when he cuts an important scene out of an opera like Faust I think he has gone beyond that point.

The nature of the instrumentation used in Faust—which is not by any means well rescored—reminds me of the squabble between Mr. Strakosch and the house of Choudens of Paris over the parts for, and right of representation of, Carmen (which he—Mr. S.—pirated from them, and claimed to give in its original form), and causes me to wonder whether we are to hear it also in an edition revamped to suit the exigencies of a reduced orchestra? It is well known that one of the great charms of this opera—the greatest according to European critics—is its instrumental coloring; that lacking the delicate and vivid instrumentation of the original it loses half its beauty and attractiveness. In the East I believe Mr. Strakosch claimed to have the original instrumentation. Will he give us this, with only one Oboe and one Fagotto in his Orchestra, even supposing that two Horns and two Trumpets (Coroets) represent the score—which, however, probably has four of each? Are we to have nothing but rescored operas in our grand three dollar season?

To-morrow evening brings the debut, in La Traviata, of Miss Amy Sherwin, a young Australian prima donna (a pretty cheap term when even Miss Lancaster, who is at best a respectable comprimaria, is announced as such), who is said to have a very fine voice and considerable talent. It is to be hoped that Miss Sherwin may prove acceptable, since the company sadly needs strengthening if it is to do the heavy work laid out for it.

The Weber Piano Company have lent their assistance in publishing a seven-page pamphlet to convince the citizens of San Francisco that Roze-Mapleson is a prima donna, and can portray emotions which Miss Kellogg fails to express, and that she takes rank with Nilsson, Lucca, Parepa, and a whole host of first class singers. If she is all this, then why don't she demonstrate the fact to us? and why—by the grace of this piano company—can't we be considered as capable of forming and holding our own opinions.

Those who have not yet secured tickets for the Artists' ball should apply to the Secretary of the Art Association at once. The success of this ball is something that the fashionable community is interested in as the avant courier of entertainments of magnificence in years to come. The committee are working hard and effectively, and the only thing needed to make assurance doubly sure is the sale of a few more tickets—a few more additions to the brilliant company of next Tuesday evening.

The continued illness of Miss Alice Schmidt compels an indefinite postponement of the remaining matinees of the Schmidt quartet.

ARCHERY NOTES.

From remote places in city and county strange archers are turning up every day, and some of them men who shoot with no indifferent skill. Last week the pastor of a prominent San Francisco church (I suppose prominent is the right word) put in an appearance at the Merry Forresters' Range, and the way that reverend gentleman clapped his arrows into the gold would have gladdened old Robin Hood himself. Three or four times a week a tall, fair lady, accompanied by a duenna, which may be either her mother or her aunt, practices on the summit of Russian Hill, and from the account given by those who have seen her shoot, her marksmanship is as good as any of our lady archers yet heard from. As a matter of record I give the score made in the first match ever shot on the Pacific coast, between the Bow Club and the Pacific Archery Club. Each archer shot thirty arrows, five in an end, at forty-five-inch targets, placed at distances of twenty and thirty yards, five archers in each team. The first flight was at twenty yards, with the following result:

BOW CLUB.

H. B. Havens	25, 27, 25, 29, 25, 21.
R. J. Bush	27, 35, 33, 37, 33, 37.
C. D. Havens	33, 29, 31, 27, 31, 31.
E. C. Macfarlane	33, 27, 33, 34, 31.
F. C. Havens	35, 39, 37, 43, 39, 39.

PACIFIC ARCHERY CLUB.

H. Darneal	33, 31, 31, 23, 17, 29.
G. W. Kinney	25, 31, 33, 29, 29, 33.
W. A. Maxwell	17, 29, 21, 35, 31, 25.
J. M. Pettigrew	27, 23, 15, 24, 18, 25.
F. M. Ward	33, 37, 31, 28, 35, 37.

At the thirty-yard score the shooting was as follows:

BOW CLUB.

H. B. Havens	19, 16, 21, 6, 10, 25.
R. J. Bush	37, 25, 41, 31, 35, 39.
C. D. Havens	15, 14, 15, 21, 21, 25.
E. C. Macfarlane	13, 11, 4, 22, 23, 22.
F. C. Havens	33, 33, 35, 35, 37, 39.

This gave the Bow Club the victory and the prize—a handsome bow and set of arrows. The P. A. Club made the annexed score at thirty yards:

H. Darneal	21, 18, 31, 27, 25, 25.
S. W. Kinney	33, 31, 21, 35, 14, 19.
W. A. Maxwell	17, 20, 13, 21, 20, 22.
J. M. Pettigrew	13, 22, 6, 17, 25, 15.
F. M. Ward	19, 18, 25, 26, 25, 24.

This match was shot last year, and of course it is only natural to suppose that every archer has improved in some degree since. The best ladies' scores at twenty yards have not exceeded, so far as I have heard, one hundred and thirty-five with thirty arrows at the regulation target. Three or four new clubs will be formed next week, all of which will go into training for the tournament.

QUIVER.

THE BATES DRAMATIC SOCIETY

respectfully announce their

FIRST BENEFIT.

to take place at the Baldwin Theatre, on THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 1,

1879.

Tickets will be procured of members. The auction sale of boxes will be held at Stenway Hall, No. 117 Post Street, on Saturday evening April 26, at 8 o'clock.

This is the neat and graceful invitation sent by our swell amateur dramatic association to announce the appearance of the members in scenes from Shakespeare's tragedy King John, relative to the trials of "Prince Arthur," and including the death of "King John," and a new adaptation of J. Stirling Coyne's three act society comedy, Everybody's Friend. The casts of both tragedy and comedy are excellent; the rehearsals have been, it is said, thorough; the programmes are tasteful, and the audience is expected to appear in full dress, and do honor to such a segregation of genius and talent. Heretofore the public performances of the club have been invitation affairs, and this is the first benefit that has been attempted. There is no doubt that the evening above mentioned will witness a fashionable and enthusiastic house, entertained by as aristocratic a set of players as ever stepped upon the boards at Baldwin's. Certainly the quality of the invitations and programmes issued, and the reputation of the club, indicate a very stylish and enjoyable entertainment.

Clara Morris has given to a reporter of the Cincinnati Enquirer her version of the Eytinge affair. "I never met Miss Eytinge but once," she said, "and that was in the green-room of a theatre in New York, and she was very cordial and loving to me then indeed. Afterward, however, I heard of her having said many bitter and cruel things of me, to which I never made any response or reply, not deeming them worthy of my notice. When the trouble at the California occurred, and Miss Eytinge retired behind the curtain, I was inclined to get up and leave the box for my hotel; but, upon thinking the matter over a moment, I saw that such a course would be discourteous to Miss Holbrook, so I remained until the performance was over. Miss Holbrook read the lines of "Lady Isabel" so well and intelligently that I threw her my bouquet as a compliment. While Miss Eytinge was in her room the manager of the theatre visited her and endeavored to get her to finish the play, but she declared in language that I will not repeat that she would never speak a line in his house. She was announced for a matinee the next afternoon, and the manager said to her: 'Am I to understand that you will not play to-morrow?' 'You are to understand,' said she, 'that I will never play again in your ——— house.' 'Very well,' said he; 'you are a woman, and I can not help myself.' The stage manager was with him and heard this conversation. The manager came to me and begged me to help him out of his difficulty, but I declined. He persevered, however, and, finding that he would be compelled to close his house if I did not come to his rescue, I, at half-past one in the morning, consented to play "Nancy Sykes" on Saturday evening. I got a copy of the play and studied the part from it, and with but the rehearsal of two scenes, played the part to a fine house. So careful was I not to infringe on any right of Miss Eytinge that I would not enter the theatre until Miss Eytinge had taken every article belonging to her out of it, and I would not use her version of "Nancy Sykes," but studied my part from the published book of the play, while the other characters were played from the manuscript edition. So you see I did not enter the theatre to play until Miss Eytinge had sworn not to play another line in it, and I only played in order to do a kind act to a manager who was in distress, and who otherwise would have been compelled to perform to empty benches. Miss Eytinge has misrepresented me in California and elsewhere about this performance, but though solicited again and again to do so I have never given my version of the affair until now."

*Said Lucky B. to Johnny Skae,
You're looking awful dry to-day.
I feel that way, so let us Beer,
And quench our thirst and spirits cheer.
What will you take, said Lucky B.
I recommend Falk's Mil-wau-kee.
You've struck my gait, said Johnny Skae,
I drink that same Beer every day.
And so do I, said Lucky B.,
So what suits you also suits me.*

The Hon. Milton S. Latham sends to the auction house of R. D. W. Davis, next week, April 28th and 29th, the rarest and most complete collection of valuable books that has ever been gathered into a private library in this State. The book-room of Mr. Latham contains some six thousand volumes, and the collection is especially complete in works on politics and political economy, together with the standard English, American, French, and German authors. The sale is without reserve, and will afford an opportunity for all who love good books, or who are making for themselves a collection, to secure some rare works. The books are now upon exhibition at the salesroom of the auction house, No. 211 Pine Street.

RESIDENCE

....OF THE....

HON. MILTON S. LATHAM,

AS A WHOLE.

TERMS OF SALE.—One-half cash, balance to be secured by mortgage on the property. Interest on the mortgage at the rate of eight per cent per annum.

This magnificent estate comprises all that finely located property described as follows: On the north line of Folsom Street, between Second and Third Streets—having a frontage of 137½ feet on Folsom Street by 355 feet in depth, running to a Tehama Street rear entrance to grounds, and stable on Hubbard Street—having a frontage of 80 feet on Hubbard Street. Enclosed on Folsom Street by an elegant iron fence, and on three sides of the property by substantial 24-inch brick wall, from 6 to 15 feet high, with marble walks, carriage drives, fine garden shade trees and four figures in marble.

The improvements consist of a modern built mansion, 65x30, and addition, 50x10, all on solid brick foundation, with mansard roof and tower, three stories in all, built in the most substantial manner, and with every possible modern improvement.

First floor—Large drawing-room with bay windows, reception room, dining room, spacious halls and staircase, magnificent library and conservatory finished in most elaborate style.

In second story—Four large chambers, with rosewood plate-mirror panel folding doors, two bathrooms, ten bedrooms.

In the third story, main building—four large bedrooms, with large tower room above.

In basement—Billiard room and ten pin alleys, finished with inlaid panels, floors, and ceilings; large supper room, and closets, servants' bathroom, wine rooms, laundry, storerooms, porters' room, linen room, and housekeeper's apartments.

The main portion of the building, including all the principal rooms, the halls and billiard room, are elegantly frescoed in the highest style of the art and regardless of expense.

Five French plate-glass mirrors, fixtures in alcove, in rear of parlor and billiard room; elegant Italian carved mantels and low English grates; rosewood square and corner wash-stands, and all conveniences in plumbing work, finished on detail in the best possible manner.

Adjoining the spacious dining-room is a large butler's pantry, containing burglar-proof vault for silverware and a lined silver closet.

Unusually large Library, with skylight and bay window, opening from one side into a large semi-circular Conservatory. This room, for size, light, and ventilation, is not equaled in the State, and was pronounced by the late Hon. Wm. H. Seward to be the handsomest Library-room in America. Also,

Stables and Carriage House,

Very large and roomy; built of brick, two stories, with cupola; finished above and below alike, with every possible convenience; paneled siding and ceiling in both stories; fitted up elegantly with ten stalls and two box stalls; ventilated all around the building, with separate stable for three cows.

Large Carriage House, 22 feet in the clear, light and airy, with large cases, with plate glass fronts, for harness.

Four large rooms finished in the second story of the stable for coachman, porter, watchman, and gardener.

Hay-loft, Granary, Stone Water-troughs, Carriage-wash, Driveway, Water and Gas all over the premises.

Also large Barn-yard, Coal-house, Tool-house, Store-room, and Hot-house, all enclosed with a substantial brick wall, and accessible in front or by private entrance on Hubbard Street.

This estate covers nearly an acre and a quarter of land in the very heart of the city, and surrounded by the private residences of John Barrett, Esq., A. J. Pope, Esq., J. O. Eldridge, Esq., A. H. Forbes, Esq., and other fine properties. Folsom Street, between Second and Third, is one of the finest blocks in the city, paved and sewered, and accepted by the city. Drainage perfect.

This property is on the north side of the street, having the sun all day on its front side. With its beautiful lawn, choice shrubbery and shade trees, garden ornaments, and inlaid marble walks, it is every way desirable for the residence of a gentleman of taste. It is complete in all its appointments, and ready for occupancy. Folsom Street cars pass the property, and the Omnibus Railroad is within half a block.

To appreciate this property, go and see it. The property will be sold in one lot, including Land, Mansion, Stable, and apartments—excepting only the gas fixtures and three wood mantels.

For permission tickets to examine the property, apply to the undersigned, or at the office of H. M. NEWHALL & CO., corner of Sansome and Halleck Streets. The house may be examined by parties desirous of purchasing, any day previous to the sale, between the hours of 12 M. and 3 P. M.

The sale will take place on the premises on the day advertised, rain or shine.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

When political affairs assume a grave aspect and danger menaces the land, such light and trifling things as grace the columns of OLLA-PODRIDA are sadly out of time. The king's jester and the court clown were never called in when their monarchs and courts were considering those serious questions that disturbed the throne or convulsed the nation. But when danger had passed then came the court fool with his "wise saws and modern instances," conveying sometimes grave maxims and a deep philosophy under the guise of a merry trifling. The appearance again of OLLA-PODRIDA evidences the fact that in the opinion of the wise men who control the ARGONAUT the danger is passed. The new Constitution will not be adopted. The old one will remain the well and fountain of our judicial knowledge. It will continue to be the chart and compass to guide us; it will be the sheet anchor to hold the ship of State, and the sun will continue to shine, and the grass to grow, and California to prosper as in the olden time, and Kearney will not be Dictator, and Terry will not be Chief-Justice, and Clitus Barbour will not be Mayor, and Beerstecher will continue to sell beer, and Bonnet to friz hair, and Vaequerel to cook, and Volney E. Howard will raise oranges in the semi-tropical climate of Los Angeles, and the lousy statesmen of the sand-lots will crawl back to their hay bunks; all the luminaries of the late convention will go into eclipse, and this new crop of demagogue politicians will be nipped in the bud.

It seems almost too bad that all the fond anticipations of these old political fossils like Terry, Howard, Sam Soule, and Piper should come to naught. It seems too bad that Judge O. C. Pratt can not be re-vitalized into a judicial existence. It is indeed melancholy that Paul Morrill and John Lord Love should be still left in the dead valley of political dry bones, or that ex-Governor Downey should have no hope of political resurrection, and that the trump of the archangel should never sound the recall to life of old, dead, dried up, and withered political and social malcontents that under the wormth of the sand-lot have made this last spasmodic wiggle for life. Poor old Tompkins and poor old Dr. Wozecraft, and Bradford, and Alexander Campbell, and Estee, and all of those old "three-time losers" on the green cloth of life's "faro table!" We are sorry for them. "The times have been that when the braies were out the mas would die," but this melacholy collection of prehistoric fossils have been galvanized into a spasmodic and final kick. It is a common experiment at the dissecting table to apply the galvanic wire to the toe of a corpse, give the battery a turn, and under the influence of electricity it will start into life, rise to its feet, give one ghastly grin, and then relapse into the very dead condition it was in before the experiment. This uprising of the slums has acted like galvanism upon these old political corpses. Every disappointed politician; every played out, burned out, kicked out, haager on of party; every bursted stock garbler; every broken banker; every old, soured, dyspeptic, unhappy, social malcontent has shown his face, grinned his grin, grumbled his grumble, and we now hope he will lay himself down again to the quiet repose of his political death. It makes us sad to see these skeletons walking among us—these ghosts of old ambitions trooping by.

Perhaps, after all, we are counting without our host. Perhaps, after all, ignorance will triumph over intelligence; nothing over something; old resurrectionists over the young blood of the State; old political fossils be revamped into new life; and that the time has come when the disgraceful tramp, the worthless idler, the vicious social malcontent, the idle, the drunken, the disorderly, the discontented, the demoralized, and the debauched, will come to political power and wield the destinies of this State. For one week longer we will indulge the hope that such a thing is impossible, and that California has not entered upon its period of social and political decadence. We hope we shall not be compelled to come under the sway of the sand-lot. We hope the time has not come when we are to be ruled over by the dyspeptic, when indigestion is to be crowned king. If that time has come, we shall submit to the majority with that good grace that always characterizes the amiable and the healthy. And if that time has not come, we shall insist that the bowling minority, the old fossils, and the political riffraff, shall crawl back to the obscurity and quiet of their ignoble past and be for ever silent.

There is one curious thing about us Californians—we are always in a stew. We go from one scare into another like babies wandering in the woods. Verily we are the greatest cowards and dunces the world has ever produced. Not less than half a dozen times since the settlement of California we have been frightened out of our seven senses, and the whole community has gone into the dumps and doldrums, as though the bottom had fallen out of the State, and the city of San Francisco was to be overrun again with ocean sands and to become a roost for sea birds. In 1853 we had it bad. Real Estate was a drug, and everybody that could realize did so, and ran away. Who does not remember the Frazer River scare, when lots sold on Montgomery Street for one-quarter their value; the Goat Island panic, when the Bulletin and Call impressed upon us the alarming fear lest the commercial metropolis was going to take itself bodily over to old Yerba Buena. We have had fire scares, and panic scares, and earthquake scares, till our hair seems to rise on end as a natural and normal condition of things. Chinese immigration has frightened us out of all propriety, and we actually believed at one time that Tom Scott was coming overland with his Southern Pacific Railroad to make San Diego a great commercial emporium, where the Asiatic and Oriental trade would concentrate, and that San Francisco would go back to its primitive condition as an embarcadero of Spanish hides and tallow; that owls would roost in our belfries and the wild ass browse upon the chaparral of Montgomery Street.

And yet during all these years our city and our State has grown and prospered. The railroad, the last and greatest bugbear of monopoly—that, in the opinion of a few howling lunatics, was like the giant in the fable to eat us all up, crying "fee, fo, fum; I smell the blood of an Englishman, and, dead or alive, I will have some"—even this has contributed to our prosperity. San Francisco, somehow or other, prospers in spite of all the birds of ill-omen that hoot over and against it, in spite of all the false prophets that prophesy evil concerning it, in spite of all the politicians, sand-lot loafers, political demagogues, and villainous newspapers that curse it with their existence. It is growing to-day, increasing in wealth and prosperity, laying its foundations broad and deep; extending its commerce, its manufactures, its trades; its buildings multiply; its private residences grow in numbers and in elegance and costliness of construction; and it will flourish in spite of the devilish machinations of all the tramps, loafers, and conspirators that combine to retard its growth and hinder its progress. We wish it could have repose for, say, ten years; that for that length of time its people could be let alone to follow their industries and carry out their enterprises; that all the daily newspapers could be suppressed, all the telegraphic wires cut, all elections be suspended. Let Governor Irwin remain in office, and let no Legislature convene. We would be delighted to have the people let alone for one decade. Let them have repose from politics and the sensation of elections. As soon as this constitutional election is over, and within forty days, our political conventions will assemble for party nominations, and we shall all be by the ears as to whether John F. Swift shall be nominated for Governor and elected by the Republicans, or some equally good man shall receive the Democratic nomination. It won't make a pin's difference who is Governor, but all our daily journals will perspire great clots of ink over the question, and our peripatetic political orators will lash themselves into convulsions of patriotism to secure a party triumph; and there will be great meetings at Platt's Hall, and processions, and illuminations, and bonfires, and oratory, and music, and all sorts of nonsense.

Next spring we shall renew the tumult over Presidential nominations. Just as though the people had any voice in choosing a Presidential nominee, and just as though it was not the toss of a Bungtown copper whether General Grant or Governor Tilden become President of the United States; and in the fall the whole country will be ablaze with excitement, and all sorts of lies will fill the political atmosphere. The North will be arrayed against the South, the blue against the gray, neighbor against neighbor, friend against friend, section against section, and all upon the question whether Tom Shannon shall be Collector of the port of San Francisco, or somebody else step into the administration of this particular ward of the national poor-house for the support of party mendicants. The nation will be tossed in a blanket because an hundred thousand men desire to remain in office, and five hundred thousand other men desire to get in. The Government is to undergo a great upheaval in order to determine who shall be its postmasters. All this excitement of too frequent elections is a severe strain upon the temper of our people; it leads to ideosecs and dissipation. If we could have a rest for ten years we should think the millennium had really come. Our officials could afford to be honest, and even if they should steal themselves rich it would be better for us than to agitate ourselves every two or four years to let a new and more hungry swarm of political insects get their bills into us.

The second step for a republic is the one that leads to empire. First, the domination of a mob; then comes Caesar. After chaos comes the order of the military power; after anarchy comes the strong government. General Grant will be here in a few days, and we suggest to General McComb, Major Backus, Colonel Wasson, General Walsh, and other distinguished military gentlemen, whether, in anticipation of his coming, they had not better organize themselves into a praetorian guard, and proclaim him Consul, King, Emperor, Dictator, anything to rescue us from this many-headed monster of the sand-lot. Let Ulysses Grant be proclaimed King of California. He can extend his empire eastward, annexing province by province till he absorbs the trans-mountain territory that lies beyond the American Alps. He can seize the great valley of the Mississippi, and make New Orleans its emporium of trade. Gradually State by State will come under the protection of his military arm, till our empire is bounded by the two great oceans, and extends from the boreal to the tropic land. We will then proclaim the empire, and crown Ulysses King, with a right to name his successor. Then the sand-lot shall be drafted to dig an inter-oceanic canal across the Isthmus, via Nicaragua, the railroads become national property, San Francisco the world's great metropolis, the ARGONAUT the court journal, and ourself a prince or grand duke by royal letters patent for being the first to suggest the elevation of His Imperial Highness to the throne of an American empire.

For jowl that's hard and cheek that's glazed, for coolness that is arctic and impudence that is colossal, commend us to the Chronicle—every attaché of which, from the devil that washes type to the devil that sits up aloft, through all the intermediate apartments from the key-hole reporter of bed-chamber sensations up to the encyclopaedical transposer of editorial from Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, are now, and always have been, and always will continue to be, gamblers in mining stocks. Not a man in the office, from Timmins up and down, that is not in this dreadful business. Now, and ever since the first share was placed upon the market, the entire establishment, rank and file, has been hanging, like Shakspeare's samphire gatherer, half way down between dizzy heights and horrible depths—now buoyant with extravagant hopes, and anon blue with desperate despair. Lo, the remedy! Abolish the stock exchange. Declare it unlawful to make time transactions. Refuse the machinery of the law to the man who gambles and loses. Give a premium to rogues who will play and not pay. Tear down the granite juggernaut that with its ponderous wheels crushes the financial bones of its worshipers. Destroy the Bourse, and by legislation make men honest. Declare in the organic law that there shall be no more cakes and ale—and all of this because the greed of gain tempted the virtuous Chronicle across the threshold of the mining cave where sits the grim giant of despair. The Chronicle went in bristling with confidence, was plucked, and came out squealing; and now, like the pig under the gate, like the sow the devil sheared, with only its nose and fore paws at liberty, it squeals, and claws, and shrieks against the crime of gambling. "The devil burnt with dipping his fingers in holy water," "Satan rebuking sin," are similes to describe the virtuous indignation of this most moral and high-toned journal.

Never a place in the world gave such continuous labor and such good wages to workmen as did California till within two years. Until Kearney made his advent upon the sand-lot work was plenty and payment liberal. Since his advent, labor has been scarce and wages low. The poor man who works for a living should ask himself the question whether this is not true. Workingmen find no employment from Kearney and his sand-lot gang. Labor is given by men who have brains and money. The sand-lot ass, Denis Kearney, is endeavoring to kick out the brains that finds poor men employment, and scare all the money out of the country that pays them.

A lady friend found a hard-working woman with two children, and the incumbrance of an inefficient husband. In charity she hired a house for the family, paid the rent, and gave the wife enough employment to keep the wolf from the door. She now writes to inform us that the husband is electioneering among his acquaintance, who are day laborers, for the new Constitution, because it is the poor man's Constitution and will reduce taxes. "Am I justified," she asks, "in bulldozing this ungrateful meddler to vote as my property and business interest demand? I am in an unpleasant predicament. I would not injure the wife and children, but I would let the man starve before he should live upon my brains and my money."

Not long since we attended the silver wedding of Mr. Houghton at Oakland. We hired a carriage to take us across the bay, attend in the evening, and return with us the next morning—price, $15. Before leaving, we asked the driver and owner of the vehicle how he would vote on the Constitution, and this was his reply: "I am an Irishman, twenty years in San Francisco. I have a family; children at school. I have a homestead and stable. I own my carriage and horses. I have some money in the savings bank. I have prospered under the old Constitution. It is good enough for me, and I shall stand by it." "Then you have no prejudice against rich men," we said; "you do not belong to the sand-lot." "No, sir," he replied; "I live upon rich men." "The sand-lot never hires my clareoce. I do not want rich men bothered; when they have money I get some of it. If times were hard you would not go to this party; or, if you did, you would go across by the ferry boat and street car; you and your wife could come and go for eighty cents. You pay me $15. I don't want rich men to economize; for while you are economizing by going on foot my horses are eating their heads off and I am starving. If money is plenty you spend, and I am all right. If money is scarce you economize, and I suffer. I am looking out for myself and not for Denis Kearney." We commend this reasoning to the statesmen of the sand-lot, and invite either of the attorneys of the Chronicle to answer it.

A young lawyer said to us on Tuesday last that he should vote for the new Constitution. Upon expressing our surprise, he said: "I am a young lawyer. My future is before me. The old Constitution is interpreted by thirty years of legal decisions. Fifty-four volumes of California Reports contain all that is settled by judicial decree. The new Constitution is a tangled web of contradictions and anomalous provisions. It is made for lawyers. It will give us a decade of litigation. It will distribute millions among the lawyers, and I am not unselfish and patriotic enough not to hope that it will pass." We turned away, tickling the back of our ear with our dexter finger, and made to ourself this observation: "If there is any class justified in adopting Kearney's Constitution it is the lawyers."

A German, in reply to our interrogatory, "How are you on the Constitution, Thompson?" said: "I came to the country twenty-five years ago. I have done well. I own a good home, and it is paid for. I always had plenty of work and good wages till this d—d fool, Kearney, began to blow on the sand-lot. Since then times have been hard, labor scarce, and wages low. If the new Constitution would send Kearney to the insane asylum, or to the county jail, or to the pound for mad dogs, or to the devil, or if it provided for a new fool-killer, I would vote for it; but it don't, and I stand by the old Constitution, you bet."

While the Chronicle is so busily engaged in moralizing over corruption in municipal affairs, and drawing such startling pictures of malfeasance in office, would it not be a good idea to carry the analysis out and state to this people whose votes put these thieves, and suicides, and scoundrels, and public robbers in places of trust? Was it not the same class of suffrage that uncovered the Chronicle and the new Constitution, and proposes to bounce us with the same ballot on the May? It's a wise child that don't recognize its own

WITH MALICE AFORETHOUGHT.

I was a teacher—St. Simon save the mark! That is, I drew seventy dollars, at intervals of twenty-eight days, for misinstructing the pupils of the Cañon School during the summer of 1874. The Cañon School was just over the ridge from Peekerville, and I boarded with my friends, the Merrys, who lived on Owing's Hill, a "short mile" from the school house. I was younger then, and did not rightly appreciate the value of self-respect; and so it did not especially grieve me to realize that my ill-success in teaching was the result of sheer incapacity to teach. My faults were various and my qualifications few; I had "no government" for one thing, and "lacked the talent for imparting" for another—but this sketch has little to do with my actual school work; it was enough that I was not reëngaged, and have never since asked for a position as teacher. Yet had I not taught the Cañon School, I should never have known Molly Browne, and there would have been no excuse for this sketch.

When I opened school the first morning, I was conscious of a great many freckled faces, not a few dirty ones, and one or two which threatened mischief. Most of the children were under twelve. There was a big, vicious-looking lot of perhaps eighteen whom I mentally labeled for a thrashing at the slightest provocation; one or two simpering misses, neutral looking as faded wild oats; and the inevitable bright boy and girl, wearing the usual expectant, self-congratulatory expression. But to the extreme right of the huddled school-room, in the very last seat, was a girl—about sixteen I judged—whose attitude was a study, whose face was a tender pastoral.

"Clyte!" I thought with almost an exclamation, for I was a worshiper of Frank Bret Harte, and swore by the Shakespearian truthfulness of "Miss." I looked at my special pupil for a long, critical moment, and the physical likeness before me and the ideal "Clyte" corresponded exactly. "How pretty she is," I thought, and as I went on with the day's routine I looked more often than in any other direction to where Molly Browne was sitting. And as I looked I could not but note how lovingly the sun had played about the curves of her full throat, to leave it so soft and white, and wondered what had preserved the exquisite bloom of her cheek from the blurring vandalism of the in-coast breezes, or why her hands or wrists were not brown, or red, or mottled—under which three descriptions the forty and five other hands in the room were certainly included.

I could not answer my own questions, and it would have been scarcely permissible—even under the sanction of scientific inquiry—to ask the young lady herself; I say "young lady," because to me she ceased to be a girl after the first ten minutes of our acquaintance. Yet it did not take me many days to realize that Molly was not "Clyte's" mental double. Molly Browne was an exceedingly straightforward young person, with positive convictions in re men, women, and things. Those opinions were, doubtless, less wise than otherwise, yet her dogmatism did not exclude the machinery of proof from the young lady's scheme of thinking; while there mingled with her more mature beliefs various old-fashioned illusions, not strictly harmful and certainly picturesque.

An accident which occurred before Molly was seven years old had made her, in early years, incapable of performing such household duties as demanded real hard work. But, as Molly took kindly and intelligently to needle-work, the house-mother found it wise to utilize her daughter's talent in that line, and made Molly cutter and fitter in ordinary to the entire household. And so she came to be the "lady" of the family Browne, and to preserve the only pair of white hands within the length and breadth of Dutch Bill Cañon.

At first I thought my interest in my special pupil was merely of passing moment, having at most a quasi-scientific character, and not at all dangerous to any one's peace of mind. To fall in love with my pupil would be too much like sundry flavorless romances which I had read as a boy in the story columns of the San Francisco dailies, and which I had learned to despise with my first tangible moustache. As I stated the case to the Merrys on the evening of my first day of the Cañon School: "Please don't think I intend to do anything foolish because I say Molly Browne is the prettiest girl I ever saw. One does not marry a girl just because she happens to have a graceful figure and a pretty face as they did—"

"When I married Harriet," interrupted the master of the house, to which his wife replied by a conjugal grimace, and then said to me:

"You are like all city men—you take it for granted that country maidens are like ripe cherries, fairly pining to be stolen. It is not so at all—it is unjust."

"She speaks from the ripe experience of a fruitful past," said Ira, and while Mrs. Merry was boxing the poor man's ears I went to bed.

The Merrys owned a large dairy ranch, and had a big apple orchard covering one of the slopes of Owing's Hill. Mrs. Merry was quite a pretty woman, and the striking physical likeness 'twixt her and Molly Browne increased my liking for each of them. Both husband and wife had an unfortunate mental tendency for practical joking, but even that could not obscure the ingrained goodness of their natures, and surely there could be no pleasanter host and hostess.

My home comforts included the use of a saddle-horse, and Ira turned over to my exclusive use a chestnut mare, called "Sue"; she was a half-breed, crank, and supple, and off like a flash, and suited my disposition to a dot. Molly Browne had a saddle-horse, also; a splendid animal, combining enough Messenger to give him bottom, with sufficient Black Hawk to give him form. As a colt he had been named "Stormy John"; and, while to every one his name was at once a warning and a definition, to his fair mistress he was both an untiring servant and a devoted friend.

Molly monopolized the family inclination and opportunity for equestrianism, and I was the only man in the neighborhood sufficiently idle to ride horseback "for fun." I rode pretty well—as horsemen and horses go—and "Stormy John's" mistress was the best horsewoman I had ever met.

In the Peekerville neighborhood the district school master was a favored animal. To most people therein the teacher—like kings in other places—could do no wrong. I had what the authorities were pleased to term "a good face"—possibly because of its complete and satisfying ugliness—and the good people of my constituency were charitable enough to condone such faults of the head as were scored against me by declaring that I "meant well," having never heard Charles Lamb declare that "well meaning people ought to be hanged."

After Molly and I began to be well acquainted—had found out each other's likings and discovered how many of them were mutual—we became excellent friends. In the Browne household I was made instantly welcome. "Of course" I might ride with Molly. "She needed an escort," and besides I might "teach her botany and things." The "botany" proposition taxed my gravity somewhat; but I was honestly grateful to be permitted to act as my pretty pupil's escort. I promised, I think, a full course of natural history, and by the very next mail sent to my friend Billings for half a dozen skeleton text books.

"Did poor little Molly fall at your feet and beg you to let her worship you?" asked Mrs. Merry, one evening—the evening of our first ride together.

"Don't be unkind," I said; "I didn't mention 'poor little Molly,' did I?"

"N-o, but Ira saw you riding past Cowen's corner, slowly, and so close together. You were looking wise over a leaf or something, and she was looking very pleased and happy. Ira said—"

"I don't care to hear what Ira said," I interrupted angrily, and went to my room to sulk.

At breakfast next morning my hostess said, sweetly: "I wouldn't lose my temper over a little thing like that. You are not the least bit handsome when you are in the sulks. You know—or should know—that your secret is our keeping—"

"But there isn't any secret," I protested.

"Of course we knew all along she couldn't resist you; it was sheer local pride which made us insist the contrary," went on the provoking woman, as if she had not heard me. But I felt it due to myself to explain, and so I said, with great dignity:

"It is profoundly cruel that society will not tolerate the most innocent familiarity without sinister interpretation."

"Well, now you mention it, marriage is a rather sinister interpretation," interposed Ira; at which they both laughed heartily, and there was nothing left for me but to laugh with them.

I have always been an accommodating fellow; and, as the Merrys had settled in advance that I should fall in love with my pretty pupil, I accepted the situation at their valuation; and it did not require many rides in company with Molly Browne to complete that young person's unconscious conquest and reduce my youthful affections to a condition of ravishing wretchedness. In theory I had studied the proposal question in all its complex phases—from the declaration by proxy to the pop direct. I flattered myself, furthermore, that I knew a thing or two, and believed I could make up for lack of exterior grace, beauty, and elegance by calm tenacity of purpose and florid persuasiveness of address.

The Peekerville region is part of the redwood belt which fringes the Pacific from Santa Cruz to Crescent City. It is a region of forest and stream, of narrow valley meadows and broad upland pastures, of rural simplicity and complex manufacturing industry, of dairy ranches and saw mills, of potato fields and tanneries, of noble outlooks and the daintiest of Lilliputian landscapes. From the clearings and forest openings along the summit of Walker's Ridge, between Peekerville and the Russian River, there is unfolded a vast panorama—ocean and river, valley and coast; its southern limit, Point Reyes; its northern verge, the redwood minarets above Timber Cove. The unnumbered gulches, which furrow the eastern slope of Walker's Ridge, are rank with clustering moss and the tropic tangles of brake and fern. The gulch streams, alternate rivulet and torrent, twist and bend and plunge in eccentric curves and angles, so that to the follower each glimpse view is a fresh surprise, a new setting for the same landscape type—a type so lovely that the friend of nature never tires of it, so perfect that only the friend of nature may rightly value it.

Molly and I explored more than one of these glens. It was our custom to ride away early Saturday mornings, and, after riding along the ridge and through the woods to the head of some previously unvisited ravine, we would tie our horses and follow the stream as long as we dared. Then, late in the afternoon, we would ride home laden with ferns and mosses and "such like" woodland "truck," which were to be admired and pressed and treasured, for friends and memory.

Concerning dress, Molly was a very sensible, practical little woman; and, after I had taken her from the saddle, she would throw her riding skirt over one arm and trip away to the sheltered screen of some hollow redwood, and in a few moments emerge clad in the most bewitching of bloomers, with a pretty sailor collar and mammoth buttons. If Mrs. Grundy—who lived variously in the Peekerville vicinage—had anything to say about our rides and rambles and scrambles, her comments never reached us. Our meanderings were as little harmful as those of the wonderful lovers in Foul Play, or the still more impossible people in Mallock's New Paul and Virginia. Nor must it be inferred that any such relations as those of sweetheart and lover were either expressed or understood between us. Molly was the most demure as well as the frankest of friends, while I was as bashfully hesitant, under my forced ease, as is the infant bantam struggling with his first reville. It is true that I often gathered "baby's eyes" and "blue bells"—the early nightshade of the fields and its summer cousin of the woods. (Botanically speaking, the "baby's eye" is not a nightshade, belonging to the family Hydrophyllaceae, genus Nemophila, and species Menziesii.) These lovely flowers I never tired of comparing with my comrade's lovely eyes. But her long lashes always veiled the expression with which she tossed aside my careless compliments, and I never dared make them seem earnest.

So, week by week and Saturday by Saturday, the golden summer slipped through my nerveless fingers, and I had neither discovered Molly's secret nor told her mine. If she loved me then, or knew how much I had learned to care for her, I did not know and dared not ask, yet no man had ever better opportunities. As I said, I flattered myself that I knew a thing or two, and I wrote out a long syllabus of proposal, which my friend, Clarence Hubbard, who was both erudite and experienced in the subject, afterward declared "equal to passages in a certain celebrated digest compiled in the reign of William and Anne." But, somehow, I could never find the courage to match the occasion, though the occasion was almost omnipresent; yet I did come very near it once—my last school Saturday as it happened—and if I had bridged the difficulty then, the deucedly uncomfortable sequel would have been impossible.

We started very early one splendid October morning, and rode along the ridge to the head of Freezeout Gulch, which is really quite a cañon, opening into the Russian River bottom about eight miles north of Peekerville. "Freezeout" is, or was, the wildest, least frequented spot in all the Peekerville region. It contained a splendid body of timber, as yet intact, and was a favorite haunt of grizzlies, panthers, and wild animals generally. Of course, we knew the reputation of the place, but we did not bargain for an actual introduction to an uncaged bruin. We were prepared, however, like the man in Aesop, to see the tracks of both bears and California lions, and we ardently hoped to catch at least a glimpse of a deer.

We did see a deer, more than one, too; as we came around a turn in the cañon a spike buck and two does were feeding within easy pistol range below us, and they trotted off very leisurely after our incautious movement betrayed our whereabouts.

As we neared, on returning, the spot where we had left the horses we heard several loud snorts of fear, a rustling scramble in the bushes, and the next moment through a break in the underbrush we saw my chestnut mare galloping in headlong flight along the narrow trail which led up the hill to the ridge road. Before we could even conjecture what had happened we heard a smothered growl, another frightened snort, and then a stallion's terrible scream of rage and pain.

"It is a bear," I said. "He has struck your horse. Climb a tree quick!" And I ran through the opening in the bushes and on to the shelving glade where we had tied the horses. It was a bear and no mistake; luckily for me, not a grizzly. It was a medium sized cinnamon, and doubtless not very hungry, for he turned tail at once, and I never knew whether the two shots I sent after him were creditable to the efficacy of my pocket "bull-dog" or the reverse.

"Stormy John," who had been picketed with a rawhide lariat, had tangled his tether midst a labyrinth of scrubby oaks, and was helpless to free himself. The bear had struck on the side just behind the girth space, but the hurt was nothing worse than a shallow flesh wound. I succeeded in partially calming him, relieved him from the toils, and ran back for Molly. As usually, she was perfectly cool and collected, walking by my side without a noticeable tremor, as I told her, excitedly, what had happened.

On seeing his mistress "Stormy John" became instantly as quiet as she, and by the time I had saddled him Molly had donned her riding skirt and came to be put up.

"You may ride, too," she said; "'John' will carry double—for me."

"But I must pack—literally pack—my saddle and bridle." "You can tie them over his shoulder, fastening them to the leaping horn."

"But I may catch 'Sue.'"

"No such good luck. 'Sue' is half way home by this time. I think you had better do as I say, sir. I'll gallop home without you if you do not," said Molly sternly.

And so I did as she bade me, and for six tantalizingly delightful miles I rode with an arm about Molly's waist, and Molly's cheek so near my own, that had I been a goblin I might have measured the distance between her dimples with a thread of moonbeam. For long before we had reached Owing's Hill the shadows had come, the sun had gone, and the full moon which rose above the Mark West hills was flooding with molten mystery the fair valley of Santa Rosa, of which we caught brief vista glimpses through the crowded trees. The owls were chanting their kobold wisdom from the pines, the spectral bats flew blindly round us, the glow-worm sparked in the road-side tufts, and the rifted moonlight silvered the leaves in its downward track and deepened the shadows on either side, until the forest became veritable fairy land, and not to love was a sin.

The hour, the scene, the situation, all were perfect, but I was a coward, and dared not break the spell.

At Cowen's Corner, midway 'twixt my home and Brownes', we met Ira Merry on his way to tell Molly's father that the teacher's horse had come home riderless, and to ask in which direction we had gone. All those miles I had been "getting ready" to say something, but when we met Ira it was, of course, too late. I let him go home with Molly, and, throwing my saddle and bridle over my shoulder, trudged up the hill to supper and a scolding.

On the following Friday I closed the Cañon School, and the next morning started for San Francisco with my great syllabus undelivered, and my youthful affections in a state of chaos.

I had been in Frisco about ten days; I had written really a long letter, which was as yet unanswered, and was sitting in a friend's office, to which I had requested my half dozen correspondents to direct, when the postman entered and tossed me a letter addressed J. K. Hazel, and postmarked Peekerville. I recognized the penmanship with a thrill—it was Molly Browne's.

I held the letter in my hand for fully three minutes, to see how much torture I could bear, and then snipped open the envelope with the office shears. There was a plump, elastic feeling about it, which meant thin paper and a good many sheets. I opened the closely-written pages eagerly, and then turned impatiently to the signature. It was from Mrs. Ira Merry.

It was a nice, long, chatty letter; full to overflowing with harmless gossip and sentimental nonsense. In almost any other mood I should have enjoyed it thoroughly; but just then it was, in effect, a bitter disappointment, and I read it to the end with the sulkiest of faces.

Molly had directed the envelope. She had stopped at the Merrys a moment, on her way to Santa Rosa, and wrote the superscription to oblige Mrs. Merry. She "would write from Santa Rosa, probably." I learned further that at the town in question there was to be a "grand fancy dress ball on the thirteenth." Molly would be there, and the Merrys also; so I "must be sure to go." I could meet Ira and his wife at the hotel, and she would tell me what Molly was to wear. "Go!" Of course I would go. I would have gone to Patagonia or Milpitas on such an errand.

I found Mrs. Merry waiting to receive me in the hotel parlor; well, and gracious, and glad to see me. "Where was Ira?" "Oh! he had gone down town on business; I would see him at the ball supper." "Where was Molly?" "Oh! I should meet her at the ball; she would be dressed so and so." "Would not they be on the floor?" "Oh, no! Ira would not think of such a thing; old married people like they!" So after a few more questions, and a few more answering "ohs," I took my leave to prepare for the ball.

As I entered the ball-room almost the first person I met was—Molly. My friend had described her dress so perfectly that there could not possibly be any mistake—a shepherdess in a corn-colored brocade and the traditional shepherdess hat, corn-colored long silk gloves, black slippers, and black mask.

I had feared this meeting with the craven hesitancy of a man not quite sure of his premises, or of himself. Yet as Molly advanced to meet me, and returned the pressure of my hand, my formless fears slipped away as if they had never been, and I whispered eagerly, proudly:

"Molly, it has been ten years—ten days since I have seen you; are you well?"

"Yes," came the clear, unshaken answer. The tones were familiar, yet somehow they did not seem quite Molly's. But I knew the hand I held and the figure before me could belong to no one else, even though glove and mask prevented perfect recognition.

"Yes, I am well; and you?"

"Molly," I whispered, passionately, all my old timidity forgotten, "Molly, I am no longer your teacher, but your lover. I have been your lover for months—it seems to me ages. It has been so ever since we rode together that first June afternoon. And I am a hungry, selfish, exacting lover. I want you now; I want you altogether; I want you always. Let me tear away that cruel, dividing mask, that I may look into your eyes, and seal your lips in solemn promise."

I noticed that she shrank perceptibly. Perhaps my ardent fluency frightened her; perhaps I hurt her hand.

"Oh, no, no!" she expostulated. "You forget—we are not alone—you are not yourself. Can you not wait a little while—till to-morrow?"

At her word the cold fit fell on me, chillingly; and I replied sorrowfully: "Till to-morrow? To-morrow will never come. Do you not see how much this answer means to me? I want it now."

"Then wait, please, until supper. Mr. Hazel—Jaakey;" and she was gone. I turned instantly, but she had melted into the eddying throng, and for the moment I had lost her.

The dancers brushed against me, goodnaturedly, spitefully, angrily. I moved apart unheeding. Had not I held Molly's hand in mine? Had not she called me "Jaakey?"

She had promised me the supper quadrille. I did not waltz, and the other dances on her card were taken before I came. I thought the hour would never come. I had been unable to get even a word with Molly between the dances, and we went through the hum-drum movement of our dance almost in silence. Then came the march, and we crowded down the narrow staircase to the supper-room where we were all to unmask.

I stood by Molly's side, leaning on her chair, with eager, expectant gaze; I wanted to catch the first upward glance from her flower-like eyes. She raised her mask. The radiant eyes which met my own were full of mocking laughter. They were fair to see; but they were not Molly's eyes.

"Molly"—I began to say as she put up her hand to raise her mask.

"Not Molly—Harriet, at your service. Didn't I do it well?"

If I could have killed her with a look, a certain worthy Peekerville dairy-rancher would have been that night a widower. The corn-colored shepherdess was Mrs. Ira Merry.

Abruptly I turned away, and left the supper-room without a word. Outside the door I met Ira.

"Where is Molly?" I asked, with wrathful directness.

"Molly?—Molly Browne? Ah! she has gone to Healdsburg, I believe. She was married last night; married to a cousin of the Peckers. Sudden engagement, wasn't it? Good match, though. Young fellow just out from New Jersey. Got a heap of tin, they say. Going to buy a big ranch near Cloverdale, I've heard. Have you seen my wife?"

And that is why the Merrys and I "are out."

Rules of Conduct.

Never exaggerate; at least, don't exaggerate so excessively as to cause undue remark.

Never laugh at the misfortunes of others, save in the isolated instance of a man struggling between heaven and earth, with only the blue dome of the sky above him, and nothing to speak of under him, except a banana peel.

Never send a present, hoping for one in return. Nine times out of ten you will slip up on your expectations. Freeze to the present you buy. You are dead sure of that.

Never question your neighbors' servants or children about family matters. They are liable to fib to you. The best way is to "snook" around and find out for yourself.

Always offer the easiest seat in the room to a lady or an invalid. A hard bottom, straight-back chair is usually considered about the easiest thing there is made to sit on. A rocking-chair is apt to produce sea-sickness.

Never pass between two passengers who are talking together, without offering an apology. One of them may lift you a kick that will raise you through the pier glass.

Never put a fire or warm dry sheets in the spare room. It's too awfully inviting and these are hard times.

Never insult an acquaintance by harsh words when applied to for a favor. It is just as easy and ever so much pleasanter to lie to him and tell him you haven't got it. He may know you are a liar, but he can't deny that you are a gentleman.

Never fail to answer an invitation, either personally or by letter. If it is an invitation to dinner, by all means answer it personally. If it is an invitation to a wedding or donation party, a letter will do just as well and is about ten times as cheap.

Never refuse to receive an apology. You won't be offered one more than once in twenty-five years, and you can keep them as rarities.

Never thrust your foot out across the aisle in a street car. Somebody may spit on it.

OUR OWN POETS.

A Love Song.

Oh, her lips are lips whereon laughter
Bubbles out like the laugh of a stream;
Her eyes are as stars in still water,
And as full of sweet thoughts as a dream;
Her throat, it is whiter than sea-foam,
And her breast's like the surge of the sea;
Her heart is more true than the lodestone,
And her heart she has given to me!

SIGNA.

My Friend.

All alone again, in the twilight,
And where is the friend of years?
The friend of my youth and school days—
The friend in my hopes and fears?

The friend whom I trusted the greatest,
The one whom I loved the best?
So sure that our faith was eternal
My heart was always at rest.

Another has taken her from me
To be his beautiful bride—
Taken her, my friend and my blessing,
And drifted out with the tide.

I give up all claim to the future;
Its brightness I would not mar
With vainest regrets or repinings,
Or the gloom of tears afar.

So I take the past and its memories,
And lay them sadly away,
With a book, a poem, a picture,
And a faded flower—to-day.

And all that I ask of my darling,
As she sails o'er life's blue sea,
Is to give me a thought in the twilight
That will drift far back to me.

Spring.

'Tis tuneful Spring,
And Nature fair has donned her gorgeous garb
And revels in a royal rhyme.
The linnets sing,

For sunny skies have slain with golden barb
The Winter chill, that has no chime
Nor merry ring.

The songsters pour
Their warbled mirth in grateful carols long;
The very air with music thrills
From shore to shore,
And e'en our poets bud and bloom in song,
And bathe their thirsty rhyming quills
In liquid lore.

The giant hills,
Whose summits slumber in the misty blue,
Seem jubilant, and all in tune
With rippling rills
And limpid mountain brooks that murmur through
The wooded cañon, and commune
In tuneful trills

With yonder vale,
From which, o'erlooked by this gray, towering peak,
A rich, voluptuous fragrance rare
From blossoms frail
Floats upward, and beguiles my soul to seek
The Eden haunt where flowers fair
Bedeck the dale.

In rich array
Of velvet green are all the valleys clad,
Bespangled with a triple hue—
With daisies stray,
And beds of buttercups, and violets glad—
The white, the golden, and the blue
In contrast gay.

So, joyous, queenly Spring
Reigns mirthful on her broad and gilded emerald throne;
And, drunk with due, in song her courtiers vie
With sweet harmonious ring;
For barrenness and wailing Winter with its moan
Are thralls to verdure and to sunny sky.
'Tis merry, tuneful Spring.

Day-Doom.

Low sinks the flaming orb of day, and wide
The sunset gates on golden hinges swing,
As Daylight through them glides on folded wing,
With Eve and dusky Twilight at her side.

Calm Night lets gently down the bars of gold
That stretch far o'er the purple mountain height,
And soft the stars flock out from azure fold
To wander o'er the radiant fields of light.

Queen Nature sleeps and smiles amid her dream
As steals on starlit air Love's serenade,
While soft the moon bright glides the silent stream,
And floods with silver light the dreamy glade.

As sleeps the world, the soul takes heavenly wing,
And with the silent stars goes wandering.

PETALUMA, April, 1879.

CLARENCE U. THOMAS.

April.

The tearful sky wept all day long
In token of the April weather.
And something in my heart o'erflowed—
The clouds and I were sad together.

But when the Jay was near its close
The sun set all the earth a-shining,
And in my heart the heavy cloud
Unfolded all its silver lining.

The rain had brightened all its slopes
Where tender blades of grass were springing,
And from each jewel-spangled bough
The happy troops of birds were singing;

And arching o'er the shining earth
The radiant bow unveiled its glory,
Repeating to the world below
The promise and the wondrous story.

The day that wept in rain and tears
Went smiling through the gates of even,
And on the bridge that spanned the sky
My soul approached the gates of heaven—
Went up in songs of happy praise
For all the beauty and the sweetness
That crowned the changeful April day
And filled my soul with such completeness.

RICHMOND, April, 1879.

MRS. D. M. JORDAN.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

Beautiful sentimental lyric, which will really bear thinking over:

"Speak kindly to my father,
Perhaps he may be yours!"

It was asked why X., a notorious materialist, never got drunk.

"Because," replied a friend, "he knows that there is a God for drunken men to take care of them."

Frederick William IV. of Prussia, once upon a time, stopped at a little railroad station where a deputation headed by the Mayor of the adjacent village awaited him with an address.

Just as the Mayor braced himself up to deliver his oration a neighboring ass did sing both loud and clear.

A frightful silence ensued, but the King did not long delay in breaking it with the paternal and graceful remark:

"One at a time, gentlemen; one at a time."

"Your conduct, sir, has been despicably inhuman. When you heard that X., your most formidable competitor for the appointment, had died suddenly, leaving a wife and nineteen small children, you seemed to say, 'So much the better.'"

"I never said anything of the sort."

"Perhaps you never said it, but you thought it all the same."

"I thought it?"

"Oh, yes, you thought it. I would have thought it had I been in your place, and I find your conduct despicably inhuman—yes, sir, despicably inhuman."

A Radical presents himself to have registered the birth of his son. The clerk notes the names, etc., and hands the proud father the book and pen, saying: "Sign your name here."

"I don't write."

"Then make your mark—put a cross here."

"Sorr, my political convictions preclude me from making any such concession to a dishonoring superstition."

It was in the golden prime of Nestor Roqueplan's administration of the opera when a danseuse who was not qualified to cast a shadow was introduced to him.

"Well, what do you think of her, eh?" said a friend when the artiste had departed.

"What do I think of her? I tell you if I saw her and six others in a dream, and I was the Government, I'd whoop all the spare corn in the country up into the elevators and granaries p. d. q., that's all."

The jury brings in a verdict of "guilty, with extenuating circumstances," against a man who has cut his twin sister into little bits, and the judge promptly sends him up for life.

"Ah, my poor sister," says the prisoner, wiping away a tear, "I had not hoped to be able to mourn thy loss so long."

Once upon a time Lamartine happened to call upon the painter, Couture, who has just died. As he was leaving the room Couture asked him for an autograph.

"With pleasure," replied the poet, and taking his album quickly wrote: "Received from Thomas Couture, one small picture—Alphonse de Lamartine."

Within the month the artist paid his debt, according to the author of the story, which has been told in various forms of every great man since the early half of the sixteenth century.

Madame X.'s husband has made his fortune in the jewelry business, and the other day when she commits a slip of the tongue she says, blandly: "Excuse me; that was a lapsus lazuli."

A medicine who adores to take a hand was feeling the other day the pulse of one of his sick:

"Ace, deuce, tray, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, Jack, Queen, King," he counts, tranquilly.

The sick regards him very astonished.

"Do not make attention, I have but little time of playing, and that makes me illusion."

A lawyer charged with the defense of a ruffian of unprepossessing appearance depicts his client as the image and embodiment of all the peaceful virtues, when lo! the prisoner, seated just beside him, begins to stretch himself uneasily and gives signs of impatience.

"Yes, gentlemen of the jury, as gentle as a lamb, and as incapable of inspiring terror as—hi, there, policeman, hold him tight!"

The young Ferdinand, whose chambers are furnished in the costliest manner and the best of taste, goes to one of his friends and says in a tragic manner:

"It's all over. She has refused me. I can not bear to live and know she is another's. Look under the heading 'Suicides' in the papers some of these days. I shall leave you all my things to remember me by. Thinking upon her drives me to death."

A couple of weeks later his friend (who has had the papers sent up to him in bed every morning) meets him smoking a contemplative cigar.

"Oh, I say," says the prospective legatee, timidly, "don't you ever think of her, you know?"

Having repeatedly fallen a victim to pickpockets, a frequent traveler in the omnibuses determines to go fishing for them, and placing in his pocketbook nothing but a piece of paper inscribed, "That's where you fooled yourself!" he goes forth on a much-frequented line.

After a twenty-minutes' ride, disgusted at the absence of any sport, he leaves the vehicle, and mechanically opens his pocketbook to see a scrap of blue paper in it.

His note was on white paper! (Chord.) Upon note he reads: "Same to you!"

PRATTLE.

Mr. Mark Gray, who recently attempted to assassinate Mr. Edwin Booth, explains that in some respects Mr. Lawrence Barrett is a better actor. Society can not afford to let such a critical opinion as this have free utterance; it must inflict some signal mark of disapproval. Still, if the opinion is honestly entertained, that circumstance should go far in mitigation. If there were worse actors than Mr. Barrett there would be worse crimes than shooting them.

A German editor has been arrested on a charge of having planned to assassinate the Queen of England and the King of Italy, but his friends protest that he is not the kind of man to harbor such a murderous intent. I am reminded by this of the reply made by Napoleon to one of his ministers who ventured to intercede for a man arrested on suspicion of plotting against the Emperor's life. "Sire," said the Minister, "I know the man; he is incapable of entertaining so base a design." "Then if we make him incapable, also, of its execution there is no hardship."

"A man who has nothing to do is the devil's own yoke-fellow."—The Rev. Mr. Hemphill.

Yoked to the devil, lo! the idler yearns
Along the lengthening furrow.
God holds the plow, though, and remorseless turns
Jack Hemphill out of his burrow.

An irascible correspondent complains that as election day approaches the menaces of the Chronicle grow more and more insufferable, and impatiently suggests a "legal remedy." "Legal remedies" for insanity are of doubtful efficiency, but if some of the more frantic utterances of Mr. de Young's views were brought to the attention of one of our judges he would probably grant a writ of Quid donas nobis? and the offender would be compelled to show that it is at least not faulty.

On Wednesday of last week all the daily newspapers of this city thoughtfully reminded their readers that it was the anniversary of the birth of Shakspeare, whom all of them, I believe, called the immortal bard, and most of them the "Swan of Avon" in addition. How Shakspeare, more than any other poet is a "bard," or more than any other equally famous man is "immortal," it would puzzle the writers who habitually call him so to explain; but why so call him is a less difficult question: each does so because the others do.

Canaries all are christened "Dick,"
And parrots all are "Polly;"
Invention is a ticklish trick,
But all can copy folly.

Not Shakspeare's fame his name can guard:
He's called (confound their ravin'!)
By prosing clowns, "Immortal Bard,"
By geese, "the Swan of Avon."

Thus dullards o'er the sands of time
Move like the slugs, their brothers,
Each sticking to his leader's slime,
And slinging for the others.

"The exciting contest over the new Constitution now raging in this State has deprived several gentlemen from attending the opera at Baldwin's."—Social Parasite of the Call. Thank heaven, it has not "deprived" you from writing your customary English.

The Rev. Dr. Stebbins has deemed it necessary to explain why he is opposed to the new Constitution. This is very much as if a boot with a sparkling polish were to explain its aversion to mud, or the human eye its hostility to soap-suds.

When Liberverm resigned the chair
Of This of That to College, where
For two decades he'd plied his brain
With more than it could well contain,
In order to relieve the stress
He took to writing for the press.
Then Ponderonimus said: "I'll help
This mine of talent to develop!"
And straightway bought with coin and credit
The Thundergust for him to edit.

The great man seized his pen and ink
And wrote so hard he couldn't think;
Ideas grew beneath his fist
And flew like falcons from his wrist.
His pen shot sparks all kinds of ways
Till all the rivers were ablaze,
And where the coruscations fell
Men shouted, "Ouch!" and "This is h—!"

Eftsoons with corrugated brow,
Wet towels bound about his pow,
Locked legs, and failing appetite,
He thought so hard he couldn't write.
His soaring fancies, chickenwise,
Came home to roost and wouldn't rise.
With dimmer light and milder heat
His goose quill staggered o'er the sheet,
Then dragged, then stopped; the finish came—
He couldn't even write his name.
The Thundergust in three short weeks
Had risen, roared, and split its cheeks.
Poor Ponderonimus said: "I'm bust—
I raised the storm that laid my dust!"

When, Moneybagger, you have aught
Invested in a vein of thought,
Be sure you've purchased not, instead,
That salted claim, a bookworm's head.

The Bulgarians having elected a Prince, that Grant of ours has lost another chance to be an effete monarch and a tottering despot. But if he can not be Prince of the Bulgarians he can at least remain Prince of the Vulgarians; and that ought to satisfy him in a country where most of the great statesmen aspire to the same distinction. I allude to Madagascar.

I take up my Bulletin and find a half-column of dispatches giving opinions of some fifteen or twenty of the leading journals of the country on the President's veto of the appropriation bill. But why should I read them? Familiar already with all the arguments that can be adduced on either side, I know, furthermore, that every Democratic paper condemns the veto and every Republican approves. Yet it is not condemnation and approval that make men Democrats and Republicans respectively; they were so before. Surely, then, this division of opinion is a remarkable coincidence. Why do the Democrats think alike?—why do the Republicans? Of what value, of what weight, is a judgment of which one can accurately forecast the character? My fellow human beings with party affiliations, I believe in neither your honesty nor your sense. I fatigue of your "views" and fall ill of their utterance. Grant me the luxury of respecting you, or concede the necessity of despising. And take it out upon the editor.

There are not ten in a thousand of those who now applaud the President's action who would not censure it if he were a Democrat, nor a greater proportion of those now backing Congress who would not execrate its course if it were Republican. And you are "but a little lower than the angels," eh?—you politicians; you are made "in the image of your Maker!" You are not as the beasts that perish; you have immortal souls that figure round after death! It is thin, gentlemen; it is thin exceedingly. Have the goodness to relate it to the marines.

The editor of the San Joaquin Valley Argus complains that although he offered three dollars and a half and four dollars a day, the Merced carpenters would not work for him. If the editorial head is out of repair let him send it to a Portuguese wood-chopper.

O'er the shapely block of an editor's head
Stood a Portuguese man with his legs aspread;
And his ax it rang
As he cheerfully sang:
"Chippity, 'choppity, hew to the line—Swish! Swash!"
"Temples of pine,
Redwood ears, and sequoia nose—
Naught to oppose
The whacks o' my ax as I hew to the line.
For the chopper is strong and the wood is weak!"—
Swish! Swash!
"I'll be done, I think,
In a moment"—CLINK!
"O Father of Adam, and Abram, and Mose,
I've broken my ax on the fellow's cheek!"

Judge Morrison has granted an injunction restraining the Board of Education from making any change in the textbooks of the public schools until they can prove their legal right so to do. This is fatal to the scheme; if the members of the Board do not know they have no right to make the proposed change it is because they have not sufficient learning to read the law. However, the School Directors are pretty certain to do more for education than education has ever done for them.

At a meeting of the members of the Produce Exchange, the other day, the chairman refused to entertain a motion to amend a resolution, on the ground that the members did not favor such an amendment! The mover vainly explained that the purpose of the motion was to ascertain whether they favored it or not; the chairman hardened his heart and set his face, and the unfortunate amender was himself amended. It is rather a pity that this unusual ruling could not have been personally enjoyed by that austere parliamentary authority whom a not very clear-headed contemporary recently preferred to call Emanuel Cushing.

Oh, certainly not; tax-payers have no aversion to embezzlement and suicide by a public officer, but they venture to protest against the order in which these two official acts are commonly performed.

You must wake and call me early, call me early, Denis dear:
To-morrow'll be the unhappiest time of all the sad, blue year—
Of all the sad, blue year, Denis, the maddest Eighth of May;
For you're to be cleaned out to-day, Denis, you're to be cleaned out to-day.

A Washington correspondent of the New York Tribune is opposed to the bill giving Cabinet officers seats in Congress, for the reason that it was tried in the Confederate Congress, but "familiarity bred a species of contempt on both sides." In the parliaments of Europe it has not been observed that the plan produces any such deplorable effect, for if the Ministers and Members do not respect one another they at least respect themselves. "Familiarity breeds contempt" of contemptible persons only. Familiarity with gentlemen begets admiration; familiarity between them is impossible.

"I know the new Constitution will be ratified by the people of this State."—Denis Kearney.

"Behold! you know not anything;
You can but trust that good shall fall
At last—fall down for good and all,
And every stoker have his fling."
—Altered Tennyson.

"Men of genius," says a local writer who enjoys the advantage of being a fool, "have generally a distinguishing absence of common sense." Genius, you cow, is not found apart from the highest and ripest development of reason, and the dullards of all ages clamor their envious negative in vain. The man of genius thinks more clearly without knowledge than another with it; his premises are truer, his conclusions more legitimately follow. It is the prerogative of genius to excel in what it undertakes; it is master of methods and compeller of success; and when Lord Brougham taught the brewer how to brew he was upon his own ground, for genius is lord of every manor. I would rather be guided by the conjectures of genius than by the demonstrations of experience. Knowledge is good, and experience is good, but genius is wisdom and understanding, the purposes of knowledge and experience. It knows what it has not learned, and apprehends before it has examined. I never knew a man of genius who had not better, harder, and more practical common sense than any man I ever knew without it.

But they drink, say the dunces; and Madam Holyhorror avers that they are immoral. Well, as a rule they are pretty conspicuously temperate in these respects, considering their temptations and opportunities. The trouble with these estimable censors is that they have mistaken drunkenness and lechery for genius; I have known people who fell into the same error with regard to dirt and dishonesty. But Mr. Fathead protests that a man of genius can not be trusted; he is brilliant but erratic—a trifle cracked, as it were—and must be watched, sir, watched, or he'll go too far; and, bless Mr. Fathead's soul! doesn't he know? hasn't he employed 'em in his business? (Mr. Fathead is the proprietor of the Cow County Forum, and keeps a family grocery in addition; the geniuses are employed in the latter.) Now, it is of the nature of the tribe of Fatheads, of Philistia, to be in mortal terror lest genius should do them the full service of its abilities. Fathead is an Aladdin who having commanded the Djinn to build a palace revises the design in order that the façade shall conform to those of the other houses in that street.

History is full of examples. There was never a man of genius whom the Fatheads of his time did not antagonize. No immortal work that they did not condemn. Why, didn't Sam Williams, and Parson Bartlett, and Noah Brooks unanimously urge Harte to suppress "The Luck of Roaring Camp?" Did they not agree with the lady proof-reader that it was immoral—nay, nasty—and profane, not to say blasphemous? It was only by threatening to resign the editorship that Harte got it into the magazine which it made famous. And in their reviews of the number in which it appeared, the fatheads gave the title of the story and said: "a-hem!" Well, if Bret Harte were honest and industrious—unfortunately he is neither—I should try to get him to superintend a boot and shoe factory if I had one, though I should prefer the author of In Memoriam.

I am quite serious, for Dr. Johnson's definition of genius—"great general abilities directed into a particular channel" (quoting from memory I am no doubt verbally inaccurate)—remains the best that is of record. I think it was Goethe who modestly said something about its consisting in an infinite capacity for taking pains, and in its highest manifestations that capacity is included—is, at least, necessary to its perfect result. But we need not trouble ourselves with definitions of what is imperfectly definable; if Mr. Hector Stuart, Mrs. Theresa Corlett, and others who possess, will not describe, in order that the rest of us may get some at the same shop, I, for my part, can get on without. And here, by way of showing a becoming indifference, I end the disquisition with curses for the lackwit lown who provoked me to begin it.

A correspondent of a local newspaper would like to know who wrote a poem called "A Psalm of Life." It was written by a pious person named Longfellow. It is not very good, but it enabled him to rebuke the Frenchman who complained that England had a hundred religions and only one gravity. You remember the lines—

"Life is real, life is earnest,
And the grave's not its goal."

I really cannot reply to any more such questions unless they are addressed to me instead of Mr. Pickering.

Now that Mr. Treen, the Clerk of the City Criminal Court, has absconded with a large sum of money the newspapers gravely point out that he was a zealous supporter of the new Constitution. It's the old, old thing—"I told you so!"

And now it transpires that Bill Mestayer's real name is Houpt—with a terrible possibility that it is pronounced Whooped!

Thus all our fairy phantoms pass,
And myths are overthrown;
Age finds us cherishing, alas!
No lies except our own.

The army of archers is every day increased by the addition of new recruits. As an example of how rapidly the taste for this delightful sport is extending on this coast, I will mention that a certain bow dealer sold one day last week no less than ten dozen of the best target arrows, in addition to a good quantity of bows. Messrs. T. Carneal and J. Cook are among the recent converts to archery, and the ladies, now that the dry weather has fairly set in, are equipping themselves in cohorts for the forthcoming contest. There was a friendly practice match at the Merry Foresters' range at Adams' Point, on Saturday, between that club and the Bow Club, but owing to the late hour at which the shooting commenced it could not be completed before dark. Frank Havens, Dan O'Connell, Albert Havens, J. Peatfield, and Mr. MacFarlane made fair scores at the sixty-yard targets, but this long range is still a little too trying for the majority of the archers who have confined their shooting nearly altogether to the thirty and forty-yard range. The Rev. Mr. Welles, pastor of Grace Church, has joined the Pacific Archery Club, and will shoot with their team at the tournament. He is a steady shot, good at all ranges, and can be relied on for an even average. The coming week will be a brisk one with archers, and you may rely upon a full record of events in your next number.

QUIVER.

Last Tuesday evening the First Annual Artists' Ball was given at the rooms of the Art Association on Pine Street. It was an elegant reception. The rooms were well suited to such an entertainment and were handsomely decorated. The music was excellent, the supper sumptuous, the guests select and well dressed and enthusiastic over the complete arrangements. The affair, considering the times and the circumstances, was a success; but for this success the artists collectively are entitled to very little credit. If it had not been for a few of the untiring patrons of the association, Mr. Martin the secretary, and the professional decorator, there would have been a miserable fiasco. Mr. Garabaldi took upon himself the designing and superintendence, and then, at the last moment, threw the empty rooms back on the bands of the Executive Committee. The cards of invitation were a disgraceful bungle, and what little else the artists attempted was done in a bloodless, careless, dilatory way. The ball, while a success, was not what it might have been had the artists in whose honor it was given exerted themselves in its behalf. There is better accomplishment in our Art Association than was evidenced on last Tuesday evening, and next season the fact may be made apparent if there is a blending of purposes and a burying of small and disgraceful jealousies. Our artists have the genius and the talent to do a very handsome and creditable thing, and if they can only find the disposition to work together, the next annual artists' ball will be a marvel as compared to this first attempt.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

The operatic menu of the week has consisted mainly of rechauffé, with the Trovatore, for the third time in a subscription season of twenty nights, Lucia (to rather a thin house), and Un Ballo. Of the latter I saw two acts at the first representation, a week ago last night. I am very fond of this opera, which, although strongly flavored with Meyerbeerisms, is one of Verdi's most mature and beautiful works—but I could not sit it out. The performance was one of the worst I ever heard; Lazarini—who sang his first Romanza very nicely—began to sharp after the first scene, and Pantaleoni to flat, and as they are frequently on the stage together the effect was something not entirely unlike a jumping toothache. The chorus was almost as bad as in Faust, the orchestra infinitely worse, Madame Roze too light for the part, and Miss Lancaster a mere make-shift. The whole thing was very bad. Miss Cary was a good "Ulrica," but could not carry the opera; Messrs. Conly and Lafontaine, as "Sam" and "Tom," were also in good form. But on the whole I think it was the worst performance of Un Ballo we have ever had here, and that means pretty bad indeed.

To-morrow evening is set apart for the début of Miss Amy Sherwin, in La Traviata, and Monday brings Aida at the Grand Opera House, where it is to be hoped a few odd bits of decent scenery will be forthcoming. At Baldwin's it has been positively disgraceful. The sets have not only been the oldest and shabbiest in the theatre, but were frequently entirely wrong; as, for instance, in Il Trovatore, the cloister scene in the third act was given in the woods; in Martha, the second act plays before an inn, to represent which there was a kitchen table with a few tin cups on it, etc., etc. Un Ballo had the meanest scenery of all, but I supposed this to be intended as in harmony with the general tone of the performance, and recognized the fitness of it.

Mr. Frederic Boscovitz, who has lately arrived here with the intention of giving a series of piano-forte recitals and, possibly, remaining as a teacher, is a pianist of such very decided and widely-recognized merits that his playing can not fail to awaken the greatest interest amongst our dilettanti. Mr. Boscovitz, who was a favorite pupil of Liszt in the old days when Weimar was the Mecca of all aspiring young pianists, and who worthily represents the school of the great master, is at once a refined musician and an eminent virtuoso, who has scored successes in London, Paris, Vienna, and the other art centres, and whose playing, while preserving the purity and noblesse of a genuine musical nature, is marked by the characteristics of a strongly individualized artistic style. Mr. Boscovitz intends shortly to make his appearance in public, when I trust that he will receive such encouragement as will induce him to make this city his home, since both as teacher and player he will be an acquisition.

I have been considerably amused over some of the opera notices that have found their way into the daily papers; above all in watching the graceful swinging round the circle of some of those which, being at first disposed to find fault with the shabby nature of the performances, bear unmistakable traces of having been "interviewed" by the potent manager, and are now diligently occupied in glossing over those defects that are becoming patent to even the dear, long-suffering public. (Of course, I do not desire to be understood as referring in the least to our profound friend of the Post, the musical toady par excellence, who is regularly put to the blush—or might be if it were in his line—by the ingenious candor of his co-laborer of the dramatic column. Let me do him the credit to state right here that I believe him to be entirely honest in his ignorance, bribeable only by the delight he has in the personal acquaintance with so great a personage as the mighty Max, and to be purchased only by the candy of an introduction to one of the prime donne.) The most facetious things of this nature have been the attempts at criticism of that Teutonic heavy weight, the California Demokrat, a paper that, while pretending to represent the more cultivated and intelligent portion of our German community, is in reality only to be regarded as the organ of the Philister on one hand and the representative of the stupidity of its editor on the other, and which, talking of these matters with the profound air of the genuine Kunst-Kenner and all the turgidity and philosophical affectation of a fourth-rate German pedant, makes a daily display of ignorance that would in vain be sought for elsewhere—unless perhaps in the musical column of the aforesaid Post. Not to mention such trifles as crediting Mr. Conly occasionally with his singing of parts that he did not really sing at all, attempting to prove that the chorus material at Baldwin's is excellent by citing the late Athalie performance of the Handel and Haydn Society, and throwing the blame for the poor performance upon the shoulders of Mr. de Novellis—whose preparation and conducting of Lucia proved conclusively to every musician who heard them that he is by long odds the better of the two conductors of the company—and other trifles of a like nature, this critical Dogberry in a single late article finds the ensemble excellent and a good ensemble out of the question, the chorus good and the chorus bad; speaks firstly of the enjoyable nature of the performance and then copies seriatim my last week's strictures upon it, including what was said about cuts, scenery, prompter, Litta, etc., etc. If the Demokrat were making its first display of this kind the matter would be less noticeable. But throughout the winter concert season there has been scarcely a criticism that was not marked by the same characteristics of ignorance and utter incapacity. It has mixed names of compositions and composers, until one was prepared for a Rhapsodie Hongroise by Bach and a Valse de Salon by Beethoven; it has spoken of original compositions as arrangements and vice versa; it has alternately praised bad performance and censured the most excellent—generally choosing the weakest points for its laudations—and has satisfactorily proven beyond question that whatever it may represent it is not in any sense to be accepted as a criterion of German thought or German criticism.

A piano-forte soirée, given on Thursday evening by Mr. Alvis Le Jeal, assisted by some of his pupils and some of the late Mr. Trenkle, was conducted with closed doors as far as members of the profession were concerned. For appreciative notice, etc., see report in this evening's Post. S. E.

THE TYPICAL OAKLANDER.

Conclusion of Mr. Starch's Narrative.—"As far as my judgment of the needs of that scientific man goes, I think I can give him the specimen he wants. The type of Oaklander who shall illustrate in his own person the vices and virtues, the shortcomings and accomplishments, the graces and stupidities of this refined city, is found in this hotel, from the hours of five to eight in the evening. The bar and billiard room are likely to be most fertile at those periods in this production. And as the character of this type is formed, trained, developed, and led to maturity by the influence of the ulster, I propose to embody the result of my observations as a hotel clerk in this paper for my scientific acquaintance. As an apology for putting those observations into verse, let me remark that long before I dreamed of attaining my present exalted position I was a frequent contributor to the poets' corner of a Sunday-school journal:

"When Adam and Eve in the garden first knew
Their negligé style there no longer would do,
They found in the fig-leaf a make-shift, which then Contented them hugely! O father of men,
Can you look from your high place, in Abraham's breast,
And behold your sons stand in the Ulster contest—
That garment which, circling round man or round woman,
Conceals in its folds every trace that is human,
And the form divine of the maiden, the grace
Of bust, hip, and shoulder its wrinkles deface,
And the little active frame of the youth it can smother,
Till a hunch-back looms up as a man and a brother?
In the old days when intrigues of all natures were rife,
And men murdered the husband to marry the wife,
(Which they do nowadays in a different style,
With more of audacity, much less of guile),
A coat impregnated with poison was given
As a present to hurry the husband to heaven.
The ulster, I often times think, was designed
To play deadly tricks with the poor wearer's mind,
For here in this house the young man who clings fast
To his ulster, and under its dread power cast,
Sees every day—strange as the matter appears—
His forehead growing smaller, and longer his ears."

Those rhymes, which have cost me a great deal of trouble, and which were revised and corrected for me by a friend who is in that sort of business, express my opinions on the ulster and its effect in developing that type of young man which I suppose my learned friend is in search of. I do not mean anything personal in my allusion to the ears, and I should be very sorry if any guest in this house (particularly if he is a member of the jeunesse dorée, and is punctual in his weekly payments) should take umbrage at those remarks.

"STARCH."

I confess that I was not a little puzzled to discover the motive of my scientific friend in handing me these manuscripts for perusal. Neither one had arrived at a definite conclusion of the meaning of his term, the "typical Oaklander," nor could I understand why, in a city where such a variety of types exists, he should endeavor to portray one character as an embodiment of the prominent traits of all.

I met him a few days after my examination of the MSS. He had confided to my care, and, assuring him that I had not only taken the liberty to make them public, but had also much confused myself in speculations as to his design, demanded, in return for my interest in the affair, the "true inwardness" of his investigation.

"My dear sir," he replied, "if you read the inclosed manuscript, it will satisfy you, I think, in every particular." It was entitled, "Deductions from my own Observations and Those of Competent Persons on the Type of Humanity which Prevails in Oakland."

"The typical Oaklander, no matter how his circumstances may be, his political belief, or his social characteristics, never travels without a basket."

"This basket, in his journeying to and from the metropolis, serves a double purpose."

"In the morning it contains his lunch, in the afternoon his purchases at the San Francisco markets."

"He is a firm believer in the future of Oakland as a great commercial centre, and in the San Antonio Creek as one of the grandest navigable estuaries in the world."

"His graveyard—Mountain View Cemetery—he fondly hopes, in the course of years, will exceed all the most beautiful places of interment, in its gems of sculpture and architecture, and the number and variety of its silent population."

"He is a member of several literary clubs, imagines the State University some distance beyond Yale or Harvard, the Rev. D. E., the greatest preacher in the world, and D. L. E., the finest elocutionist and the most profound thinker."

"The Oakland editor, he assumes to be a guiding light to all journalists, but he is slow in coming down with his subscriptions, and with all his praise confines his reading to those matters which relate to city taxes, street assessments, etc."

"He assumes that the typical Oaklander does his business in San Francisco, and, with his ten thousand companions, returns to his sleeping place when the evening shadows fall on metropolis and suburban town without discrimination."

"Finally he is capable of a higher development than he can at present lay claim to, and though professedly an Athenian, a model of culture, and an exalted Christian, a builder of churches, and a patron of current literature, there yet remains a standard of excellence to which the typical Oaklander has not quite attained."

ENTRE NOUS.

Occultation.

Pretty Jennie came to me,
Earnest, seeking information:
"Cousin, darling, will you show
What is meant by occultation?"

What could mortal man as I
Do in such a situation?
Father, mother, no one nigh,

FIRST CLASS IN CONUNDRUMS.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—Were you ever an applicant for a position in the School Department?

If not you can not form the remotest idea of the theories and methods of appointment. As is the case with all theories there are commendable features, but the methods are vile.

At the inauguration of the present Board of Education, a committee on "Credentials" was organized for the purpose of examining the credentials and qualifications of all applicants for positions as teachers. After a careful and unbiased computation they were to report the result in open Board, and the candidate favorably reported was elected. Seven votes are necessary to secure an election, and the ring existing at that time controlled that number.

After receiving a nomination what connubiating there was to secure the majority of the committee. It had been vaguely hinted that "gold notes," examined and credited before the candidate was interviewed by the committee, were considered the best and strongest credentials.

After the startling developments of the "Question Frauds Investigations" the members of this committee concluded to examine orally every candidate after his or her nomination, and to award the vacant position to the party receiving the highest percentage.

There was but one oral examination, and nothing to prevent access being had to the questions under the present management. These examinations are held at the Lincoln Grammar School, different members of the Board acting as examiners—and without diplomas. If favoritism existed under the old régime, it was of an abstract quality, but under the present it is so palpably open that one groans in spirit, and calls for the old way even if it is but a form.

Dr. Fiske, chairman of the committee on "Credentials," says, "all teachers are now appointed fairly." I never was particularly good at definitions, but I know what fairly is not.

It is not "fairly" when a candidate, who is a member of the City Normal Class—a branch of the Girls' High School—enters the lists with an advantage of fifty credits, for no other reason than being a member of that class. The prestige given this "Normal Class" is absurd. Several of the pupils have admitted to directors that there is no knowledge acquired, or experience gained, and that they simply attend "to have some fun."

It is not "fairly" when a member of the Committee of Supplies of the Board of Supervisors, or a member of the Fire Department, calls on Mr. Taylor and incidentally mentions that several feet of hose is an apparent necessity in the Fire Department, and that the object of their visit was to interest Mr. Taylor in a lady protégé, who has secured a nomination and is obliged to pass the competitive examination. Mr. Taylor frantically snaps up the bait, promises (one of the few of his promises that can be relied on) that he "will take off his coat and do his level best." That lady's position is insured.

It is not "fairly" when Doctor Fiske is aware that one of the members of the household where he is the family physician is a candidate, and, looking through the lenses of a present or a future bill, sees her magnified efficiency, and materially assists her through the trying ordeal.

It is not "fairly" that some daring candidate should have a text-book concealed in her desk, and, while the examiner is busily chatting with a visitor, search its forbidden chapters for the solution of the problems.

It is not "fairly" for Mr. Taylor to have printed questions in mathematics in every stage of contortion, that, without an initiatory benefit, it is impossible to decide what is wanted.

It is not "fairly" for Doctor Fiske to expect answers to abstruse medical questions.

It is not "fairly" that the pupils of the Lincoln Grammar School should examine most of the papers (the examiners not having time to devote to that purpose); nor is it "fairly" that Miss Mary Maddon examine and credit Doctor Fiske's set of physiology papers.

It is not "fairly" when a member who is not on that committee requests a little leniency shown in the case of a worthy candidate, to have her marked down, so as to vent spleen on the interested member.

It is not "fairly" that Mr. Leggett should sit imperious and frowning as some autocrat, freezing and stifling the knowledge in the poor tired brains, and sending the expectations flying out of the finger tips.

It is not "fairly" when the examiner takes an inventory of the way you dress your hair, the amount of powder distributed about your face, and credits you high or low, as the estimate agrees with his fastidious taste.

I advise every and all candidates to pile on every puff, scorn economy with the powder box, and to adorn themselves with the very best their trunks contain; for theirs is a corner's inquest held over the dry-goods on their backs at the same time the inventory of the head is taken.

It is not "fairly" when candidates religiously believe that the one who receives the highest percentage is to be awarded the vacant position, to have the Supervisor's or physician's protégé marked up and appointed.

One can not fail to see that Webster's definition of "fairly" and Dr. Fiske's are diametrically opposed.

Frantically yours, A REDHEADED SCHOOLMARM.

We have had our Centennial Exposition—one hundred years from the Declaration of Independence. That wasn't enough; we are to be blessed with another in 1885, one hundred years after Great Britain formally acknowledged that the Declaration would stick. Where is this thing to stop? There will be centennials henceforth all the time—something occurred every year in the good old days; and in 1976 posterity will have the happiness to celebrate the one-hundredth anniversary of the first centennial celebration. All this comes of setting the earth pottering around the sun in the same old track, instead of making it go booming right along, as it ought.

A Fort Wayne girl mistook her somnambulistic brother for a burglar, and fractured his skull with a base ball club.

Some people are so constituted as to be unable to thing beautiful in this life—not even in a mirror.

ASSOCIATIONS.

While waiting one day in a railroad station, trying to beguile time by reading the gorgeous advertisements on the walls, I observed that a certain panacea was warranted to cure "wandering pains;" and I thought there could be no more appropriate place for proclaiming this virtue. Yet, alas! there are wandering pains and wandering pains, and for the latter where is the panacea? Do not hope to avoid them. You may shut your heart up as in a fortress strong, and vow there shall be no regrets to pierce it, when you have to leave some wayside station on the grand route; but, when the time comes, you will find that through tiniest crevices of the stronghold the fine, outreaching tendrils of love have found their way and are clinging fast to many an object. Yet the divine law of compensation gives a pleasure for every pain, and the recompense for the wanderer's woe is found in pleasant memories, the dear associations that gild common things with glory. It is surprising to see what homely and otherwise disagreeable objects may give you joy when touched by a ray of this beauty; they have only to remind you of home, or some sweet passages in the story of your life, and the glory is upon them. Of this order is "The Cane-Bottomed Chair," of which Thackeray writes with such whimsical tenderness:

"'Tis a bandy-legged, high-shouldered, worn-out seat,
With a creaking old back and twisted old feet;
But since the fair morning when Fanny sat there,
I bless thee and love thee, old cane-bottomed chair.

"It was but a moment she sat in this place;
She'd a scarf on her neck and a smile on her face!
A smile on her face and a rose in her hair,
And she sat there and bloomed in my cane-bottomed chair.

"When the candles burn low, and the company's gone,
In the silence of night as I sit here alone—
I sit here alone, but we yet are a pair—
My Fanny I see in my cane-bottomed chair.

"She comes from the past and revisits my room;
She looks, as she then did, all beauty and bloom,
So smiling and tender, so fresh and so fair!
And yonder she sits in my cane-bottomed chair."

There certainly is no grace or beauty in a collection of dirty old freight cars at a railroad crossing, "yet," says a friend, "I remember when I was returning home from a long visit far away, where I had been ill and home-sick, that when I reached a certain city and saw the long trains of Central Pacific Railroad cars in the station-yard, my heart leaped up, and a rainbow in the sky would have looked dull in comparison to those dingy old freighters. If "C. P. R." had been done in fire gilt and vermilion, those letters would not have looked more splendid to me; and I turned my face to hide the joy that was making it glow, that my fellow-passengers might not think me growing idiotic all at once. Those cars had passed before my home. Every engine had shrieked in at our door, and sent its smoke wreaths curling over the roof and floating and fading away across the meadows and the ferny hills. Only a few hours before some of them had passed through the dear valley, and it seemed almost as if they might speak to me, they were so radiant with association."

I knew a charming little country girl who was soon to be married to her city lover; taking her last turn at the churn one day, she said, setting it down with an emphatic thump: "There, that's the last time I'll wash you!" and she looked as if she were rolling off the burden of years. Her lack of sentiment was refreshing, yet I could not help wishing she had shown a little more tenderness for the poor old churn, since around even that homely and unromantic thing must have clustered many associations, and I dare say that now, if she ever sees it when she visits the old home, she regards it with a kind of affection, remembering the old careless days when stood over it singing like a meadow-bird as she tossed and shaped the golden rolls in her little brown hands, with the scent of the red clover coming in at the windows and doors. Prosper and grow rich, my Margaret, and adorn the little hands with jewels, yet as Mammon's gold drops into your purse, and Time's silver creeps into your hairs, will there not be days when you would like to slip out of your grandeur into youth and calico, with your sleeves tucked above your elbows, your bright hair rolled in a simple knot, with the curls breaking out and blowing over your laughing face, and—with father and mother, brothers and sisters somewhere within sight or call—to wash the old churn again? Even that. Not long ago I noticed a peculiar trade mark on some article. It bore a mysterious look of familiarity. It was one of those Chinese landscapes so remarkable as to perspective. The pagoda had a homelike air, as if I had inhabited it in some far off time; the high-flying birds, the boats sailing straight for the roof of the pagoda, even the tops of the trees that bent not with willowy grace above the droll little men fishing from the curious little bridge—all wore a particularly knowing look, like the smile of a long-absent friend who gazes half quizzically, half pathetically, in your face, waiting the dawn of recognition.

At last I had it! That was the pattern of some old china at home, long since gone back to its original clay; but its memory still lives, and with it sprang up that day a whole panorama of scenes from my child life.

There are no associations to which we cling more fondly than those of childhood. That is why we love "old-fashioned flowers," as the phrase goes, as if there were modes from Paris in Nature's grand realm! The gorgeous hollyhocks with their "cheeses," the poppies that we converted into dolls, with their sashes made of the "striped grass," over which we spent hours trying to find two blades that were alike. The columbines with their little bags of honey, the nasturtium about which Helen Hunt writes so beautifully, the marigolds, the glowing red peonies with whose leaves were made little air sacs to be "cracked" upon the back of the hand or on the forehead, the great double roses that grew under the windows, whose leaves we gathered for our mothers to dry, the daisies, the buttercups, and the blessed, bright old dandelions! How the green meadows glittered with these last in the spring days; how they bordered the roadside! And can you remember, you, who were "brought up" in the Eastern country, how your little heart swelled with happiness some warm Monday morning, when, for the first time in the season, you started for school in a new dress and a sunbonnet? You began then to feel certain of spring, and when you found the path bordered with those golden blossoms that seemed to be lifting their bright little faces out of the grass, and begging you to take them up—then you knew it was spring!

Oh, beautiful spring-time of life! Oh, happy morning of childhood, set thick with the bright blossoms of hope! But was there no care, no pain nor grief, in those sweet days that we should cling so fondly to their memory?

Alas, yes! even on that very spring morning you lingered so long with the dandelions that you were "tardy" at school, and passing under the awful doorway, weighed down with a sense of disgrace, were ordered "to throw those things out." Away went the dear blossoms out of your little warm hand, and the sunshine out of your indignant heart. How, in those days, you suffered in trying to bring your spirit down to the multiplication table, or some other dreary task that your soul abhorred; how the fetterless thing would fly away to the meadows, to the birds and the bees, the sunshine and the crowds of dandelions that you had left ungathered. But oh, how your soul would quake with guilty fear when the awful voice of the mistress called "class in Colburn's Arithmetic." What was bound between the covers of that "Colburn's Mental?" And was there not envyings and strife and bitter wrongs in those days? Had they not their misfortunes? Were not our pets always coming to grief, and did we not daily spill ink on our pinafores, and tear our dresses on the fences, or fall from giddy height of swing or "teeter," and so on, and so on?

We can afford to laugh at the trifles now, but they made up the woes of our childhood and were hard to bear. So it goes on through every stage of life; yet the dark days lose themselves in shadows, while the bright ones stand out from the some background fresh and golden; and the lightest touch may open the treasure-house where all these happy visions lie.

Music is strongly allied to memory. What melody has not its cherished associations? The lover hears his sweetheart lilting a merry tune as she sits at her window unconscious of his coming. How, in after years, when he hears that tune, will the whole scene repeat itself in his memory! Again he will hear the fresh young voice, will see the quick flush of surprise, and the bright smile of welcome. And there will be the songs they sang together in those rosy days of trembling hope, and that song of songs through which his heart poured out its sweet secret long before he dared otherwise to give it voice.

The heart of the wanderer far from home melts as he listens to some song of la patrie. The old soldier, sitting idle in the sunshine of quiet days, waiting for the summons which shall call him before the Great Commander, weeps at the sound of a martial air that is associated in his mind with the old days and fields of glory. He sees again the bright, waving colors, the glittering arms, the nodding plumes, and prancing steeds. He hears, like the rushing of many waters, the noise of the advancing hosts, and above it the voice of their leader urging them on to victory or glorious death. He remembers how comrade after comrade fell at his side, and could give him but one brief word, one appealing look, to take back to the beloved ones. How clear and sweet, above the glare, and din, and battle smoke, like a spirit too pure to receive a stain from sin and death, the "Music pours on mortals

Its beautiful disdain."

His heart is wrung with emotion as these scenes come upon him like a flood while he listens to the familiar air.

How thickly the associations gather about the old hymn tunes that seem to have tangled themselves in with our existence. Though they may lie sleeping in some corner of our brain, mute as the harp on Tara's walls, let but a chord of them be touched, and heart and soul respond. There are some that will take us back to village choirs and still Sabbath morns, sweet as those in Longfellow's poem; some to city churches, with softened light, and illumined walls, with swell of organ, and voices trained for earthly praise—paid worshippers, yet the music is free, and soars like an unbound bird into the sky, bearing on its wings the praise and love of the true worshippers. There are other tunes that take us far back into the little country schoolhouse, where we used to "go to meeting" "at early candle lighting." Those early candle lighted evenings! My drowsy head falls once more upon the desk before me, in some dimly-lighted corner. Could I have been such a sinful child as to select that nice, secluded place with a view to nap?

At any rate, there were such corners in the old schoolhouse, where the candles were seldom very close together, and there in fancy my head droops once more, while the minister reads the hymn in a voice that may have been appalling to older "worms," but to a sleepy child was fatally soothing. Oh, the dear old voices that quaked and quavered, and the young ones that flatted and blundered, through "Oh, for a thousand tongues to sing," "A charge to keep," and "Come, ye that love the Lord." How the lights would grow dimmer, and the voices fainter and further away, until my neighbor would bestow a gentle "nudge" upon me, at which I would sit bravely up, trying to look as if I never, never! But that preacher's tone, to say nothing of the sentiments that soared to realms too high, or sunk into depths too profound for me to follow! How thankful I would be when the nudger became so absorbed in the discourse that I was left sleep in peace. But that dearer hymn tune with which my mother used to sing me to sleep. Once more I seem to feel her arms close around me as my tired head sinks upon her gentle breast, and I fall asleep to her singing, her voice so sweet and cheerful that it made melody of the duldest tunes; it was as if she filled those old dreary strains with the sunshine of her bright nature. Even "Hark from the tombs" came from her lips joyously, overpowering the doleful words, or wedded to other and happier ones. How softly came that other sweet old hymn, to which I can hardly listen without tears, so dear are its associations:

"Jesus sought me when a stranger
Wandering from the fold of God;
He, to rescue me from danger,
Interposed His precious blood."

"Oh, to grace how great a debtor
Daily I'm constrained to be!
Let thy goodness, like a fetter,
Bind my wandering soul to thee."

Sankey's sensational version, beautiful and poetic though it be, can never touch my heart like the quaint homeliness of this old one, wrapped in the tender music of my mother's voice. Ring out, dear voice, in the heavenly chorus, beautiful and perfect; but it seems to me it would be heavenly enough as I heard it then, between sleeping and waking, at rest in her dear embrace.

Here lies a little book; it was the gift of a friend, long ago and far away. I suppose I shall never see her again, yet how vividly her bright face rises before me when I touch her gift! And that piece of gypsum, with its soft, flesh tints; that was broken from a rock in the Garden of the Gods, among the Rocky Mountains. What a jolly carriage-full we were that day! As we drove back to camp the baby kicked off his shoe and stocking, and we held the piece of gypsum beside the little pink foot, and wondered to see how like they were in tint. Dear, bright-eyed, laughing boy, can it be true that while this fragment of stone still is lying in our sight those little rosy, restless feet have gone down to the shadowy valley and out of our sight forever? Poor father and mother, who have had to let those precious babies go out from your clasping arms while I hold my little ones close, I grieve to think of your anguish. Oh, put away this souvenir—it is too full of heartache.

From every land the traveler brings souvenirs, and in the quiet days at home, as his eyes rest upon them, scattered through his rooms, he lives over again the scenes and adventures of his wanderings. That little Alpine flower, what visions are shut within its withered petals! This bit of stone brings him again within the shadow of the Pyramids; these pictures are solemn with the awful splendors of ruined Rome, or bright with the glowing sunshine of her Campagna, her flowery environs—they "Tell of countless sunny hours, Long days, and solid banks of flowers."

In these shells he sees again the blue waters of the Mediterranean; he hears "the deep sea music" of its quiet waves breaking against the shore; the twilight comes and deepens; and from the rocky banks the great black shadows creep out and lie in awful shapes upon the water. Then this bit of hether is fragrant with memories of the spot—

"Purple heath profusely strown,
And throatwort, with its azure bell,
And moss and thyme his cushion swell;
There, spent with toil, he listless eyed
The course of Greta's playful tide;
Beneath her banks, now eddying dun,
Now brightly gleaming to the sun,
As, dancing over rock and stone,
In yellow light her currents shone,
Matching in hue the favorite gem
Of Albin's mountain diadem."

And so in fancy he revisits each place of interest, through the medium of these charmed treasures.

I have already spoken of old-fashioned flowers as associated with the memories of childhood. Each individual flower has also its associations. A little child loved garden violets because his absent sister loved them, and came in one day with his hands filled with them, broken off—child fashion—close to the blossom. "Here are some violets for Dodo, mamma; Dodo loves violets." When the sister is hastily summoned home, the little blossom-sweet boy is just fading out of life, while his violets lie fresh and smiling where he had begged mamma to put them for "Dodo's" home-coming. Down at the foot of the little casket she lays a freshly-gathered bunch of the precious flowers. Now it is for his sake that she loves them, and, when the summer comes around, in their gold and purple bloom she seems to see the face of the lost darling. A mother has a vision of her dead child's face in a bunch of water-lilies, and since that time they are sacred to her. Another turns from the sight of heliotrope because of some sad or bitter memory. To others mignonette has its special significance; and another loves bridal roses because she carried them on her wedding day.

To me, the sight of wood violets, blue or white, brings a vision of my father's wood, with its maples, elms, and beeches, its wonderful mosses and ferns and sweet "spring beauties," its vines and berries and lichen-covered rocks. As I lose myself in the vision, I seem almost to smell the fresh fragrance of that green retreat; I hear the tapping of the woodpecker, and from farther depths the wild, sweet notes of some shy bird pouring out his heart in the solemn hush of the hemlocks and cedars. As to the associations which lovers find in flowers—there is no end to them! Who that has read Owen Meredith will not remember this verse from "Leoline?"

"There's a blue flower in my garden
The bee loves more than all;
The bee and I we love it both,
Though it is frail and small;
She loved it, too—long, long ago!
Her love was less than mine—
Still we are friends, but only friends,
My lost love, Leoline!"

Another thus apostrophizes his faded flower:

"What thought is folded in thy leaves!
What tender thought, what speechless pain!
I hold thy faded lips to mine,
Thou darling of the April rain!"

And what a world of innocent, heart-breaking reproach is in Ophelia:

"There's rosemary, that's for remembrance; and there is pansies, that's for thoughts."

The seasons also, and the days, are thus brightened or saddened. The birthdays, the anniversaries, and Christmas, that brightest, dearest, and holiest of holidays, all are set apart by the memories that crowd and cling, and still gather, year by year. So it goes ever on, till there is hardly a sight or sound in this great world that is not a reminder of some pain or pleasure.

There are some people who walk the streets and fulfill their daily round of duties as in a dream, and whose real life seems to be only in the world of associations. Though such are surely not to be envied, barren indeed would be the life that knew nothing of such joy—or even such halcyon sadness. Take courage, then, ye who are drifting about with adverse winds; from each point where your barque touches you will carry some memory to brighten the placid days when you shall have reached a quiet and perhaps monotonous port.

But association has a still deeper power than its sentimental one; it has a formative power. Our association of ideas with certain forms and customs, and the different types of natural scenery, may influence our labors and our spiritual life. All genius gives proof of this: the poet and the painter reproduce the scenes and forms that are dear to them through association, and give them the coloring which they wear in their own loving memory. Ruskin describes the birthplace of Turner and the surroundings of his youth in the dismal and prosaic world of Covent Garden, and shows how they influenced his art and lived again in his pictures.

"None of these things," he says, "were very glorious; yet such as they are he loves them—never, indeed, forgets them. His foregrounds had always a succulent cluster or two of green grocery at the corners. Enchanted oranges gleam in Covent Gardens of the Hesperides; and great ships go to pieces in order to scatter chests of them on the waves. That mist of early sunbeams in the London dawn crosses, many and many a time, the clearness of Italian air; and by Thames' shore, with its stranded barges and gildings of red sails, dearer to us than Lucerne lake or Venetian lagoon—by Thames' shore we will die. * * * * * He attaches himself with the faithfulest child-love to every place that bears an image to the place he was born in. No matter how ugly it is, has it anything like Maiden Lane, or like Thames' shore? If so, it shall be painted for their sake. Hence, to the very close of life, Turner could endure ugliness which no one else of the same sensibility would have borne with for an instant."

Scott, reared among the wild and picturesque scenery of a land thrilling with romantic tradition, had an intense love for all that was bold and free, and for those old legends set forth in the ballads of the acient minstrelsy. He visited the Border district, and gathered stores of them from the old peasants; he pored over Percy's collection of old English ballads; and thus laid the foundation for those poems—as rich in coloring, as wild and free as his own loved mountain landscapes—and for that long and brilliant series of prose poems, filled with the weird lore in which he was so rich.

Burns, the peasant-poet, throws all the tenderness of his warm heart into pictures of rustic life, while Wordsworth, dwelling amid the calm beauty of English lakes and mountains, sees true sublimity, not in passion and strife, but in the reverent, quiet love of Nature, meditation, and worshipful thought. To give his own words:

"The moving accident is not my trade;
To freeze the blood I have no ready arts;
'Tis my delight, alone, in summer shade,
To pipe a simple lay for thinking hearts."

Mark his genius—clear, cool, and pure as a mountain stream in quiet days, flowing with constant music down its rocky path, in glint of sun and murmur of pines; then turn to the glowing beauty, pathos, and sublimity of Byron—defiled, alas! by selfishness and vulgarity, morbid melancholy and unbridled passion. But, while we turn again in sorrow and disgust, and wonder that a soul so gloriously endowed, so keenly alive to beauty, should sink to such depths of all that is unlovely, we must remember the sad story of his birth and neglected childhood, that had not even the comfort of a calm and steadfast mother-love, and that over his ancestral home, though placed in the midst of rich natural beauty, hung the gloom of debt and desolation. It seems as if he had hardly an experience that was not mixed with the very gall of bitterness. Considering all that went to form the character of this "wandering star," we must pity rather than blame him.

But if we begin this sort of analysis, where will it end? I have strayed into a field so wide and rich that I must turn about and leave it by the shortest path, shutting my eyes to its temptations, as we walk with overflowing hands out of a garden crowded with blossoms; and, in the words of the immortal Bunsby: "The bearin's of these observations lies in their application." J. H. S. BUGEIA.

CALISTOGA, April, 1879.

Mr. L., a member of the Northern Circuit, well known for his joking propensities, was, after much persuasion, induced to join the Inns of Court Volunteers. While drilling one day with the Devil's Own the order was given to "double." When "halt" was ordered, this gentleman's rear-rank man slightly prodded him with his bayonet. Mr. L. threw himself on the ground and roared for the ambulance, declaring that he was "wounded." His corporal in vain attempted to soothe him, and to induce him to regain his legs. His only answer was that he was "wounded," and he demanded to be carried off in the ambulance. Then up came the captain of the company to see what the hullabaloo was about. To the plaintive request for the ambulance he gave an angry and contemptuous refusal. Whereupon Mr. L., with solemn and virtuous indignation, rose to his feet, threw down his rifle, and thus unburdened his mind: "I came here to play soldiers, and if you won't play the game properly, I won't play at all." And he marched off amid a roar of sympathizing laughter.—London Truth.

She tore the azure robe of night and set the stars of glory there. She did, for a fact. She is a young and careering genius of Portland, Maine. She has written a story, she has. She has drawn it mild—very. Here is the mildest passage in it: "And even as she mused the clatter of horses' hoofs was heard along the labyrinthian avenues of the outspreading park. It was Juanita's Alphonso de Cassa Blanca and his retainers. Reining in his prancing steed beneath her casement window, he cried in oleaginous and farinaceous tones, 'Juanita, appear!'" Wow!

Concerning the allegation that Californians "loathe the Chinese," William Lloyd Garrison writes to a friend in New York that, if that is so, it is very odd that they insist upon employing one hundred and twenty thousand of them, and using them in occupations where loathesomeness is particularly not desirable, as those of cooks and chambermaids, and paying them from $25 to $40 a month—more than whites would get for doing the same work.

There is very little difference between a man who sees a ghost and one who swallows a bad oyster, so far as looks are concerned.

A barber refused to color the moustache of an intoxicated customer because he did not want to dye a drunkard.

The King's Picture.

There is in every human being, however ignoble, some hint of perfection—some one place where, as we may fancy, the veil is thin which hides the divinity behind it.—Confucian Classics.

The king from his council chamber
Came weary and sore of heart;
He called for Iliff, the painter,
And spake to him thus apart:
"I am sickened of faces ignoble,
Hypocrites, cowards, and slaves!
I shall shrink to their shrunken measure,
Chief slave of a race of slaves!"

"Paint me a true man's picture,
Gracious and wise and good,
Endowed with the strength of heroes
And the beauty of womanhood.
It shall hang in my inmost chamber,
That thither when I retire
It may fill my soul with grandeur
And warm it with sacred fire."

So the artist painted the picture,
And hung it in the palace hall;
Never a thing so goodly
Had garnished the stately wall.
The king, with head uncovered,
Gazed on it with rapt delight,
Till it suddenly bore strange meaning
And baffled his questioning sight.

For the form was his supplest courtier's,
Perfect in every limb,
But the bearing was that of the henchman
Who filled the flagons for him;
The brow was a priest's who pondered
His parchments early and late;
The eye was a wandering minstrel's
Who sang at the palace gate.

The lips, half sad and half mirthful,
With a flitting, tremulous grace,
Were the very lips of a woman
He had kissed in the market-place;
But the smiles which her curves transfigured,
As a rose with its shimmer of dew,
Was the smile of the wife who loved him.
Queen Ethelyn, good and true.

"Then learn, O king," said the artist,
This truth that the picture tells—
How that in every form of the human
Some hint of the highest dwells;
How, scanning the living temple
For the place where the veil is thin,
We may gather, by beautiful glimpses,
The form of the god within."

The Statue in Clay.

"Make me a statue," said the King,
"Of marble white as snow.
It must be pure enough to stand
Before my throne at my right hand;
The niche is waiting. Go!"

The sculptor heard the King's command,
And went upon his way;
He had no marble, but he went,
With willing hands and high intent,
To mould his thoughts in clay.

Day after day he wrought the clay,
But knew not what he wrought;
He sought the help of heart and brain,
But could not make the riddle plain—
It lay beyond his thought.

To-day the statue seemed to grow,
To-morrow it stood still;
The third day all was well again;
Thus, year by year, in joy and pain,
He wrought his Master's will.

At last his lifelong work was done—
It was a happy day;
He took his statue to the King,
But trembled like a guilty thing,
Because it was but clay.

"Where is my statue?" asked the King.
"Here, Lord," the sculptor said.
"But I commanded marble." "True,
But, lacking that, what could I do
But mould in clay instead."

"Thou shalt not unwearied go,
Since thou hast done thy best;
Thy statue shall acceptance win—
It shall be as it should have been,
For I will do the rest."

He touched the statue, and it changed;
The clay falls off, and lo!
A marble shape before him stands,
The perfect work of heavenly hands—
An angel pure as snow!

Unfinished Still.

A baby's boot, and a skein of wool,
Faded, and soiled and soft;
Odd things, you say, and no doubt you're right,
Round a seaman's neck this stormy night,
Up in the yards aloft.

Most like it's folly; but, mate, look here,
When first I went to sea
A woman stood on the far-off strand,
With a wedding-ring on the small, soft hand,
Which clung so close to me.

My wife, God bless her! The day before
She sat beside my foot;
And the sunlight kissed her yellow hair,
And the dainty fingers, deft and fair,
Knitted a baby's boot.

The voyage was over. I came ashore.
What, think you, found I there?
A grave the daisies had sprinkled white,
A cottage empty and dark as night,
And this beside the chair.

'The little boot, 'twas unfinished still;
The tangled skein lay near;
But the knitter had gone away to rest,
With the babe asleep on her quiet breast,
Down in the churchyard drear.

ABOUT WOMEN.

Look in the mirror all you please, girls, for reflection is good for the mind.

Girls suck their lips to make them thin—
A case of sweetness long drawn in.

There's no special style of engraving engagement rings. A spider's web with a fly in it is a very pretty device.

Lydia Thompson calls the bald-headed row of old men in the front seat "Kind Werds," because they never dye.

In Michigan etiquette permits a bride to be married without gloves—precisely the way she handles her husband.

Modjeska says that Wilhelmj is a terrible flirt and is more renowned in Warsaw for his gallantries than for his musical accomplishments.

A pretty girl won a musket at a lottery, and when they gave it to her she innocently and injuredly asked: "Don't they give a soldier with it?"

Sings a poetess in the Pittsburg Telegraph: "What shall we get for the baby's neck?" Get a strip of red flannel, about an inch wide, Geraldine.

Love is a game of pitch and catch. He "throws" his affections, and she generally catches them on the first bounce. In the end both fetch up at the "home base."

"A man owes his success in his life work to the woman who walks beside him," says a philosopher. This remark, no doubt, refers to the husband of Madame Anderson.

A young lady ate half a wedding cake, and then tried to dream of her future husband. Now she says that she would rather die than to marry the man she saw in that dream.

The Countess de Trobriand, who is an American, is also very patriotic. At her recent reception in Paris she furnished her refreshment table exclusively with American viands, and made her guests all sick.

Camilla Urso is almost the only woman who has ever attained eminence as a violinist, and yet the art of drawing a beau is innate with the sex. They all do it; only they don't make the same noise about it.

A newly-married lady was telling another how nicely her husband could write. "Oh, you should just see some of his love letters." "Yes, I know," was the freezing reply; "I've got a bushel of 'em in my trunk." Tableau.

There is only one object in the world which will attract a young lady's attention from the handsome young man whom she meets on the street, and that is another woman with a hat two laps ahead of any style she has yet seen.

We are to have Lorne and his wife this year without doubt. The London Queen, semi-official authority, says they will come to New York in May, and will reside in twelve rooms at the Windsor Hotel, especially decorated for their reception.

At Bristol a lady was sued by a dressmaker for the price of a dress. Defense, misfit. Two dressmakers as judges disagreed. The presiding justice of the court went, therefore, with the defendant and the witnesses to see the dress tried, and he decided that it was a misfit.

The sister of the Sultan of Zanzibar, who left that country secretly about ten years back, after being converted to Christianity, and who married a Hamburg merchant named Ruete, recently became a widow. She has now settled at Berlin, where she intends giving lessons in Arabic.

A Southern paper informs us that "Mary Brown burst her boiler on Tuesday last," and we were just about making up our mind that perhaps Mary had been lighting the fire with kerosene, when the paper informs us that three of her deck passengers were instantly killed. This last statement leads us to infer that Mary was a steamboat.

A Yorkshire trainer lately revealed his method of meeting a conjugal storm. His plan, he said, was to keep silent and nod his acquiescence to everything—no matter what—said by his spouse. "Yes," remarked one of his friends; "but then she has it all her own way." "Just so," replied the Tyke, with satisfaction; "and nothing annoys her so much. There is nothing women hate like a walk-over."

A Nevada surgeon is in trouble through trying to improve a woman's nose. She had broken it when a child, and the mishap had left it in a slightly crooked condition. The surgeon bargained to straighten it, and attempted to do so by breaking it anew. The operation left the nose in a worse shape than it was before. The woman sues for $10,000 damages, and threatens to break the bugles of the whole court and county if she don't get it.

The breath of spring is in the air,
Take care, take care;
Your wife for you has laid a snare,
Beware, beware;
She meets you when you come from town,
She sweetly smiles as you sit down,
She gits your shippers and your gown,
She drives away each care and frown;
Take care; beware;
She wants a new spring bonnet.

The Carson Appeal tells this story: A young gentleman who is very fond of children, while playing with a little two-year-old girl in the parlor of one of our hotels Sunday evening, said:

"I wonder how much your mamma would sell you for?"
The mamma answered for the daughter, saying:
"Tell him I would not take $100,000 for you."
The young gentleman replied that he would sell her for $50,000. An old gentleman who was present remarked:
"Young man, if I were you I would not sell my babies 'short.'"

"Why?" asked the baby fancier.
"Because," replied the old gent, who evidently knew the ways of the world, "because when you get your 'shorts' you might have to do it with your own stock."

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MAY 3, 1879.

This will be our last opportunity to write upon the question of adopting or rejecting the new Constitution. Our readers will be glad when the election day shall have passed, and we shall be glad that the ARGONAUT may drift away from the discussion of this passionate and angry controversy to questions more in harmony with its original purpose. We look back over the history of the last two years with surprise. When we remember the prosperity of our early period, and the kind and genial feeling that characterized the intercourse with all classes of society, and contrast it with the present depressed condition of affairs, the despondent, almost desperate feelings entertained by many, we do not at all recognize the California of the earlier and better time. We were steadily progressing; in a healthful way everybody who confined himself to his legitimate pursuit was improving his position. We were recovering from the effects of our first gambling mania; we had recovered from all our scares, and everything gave promise that California had entered upon the home-stretch of a winning race. The demon of political discontent whispered into the ear of the Democratic party to give the State a new Constitution. A municipal election gave a few crazy aliens an opportunity to form what is known in the slang of our party politics as a "piece club," and from this club developed a noisy, brawling agitator, ignorant, insolent, and audacious, who became the leader of a vicious, idle, and discontented element of society. He gathered to his following all the drunken, the worthless, the demoralized of all classes. He managed them by appeals to their passions, and fired them with an ambition to accomplish by violence such a political ascendancy as would enable them to acquire a living by some less laborious means than daily toil. The Chronicle, for an independent and selfish business purpose of its own, gave to the sand-lot the support of a daily journal. The Call, through jealousy, and fearing the loss of business, became a rival in the same direction, and thus a criminal uprising had the support of the two most widely circulated journals of the coast.

A Constitutional Convention was seized as a political opportunity, and to send working men as delegates it was made the occasion of a party organization. Demagogues and adventurers sprung up on every side. Every disappointed politician, every man of desperate fortunes, every element of the social organization that had a war with God, society, or civilization, every broken stock-gambler, every bankrupt, everybody who had nothing to lose and everything to gain, precipitated themselves into the movement. Kearney led all of the mob which had no sense of shame on a Thanks-giving parade, and all of his silent supporters stood by on the sidewalk to see the dirty stream flow by, and on election day it polled thirteen thousand votes. It sent to the Constitutional Convention a mass of ignorant men, who developed no leader of intelligence, no single man of mind or thought. The farmers caught the inspiration, and to the ignorant and vicious agitators of the town was added an honest but unintelligent delegation from the country. There were a few men of culture and honest purpose, who, finding themselves utterly overwhelmed by the Granger and the Workingmen's delegates, only endeavored to act as a regulator to control the eccentric movement of this ill-contrived machinery. The result is an organic law of tricks, of conspiracies, of legal conundrums, of curious reforms; a law to punish rich men, curb corporations, filled with promises that can not be performed, hopes that can not be realized. Some things it does accomplish. It makes new offices in every department of government, and this gives the demagogues a chance of place. It destroys and unsettles all law, and this gives the lawyers the promise of a rich and plementous harvest of litigation. It gives a new deck, a new shuffle, and a new deal, and thus every desperate gambler of fortune, hold neither ace nor trump, has a chance for a new hand. It does more than this. It organizes into a compact party all the desperate adventurers and all the vicious malcontents of the State. If they can carry the Constitution, the same organization can elect the entire administration of a State and municipal government. It will give us either David Terry or Denis Kearney for Governor. It will give us Clitus Barbour or Bob Ferral for Chief Justice. It will give us a defaulting ward club treasurer to keep the funds of our State. It will elect for Mayor some blooming loafer of the sand-lot; a police force chosen from the hoodlums of Tar Flat; Supervisors from the dives of Barbary Coast; a judiciary from the Police Court; small salaries, to be supplemented by ample stealings. This is the feast to which we are invited by this strangely compounded political organization.

This is the first time in the history of American politics when such a combination has either been made or attempted, and only because it is the first time it is dangerous. It is the first time when criminal and political elements have successfully struck hands. We do not believe there is a convict in this State, nor an individual who belongs to the criminal class, who does not vote for the new Constitution. We do not know of an idler and vagrant who will not cast his vote for it. We do not know of an utterly debauched and worthless American, an utterly benighted and ignorant foreigner, who is not prepared to give his support to the new experiment. We know of some few gentlemen (?) who avow themselves for it—men who have better sense, and ought to have better morals than to be found in the bad company they are in—but there is not one of them that we can not put our finger upon his raw spot. They are soured, disappointed, unappreciated, and bitter men, who have made mistakes in life, or who have some selfish purpose in view. These men are in an association they despise. They are doing that which they are ashamed of, and that which, if it succeeds, they will deplore; if it fails, will prove to them a self-inflicted death wound. These men—we might name twenty of them—would be ashamed to be seen in the procession of that mob to whom by their political action they are giving countenance. Yet they are encouraging them to seize the reins of political power; they would allow this vile, ignorant mob of criminals and mendicants to become the governing authority in order that they might attain some honor in its leadership, some revenge against the society that has not appreciated them; and, what is perhaps most strange, that of the twenty we would name the greater part are Southern men—men who are proudest of their good name, their family descent, and the most particular in their personal association.

Out of this episode there comes an inevitable result. It brings our community into a new alliance. It tends to destroy political parties, and if the coming Presidential election was out of the way, here in California now, and elsewhere later, party organizations would be broken up, and society would reorganize into new political combinations. The intelligent, the property-owning, and the well disposed would in self-defense band themselves together against the ignorant, the idle, the vicious, the mendicant, and the demagogue. Into such party lines must republican government marshal its citizens. It will be under this organization that property and social order will make its defense against the dangerous majority of "have nothings" that will endeavor to destroy by force the laws protecting property; a party that when it outnumbers the "have somethings" will invoke the principle of majority rule to the division of property. When this lawless and impecunious minority becomes a majority, then practical agrarianism is enforced, and society either passes into anarchy, or through anarchy and revolution to an imperial government. That this dream is now in the minds of men is indicated by the almost unanimous desire for one great national party to reflect, and for a third term, to the Presidency one whose sole qualification for the office is that he can lead armies, and does not faint at the sight of blood. The times are pregnant with suggestions of alarming possibilities, and it becomes every rational and thoughtful mind to well consider his political action in the presence of what we deem a great crisis to California, and the beginning of a great possible political revolution to the Government of the United States of America, and a possible solution of the problem of self-government in a manner that shall not fulfill the expectations of those who love liberty, or who have confidence in the permanence of a republican form of government.

A "professional man" who makes the damaging and cowardly admission that "he dare not write over his own signature lest it should injure his business," and who is "compelled to dissemble and pretend to oppose a measure he will do all in his power to advance," draws a four-column parallel in Monday's Chronicle between the people of California of to-day and those of Europe from the second to the fifteenth century. He finds the freemen of this, our Pacific empire, in a condition not dissimilar to the oppressed communities of Europe during the dark and feudal ages. To all the destitution, oppression, ignorance, servility, and moral degradation of that barbarous and fearful epoch of history he finds our community fast hastening. The strong baron, the robber chief, the imperial ruler, the insolent patrician, the domineering priest, the feudal lord, all have their counterparts in the corporations and wealthy men of to-day. By all the laws of knighthood and chivalry of the period he discusses we are not compelled to set a lance in rest with this unknown combatant. Were he a brave knight he would enter the list with his visor up, and, looking us in the face, would give assurance of his right of challenge to the field. We would not extend the mailed hand to this disguised foe if his communication did not contain a threat which brave men never make and brave men never fear. From the sand-lot we hear the muttered threat of violence, if this appeal to the electoral urn shall fail. We refer these cowardly and vulgar miscreants to the police authorities, but we assume that this "professional man" is a gentleman and a scholar, and we take his threat as a challenge which just at present we do not choose to decline. We reproduce his concluding words, and interpret them to mean that, unless the tangled mass of political conundrums styled a new Constitution, which passion and hate has instigated and ignorance produced, is adopted, the only alternative is violence. In other words, unless a propertyless and ignorant mob can succeed at the ballot-box it will essay the bayonet. Hear the unknown: "I say, away with this condition of affairs. Away with servile labor, with aristocrats, with monopolies, with bad laws, with corrupt officers, with the whole damnable system of seigniorial finance. Away with it now, while reform is offered in a peaceful mode. Recall what happened in France, where peaceful reform was denied and it had to be obtained by force. Remember that we are a highly nervous and sensitive people, as yet not subverted by a long course of oppression and misery, and that pin scratches are apt to irritate our body politic as festering wounds pained our European ancestors. Observe that peaceful relief is impossible by any other means than the one now offered, and that the only alternative is violence."

The italics are ours. The threat is unmistakable. We are to be treated to a reign of terror as in France, if we vote down this constitutional monstrosity. The alternative of violence is offered to us if we do not obey the mandate of this monster of agrarianism and social disorder. This land of freedom and of unrestrained liberty of personal action; this State, where free churches, free schools, free lands, invite to freedom of conscience, freedom of expression, and freedom in the acquisition and enjoyment of property, is to be drenched in blood, lighted by incendiary fires, homes desolated, government overturned, authority usurped, unless this Constitution is adopted. This is what this writer means. It is what he threatens. It is what the sand-lot mutters. It is what the Chronicle is driving at. We say, let it come. Let it come now. Let it come here. If our institutions demand for a third time the baptism of blood, let us welcome the combat with ready hands and resolute hearts. In defense of our homes, properties, lives, and laws we stand upon the defensive—not seeking, not shrinking the conflict; not provoking the fight, but not turning our back upon the foe. When that time comes, and this "professional man" must lay down his pen to take up that more powerful and open weapon, the sword, he must also lay aside his mask and look danger in the face. We propose to look squarely into the eyes of this monster; and by "we" is meant all men, native and adopted, who love the land they live in and who love constitutional liberty and social order. And when the conflict comes, this disguised and hooded hero of the pen, who threatens under a nom de plume, will not be in the arena. We are almost impatient with ourself that we have been provoked into a serious reply to this most cowardly menace of one who has not the moral courage to openly vote his convictions, and who is compelled to "dissemble and pretend," and to bide his name in discussion of the rejection or adoption of an organic law. So abject and pitiful a moral coward is not dangerous either with pen or sword. It must rejoice such as him that a secret ballot gives him a safe vantage ground for stabbing republican government in the back. In event of a popular disturbance, this "professional man" (?) would doubtless be found lighting secret fires. Against open and disguised treason, against bold men who fight and cowardly assassins who stab, we must be equally prepared.

It seems to us that the wives, mothers, daughters, and sweethearts of the sand-lot have not received that degree of attention to which they are entitled in this discussion over the adjustment of the difficulties between labor and capital. We hope they will take as kindly as it is meant some words of advice to themselves. Those women who bear to workmen the relations indicated by the appellation of wife, mother, daughter, and betrothed, have a deep interest in this question under consideration—deeper indeed than the men themselves. If any disaster occurs to the working class it is first felt within the domestic circle. If any evil happens that brings want, poverty, care, or anxiety, that want and poverty come first to the wife and mother; that care and anxiety first deepen the lines and furrow the face of the anxious working woman. It is the wife and mother who first feels the diminishing resources that lessen the comforts and reduce the supply of those things necessary to the maintenance and support of the family. She is the first to recognize reduced wages, and the first to feel that the financial supply is inadequate to the provision of all the comforts she demands for her home. She sees the first holes at the knees of the boys' pantaloons, and first realizes by the shortening frocks of her growing girls that they need new clothes. She sees the first pale streak that insufficient food paints on her baby's face. It is the wife who is the cashier and banker of the family, and when the deposits run low she is the first to perceive it. She keeps the commissary store, provides and issues the rations to the hungry mouths that clamor to her for food. If the husband or son goes wild, takes to drink or politics, or spends his money or his time upon the sand-lot, it is over the threshold of the home that the first shadow is cast. If boys go astray and become arabs and hoodlums, or girls lose that love of home and cut loose from that parental restraint that keeps them in the path of rectitude, it is the poor mother's heart that is wrenched and that weeps over them. Is it not, then, appropriate that in all this discussion an occasional word may be said to the working women? May not religion, civilization, society, and government safely appeal to them, and ask their co-operation to adjust the differences we are now considering? We know the influence of good women over all kinds of men, and recognizing the important stake they have in this business, they should not be neglected.

And first we ask of the wives of the sand-lot that they recall their own conditions and the conditions of their sex in their native lands; that they recall the wage of labor that they were enabled to earn, and the kind of labor they were called upon to perform in the old country before they emigrated to this. If they came at tender years they may remember the tales their mother told them, of hardship, toil, suffering, poverty and destitution; of the kind of home in which they lived, and the degree of plenty that surrounded them in their youth; of the dresses they were enabled to have, the shoes they wore, and compare their physical comforts and conditions in the land of their birth with the land of their adoption. Let them remember that in that old country their husbands were not, as here, voters, making laws and entitled to hold office; that the political honors now within the reach of their husbands and sons were not possible in Europe. Let them understand that the two things which gave to their native places an aristocracy that enabled them to live at ease—namely, land and education—are here within reach of their own families; that land is given away and education is free; and that when their husbands come home from the ward meeting, or the convocation of the Sunday sand-lot, where God has been blasphemed by an apostate Catholic, and the Holy Mother of God insulted by a blasphemous English heretic, and where infidel Germany alternates in harangues with atheistic Americans, let these intelligent women catechise their husbands and sons, and cross-examine them upon the causes of their dissatisfaction toward this country. Let them ask the male members of their family what they expect to accomplish by following Denis Kearney.

Two years ago, when Denis was driving his dray, times were good, money was plenty, wages were higher than now. The women know this. Now times are hard; money is scarce and wages are low, and while things have been going from bad to worse Denis has been living at his ease upon the donations of his followers. He has visited with wife and family the Eastern States in a palace car. He has been down to Santa Ana. The whole burden of his song is against the rich. Now let the women ask their husbands what the rich have done to them; what particular rich man has done them a wrong? Let each wife ask the bread-getter of the family from whom do they get their wages, and from what class comes the profitable and steady labor that gives bread and meat, luxuries and comforts, to their homes? Does employment come from the sand-lot? Did any body ever make any money out of Clitus Barbour. Does Judge Terry or Volney E. Howard ever give employment to labor? Let those wives ask their husbands whether it would be more profitable to live upon the declamations of Beerstecher, or the poetry or the songs of the Wellock child, or the windy vapors of Kearney, or the passionate editorials of the Chronicle, than upon the twenty-dollar pieces of the most extravagant rich man or the meanest millionaire that lives in town? Do the men that do daily labor, that shovel earth, carry the hod, drive dray, coach, or carriage, that find labor in any position, from the lowest and most menial employment up to the highest—do they get this work from the sand-lot? In other words, does labor come from politicians, idlers, demagogues, and sand-lot orators?—or does it come from business men, and brains, and capital? Does the woman that works for a living get her best labor from her poorer or her richer neighbors?

And now, then, comes a new code of laws to be set up in place of the old and tried instrument. We can not go into an argument with women upon this subject further than to say, the old Constitution was made by able and learned men, modeled after older States, and has been our organic law for thirty years. Under it we have prospered and had good times; and never was there a time of want, or a time when labor could not find employment at good wages, until a set of politicians conceived the idea of destroying the old law and setting up a new one in its place. From that moment, and the point of time when Denis Kearney and a set of ignorant declaimers began to howl on the sand-lot, we have had hard times. They have proposed to give us a law that will enable all the old out-at-elbow political demagogues to get back to office; a law that destroys the schools, that withholds money from the orphan asylums, that gives us cheap and ignorant judges, that taxes money in savings banks, and that will so frighten everybody that they will hide their money or send it out of the country; that will multiply law suits, and set labor and capital by the ears, and finally turn all the work over to the Chinese by making the rate of wages so low that none but Chinese can live upon them. We do not expect our working women to understand a legal instrument like the new or the old Constitution. But they do know that we had good times until the politicians and agitators began to talk about destroying the old law and adopting a new one. They do know that labor comes from rich men and enterprising men, and not from beer-drinking, whisky-swilling politicians. They do know that riot and disorder accomplishes no good result. They do know that this country is free and liberal in its laws; that it is better than any other; that here their children can be educated; that sons and daughters of the poor become rich and prosperous; that if they are having a hard time themselves their children have as good a chance as the children of the wealthy; and they also know that poverty and want does not come as much from the law as it does from the beer keg and whisky barrel.

They know, by a sort of intuitive knowledge, that there is no real class distinction in this country, and the real working, toiling woman and mother has a conscious realization of the fact that if her sons are intelligent, industrious, and honorable, there is no position to which they may not attain; and that to her daughters, if well educated and virtuous, there is no social position to which they may not be called. The laboring women know that most of the troubles, anxieties, and cares of their lives come from the dissipated habits of workingmen—that it is from the groggery and the gin-mill that her troubles flow; that the money squandered for beer and whisky if spent for bread and meat would bring plenty to the home, and that with prudence, economy, and industry, want is impossible. There is not a workingman's wife in San Francisco who has a good, industrious husband, and who is herself a good wife, that has any serious cause of complaint. She knows that all this agitation at the sand-lot is a political one, and that her husband is better away from it. She knows that to the rich men and prosperous men her husband must look for work, and she knows that any agitation that leads to strife or contention between the rich and poor, between labor and capital, only makes her lot harder and her burdens heavier. We commend our workers to consult with politicians less, and with the women more. A wife is a husband's best adviser. Women's intuition is better than men's brains. We wish the women could vote on this question. In such an event the new Constitution would be rejected, and the old one retained.

There is no class of men for whom the ARGONAUT has a more tender regard than for those who labor at honest manual toil. The man who is willing to do an honest day's work for an honest day's wages is entitled to the honorable regard of every intelligent and decent person. He is justly entitled to have continuous employment provided for him by organized society. To this end we would be willing to be taxed down to the level of working beside him for our daily bread. This mode of division we will submit to until our crusts are broken in the middle. But the vicious tramp who comes from a foreign land, and sets himself down upon our doorstep and demands unearned bread, or who threatens to burn our house because we will not let him in and steal the property that in our youth we worked for, because we will not provide for him—we will fight. He shall not by threats or menace save himself from starvation if we can help it. We say to Denis Kearney and his kind that if they desire employment and wages, they are entitled to it if they ask for it. If they prefer politics, agitation, riot, and starvation, they shall have it; they shall have the conflict first, and it shall determine whether it is easier to get a living by fighting for it than working for it. This is in answer to Mr. Denis Kearney's vulgar and cowardly threat that if the new Constitution is not adopted there will be trouble.

The burden and cry of the Constitutional campaign is that "the new document will reduce taxation." Yet it is a curious fact that nearly all the owners of real property in San Francisco, and all that class of foreigners who are out of debt, or ever expect to be, are opposed to its adoption. The anomaly is presented of the sand-lotters, tramps, and vagabond politicians who have no property, never did have and never will have any, shouting for reduced taxation, while the men who own the city and the State are willing to support the old Constitution and all the burdens it entails.

"I am going for the new Constitution," said an Irish drayman to us the other day, "because it will reduce taxation." "How much do you now pay?" we asked. "Twelve dollars." "How many children have you?" "Five." "How many at school?" "Four." "Then you get four children educated for $12, that is $3 each. It costs $18 dollars per annum for each scholar—4 times 18 equals 72. So that for $12 you are getting the general advantages of organized society—a fire department to protect your house, a hospital to which you may go if sick, police to preserve order, streets over which you may drive your dray, and $54 worth of schooling; and you want your taxes reduced. Don't you think," said we, "that you had better sell your homestead and your dray, take your money out of the Hibernia Bank, and go back to Ireland, and thus avoid the tyranny and oppression of this infernal country?" This Irishman is now scratching his head. He ought to be furnished with an iron garden rake at public expense.

Another defalcation of a Deputy City and County Treasurer has sent the criminal to square his accounts in the bankrupt court of death. Mr. W. F. Cassebohm has stolen $20,000, gambled it away in stocks, and killed himself. Mr. Hubert, the Treasurer, must make some better statement to disentangle himself than by cowardly innuendo endeavoring to implicate Mayor Bryant with any knowledge of this criminal defalcation. Andrew J. Bryant is an honorable and honest man. He is capable, and has done his entire duty as Mayor. He will not be damaged by any insinuations of Hubert, by any assaults of the press, and he will not be indicted by the Grand Jury under the perjured testimony of Mr. H. S. Tibbey. Future investigation will disclose that he has been guilty of neither negligence, carelessness, nor crime in his office as first executive officer of the city of San Francisco.

If on election day there should be any citizen undecided as to the casting of his ballot, let him stand for a moment and watch the runners for and voters of the hoodlum ticket. He will see the line of demarcation, the boundary between respectability and the mob, as clearly defined as the hand of ignorance and hate can trace it in the sand of suffrage. On the one side will stand the wealth, the intelligence, the property, the decency, the well dressed and well behaved of all classes—the merchant, mechanic, and laborer; and on the other, poverty, and ignorance, and villainy—the tramp, the demagogue, the Ishmaelite politician, the mob with scowling brow and short-cropped hair. Let him choose, then, his position, and step to his following. It is a question that can be instantly settled. It is a test that is beyond the contradictions of newspapers, or the explaining tongues of politicians, or the pressure of friends or business acquaintance. It is an appeal to one's self-respect, a sight draft on the deposit of principle within the manly man, the citizen, and the sovereign. It is an experiment that should be tried at every election; it is one that never fails to convince.

Said a gentleman the other day: "If I could neither read nor write; if the old Constitution and the new Constitution were alike as inscrutable to me as the works of Providence, it seems to me my eyes alone would show me the way to 'vote.' This remark has meat in it. You need not read the old document; you need not read the new one. You have only to notice the kind of men that are going to vote in favor of the new, to make up your mind at once and forever to vote against it. Independence of thought is a beautiful thing; it is to be encouraged; but if your mind does not come down to conviction with the weight of reason that will be brought to bear upon it, there is a vacuum somewhere that this common-sense suggestion will fill.

"No husband can rely on the honor of his wife while all classes of our people are swept into the whirlpool of stock 'gambling.'" These italics are from authority—the San Francisco Chronicle of Wednesday last. These are specimen words and specimen sentiments of this fight from the beginning. It is an argument straight from the source that knows nothing of honesty in man or honor in woman. It is an insult that could only come from a blackguard and outcast pen. It is a vicious thrust from a palsied hand and a bloodless heart. It is a thing that you men with wives, and daughters, and sweethearts, and homes to protect, are asked to throttle to death with a majority at the ballot-box.

The tide of European immigratinn, bearing its flotsam of ignorance, crime, and incapacity, is again rolling into the port of New York in a volume that promises finally, and once for all, to pauperize and barbarize the continent. This is good news to the statesmen who believe it the heaven-ordained mission of this country to serve as "an asylum for the oppressed of all nations," and will correspondingly displease those who perceive that the oppressed of other nations are the oppressors of this. Communists, Socialists, Nihilists—God bless us, what a crew the crimps are bringing us for the Ship of State! Seven hundred and fifty-eight came alongside on Monday last, and it is estimated that one hundred thousand will board us during the summer—we to be during the remainder of their lives. Take the qu gentlemen, take the quarter-deck; Americans will walk.

THE VORTEX RING.

An Old Scientist Tells all About It.

It was some years ago when me, and Charles Darwin, and Bill (afterward Sir William) Thompson, and Hanky Helmholtz, and many others of the boys, was a studying physics at the University of Heidelberg, and Max (which his right name is Maximilian) Müller was grubbin' at the languages, and one night we all went kneiping together, and smoked and drank till all was blue. Even then Helmholtz was working at his theory of vortex rings, and Thompson was trying to steal his thunder. You don't know what a vortex ring is? Why it's as easy as tying a knot in the end of all things. All you have to think about is a perfect fluid like the ether, the existence of which ain't no more settled as a truth than the law of gravitation is, and imagine a movement set up in it which occasions a ring precisely similar in its turning upon itself to a smoke-wreath like this which now I blow from my mouth while waiting for you to order the boy to set up two more glasses of hot whisky. When once they are set a-going, bless your heart, they can't stop; they may be little or they may be big, but whatever they are they are bound to stay rings forever. Bill Thompson, when he became a swell and was called Sir William, made a theory to the effect that atoms are nothing but these rings and as there weren't reason to contradict him, half of the scientific world fell in with his notion. You know you don't never find any such rings, but then you don't find no atoms either, nor molecules, too, for that matter, and so, as scientific things go, all is in fine trim for any ingenious man who wants to make a theory, and the only requirement is that it shall be consistent with mathematics, which, so far as I have observed, hain't got nothing whatever to do with nature as it stands. However, we were talking, at the time of which I speak, of these vortex rings swishing and swirling on forever in a vast hypothetical fluid, and we came to the conclusion that there weren't no good reason why some of them shouldn't be big enough to hold a man as well as some be small enough to hold only of an atom. There was a big blacksmith in the room, and Helmholtz at once got up when the idea was suggested, and by simply changing a "b" in an equation to a "c," showed not only that this was possible but that it was inevitable. A big vortex ring he showed, also, must spin with a velocity some ten thousand times greater than that at which light travels, while its progressive motion couldn't not by no means be less than fifty thousand times as great. Helmholtz's room, at which we was kneiping, was furnished with an excellent arrangement of scientific apparatus, by means of which it would be possible to exhaust the air and form a vacuum in a tank big enough to hold a man, but of course this vacuum would be full of ether, for there ain't no means of getting rid of that hypothetical substance. If it was real we could easily pull it out, but seeing as how it were only hypothetical it would be tough work to dispose of it except in a logical way; and logic, you know, ain't science. Now I come to remember, Jules Verne was there, and at once constructed a tank of the proper size; Helmholtz then filled it half a dozen times with carbonic acid, which he expelled by means of an air-pump, and then chucked in potash to absorb the remains of the acid, and so we got an absolute void full of ether. By tapping then at one end of the tank a vortex ring was expelled from an orifice at the opposite end, at which I was sitting. It was a big ring, and I was engulfed in it, so that in an instant I was whirled through the walls of the house and sent off into space with a velocity of which you can't, by no means form no adequate notion. And now, sir, if you will only tell that boy to fetch on some more cold applejack for to wet my whistle, I will continue for to spin this yarn. Thank ye kindly, sir. Now, I want you to think about light for a few minutes. Ye know light travels, as I said, at the rate of 200,000 miles a second, there or thereabouts. Now, if a man with pretty good ordinary eyes was situated 200,000 miles from the earth he would see an event just one second after it occurred on the earth. If he was 400,000 miles away he would see it in two seconds after it happened, and so on. When I found myself swallowed up in this vortex ring, I saw that my eyes, being freed from the burden of gross matter and being, so to speak, at the very interior of nature, could see what was going on almost anywhere. Of course I fixed my peepers on the old planet as long as I could, but as I went blazing off among the stars and comets and meteors and star-dust and floucci and forming worlds, to say nothing of those as was bustin' up with old age, of course my attention were diverted. By and by, however, after going all over the universe, I found myself approaching the solar system. How did I know it? Well, I knew the earth by the mark I had made on it, and then there was a sort of home feeling in the ether easy enough for anybody to understand who has once been in my predicament. When I first spied the earth I were quadrillions of miles away, so many that the light which I met had started from the earth about one hundred thousand years ago, so that I saw what had taken place on our planet just so many years back. As I came nearer, of course I saw what had gone on at a less remote period, so that at last I began to twig the paleozoic age when there weren't nothing but monera and amœbæ and such small deer on the globe, and a powerful deal of trouble I had for to spy them out, and I wouldn't never have seen them at all if I hadn't long before heard Emy Hæckel blow his horn about them. When you are so high above the earth you can easily see to the bottom of the ocean, and of course I observed the life there. Great coral reefs was a buildin', and generation after generation of the little animals appeared and disappeared under my very eyes. It weren't long either before I saw monkeys a jumpin' and climbin' in the trees, and throwin' coconuts at each other just like human beings. You would hardly believe it, but I saw the first appearance of man in the forests, and it were a most interestin' sight to observe how they gradually sloughed off their tails, and the abliest of the maimed beings that was left scampered off immediately to the Aryan plateau and began to show signs of human civilization. In short, I watched the whole course of the world's history up to date, and I were satisfied that all that the evolutionists and Darwinists say is precisely as true as this here yarn. And now I don't care if I do take another of them hot brandies. How did I get back? Well now, it shows what profound ignorance the human mind is capable of for you to ask such a question. It is mathematically the very nature of vortex rings to return to the place from which they started; all their motions are fixed and defined from the very moment when they comes into existence, and what they was at first to that they must return. So it happened that arter goin' through the material universe in this way I were vortexed exactly back through the aperture of the tank from which I started, only that as I should have been I dropped outside into my chair, and the ring was whisked into the tank and snuggled down into the hole in the ether which had long been achin' for it; in the words of the hymn, it were, indeed, an aching void. Perhaps you may be inclined to doubt this here yarn, but it's as true as any that you will hear from a scientist for many a long day, particularly if the scientist is of a speculative turn of mind.

A Western man lately called at the Chicago Tribune office to show the editor a patent corset that he said was bound to revolutionize society. "You see," he said, "it's just the same as the ordinary corset in all its essential particulars. But there are several attachments not found in the ordinary corset, and which form the particular charm and merit of my patent improved corset—"The Absent Friend Recalled," as I poetically call it. Round the central section of the corset there extends, as you will see, a hinged clasp—a curious and yet very simple arrangement of powerful springs, so arranged that the pressure they exert can be graduated at pleasure, and as instantaneously exerted or removed. The compression varies from that of a timid and unaccustomed friend whose muscle is imperfectly developed, or who has a boil on the side of his elbow, up to that exerted by a Hercules when engaged in strangling a boa constrictor; on the scale they are marked, you see, from G 3 up to AA 11, the equivalent in pounds being given, so that the young lady can set her corset so as to squeeze her precisely so much and no more, when she has discovered by experiment—as she can easily do—her betrothed's hugging power. Thus, if a woman has no lover, or her admirer has gone to the lodge, or to see another, or is out of town, all she has to do is to put on her automatic corset, touch the spring, and, with a little exercise of the imagination, recall the absent one."

A Shot.

Quoth a wise-man to a youth one day:

"Tell me your aim in life, I pray."

"A mighty general I'd be,"

Replied the youth, ambitiously.

Then quoth the stripling to the sage:

"Tell me your aim in your old age."

Then said the sage, a little tired:

"Aim? Oh! I have no aim; I've fired."

A dress woven from the webs of the large spiders common in South America has been presented to Queen Victoria by the Empress of Brazil. It exceeds in fineness any manufactured silk known, and is very handsome. Spaniards, nearly two hundred years ago, endeavored to make gloves, stockings, and other articles of spiders' webs, but they yielded so little profit, and necessitated so much trouble, that the manufacture was abandoned. In 1710 the calculation was made that the webs of 700,000 spiders would be required for about forty yards of silk. Such dresses are occasionally seen in South America.

At Monaco and Nice the gambling season has been good. Many noble amateurs lost their fortunes, and a few made theirs, among the latter being an Englishman, who won three hundred thousand francs one evening at Trenta et Quarante, and was arrested just after the bank closed. Two days afterward he was released, and it was proved that he had made believe to commit a petty theft, so that he could be arrested and kept two days from playing.

Two old Texas rangers, who had just helped bury a neighbor, were talking about religion, and one asked the other how pious he thought it was possible for a man to get in this world if he was in real earnest. "Waal," said the other, reflectively, "I think of a man gets so 't he can swop steers or trade horses without lyin', 'at he'd better pull out for the better land afore he has a relapse."

X. is the most furious of advocates of equality.

The other day his valet brought him a letter, saying: "A gentleman left this and said to give it to my master."

"Your 'master,' you blasted aristocrat," yelled X., with a frightful whack on the nose, "can I never knock it into your head that all men are born free and equal? What did I hire you for if you're going to talk about 'masters'?"

A handsome young woman steps out of a coach and says to the driver: "What do I owe you?"

"Three francs, your ladyship," says the coachman.

"Keep the change," says his fare, handing him a five-franc piece.

"Bully for you, old gal!" says the jarvey, relapsing into naturalness.

It seems that even the blessed bees have learned to adulterate. Some parties took the trouble to place a quantity of glucose at the doors of their hives, and the insects actually made use of it to sophisticate their honey. It is to be hoped that it won't occur to anybody to put cotton within reach of the silk worms.

An old negro woman once prayed: "O Lord, let there be a full heaven and an empty hell."

CORRESPONDENCE.

VOLCANO, AMADOR COUNTY, CAL., April 21, 1879.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—The crops of Kearneyism which has rooted firmly in the rankest and foulest soil of our prosperous State are rapidly maturing worthy of the seed. The community of Volcano and vicinity is largely composed of Italians, the greater number being an illiterate and unskilled people, equaling in clannishness the Chinese. This town is situated upon both sides of Sutter Creek—wide, with but little grade, gathering a large volume of water from distant water-sheds during the rainy season. The creek proper had been diligently worked in former years by horse-power and other machinery, especially above Volcano, the Italian population owning the larger interest. A portion of that ground was never bottomed on account of the strong flow of water beneath the surface, and the necessarily extensive mode of hoisting gravel to a point above the surface requisite to obtain sufficient grade for the extraction of the gold. The Volcano Mining Company purchased some two hundred acres of this ground, and ditches conveying water for working purposes, from the many different owners, to whom the ground was practically worthless. The company, as an experiment, erected hoisting and pumping machinery, with water as the motive power; renewed and built extensive aqueducts, consisting of fluming and iron pipes. The cost so far has been probably $25,000. All claims for labor done or otherwise were promptly paid on demand. Americans and a larger number of Italians were employed. A contract to load the cars with gravel was let to an American, who employed from five to fifteen Chinamen. The company have had no returns for their outlay as yet, as all the necessary dead-work has not been completed. On the 7th of this month, 7 o'clock P. M., a strong charge of Giant or Hercules powder was exploded on or under the iron pipe leading the water to the hoisting works with a pressure of one hundred and fifty feet. Four feet of the pipe was torn to ribbons. Prompt action repaired the damage in three hours. On the 17th inst., after dark, some one thousand five hundred feet of new fluming, one and a half miles above the mine, was thrown down, and the lumber torn with axes, picks, and crowbars so as to be worthless, and a large iron pipe carrying water from one side of Pioneer Creek to the other mutilated by punching it full of holes for two hundred feet in length. The damage to the aqueducts, including the filling of the mine with water, is heavy. The company suspended all work, which will be permanent unless the perpetrators are brought to justice. Previous to this frequent threats to injure the company's property were made by a number of the Italian population here, and all prominent citizens of all races firmly believe that the practical miscreants were Italians, incited by a number of their countrymen. Every one of those will vote for Mr. Kearney's Constitution. A large and unanimous meeting, attended by all Americans who were cognizant of the circumstances, was held last Saturday, at the town hall, condemning in plain but eloquent terms the atrocious acts of the foreign villains, and pledging themselves to exhaust all lawful means to illuminate the dark deeds of communism destructive of the recently revived prosperity of a not wealthy country. The Donovan Exodus.

"BENEFIT FOR MIKE DONOVAN.—This well-known boxer will take a benefit, tendered by his admirers, at the Standard Theatre, to-morrow evening. The benefit is given in conjunction with Mr. Zahn, the pedestrian. An excellent bill is offered, and the sparring of Donovan himself will be the principal feature of the evening. Mike deserves a good house, for he is a clever and genial man, and well liked by all who have had friendly companionship with him. He is very anxious to make sufficient out of the affair to enable him to return East and give McClellan another show, which the latter, we understand, so much desires. Donovan intends, after meeting McClellan, to return to this coast to permanently reside."—Pacific Life.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—From the above it will be seen that California is about to lose, at least for a season, one of its estimable and much-loved citizens. Would you not in your earnest zeal for the defeat of the new Constitution, and your admiration for the noble, self-sacrificing endeavors of Mr. Kearney, induce Mr. Mike Donovan to forego his apparent rash intention? Is there no way to prevent this exodus of our useful and valued citizens. Shall our loved state be depopulated, and no voice raised against such fearful loss? I have despaired of inspiring the efforts of the Chronicle. It turns aside from my entreaties on behalf of the poor, industrious, and deserving, and ruthlessly permits such patriots and pillars of the State to shake the mud off his brogans and go East, or to the devil should he choose. "The Chinese must go!" Let 'em go, but in the cause of humanity, progress, civilization, and advancement, in fact in the cause of the bright future of our State, the national emblem—eagle—stars and stripes, Hail Columbia, Yankee Doodle, and every other high and lofty consideration, step right in with the ARGONAUT and prevent, I beseech you, the fearful sacrifice contemplated by Mr. Mike Donovan, and the dire effects that will be produced upon our State and the nation at large. Stop this—it must be stopped. X.

A Reminiscence of the Convention.

Who that sat under the heavy affliction does not remember the never-ending homilies of those members of the late Constitutional Convention who would have ejected the delegate Fawcett from his seat? Certainly none but the philosophic mind which is determined to live in peace and cast all disturbing pictures out as devils from the sanctuary. Yet how soon does it appear to have been forgotten that, at the time we speak of, another attack was scarce less openly spoken of, and arguments were in every one's mouth in defense or antagonistic to the tenure of the Honorable Dave Terry, who, as was generally conceded, would be the next subject of attack by the belligerent element of the body. Why is it so soon forgotten that this matter was heard no more of from the time that the cooked-up letter from Stockton was followed by the apostasy of the Honorable ex-Chief Justice? and why is the memory of this matter, which was regarded by many of the members of the Convention as a most corrupt bargain between the gentleman named and those with whom he had not the slightest sympathy, allowed to rest unpublished, while the honorable gentleman is playing the rôle of leader to those who bought him, with the privilege of remaining unmolested as a delegate in a body where many people think he had no right to sit. FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

There was a frog and a ephalant, and the ephalant it sed to the frog: "Were wude you be if I wude step onto you?"

The frog it sed: "You must be a mity big fool if you think sech a act as that wude make me go away."

The ephalant sed he ment wot wude be come of the frog, wich thot a wile and then said, the frog did: "Wel, I wont deny that if you done it a purpous, and bore on hard as you cude, it wude make me hoppin mad!"

Then the ephalant made a figger 8 out of his proboscus, wich is their way to smile, and wocked a way like he was tickle to deth, but wen I tickled Missy, thats my sisters, nose with a gras wile she was a sleep she snoze and rubd it with her fofinger, and her feets is ticklish, too, on their bottoms.

Mister Pitchel, thats the preacher, he says: "One time a frog and a hop tode they met, and the frog sassed the hop tode cos it was clumsy, but the tode it sed: 'If you wil come here on this flat stone, were we can start even, Ile beat you jumpin high, best 2 out of 3.'

"So thay done it, and the first time the tode it only jest cleered the stone, but the frog it went up so high that it hurt itself comin down, and cudent jump no more at all, and the tode beat it the 2 uther times."

Then Billy he spoke up and said: "So the tode won the rubber!" and Mister Pitchel he sed: "William, I dont kno wot you mean by rubber, cos its a word wich isent in the Bible, and is the speech of the worldly and the sinfle; but, William, it is true that it was ordained by Providence that the tode got a way with the od game."

Marbles is the game for me, yes in deed, but no snatch up, and tit, tat, to is mity good fun too, wen I can git 3 in a ro.

An now Ile tel you a story about a bear. One day the bear he went a mung a flock of sheeps and picked out a nice little labm, and cot it, and the labm it said ba-ba-ba! cos it kanew it was a goin for to be et evry little tiny bit up. But the bear took it up in his fore poze, like it was a baby, and set up ful lenth and rocked it, and said: "There, there, never mine, my preshous darlin, were does it hurt you?"

But the labm kep a hollerin louder and louder, cos wile the bear was a smilin, and singin hush a boy, he was a skaweezin titer and titer all the time. Bime by the ole ram he seen wot was up, and he dropped his hed, the ole ram did, and come like he was shot out of a gun and let him have it in stumach of his belly, and dubbed him up like he was a razor, and sent him a rolin over an over with out his preshous darlin. And wen the bear had puld hisself to gether agin and shuke the dust out of his hair, he sed: "I hav obserfed that labms tails was quickern litening, but I didnt kanow thay was powerfuller, too."

Jest then he see how it was, for there stood the old ramb a holdin down his head ready for to let him have it agin, and shakin it, like he said: "That little shaver wudent make more than a mouffe for a feller like you, I gess you better serve up the ole man."

But the bear he wocked off a shakin hisn, too, much as to say: "I dont hanker after a dinner wich gose aginst my stumack like that!"

Uncle Ned, wich has ben in Injy and evry were, he says one day he see a grisly bear a settin on a log pickn his teeths with his cloz, like he had et a nice dinner, and a mitionary preacher was with Uncle Ned, and the mitionary preacher he said: "You wudent spose there was any thing in this barren country for sech a great beest to live on, woud you? But Providence cares for all His creeters, and gives em the means to sustain life."

Uncle Ned he sed: "Bout how much, now, does it take for this fellers board by the week?"

The preacher he sed: "They are mity big eaters. Mebbey he cude git on with about a haf dozen cafs, and a pig or two, with a small flock of sheeps, and a horse team, or when the berry seasen is good, jest a saddle horse."

Uncle Ned he thot a wile, and then he sed: "Wel, that seems a hily curious way for Providence to sustain the lifes of His creeters, dont it?"

Then the preacher sed: "Yes, it does require a goodeal of slotterin, thats a fact, but the animals wich is kill blong to the natif niggers, wich dont reely need so much of this world's goods if they hav lain up treshers in heven."

Wen the bear had gon thay went to were he had et, and found Providence had been sustainin the pore creeters life with the preachers sadle horse, and that mitionary preacher he acted jest like he haddent lain up any treshers in heven his ownself, you never seen sech a fewrious mitionary preacher!

I ast my father: "Is there any tribes of sabbidges wich eats worms?" and he spoke rite up and said: "Certainly, the Demmicrats eats em."

Then I sed I thot Demmicrats was wite fokes, but my father he jump up and kicked over his chair and said: "Wite fokes be dum busted! Do you think all fellers wich ain't Niggers and Chinymen and red Injins is wites? Dont you spose that some thing depends on how a man votes? You ben readn that Xammer agin, that wot ails you! I tel you, my son, and you must bleef a man wich, like yure Uncle Edard, is a grate travler and has ben to Jackous Canyon and evry were—I tel you it aint enoufgh for a Demmicrat to have a wite skin, wen it is wosh, and a wite livver, wen he aint drunk, for to make him a wite foke; he has got to be wite all thru, like a turnip. No, Johnny, dont let their noose papers deceef you; the Demmicrats is stil a barbarous tribe."

Then I ast him a other time did thay reely eat werms, and he sed: "Wy, I spose so, of course. It stans to reason that a Demmicrat wil eat enny thing, cos peeples is Demmicrats and Republicans with their stumackses. Sho me the contence of a fellers belly and Ile cast his plitiche harrowscope like a litenin calculator. Its the stumack, Johnny, wich is the man, and if this new Constution is a dopted it wil be the biggest vctry for Denis Karny's Chinees cook wich that sportsman has ever won by wipin his nose on the pudden bag and spittin in the hash!"

Two sad cases have recently occurred out West: One was that of some road agents who tried to rob an insurance agent and were met with a request to be allowed to take their lives. The other was the case of a book agent, who was knocked down by some ruffians and sold a bible to the leader.

That Hand.

We sat alone; your little hand
Lay on the table by my own.
Only a little hand, and yet
I can not, while I live, forget
The tremor of profound regret
When I saw how your hand had grown.

We parted; but your little hand
Lay on the table, cold and fair;
Wide was the scope its numbers spanned;
Three bright-robed queens, serene and bland;
Two rampant jacks—a happy hand—
While I had only one small pair.

Mary's Lamb.

Mary had a little lamb;
Its fleece was white as snow;
But Mary's lamb (it was a ram)
Was bad—it butted so!

It went with her to school one day,
But 'twas against the rule;
For, when at school, it butted Mary, and all the rest at school.

And so the teacher turned him out—
To stop the school's alarm;
But the way that rammy butted her
Was a lesson to that marm.

He butted right, he butted left,
He butted front and rear;
He floored the marm that did him harm
Till Mary did appear.

A Strange Device.

The morn was very bright and clear,
When on Broadway there did appear
A youth in suit of checkered gray,
Well suited to an April day.
('Twas April, though she just had burst Away from March—in fact the first.)
And on his hands—hued like the doves—
He wore a pair of brand-new gloves;
And around his neck a blue cravat,
And on his curls a tall, silk hat,
And in his button-hole there hung
A bunch of violets, sweet and young.
But ah! alas! alack! alack!
Upon a card pinned to his back,
In letters large and most precise,
Appeared this very strange device—
"Please kick me!"

As on he went rose laughter gay,
"How jolly people feel to-day,
And / a pleasant sight must be,
For all who pass look back at me,"
He thought. And then his cane swung,
And softly to himself he sung:
"Tra-la-tra-la, 'tis well, 'tis well,
To be a handsome Broadway swell."
And little recked he the unkind
Request some friend had pinned behind
In capitals. Oh! yes indeed,
So huge that all who walked might read,
(How of in life we journey thus,
No vexing thought accompanying us;
With smiling front and in the rear
Some mischief clinging close and near.)
"Please kick me!"

PLAIN TALK FROM A MERCHANT.

It has been stated very frequently by the pro-Constitutionalists and their organ that our savings banks have merely figure heads to manage them, and that this great evil will be done away with provided the new Constitution is adopted. Let us look into this matter. The Hibernia Savings Bank is certainly a representative institution, founded many years ago, and no one will gainsay that it ranks all the other banks of the same kind on this coast. This banks is mainly the depository of all the earnings of our Hibernian laboring population, in amounts ranging from $500 to $5,000—this latter sum being the most that it will receive from any one depositor. Can it be denied that this bank is almost a national one with the Irish born and American Irish? Why do you then deposit with this bank if your managers are but figure-heads, and not entitled to your confidence? Can you be so foolish as to deposit the result of the sweat of your brows, and upon what depend all the comforts of your homes, with an institution that is doubtful, and conducted by straw men, who merely give their names to sustain it? If such is the case, then you must all be insane; but if insane you are, there is method in your madness.

For many years past, ever since its incipency I may say, the Board of Directors has been composed of the following gentlemen, viz: Myles D. Sweeney, President; C. D. O'Sullivan, Vice-President; Edw. Martin, Secretary and Treasurer; Joseph A. Donahoe, M. J. O'Connor, John Sullivan, P. Donahue, P. McArar, G. Touchard, R. J. Tobin, Consulting Board.

All these gentlemen, but with one exception, are Irishmen by birth or American-born Irish; one, Mr. G. Touchard, is a Frenchman. There isn't a native-born American in the Direction. From a very small beginning this bank has grown into the most prominent one in the State, its transactions taking the lead, not only in fixing the percentage to be loaned on city property, but also in establishing the rate of interest. You will not pretend to say that all this prominence has been brought about by figure heads—by men of straw. What nonsense. And how can you listen to men who will tell you such trash, or how can you place any reliance on papers the main object of which is to cram such stuff into you, and then ask you for your suffrage against wrongs that have no existence, and that are as false as hell itself? The gentlemen mentioned, and who invest your hard earnings for you, have been long and most favorably known to you all. They once were poor working or laboring men; commenced at the foot of the ladder; but, after years of honest and indefatigable toil, they have reached a point where they command your entire confidence, and justly, too. It is for this reason that you are perfectly willing to place implicitly in their custody your all. Whether the new Constitution passes or not, you will continue to act as you have done in the past, as you are doing to-day. Being perfectly satisfied in this respect, why will you allow yourselves to be influenced by those in whom you have not the slightest reason to confide, and who will persist in preaching to you sentiments so strongly opposed to your knowledge and convictions? Will you please answer this?

Having demonstrated to you that you are ever willing to trust these gentlemen with the management of everything you have in the world, the result of years of hard labor and economy, can you not trust them to guide your actions in times of such momentous importance, by their sound experience and disinterested advice? You certainly can not suspect that these gentlemen are controlled by any obnoxious corporation, or influence, because if you did think so, you certainly would not be so foolhardy as to thrust your heads in the lion's mouth. However, should any of you entertain any such thoughts, then be advised, give immediate notice to the bank that you desire to withdraw your deposits, call a meeting of the discontents, form another institution of safe deposit investment, and appoint for its President Denis Kearney; Vice-President, Wellock; Secretary, Dr. O'Donnell; and for directors such men as you can choose out of the following list: The De Youngs, Terry, Howard, Downey, Pratt, Beerstecher, etc., etc. Will you then be better satisfied? What is said of the Hibernia Savings' Bank will apply to almost every other similar institution in the State. Any humbug, that starts in to defraud the public, will succeed for a short time, more or less, in proportion to his brazen effrontery and cheek, and you will all acknowledge that in every community there are a vast number of innocent ones to be "gulled." There are black sheep in every flock, and so there are dishonest men in every community. If you think that the new Constitution will make men more honest than they are now, or more honest men, you are much mistaken, for the reason that honesty is inborn, and can not be legislated into any individual. We have had breaches of trust, defalcations, robberies, etc., from the beginning of the world; we are having them to-day, and we shall continue to have them just so long as this globe revolves. I repeat, you can not legislate honesty any more than you can pump the waters of the Pacific into the Atlantic Ocean, or vice versa. This is only one instance where you are being deluded. Rest assured that there are many, many more. Open your eyes, and be no longer led by the nose to your perdition, for the benefit of calculating political tricksters and falsifiers.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 24, 1879. T. P.

A sort of colored Talmage trial has been proceeding in Georgia, a colored preacher being tried before the dusky ecclesiastical court for stealing bacon. The verdict was that "the Rev. Moses Bledsoe am ackwitted of de situations dat he actual did stole de pork, and 'twas not shode dat somebody else miten't have been wearin his cloze; but de brudder is hereby fectionately warned dat in de future he must be more keerful."

A cartridge is said to have been invented which floats on the water, tastes good to ducks, and blows their heads off when they chew it. It is suggested that they should eschew it.

"I've got a frightful cold," someone said to "Cham," "and I don't know what to do to arrest it."

"Swallow a policeman!"

Perspiration is about the only honest sweat from a mean man.

AN INTERCEPTED LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, May, 3, 1879.

MY DEAR MADGE.—We are not in the tumultuous state of excitement which you might imagine, with the great Boucicault in town, and a noble detachment of prima donnas beside. I refuse to say prime donne, George Augustus Sala notwithstanding, for the prima donna has become so almost exclusively an American article that it is high time the word were pluralized according to the rule of English spelling. We have had no new operas during the week, although Mignon is to be produced to night, with Cary as "Mignon." The subscribers, naturally enough, are not very enthusiastic over the week's performance, but it is an ill wind that blows nobody good. I like to go on an off night sometimes just to see a lot of people made happy who have been stopping at home on the big nights, longing and yearning for three dollars which they could afford to invest in a seat at the opera. They are the brothers and sisters, the clerks, the cousins, the poor relations, if no one represents the term, or the bosom friend of the more fortunate subscribers who give away their seats for the night. The house, naturally, is not so brilliant. One does not see such toilets, such bonnets, such jewels, but there is just as much enjoyment. Why, then, does not every one who does not go give their seats to some poor, longing, music-hungry one? Everybody knows somebody who would like to go and can't. Those little white iron backs loom up like miniature tombstones behind an empty seat, and the singers, sing they never so sweetly, like nothing less than an echo in an opera house. Yet Litta, they say, was never in such voice nor sang so charmingly as on Wednesday night in Lucia, when nearly all the subscribers stayed at home, when very few gave their seats, and very few outsiders paid to get in. It was originally the intention to repeat Faust this week, but the management began to realize their obliquity of vision and wisely withdrew it to offer one new opera this week, and have only repeated Il Trovatore and Un Ballo in Maschera. Un Ballo and Rigoletto are the best things they have done this season, and if they would allow people breathing time between there would be really no objection to repeating the delightful music once and again. On dit that Strakosch is having a bad time every day throwing oil upon the troubled waters of discord, which surge up now and then over the footlights from the orchestra to Signor Pantaleoni. I wish you could hear the various pronunciations and interpretations given to this name, Madge, which upon the face of it invites comments, jokes, and most atrocious puns. But then, they call Lazzarini lazzaroni, much to the little fellow's disgust, I trow, and Pantaleoni gets off rather easily after all. What a temper he has! He interpolated a lot of Italian billingsgate in a recitative the other night, and did not stop to put it to music either. Now

"I love that language, that soft, bastard Latin, Which melts like kisses from a female mouth, And sounds as if it should be writ on satin, With syllables which breathe of the sweet south, And gentle liquid accents gliding all so pat in, That not a single accent seems uncouth;"

But when it comes to a big irate Italian burling it in full force to buffo style at a discordant orchestra, it really interferes with the harmony of a perfect operatic performance. The musicians have been retaliating upon him ever since. The pitch, in any case, is higher than the singers have been used to, and, as Jack says, they "just love to lift Pantaloon's." In point of fact, it is a very interesting little quarrel among themselves, but rather hard upon the public; don't you think so? Under the circumstances it is to be hoped that Max Strakosch's cruse of oil will hold out like the Bible widow's, and quiet the troubled waters as soon as possible. We are not to have Pantaleoni in Mignon, but Mr. Gottschalk. Mr. Gottschalk is about as tame a young man as ever walked the stage. He has rather a good presence, and not altogether a bad voice, but he should never be set before the public except under the influence of a galvanic battery. Mr. Westberg sings the part of "Wilhelm Meister." He is the third of the three little tenors with the three little voices. I should hardly say that, for Adams' voice is not little; but his huskiness is like Mrs. Oates' cold, we shall not witness its convalescence. Westberg's voice is very sweet, and smooth, and small, and if he is not frightened into seven fits by the importance of the undertaking—for he seems a modest, bashful boy—his "Wilhelm Meister" may be very good. Little Lazzarini quite excelled himself in Un Ballo, more especially in the first part, for his voice does not last well; but anything more absurd than the embrace of the lovers on that wild, gibbon-decorated scene you can not think. Madame Roze in moments of emotion—and she really seems to feel what she can not sing—rises to her full height, as the novelists say; looms up in all the majesty of her rich beauty until she towers yards, it would seem, above the little tenor, who meanwhile grapples with his high notes like a little major. He has a fashion of sisking down (to get under the note, Jack says) and rising with the swell of sound with a glance of sublime triumph which is quite irresistible. You should see Marie Roze's domino in Un Ballo. To quote an ardent little lady, she looks in it like a "gilt-edged angel." It is of white lace—Spanish lace, I should think—and as a disguise is a filmy thing of beauty it is superb. She is as large as Titians herself in the dark maroon velvet which she wears in the first part, but the gossamer web conceals her too full outlines, and she is as beautiful as a dream. How I do long sometimes, when she begins to sing, to go out somewhere and buy some high notes for her. What a magnificent prima donna she would be if she only had a voice. Cary as "Ulrica" has only one short scene, but as "Mignon" and "Amneris" we shall have more of her. The fates be thanked for so much at least. I supposed Litta will be at her best in "Fillina," with its embroidered music, for she has something of the Di Murska style in that sort of thing. Poor Di Murska! I thought of her often as the story moved on in Un Ballo the other night. She made a very shadowy-looking "Oscar," but she sang its music for all there was in it, as the writers say. Miss Lancaster, by the way, did so very much better than was expected that the audience accepted it quite good naturedly, but it will be many a long day before she can be fairly billed as a prima donna. Why did not Litta sing the part. It is not unworthy the young artist. Ah! perhaps we are yet to have a grand coup with the three when stagnation seriously threatens. We must wait.

Arrah na Pogue has been reconstructed once more with Boucicault as "Shaun." I have seen better "Shauns," for, although the great Dion is inimitable as the rollicking Shaughraun, "Shaun" is a graver and deeper fellow, and sentiment, I take it, not even the extravagant Irish sentiment, is much in Boucicault's acting line. If we were not over-familiar with it we should all think Arrah na Pogue a far better play than the Shaughraun. There is more light and shade, there is more of that truest pathos where the smiles chase the tears, and the tears the smiles. For some reason—perhaps a deep admiration for his genius, his versatility, his industry, his fertile wit, his plagiaristic talent, if you like—I never lose sight of the authorship of Dion Boucicault when I see one of his plays, whether or not he be there to interpret it. There is so much the mark of the skilled workman in everything he does that even when my feelings are wrought upon I say to myself a moment afterward, "How cleverly that was done." How really odd it seemed to see our old friend, the "O'Grady" in other hands than those of Harry Edwards, and yet I have seen Harry Edwards himself play "Shaun," so there must have been another "O'Grady" on that occasion at least. Comparisons are invidious. Harry Edwards played it his own way, and nobody else played it just like him, even although they played it quite as well. What an aristocratic "O'Grady" he made of him, too, a touch, I fancy, that would suit Boucicault, for I know he likes to mark the class distinctions of the Green Isle. Frank Lawlor makes him very much more of an Irishman and in that is not far wrong. He plays it well, too, when he once gets in earnest, but he is very palpably ill at ease for a time, and he needs to cultivate his stage walk. What is the matter with Jeffries-Lewis this week. Where is the high-spirited, somewhat defiant "Miss Fanny Power" of Cabintely. I scarcely recognized our old friend in the half-petulant, half-indifferent young woman into which Miss Lewis has transformed her, and I do not fancy the change. I liked better the old "Fanny" with all her various moods, for she was very much in earnest in any one of them, and her love was not "a cowlip ball to fling a moment's pretty pastime." Such sentiment as this young heroine bestows upon "Bemish McCool" would not be flattering to one of those swallow-tailed young popinjays who seem so plentiful this season. Miss Lewis' change of style is too abrupt, and in this instance ill advised. Miss Ada Gilman is quite as delightful a little "Arrah" as she was "Moya." As a cantatrice she does not shine, for that song up on the battlements had a very vague and undefined sort of a tune, but she is really a nice little actress. She seems to have an infinity of stage tact, and, like Dion Boucicault himself, she takes time enough for everything. I observe that when she has a serious speech to make, it never loses a shadow of its meaning. She has a trick of waiting a second or two for stillness to fall, and people involuntarily stop their chatter to see what is going to take place. The setting of the play is fine, but if the town keeps up its percentage of unemployed talent they might have found a couple somewhere to do the barn-door jig. The man in this instance seemed to have been visited with a severe attack of melancholia, and his partner, like himself, did not know how to dance. It is a little thing, and of but minor importance, but when they saw fit to give us one scene—that of the Castle Cliff—painted in two different lights, and handsome pictures they made, too, we began to think we had a right to be fastidious. We have not been told what follows Arrah na Pogue, but we have been told that Fanny Davenport follows Boucicault. Poor girl! I hope she will reverse the first decision which followed her first appeal to our public. It was in the heyday of her time at the Fifth Avenue, and she was the American high-priestess of dry goods. She was a spoiled darling in New York and elsewhere, but we would none of her. "What do they want?" she asked, when she had given us marvel after marvel in pink, and blue, and white, and yellow, and whatever else was the rage of the moment, which had conquered New York. "What do they want?" In terror she spoke, letting sink her plumes till they trailed in the dust—till they sorrowfully trailed in the dust, as it were. It finally dawned upon her that we wanted an actress. She was very good-natured about it, too, I must say, for she is said to have remarked sorrowfully: "San Francisco likes me, but I like San Francisco." But the lady has studied, traveled, and worked since then, and comes back perhaps with something of the same fascination which haunts the Rice Brothers. However, I am looking too far ahead, and no one in this life should count for longer than a week. That is quite enough time to take care of in advance. We are to have Aida on Monday night at the Grand Opera House. Every man, woman, and child who has been interviewed on the all-absorbing opera subject has been waiting for Carmen and Aida. So the stampede will begin; music, "Haste to the wedding," or to that effect.

Yours, hopefully,

BETSY B.

THE DIRECTORS OF THE

Hibernia Savings & Loan Society

TO ITS

Depositors and Borrowers.

We have carefully considered what would be the effect of the adoption of the proposed new Constitution upon your interests and upon the trust confided to us; we have been aided in our examination of the question by men of tried ability and integrity, and we are now constrained by a sense of duty and responsibility to state to you the conclusion we have reached. In thus addressing you we have no private or personal objects in view. This Bank has no capital stock. All its earnings, in excess of its necessary expenses, are divided equally among all its depositors, without any preference or distinction whatever. The average amount to the credit of each depositor is only seven hundred and eighty-two 14-100 ($782 14-100) dollars, and the earnings of its sixty-seven thousand three hundred and seventeen (67,317) depositors, since the Bank was established, amount to twelve millions eight hundred and seventy two thousand five hundred and forty-two 63-100 ($12,872,542 63-100) dollars. Our depositors, collectively, own a large capital, but individually they are not capitalists nor monopolists. They are respectable working people, by the use of whose money this Bank has largely aided in reducing the rate of interest on money, within twenty years, from two per cent. per month to seven per cent. per annum. Borrowers at this Bank are chiefly of the same class.

Our relations with you, hitherto, whether as borrowers or depositors, encourage us to hope that what is here stated may have some force in determining your action. We are bound by the obligations of race—bound by every tie—to sympathize with you, and we deplore the unjust and unfortunate competition with which you have to contend; we know that times are hard, but we also know that an unwise decision of the pending question will make times harder. Your condition is not so bad that it may not be made worse, and we are as confident as men can be of anything in the future that the adoption of the new Constitution will only aggravate the evils of which you now complain.

In part it is so confused, inconsistent, and absurd, that it must lead to protracted controversy and litigation. Its scheme of taxation is arbitrary, unjust, and impracticable. It proposes to tax (1) depositors on their pass books; (2) to tax the Bank on its mortgages; (3) to tax the coin secured by the mortgages; and (4) it authorizes the taxation of dividends. It provides for taxing all contracts and obligations of every description as so much property, and it gives the Legislature power to increase or diminish the rate of taxation upon any particular property—power to make one kind of property pay nearly all the taxes required by the State—a power which must lead to infinite strife, contention, bribery, and corruption.

It is our deliberate judgment that the new Constitution would tend to make money scarce and dear; to fetter industry; to discourage enterprise; to prevent the establishment or continuance of factories and workshops; to diminish the value of property, and to hinder the construction of buildings and other improvements which go to develop the State and give employment to workmen; that it is revolutionary and destructive in its spirit and purpose, and tends to create discord and hatred between classes, and that it would do more harm to working people than to any other class.

We, therefore, earnestly and respectfully advise you that you would promote the welfare of the State and your own interests by voting against the adoption of the new Constitution.

TO OUR DEPOSITORS.

On the eve of an election which must decide whether the new Constitution is to be the supreme law of the land, it seems to us, Directors of Savings Banks, entrusted by you with the safe keeping and investment of the fruits of your labors, that it is our duty to give you our views on this important subject.

Under the old Constitution the State has prospered and its varied resources have been developed to a large degree. This could not have been the case if its provisions had been unsuited to our material progress. It has been attained under the operation of a fundamental law which it is now proposed to set aside for an experimental Constitution, full of crudities and dangerous innovations.

The rules by which the rights of persons and property are governed have been laid down with unmistakable accuracy by Courts created by the people, and enjoying the public confidence. We do not think it wise to accept the uncertain for that which is established and understood.

The elaborate discussions elicited by the present contest confirm the impression that a few amendments will bring the old Constitution into harmony with the necessities of the times; these changes can be accomplished without giving a shock to the entire business interests of the Coast, or running the hazard of destroying the confidence hitherto reposed in us by Eastern and European communities.

Incidentally, the adoption of the proposed Constitution will also hinder the operations, and therefore impair the usefulness, of Savings Banks, affecting not only the depositors, but also the borrowers, who have hitherto profited by the large aggregation of funds available for loans, in competition with those of private money lenders.

These Savings Banks owe their existence to you. Your deposits have built them up. An injury to them is an injury to you.

As Directors of your Savings Banks, as conservative members of this community, as citizens who have sincerely at heart the welfare of the State, we have given to these question the attention they deserve: we have carefully weighed the arguments adduced for or against the new Constitution, and we view with grave apprehension the possibility of its adoption. We feel bound to say to you that we are decidedly of the opinion that it should not be adopted. We therefore most earnestly advise you to VOTE AGAINST the new Constitution.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 30, 1879.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT.—Dear Sir:—In your issue of Saturday last a statement is made that the Weber Piano Company have lent their assistance in publishing a seven-page pamphlet to convince the citizens of San Francisco that Marie Roze is a prima donna, etc. As representatives of the Weber Piano on this coast, permit us to say that your statement has no foundation in fact, as the pamphlet in question contains only the opinions of the leading Eastern papers on Marie Roze, a general endorsement of the Weber Piano from the great musical authorities of the world, and a copy of a letter addressed by Madame Roze to Albert Weber, wherein a handsome tribute is paid to the excellence of his pianos. This warm commendation on the part of Madame Roze Mr. Weber justly considers to possess unusual significance, hence his reason for publishing it—the reason obviously being that Madame Roze, as prima donna of Her Majesty's Opera, London, the Grand Opera, Paris, and the Academy of Music, New York, has tried all the leading pianos of the world, and consequently thoroughly tested their respective merits. Madame Roze's claims are too firmly established to need defense at our hands—her reputation being world-wide; her laurels having been won in the leading opera houses of Europe long before she ever thought of visiting the United States. If any further evidence on this point were necessary, it is afforded by the unanimous praise bestowed upon Madame Roze by the daily press of our own city. Respectfully, SHERMAN, HYDE & Co.

WHERE TO

SPEND THE SUMMER.

IF YOU WANT A THOROUGHLY enjoyable place, go to the

GEYSER SPRINGS.

Medicated Baths for the sick; Swimming Baths, Bowling Alleys, Shooting Gallery; pleasant Picnic Grounds for the well. In remodeling the Medicated NATURAL Steam Bath, due regard has been observed to give special privacy to ladies. This Bath removes TAN-FRECKLES, SALLOWNESS, BLOTCHES, and all IMPERFECTIONS from the skin, and is recommended by many physicians who have tested its value. A magnificent Swimming Bath has been constructed at a large outlay.

The house has been completely remodeled since last summer, and now is not surpassed by any in the State. The stage ride to this glorious mountain resort can not be surpassed in the world, while the very atmosphere, rarified and aromatic from the breath of fragrant pines, fir, and laurel, stimulates the senses like old wine.

For tickets and all information call at No. 2 New Montgomery Street, and 214 and 426 Montgomery Street. Rooms may be engaged by letter or telegraph.

Special arrangements can be made by the week and for families.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

DWIGHT C. KING, plaintiff, vs. MALISSA KING, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to MALISSA KING, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this twenty-fourth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

HON. MILTON S. LATHAM,

AS A WHOLE.

TERMS OF SALE—One-half cash, balance to be secured by mortgage on the property. Interest on the mortgage at the rate of eight per cent per annum.

This magnificent estate comprises all that finely located property described as follows: On the north line of Folsom Street, between Second and Third Streets—having a frontage of 137 1/2 feet on Folsom Street by 355 feet in depth, running to a Tehama Street rear entrance to grounds and stable on Hubbard Street—having a frontage of 80 feet on Hubbard Street. Enclosed on Folsom Street by an elegant iron fence, and on three sides of the property by substantial 24-inch brick wall, from 6 to 15 feet high, with marble walks, carriage drives, fine garden shade trees and four figures in marble.

The improvements consist of a modern built mansion, 65x 50, and addition, 50x40, all on solid brick foundation, with mansard roof and tower, three stories in all, built in the most substantial manner, and with every possible modern improvement.

First floor—Large drawing-room with bay windows, reception room, dining room, spacious halls and staircase, magnificent library and conservatory finished in most elaborate style.

In second story—Four large chambers, with rosewood plate-mirror panel folding doors, two bathrooms, ten bedrooms.

In the third story, main building—four large bedrooms, with large tower room above.

In basement—Billiard room and ten pin alleys, finished with inlaid panels, floors, and ceilings; large supper room, water closets, servants' bathroom, wine rooms, laundry, storerooms, porters' room, linen room, and housekeeper's apartments.

The main portion of the building, including all the principal rooms, the halls and billiard room, are elegantly finished in the highest style of the art and regardless of expense.

Five French plate-glass mirrors, fixtures in alcove, in rear of parlor and billiard room; elegant Italian carved mantels and low English grates; rosewood square and corner wash-stands, and all conveniences in plumbing work, finished in detail in the best possible manner.

Adjoining the spacious dining room is a large butler's pantry, containing burglar-proof vault for silverware and a lined silver closet.

Unusually large Library, with skylight and bay window, opening from one side into a large semi-circular Conservatory. This room, for size, light, and ventilation, is not equaled in the State, and was pronounced by the late Hon.
Wm. H. Seward to be the handsomest Library-room in America.

Stables and Carriage House,

Very large and roomy; built of brick, two stories, with cupola; finished above and below alike, with every possible convenience; paneled siding and ceiling in both stories; fitted up elegantly with ten stalls and two box stalls; ventilated all around the building, with separate stable for three cows.

Large Carriage House, 22 feet in the clear, light and airy, with large cases, with plate glass fronts, for harness.

Four large rooms finished in the second story of the stable for coachman, porter, watchman, and gardener.

Hay-loft, Granary, Stone Water-troughs, Carriage-wash,
Driveway; Water and Gas all over the premises.

Also large Barn-yard, Coal-house, Tool-house, Storeroom, and Hot-house, all enclosed with a substantial brick wall, and accessible in front or by private entrance on Hubbard Street.

This estate covers nearly an acre and a quarter of land in the very heart of the city, and surrounded by the private residences of John Parrott, Esq., A. J. Pope, Esq., J. O.
Eldridge, Esq., A. H. Forbes, Esq., and other fine proprieties. Folsom Street, between Second and Third, is one of the finest blocks in the city, paved and sewered, and accepted by the city. Drainage perfect.

This property is on the north side of the street, having the sun all day on its front side. With its beautiful lawn, choice shrubbery and shade trees, garden ornaments, and inlaid marble walks, it is every way desirable for the residence of a gentleman of taste. It is complete in all its appointments, and ready for occupancy. Folsom Street cars pass the property, and the Omnibus Railroad is within half a block.

To appreciate this property, go and see it.

The property will be sold in one lot, including Land,
Mansion, Stable, and appurtenances—excepting only the gas fixtures and three wood mantels.

For permission tickets to examine the property, apply to undersigned, or at the office of H. M. NEWHALL & CO., corner of Sansome and Halleck Streets. The house may be examined by parties desirous of purchasing, any day previous to the sale, between the hours of 12 M. and 3
P. M.

The sale will take place on the premises on the day advertised, rain or shine.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

THE MASONIC SAVINGS AND LOAN BANK,
Plaintiff, vs. EDWARD MAGUIRE and ELIZA MA-
GUIRE, Defendants.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in
and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to Edward Maguire and Eliza Maguire.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein (a copy of which accompanies this summons) within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; if served out of this county, but within this judicial district, within twenty days; or if served
out of said district, then within forty days—or judgment by default will taken against you.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court for the foreclosure of a certain mortgage described in the complaint and executed by the said Edward Maguire
and Eliza Maguire on the 4th day of June, A. D. 1877, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note, interest, taxes, street assessments, and attorney's fees, and costs, all
in gold coin; and in case such proceeds are not sufficient to pay the same, then to obtain an execution against said Edward Maguire for the balance remaining due; and also that the said defendants, and all persons claiming by, through,
or under them may be barred and foreclosed of all right,
title, claim, lien, equity of redemption, and interest to said
mortgaged premises, and for other and further relief.

And if you fail to appear and answer said complaint, as above required, the plaintiff will take default against you and apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 13th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

Perhaps we are wrong. We do not think we are, and if we did we would not admit it. It is a favorite idea of ours that we do not have half as much fun in this world as we are entitled to when we consider the very doubtful outlook in the next. If there is a hell—and there ought to be—it certainly follows that all who have not a pretty good assurance of a good time in the next world ought to lose no opportunity of innocent enjoyment in this; and if there should be no next, then of course it is a dead give away not to make the most of the present. Impressed with this leading idea, fond of the country, and possessing but little poetry or sentiment that does not associate itself with brooks and trees, with grassy banks and primal forests, with ocean views and mountain scenes, we never look upon a landscape painted by Hill or Keith that our imagination does not run away from the oil-smelling canvas and the narrow gilded frame to the boundless vista of field and forest. We never hear opera or concert song that we do not contrast the artificial piping sounds of brass and cat-gut and the narrow-chested prima donna, with her false teeth, hollow smile, and painted face, with the music of babbling brooks, breezes whispering through pines, birds singing in their leafy cover. The roar of ocean, storm-lashed, beating its rocky shores, sounds more grand to us than trombone or bass drum. The woods and fields are not only God's temples, but they are His opera house, His gallery of painting, His museum of natural curiosities, His Jardin des Plantes, His Zoological Gardens, His Bois de Boulogne, His Hyde Park, His Champs de Mars. And when, in the full completion of the creative period, He looked upon His work and pronounced it well done, we do not believe that He said to the lonely pair, nor through them to their progeny, "the seventh day thou shalt keep holy, by not looking upon the wonderful creation I have wrought; thou shalt keep it holy by closing your eyes to the splendid creations I have produced; thou shalt keep it holy by closing your ears to the music of my myriad instruments, chanting melodies from stream, and tree, and bird, and insect; thou shalt keep it holy by singing psalms through your noses in pent-up, ill-ventilated buildings you have reared; thou shalt keep it holy by not listening to the sermons of mine that come from stones and plants, but by listening to the angry and passionate contentions of small-minded men groveling over dogmas, articles of faith, and formulas of church belief." And because we believe in this worship of the beautiful, this freedom of the fields, we do not accord to the beer-guzzling and gin-drinking the right to make God's sabbath-day hideous with the din and racket of military and turn-verein displays. We would tame the wild hoodlum who would set at defiance the amenities of life by a Sunday's debauch with the chastisement of the law.

All this preface is to introduce a description of our enjoyment of May-day at Healdsburg, on the banks of Russian River. We were invited there to deliver the May-day oration, and we hope our readers have forgotten our descriptions of other parts of our State, when we called them the most beautiful spots we had every seen, for we intend in this article to place ourselves deliberately on record by saying that the Russian River Valley at Healdsburg is the most beautiful spot on God's earth. We hope we are not irreverent when we hint that the good God made a mistake when he located Paradise somewhere on the Euphrates, or the plains of Babylonia, instead of Healdsburg, and we are not altogether sure that this is not the spot where the original Eden was planted. Its location has never been settled. The Vale of Cashmere, Toorkistan, and Armenia have claimed it, and at none of these places are the four rivers spoken of in the Biblical narrative. At Healdsburg we have Russian River and Dry Creek, and there are two other excellent places for rivers, the water of which may have entirely disappeared. And then we have the very highest evidence of the possibility that the serpent wriggled himself into this spot of primal innocence in the progeny he has left of Pike County farmers, who are there now in great numbers—indeed they compose a majority of the people, as indicated by the recent Constitutional election. Our oration, which was a very good one, and full of poetry quotations, and some gems of literature (stolen), strung out in fanciful words, was well enough adapted to a May-day frolic, where there had gathered from forty miles around the honest yeomanry—for Pike County is honest—and their families; but we should have been very much delighted if the amenities of social life had permitted us to have dealt these honest, unintelligent, prejudiced American farmers some sturdy blows of Saxon speech, for their abuse, and neglect, and lack of appreciation of the magnificent country they possess, the unspeakable privileges they enjoy, and to have denounced them, in firm, bold, but courteous language, for their abuse of their splendid heritage of republican liberty.

For here, amid these people, linger regretful memories that in the recent civil strife liberty did not die and slavery live—regret that the American Union was not destroyed and the bright banner of the stars and stripes was not dragged down and dishonored. Here, too, in this land of plenty, there festers and foment a jealous, angry feeling of the poor against the rich. Out from amid these homes of plenty, cottages clad in vines and climbing plants of clematis and of rose; farm houses embowered in flowers nestling in vineyards and hid in orchards of fruit; farms of fat valley lands valued at $300 per acre; a community in which for a generation no man or woman ever went supperless to bed; where there is abundance, plenty, health, wealth, and freedom; where every white man of twenty-one years of age is a free-man and a sovereign; here where on the faces of well-clad matrons and well-dressed children there is every evidence of God's bounty, this demon of jealousy has found root. Here at Healdsburg these Pike County farmers said: "Give us a change; any change of our organic law will improve our condition." We wish we could, by the wand of the necromancer, have taken them to the squalid huts of Ireland, where in squalid poverty children and pigs root together; to Scotland, where in the hovels of the peasantry there is a common bed for both sexes; to the plains of Lombardy, that fruitful and bountiful land nestling at the foot of the Julian Alps, where the haggard wife and mother swings the heavy mattox to cultivate the fruit and grain she may not dare to pluck; to Belgium, where women are worked with dogs in hand-carts; to Austria, where they drag the plow; to France, where young girls, with paniers on their backs, gather with brush and basket horse-droppings off the streets to bear it upon their weary shoulders to the summit of the hills to fertilize the vine, of the fruit of which they may not eat, and of the wine of which they may not drink. We would take them to Holland, where house and cow-stable is under the same roof; to Switzerland, where children are sent with goats to mountain pastures; to the great cities where gaunt-eyed, hopeless poverty sits enthroned, and where famine stalks abroad with its skeleton frame; and then we would bring them to San Francisco and show them the immigrants from these God-forsaken lands—these lands where men are slaves and women starve, where none of them vote, where for themselves, their wives, and children was the hopeless heritage of ignorance, poverty, and toil. We would have them listen while those aliens curse God and the American Constitution and the American laws, denounce rich men, and threaten a forcible appropriation of all our accumulations, in order that they might enjoy unearned beer, and gin, and bread, and live a life of idleness, debauchery, and crime—a wicked, devilish, alien mob, lead and hounded on by demagogues and knaves; and then we would send to their homes in Russian River Valley those native-born American farmers, and if each and every man of them did not get down upon his knees and kiss the sod, and thank God that he was a native-born American citizen, we would invoke the Genii to convert all the feet in the world into one great foot, covered with one great boot, that we might kick the ungrateful Missourian farmer from off the American continent.

But we had a jolly day notwithstanding these unnatural allies of the sand-lot would not let us talk politics to them. From among the country gentlemen some score or more of excellent riders, well mounted on good stock, clad in armor, rode in joust at the bugle's call, tilting for the ring. All the knights of good King Arthur of the Table Round, Sir Galahad, Lancelot, Gawain, and all the others of that mystic hero band, had their representatives in bold riders, and the victor crowned the queen. A mountain girl so sweet, so pretty, and so young that this mention of her name in the ARGONAUT will not spoil her innocence—a Miss Toombs—was crowned on the throne of roses by a diadem of flowers by Harry Truitt—Sir Lanval—the victor choosing her the Queen from other beauties. Chosen by other victorious knights—Bierce Litton, Sir Hector; George Seawell, Sir Morolt; Charles Brumfield, Sir Galahad, and Ed. Haight, Sir Denadam—were maids of honor to her youthful little majesty. Then came the banquet under the oaks, where we wandered from group to group, and ate and drank. It was a basket picnic, with enough of ambrosia for a banquet of the gods if the gods had been never so plenty, and enough of nectar to have made all Olympus drunk. Then came the Calathumpians, a Motley Crew of Comus. Such fantastic costumes; such fanciful equipages; such unearthly music from such uncouth instruments; such sorry Rozinantes of steeds—both horses and mules; such queer mugs of pasteboard faces, and such a joust at barrel hoop; such fun, and frolic, and jollity, we have seldom seen. After the banquet we strolled away from the Park to the burial ground, where, embowered in trees, festooned with flowers, a marble shaft marks the resting place of a dead friend, one of the heroes who gave his young life for his country—poor Rod Matheson—killed upon the battlefield of South Mountain. Let us keep him in kind remembrance—he died for us. The evening previous we had dined, a merry party of country and city folks, at the "Magnolia Farm"—a summer resort near the town, and a beautiful place it is; cherry trees seven feet in girth, and cream that came from cows. At early evening we attended at the theatre the operetta of Little Bo-Peep and Little Boy Blue, a charming pastoral, where the orchestra and actors were of the country and to the manner born—a play in which modesty was not an affectation, virtue a borrowed costume, where the roses of complexion were not imitated by French cosmetics, and in which Miss Katie Madeira, Susie McGilvray, Maude Moore, Cora Blackington, and Braxton Hyden carried off the honors—Angie Osborn, and Louisa Groves playing "Cockle Shell" and "Silver Bell;" and then the theatre was cleared of its benches and converted into a great dancing hall—the band, boys and young men native to the town—and the dance went on till the sun, glancing over the eastern hills, lit up the whole valley, every leaf and shrub and blade of grass sparkling as the rays of the morning sun reflected the rain drops that had fallen in the midnight shower.

"And never yet, since high in Paradise
O'er the four rivers the first roses blew,
Came purer pleasures unto mortal mind."

We came home—back to the turmoil and tumult of the dirty town; back to money-grubbing and politics; back to the scowling bandits of the sand-lot and to the beery faces and stinking breath of the demagogues who agitate them; back to wield the weary quill—

"Forced to drudge for the dregs of men,
And scrawl strange words with the barbarous pen;"

Back to chase phantoms and fight fiends; all the time toiling for pelf, the pursuit of which will bring softening of the brain, paralysis of the limbs, and, if there is a hell, will entitle us to a good long purgatorial residence in its warm and sulphurous atmosphere before our earthly stains and worldly taints are so purified that we may enjoy a forgetfulness of all this devilish greed and scramble for useless and unprofitable gain.

And now that this election is passed, and in the reorganization of political affairs we are called upon to elect a new administration, it is not improbable that we may be allowed to address the Pike County farmers in advocacy of one of them for the highest position on our State ticket. Our friend, John F. Swift, whom we hope may receive the Republican nomination for Governor, is a native of Pike County, Missouri. He is a farmer's son, a workman in the broadest sense of the term; an educated, intellectual, thinking, honest man. He is not rich enough to be dangerous and oppressive, nor poor enough to be discontented and agrarian. He has opposed corporations when they were wrong and exacting. He will not oppose them when they are working benefits to the people. He has sense enough to discriminate between great financial combinations that do unjust things, and those that enable wealth to aggregate itself for the accomplishment of beneficial results. There are corporations for railroad building, for gas, and water, for steamship navigation, and banks; there are eleemosynary and religious corporations, corporations for building dwellings, fruit drying, and irrigation. Some are oppressive, and some are not; some are well conducted, and some are not. A corporation is an artificial person in law. It is managed by individuals, some honest and some dishonest. It is through corporate organization that many persons of moderate means may compete on equal terms with the very rich.

To destroy and tear down corporations, to inordinately tax or annoy them, is a movement that aids the wealthy copartnership or individual, and makes a healthy competition impossible. Hence the man who says, "destroy corporations, send them all to a judicial massacre," is an unwise person; not to put too fine a point upon it, he is an idiot. Because, without corporations the Comstock mines would not have been developed, and the hundreds of millions that in the few past years have been distributed throughout the world would still remain locked in the great rock-ribbed fissure of the Comstock lode. The railroads in this State would not have been built; there was no individual or firm that had wealth or credit enough to have spanned our continent with iron; nor would we now be crossing the Sahara of Arizona, reaching out for the commerce of the southwest, if road-building had been confined to individual exertion. The same is true of the great steam lines that navigate the Pacific or engage in our coast and inland trade. Our church, school, and charitable organizations are incorporations. We hope now to have an opportunity for rational discussion of all these important questions, and we shall be sincerely grateful if this storm over the Constitution shall have so purified the political and party elements that we can calmly consider what is for the benefit of all and for the welfare of the State.

At last it would appear that sitting in a neat "roly-poly," behind a natty horse, driving hubby to the train, and bringing him home again on his return, has ceased to be the only occupation of the Oakland lady. There is a great spirit of industry abroad in the land, its wave has touched the Alameda shores, and the household divinities are full of its enthusiasm. Madame Ferrier, a French lady, who resides on Telegraph Avenue, has opened a school of flower painting on porcelain, silk, and china, and the maids and matrons of the metropolis trifle with the pigments, and paint for themselves and for their friends tea and dinner sets, satin casings for toilet bottles, etc., etc. Madame Ferrier is an experienced teacher, an artist herself in the true sense of the word, whose accomplishments are not confined to this branch, but who, remembering its popularity in her own country, has introduced it with success here. Her pupils improve rapidly, and after a few lessons are able to make a very fair effort at this method of decoration. Taking a common set of dinner ware these ladies paint on it flowers, borders, etc., and when the plates are baked the surface assumes a glossy appearance, and the colors are definitely fixed. Already have the mutterings which precede the exodus of Oaklanders in camping parties been heard, and the duster and luncheon dress have been drawn forth from the closet, and the most possible and picturesque places discussed for the week or two of

MISS THATCHER'S SUMMER AT THE SEA.

Miss Thatcher—Miss Melissa Thatcher—was fond of the sea; she sat and dreamed over it for hours; she would have taken it in those small white hands of hers and patted it if she could—only in that case it would have splashed and spit back at her like a cat. That strange, wild odor of brine; that strong, wet-fish, weedy, queer old smell was born in her nostril, she declared; and so of a summer, while others went into the mountains among the woods and lakes, she came down by the sea to mate the perfume that quivered upon her nerves and shook its wings in her throat.

So she sat one warm afternoon under the shade of a high rock, with the waves coming in and breaking softly at her feet, carrying up with them certain stray straws and bits of stick and laying them before her. She had been poking out with her sunshade some baby crabs from a cool nook they had found in a crack in the rock; but after she had tormented them a while she had idly allowed them to scabble away, and now with her hands limp and listless in her lap, her feet crossed, and her head tipped over against the black, sea-stained wall behind her, she was burying her gaze in the purple haze that hung upon the horizon and dipped into the water afar off.

"Sir!" she said, suddenly starting; then she colored a bit and looked over at a person quite a distance off who had a book in his hand. For a week and more, as she wandered on the sands, she had had the conviction borne in upon her that this person was watching her. Just now it had absurdly seemed as if he were standing by her side; but there he was, half lying on the beach away yonder, and, yes, he was watching her; but what did she care, who was quite accustomed to be looked at when it came to that? Still, she thought, uneasily, no one really liked to be stared at steadily, and, with a little flirt and angry shake of its fringe, she put up her parasol and guarded her face with it. Then she looked off upon the purple horizon again, and the gentle, soothing calm, and her mind wandered away into that dreamy doze which keeps the eyes and the body awake but sets the thoughts upon the silver edge of cloud-land. A tangle of weed gathered at her feet, the shadow of the rock lengthened and grew paler and paler, the sea turned to ashes in her eyes, and then Miss Thatcher rose, shivered a little, and thought she would go home.

As she walked fleetly across the open sands she wondered if some one called her. Perhaps it was the wind twisting her ear into a shell and making hollow sounds in it. She turned, and a man stood on the rock she had left like a black pillar against the sky. He waved his hat and gesticulated, but she paid no heed to him, and the next thing here he was running after her.

"Miss Thatcher," he called, "Miss Thatcher, it's so late you'll get your feet wet if you go that way. You'll have to come back and climb over the rock." He held his straw hat in his hand with a sort of deference, though he looked at her brightly with his blue eyes; and, why he was only a boy after all!

Something in his face was a little unusual, too. It was as though it had been stamped with something out of the common line. A wrinkle marred his forehead, an old line or two was round his mouth, and a few crow feet about his eyes. The blood flashed over his face for an instant, showing how quick it was wont to come and go, and went as suddenly as it came, leaving a tint behind it that showed plainly a lack of health. Miss Thatcher observed this much at a glance, and then turned back and he followed her. When they came to the rock he said:

"I don't believe you can get over it."

"Yes," said she, "I can climb; though I don't know but I'd rather have gone on and had my feet wet. Now, stoop down and make a step out of your hand and I will spring for that crack up yonder, and get my other foot on this knot of rock a little further up." By which means she was soon on top without a great deal of exertion, for she was strong of limb action. But he climbed weakly and slowly, and once he fell back a little way into the sand.

"Why don't you get up?" said Miss Thatcher, sharply.

"There's something the matter, ma'am," he answered.

"Folks say it's consumption, and I expect it is; it has eaten all my strength up."

"Oh! Give me your hand," she cried, in contrition, and with that help he laboriously, and with effort that took his breath, reached her side.

"Thank you, thank you a thousand times," she said sweetly. His face was brown, quite brown, and burned with the sun beating back from the water, but a yellow pallor underspread it and his lips were bloodless. He had fine, light hair, quite long, and he was very young and boyish; impulsive he must have been with that hair and those eyes—light blue, but with an inside glint, and their rim or circle of pale color darkened into deeper blue as she spoke so graciously.

That was Miss Thatcher's first meeting with the boy John Van Brant. Not her last, for thereafter when she walked upon the sands in the early morning when the crystal shimmer was upon the water, there was the boy beside her; at noon, when it lay like a sheet of gold under the sun, again it was John Van Brant; at sunset, when the whole was like a ripple, still it was he. No matter where she turned her steps, he found her and fell in with her mood.

"I don't know how I lived before you came," he said one day, half lying in the sun and sand while she sat in the shadow, and the words came into her dream and played about it and drifted in and out, and then she started and looked at him curiously. His hat was over his brows, and his eyes, deepened and glowing, were watching a distant sail. By and by his lips moved.

"What are you saying?" she asked.

"Only a bit of verse," was the low answer.

"Then say it to me," she demanded; and it was a love poem of the purest, tenderest sort, which he repeated scarce above his breath, the blood hurrying into his lips and a scarcel-blown flame into his voice as he told over the much-meaning rhymes, but his eyes with the shooting glint in them followed the sail. "Now, what a strange boy," she thought, and went off into her doze again.

She did not sleep very well that night, and the verses haunted her, coming up to her like ghosts and beating about her in the dark. Young Van Brant came to her and looked at her with a look she had never seen, and a creepy sting tingled at her finger ends. "Don't, John, don't," she thought she said. Next morning she laughed it off over her toilet-table. "The idea of me with nerves!" she said, ridiculing herself.

When she met him he was paler than usual. "Not so well this morning?"

"Oh, well enough, but I dreamed all night," was the answer.

"So did I. Those verses ran through my mind from dark to dawn. There must have been something in the rhythm," she added after a bit.

"Perhaps if I say them again it will make them down." He half smiled and turned his hat brim over.

"Yes, may be," she replied, and put a pin in her cuff.

He began, but broke short off. "The fellow that wrote those verses was too much in earnest to have me saying them over carelessly to you," he said, in explanation; then she opened her book and read to herself, while he sifted the sand through his thin fingers.

He broke out again into talk by and by. "I am nothing but a boy, am I?" he asked, smiling up at her.

"Nothing but a boy," she echoed. "Only twenty, didn't you say?" She put her finger on the line she was reading, and looked up, then added: "And I am twenty-seven—so much older than you. Why, I feel like a mother to you."

"What is age, any way?" he went on. "I feel as though I had lived a hundred years. I don't care." And his tone was half defiant. "I'd as lief be twenty as thirty. I am quite poor, too, as I've told you before, and as you may see by my coat, but I'll have more than I need—ever so much more. See here, I got this set the other day, and I want you to wear it on your chain if you will."

He held toward her a green, smooth-worn pebble that had been cast up on the beach, which he had found, and Miss Thatcher had exclaimed over for its beauty. It was inclosed now in a rim of gold, with a tiny ring attached. It was a dainty little charm, and she was fond of pretty things, but she put it away with her rosy-tipped, trim-nailed finger. "No, no, John," she said; "I can't let you do that. Why, don't you know, if you are poor, I am rich. I can have everything I want—jewels, and journeys, and dresses, and carriages, and every luxury. I like to leave it all behind, though, and come off by the sea alone. I am so gay all winter that the whole season is just like a spiced fruit. When you see me so quiet here, you never dream that I am like that, do you, John?"

"Yes," he answered, quietly, "I know you have money; that's the reason I dared to get this little thing for you. Rich people never have cheap things, and you'll prize this all the more because it's the only cheap little jewel you have. If you had been poor, now, I should never have dared to offer you anything less than a glittering diamond." He reached out a decided hand, a hand that trembled a bit, and snapped the ring on her chain. She never took the trouble to notice it, but he always had his way with her. She laughed a little, and looked down at it admiring it.

"You're a strange boy, John," she said.

"Strange? Why? I don't feel strange toward you." He glanced up at her with a happy smile on his lip, and a dancing light in his blue eye. "I'm sure, somehow or somewhere, I've known you for a long, long time. This is the very happiest time of all my life, being here with you, within sound of the waves day and night. I lie awake nights just because I am so happy. I feel like a little child, Miss Thatcher, I'm so lighthearted." He looked up at her, his eyes shining almost as if with tears.

"Yes, the sea affects me that way, too," she smiled back at him, frankly. "Down here close by it I put away all my frettings, and my frivolities, and my ribbons, and I feel deep-hearted and up-buoyed beyond all selfishness and vanities."

"I haven't a care left in all the world," he said, after a sigh of full content. "The dearest happiness I could wish for would be just to lie here on the sand, with that lap and little roar of waves in my ear, and you sitting just beyond there saying a word now and then. I'm glad this is my last year. I don't want another day after you go."

"Why, what are you talking about? What is it you mean?"

"Don't you know? I'm going to die some time before the very heaviest of this winter. I surely thought I'd made you understand it. I can't live, you know; it's an impossibility." He said it without a shade of feeling passing over his face, and his hands went on filtering the sand.

"Why, John, how can you lie there talking in that absurd way? And it's dreadful, too—perfectly dreadful. You make me cold to hear you. Die? Of course not." She was startled by his saying it, and being so queer and quiet.

"No, not at all dreadful; all the doctors have told me so, and I know it myself. My life and strength are going together, and my veins feel as if they were running dry. I have an odd, pulling, tugging sensation as if my soul were being dragged out of my body, and the body is gradually getting weaker, and before long—snap!—the two will part. Not while you're here, though, Miss Thatcher; don't be afraid of that." Not a shake nor a quiver disturbed his voice, but Miss Thatcher was very much impressed. The tear of ready sympathy rose to her eye, and her woman's heart was deeply touched, for she liked him beyond all other boys.

"John," said she, stretching out her hands, "I have a real motherly feeling for you, and you hurt me when you talk that way. I know you're sick; indeed, you are very sick, but you may live many years, and you may get entirely well after all."

"No, Miss Thatcher," he said, earnestly; "I tell you the truth. I went to see one of the best physicians, and he confirmed me in my own conviction. I shall draw my last breath in the early winter; no fear but I shall." His hat went over his eyes again, and a flush went up to his cheek. "I'd like to tell you something if I may," he went on, "but I want to take advantage of your sweet sympathy beforehand, and remind you that I'm living out my last days, and that I'm way below you in my station in life, probably in my birth, and most certainly in my years. It would not be worth while getting angry with such a small object, would it, Miss Thatcher?" His thin lips shaped a smile intended to be amusing, but in Miss Thatcher's eyes it was pathetic as well as eager.

"No, John, how could I be angry with you after that?"

"Well, I want to tell you what you are to me, then."

You're not a saint, to be set up in a niche and worshipped all day, but something far dearer than that. You are to look at every hour, to talk to, to think with, to smile at, to be gay, and joyous, and silent, and calm with, just as the great ocean way out there lies in a calm. That's my feeling for you—so deep, so undisturbed; way down, without end or fathom."

"Ah! John, it's something to be that to even one soul." She was deeply in sympathy with him, and she felt a twang of pity go all over her.

"I think you'll have to stand it if I tell you how much more, how very much more you are to me. You are mother, sister, friend," he rushed on as if the words raced with the blood dashing past his temples; "mother, sister, friend—nay! I will say it, wife—all in one."

"John, John! hush! do hush!" She stood up, alarmed, conscience stricken, ashamed.

The color rushed back from his face, and he gasped a little for breath. "Pray forgive me, Miss Thatcher; pray do. It isn't much to ask that you'll give me a month or two more of your friendship. Besides, it can't hurt you that you are the only woman I ever had an intense feeling for; and it will be such a comfort to me if you'll let me keep it till there's an end of me. Here, it is the last of August now, and you will be going back before October. It will be something to think of among your jewels, and your journeys, and your ribbons, that you made a boy content to die once." He turned his eyes away from her and looked out to sea, but his lips shook, and he thrust his white fingers absently about in the sand.

"John, John!" she repeated, amused at his audacity, vexed at this complication, touched by his pale face and the boyish tremble on his lips. Then betraying a half yielding tone she said: "Though, to be sure, you are only twenty."

"Oh, yes! only twenty, or ten, or five!" and at her tone of relent he turned joyfully about with radiant eyes; "what matters it? I will study my primer again if you say so. Keep your mother feeling for me, Miss Thatcher—oh! thank you for it a thousand times! nothing could be sweeter to me. And in return receive all the humble reverence of my heart. It is pure goodness in you to bear with what must seem to you so very, very foolish; but believe me, it is my very last whim. Give me your hand on it, my mother; your hand, that is used to jewels, and perfumes, and delicate, tender touches," and when she looked at him with pitying gaze he caught her hand and kissed it eagerly.

"Nay!" and she snatched it away and carried it behind her. "This winter I am to be married to a man who has a million."

"I don't care for that," he said gleefully. "Married, or to be married, or heart-free, it is all one to me. I haven't a spark of vulgar jealousy in my breast. A thousand may love you, and I can love you in spite of them all. And then what difference does one man make!" A joyous abandon was in his face, a reckless shine to the blue glint gleaming under his black lashes.

Cruelly careless she went on: "I shall have the grandest wedding, in the most magnificent church, with the longest train of loveliest bridesmaids, gorgeously costumed, and a wedding dress fit for a princess," then she drew her shoulders up like a queen; "and my bridegroom is such as I shall be proud to give myself away for."

"Oh, yes, yes!" he exclaimed, catching her words; "how proud I should be to see you there! What a bride you will look! I can see it all in my mind—flowers, and flashing eyes, and flushed faces, and yours the loveliest of them. When will it be?—December, January, when?" He asked it ecstatically.

"December," she answered, nodding her head.

"Oh, I shall be gone then!" His tone was disappointed.

"Oh, what a boy!" she exclaimed, an indulgent smile breaking over her face. "Who ever saw such a boy before! Adoring, yet not jealous; lofty, bumble; sublime, ridiculous!" She stood and laughed at him, his own happy laughter accompanying her.

Suddenly she ceased. "You look pale, John," she said.

"Yes," he replied, "I feel pale."

A cold puff of wind came in over the water, and a great tangle of sea weed went up and down with a serpentine motion upon the waves. He looked at the wind and shivered. "You are cold, John!" she cried.

He replied: "No, I shiver with happiness!" and his looks bore him out in it.

"Nevertheless, we will go home." She said it with a maternal accent, as one might coax a child.

"Yes, let us go home," he answered cheerfully.

Afterward they met much as usual, though occasionally referring to their half compact—she lightly, often ridiculingly; he soberly, almost tenderly. She began to tell him once about her home, its surroundings, its situation, when he interrupted her:

"I've seen it many a time on the outside, and I know that by heart; tell me of the inside."

She looked toward him with eyebrows askew.

"Yes," he repeated, "a hundred times. I knew you, almost, long ago. I counted it a lucky day when I saw you at the window, or coming down the marble steps, or driving away in your carriage. I'm from the city, too, you know; and I took to you the first glimpse I had of you. I came here because I knew you were here. Oh, no! Don't think that of me. I never presumed so much as to dream of your friendship. I wanted to spend these weeks near you. If you had stayed at home, I should have stayed, too. I never counted on your speaking to me, though."

It was remarked that he grew paler and more shadow-like every day. His breath came shorter and shorter, and his step was slower. It was she who read aloud now, and he liked to lie in the warm sand at her feet watching her. He began to repeat again one day the love poem he had said among their first weeks.

"Is that Keats, or Shelly, or who?" she asked, idly.

"That? Why that's mine!" he said, looking up.

"You write poetry? Why, John!"

"Oh, that's all! I put you into verse, you know. I like to say it over because it means you to me. I like to read all poetry because it seems like you."

In all her life of whirl and gayety Melissa Thatcher had never heard of so pure, and fresh, and boyish a love, so simple and revealed an affection as this of John's. She was thankful for it by and by, as every woman is grateful for every earnest love, and she would have liked to do him good. She could think of only one way, and she put it as delicately as she could.

"You said you were poor, John." She edged round the subject, coming to it carefully.

"Yes, poor at your estimate, I suppose. I have not much it's true, but more than enough. I looked out for that."

"And I'm rich," she suggested, trying to feel her way along.

"How kind you are," he interrupted, seizing her thought. "I have more money than ever I shall use. You see, I put by enough, reckoning until spring, if by any chance I should live so long, but I shan't. As near as I can reckon I shall die about your wedding day. Look at my hands and cheeks, the veins and bones stand out plainer every day."

She nodded her head that it was so, and two tears fell over into her lap.

"Oh, don't do that! I don't care, and why should you? I have made arrangements to die here comfortably, paying the woman extra for it. I've made a will—think of that, will you!—and what's left over, which will be a hundred dollars—a hundred dollars!—if I last no longer than I reckon on, is to go to a fellow I know who has made an invention and wants to get a patent on it. It's something about a motion in wheels."

Days he lay on the sand, grown too weak to walk far, his face turning whiter, as if bleached by the sun, and his fingers, long and blanched, lying idly at his side.

"I can never bear to say good-bye, John," Miss Thatcher said, breaking out once as the wind was turning colder, and the gulls flew screaming past.

"It must be pretty soon, I know, I've been counting the days lately. Thank God, I shan't last much longer, anyhow! How very, very happy you've made me! What am I that such as you should be hurt to take good-bye of me?" His eyes were luminous, and hers were wet and drooping, and a sob choked a moment between her lips. "I should prize the last touch of your hand beyond everything," he added.

The tears began to rain over her cheeks, and she sat with her head turned away. Suddenly it had come over her how simple and sorrowful it all was—the story of his long-enduring passion, a sick boy with no home and no family ties, and nothing but that impossible love to uphold him to his death, reckoning even into the weeks upon the shortness of his life, providing for his last breath, and almost putting on his shroud, and preparing his own body for death. Ah, what a story it was!

He seemed to be watching the wreaths of spray fantastically tossing themselves into shape out of foam as the water struck and dashed up a little way against the side of the rock. The waves were running and creeping everywhere like a dog hunting eagerly about with his nose. All the old lappings, and tiny roarings, and mimic shouts were there, and the old witching, never-failing perfume flinging itself from the sea. The water beyond gleamed in the distance like the gray breast of a gigantic sea-bird, the light glancing in streaks across it, and Miss Thatcher saw it through the tears that ran over and dripped upon her clasped hands.

She put her foot toward him as if to take a step, waited a moment as if to still the quiver of her face, then with a sudden motion she stooped over him and kissed him on the mouth, and walked swiftly away with her own peculiar grace, never stopping once nor inclining a look back toward him, leaving him lying alone in the sand with his radiant face upturned to the sky.

His eyes deepened into dark, vivid blue, and he smiled and laid his hand reverently upon his lips, but he did not turn his head to look after her, nor did he try to rise and follow her. The sails went across the sea, and the sails came, and the water birds flew with their cries across the beach; the day waxed and waned, and foam and brine washed and washed, and threw up its damp, wild odor; a pebble turned and tossed, and was drawn back, and thrown nearer, and a little nearer, till finally it touched his foot gently, and lay there. And there some one found him lying, gone before his time, one long, white hand softly covering his mouth.

When she who was Melissa Thatcher came down to that very spot again she was thirty years old.

"He was poor and sick, and nothing but a boy," she cried out to herself, "but I've never since seen a love unselfish and pure and tender just like his."

It was as if something like longing for what was good and far above had come into her heart, but she smothered it away and hid it even from herself. KATE HEATH.

SAN FRANCISCO, May, 1879.

In Ceylon they have a nice pleasant way of recovering bad debts. They will sometimes go to the house of their debtor, with the leaves of neungala, a certain plant which is rank poison, and threaten him that they will eat that poison and destroy themselves unless he will pay him what he owes. The debtor is much afraid of this, and rather than the other should poison himself, will sometimes sell a child to pay the debt. Not that the one is tender of the life of the other, but out of care for himself; for if the person dies of the poison, the one for whose sake the other poisoned himself must pay a ransom for his own life. By this means also they will sometimes threaten to revenge themselves of those with whom they have any contest, and do it, too. And, upon the same intent, they will also jump down a steep place, or hang, or make away with themselves, that so they might bring their adversary to great damage. Now, if the carpenters and builders of the new Constitution will take this means of collecting the debt of gratitude we owe them, we shall just howl with appreciation.

A drosky driver of St. Petersburg asked his customer, who appeared to be a nobleman, what the Nihilists were. "Nihil means nothing," was the reply, "and people who have nothing in the pocket, nothing in the way of land, nothing in the shape of property, and nothing of the nature of a title, are called Nihilists." "Yea, yea," said the driver, "then Russia is full of Nihilists, and even I also am a Nihilist."

A few days since the important information was telegraphed over the country that Sam Tilden had walked six miles before breakfast; and now Grant's managers go one better, and tell the world of Grant riding an elephant in India, and sticking a couple of boars on a hunt. It is going to be a hard campaign.

OUR OWN POETS.

Manzanitas.

In lonely mountain forests,
Amid their hush and gloom,
Are beauteous isles of sunshine
Where manzanitas bloom.

Upon the dark, stern hillside
Their clouds of sweetness rest,
Like a rosy infant smiling
Upon a warrior's breast.

O rare, brave manzanitas!
Beneath the dark fir tree,
Like palest rose of sunset,
Your dainty blush I see.

The wild bees know your coming—
They seek you from afar;
With musical sweet humming
They fill the drowsy air.

The wild bird in your branches
His morning hymn has trilled;
Yours were the swinging censers
With holiest incense filled.

How softly falls the sunshine!
The blue sky smiles above,
The great oaks spread their branches
In fond, protecting love;

The young ferns wave their greeting
From greenest mossy dells,
And all its murmured secrets
The babbling brooklet tells.

O blustering, ruthless Winter,
Grim tyrant of the North!
Naught care I that your forces
Are sternly marshaled forth;

You can no more affright me,
Nor reach me with your gloom,
On God's great sunlit mountains,
Where manzanitas bloom!

CALISTOGA, May, 1879.

J. H. S. BUGEIA.

His View of It.

I've been to a prayer-meeting, Sam;
The folks seemed good and true,
And they told how different they acted now
From what they used to do—
How the pleasures they used to like the most Disgusting had come to be,
And they looked with wonder and scorn on those
Who delight in such things could see.

They all told their experience, Sam,
Since their Christian life began,
And the theatre and dancing, Sam,
Got the heaviest share of the ban.
Of course, if any people there
Ever gambled, or drank, or swore,
I can easily see, though I'm not a saint,
Why they couldn't like that any more.

But I've thought of their talk considerable since,
And a doubt on my mind will lay
As to whether the good folks there, friend Sam,
Really meant just what they say.
For those concerns where the young folks, Sam,
Dress and sing like old women and men,
And charades, and tableaux, and the theatre, seem
To be chicks of the same old hen.

And the fish-pond, and grab-bag, and all that sort
Of church contrivances, where
You pay your money, and trust to luck
To get of the chips your share,
Seem a near relation to gambling, Sam,
And I hardly think it's true
That these brethren really hate the thing
As much as they think they do.

I'm only an engineer, Sam,
And as rough as the work I'm at;
But I think "Be ye separate from the world"
Means something more than that.
They were mighty hard on us sinners, Sam,
Who take stock in this world's affairs.
Do all members pay church "debts of honor" as quick,
I wonder, as gamblers pay theirs?

Do they always excuse a brother's mistakes,
And help him again up the hill?
Will their purse-strings open as readily
As actors' and actresses' will?
I ain't much of a church sharp myself, friend Sam,
But it seems to me that the Lord
Meant more than the theatre, and such like things,
When He said in the Holy Word,

"Come out of the world!" For I really feel (Though I 'low I myself don't do right)
That the tricky bargain, the untrue word,
The bitter sneer, and the slight
Of the rest of His church that don't walk just their way,
Helps the devil's side of this fight,
And mixes them up in the world quite as much
As the theatre would of a night.

OAKLAND, April, 1879.

FANNIE M. PUCH.

To a Lady of Oakland.

A slave to Beauty, though despoiled of Love,
Thine eyes compel poor tribute from my pen;
For they have caught some magic from above,
For good or ill, to stir the hearts of men.
Not violets, nor blue-bells, moist with dew,
Can give the hue of such bright eyes divine,
But sometimes Tahoe Lake reflects a blue
From morning skies like those clear orbs of thine.
As tender tints of sunset in the skies
Thy cheeks are tinged with color, and thy face,
Fair as Ret for such liquid gems of eyes,
Is loveliness, a model for thy race.
Fair lady, know thy might and use it well,
For beauty makes on earth a heaven or hell.

OAKLAND, April, 1879.

A Fragment.

Existence is a novel in two parts:
We take up Life presuming it complete,
Its preface childhood, and its pictures hopes;
And pondering on the plot, now vague, now clear,
We find "To be continued" at the end,
For Death has closed the book. Its other part,
Eternity, unread, is in another sphere,
Where we shall solve the mystery (yet sealed
To mortal eyes) for what men live.

OMNIUM GATHERUM.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

A young woman, who had never learned the gentle art of cookery, being desirous of impressing her husband with her knowledge and diligence, manages to have the kitchen door ajar on the day after their return from the bridal trip, and just as her lord comes in from the office exclaims loudly:
"Hurry up, Eliza, do! Haven't you washed the lettuce yet? Here, give it to me; where's the soap?"

From the "Princess of Babylon," a story by Voltaire:
"A multitude of people followed on foot, in periwigs, and in silence." Which reminds one of Crabbe's description of the housekeeper falling—

Heaven in her eye, and in her hand her keys.

Before a civil tribunal, occupied with the case of the degenerate son of noble sires cast off by his aristocratic and long-suffering family. The game-keeper, an old soldier, is duly sworn.

Q. Is it true that the Dowager Marchioness was bitterly opposed to her nephew? Did you ever hear her use severe language in speaking of him?

A. No, never. All she said is what any one might have said in the privacy of the family circle—she may have called him "the son of a sea-cook," or "a blank, dash, blank, ad-jec-tive blank," or "a howling ass," or "a knock-kneed, slab-sided ne'er-do-well," but never anything that was not familiar and ladylike.

"Thank you, but I am sick as ever. For thirty years I haven't known a well day."

"Humph! Well, I've known you all that time, and I don't recollect the time when you were not the very picture of health."

"That just proves the obstinacy and malignity of my complaint, which sticks to me in spite of my apparent robustness."

The janitor enters the apartments on the first floor like a whirlwind, and shouts angrily to the occupant of the suite:
"Madame, look here now, I give you fair warning that if you keep carrying on this way any longer I'll complain to the boss, and he'll fire you out." (Je me plaindrai au propriétaire et il vous fera dehors.)

"What do you mean?"

"Mean? O, you know what I mean. What I mean is your pounding away on that piano last night until twelve o'clock, that's what I mean."

"But there is some one up stairs that plays the piano regularly every night until two o'clock in the morning, while somebody accompanies her on the French horn."

"Oh, that is very different—that's my daughter and her young man!"

They were trying a case in which several criminals were engaged, and one of the prisoners—as prisoners often will do—endeavored to lead the jury astray by putting himself forward as the principal actor in the tragedy.

But the vigilant and experienced counsel for the people is not to be humbugged by any such shallow pretense. "No, gentlemen," he cries in summing up, "you will not suffer yourselves to be imposed upon. Look at those dull features, that stupid eye, and tell me if there you can perceive any indication of the energy, the courage, the fertility of resource, the intelligence, the fire of genius necessary for the conception and execution of the masterly murder we are discussing."

"Well, what do you think of this play?"

"What do you think of it?"

"No, I asked you what you thought of it."

"Never mind; give me your opinion first."

"Ah, I see we're both of one mind."

"Oh, come now; positively you're too hard on him; the play isn't quite as bad as all that."

Calino—Calino is the French Mme. Malaprop or Mme. Partington—goes to the theatre.

"How was the play?" asks his wife.

"Very interesting—a new piece."

"What was it—a tragedy, a comedy, an operetta—what?"

"How can I tell? I couldn't get a programme."

A young dramatist with more pretensions than talent meets on the evening of the first performance of one of his plays a friend.

"It went well, don't you think?" he says, swelling visibly with pride. "I guess I can go ahead and order the champagne supper for the hundredth night."

"Yes," replies his friend, timidly, "but wouldn't it be being on the safe side to give it this week?"

At each returning Christmas, New Year's, birthday, and festal occasion, a kind but prudent father presents his little daughter with a valuable gift of the useful variety—a dress, a hat, or a pair of boots.

"Pa," finally said the little one, "my birthday comes next week. If you love me and think I have been a real good girl you might give me something that's useless."

Indignant father to his son, whose picture has not even been skied at the Academy:

"You're a nice artist. Here you are forty-five years old Christmas week, and yet no picture of yours has ever been received."

"But, sir—"

"Silence, sir! Don't you presume to 'but, sir,' me. Sir, at your age Raphael had been dead for ten years."

When Paul de Kock was accused of catering to the literary taste of cooks and laundresses he philosophically replied:
"There must be no end of cooks and laundresses, for I notice that my books sell immensely."

"What?" says a lodger to the concierge, "the proprietor increases my rent? Why?"

"My dear sir," replies the concierge, "he is about to commit a crime which will give life to the neighborhood."

PRATTLE.

It is not of the nature of the literary Briton to let yesterday take care of itself; he will not endure an hour's injustice, and the sun shall not go down upon a clouded record. Nevertheless, there are signs that he is growing thick-skinned in his leisurely way, and may some day "draw near to the complexion" of a rhinoceros. An encouraging symptom of abated sensitiveness I note in the Edinburgh Review, which, replying to an accusation of Mr. Spencer Walpole, uses the following dignified and patient language: "Against the charge that the outspoken rather than unjust notice of Hours of Idleness, published in this journal, 'made Byron declare war against society,' it is scarcely necessary to defend ourselves." Quite right, brother; it is too soon to justify the stand you took in 1807. Let Time have a chance at the matter, and if he do not acquit you take an appeal to Eternity.

There is a certain touching pathos, a suggestion of martyr-like resignation, in the way in which the Reviewer deprecates the injustice he will not resent. "Every one," he continues, "knows that Byron was the spoiled idol of society from the morning that English Bards and Scotch Reviewers appeared. He might have remained so had he not chosen to set the world at defiance by quarreling with his wife." This is quite in the spirit of the reply made by the convict to the prison chaplain, who, to test his religious intelligence, asked him if he knew who killed Abel. "Maybe I knows all about it," said the beetle-browed ruffian, affecting an air of impenetrable mystery, "and maybe I didn't have nothin' to do with it; and maybe he hurt hisself a shinnin' up a lightnin' rod for to catch a saw-mill."

"Wilhelm Meister, from which the opera of Mignon is taken, is not a remarkable work."—Theatrical Reporter of the Call. Not very; but then Psalm Williams, Frank Soule, and The Other Barnes (the Call's triumvirate of censors literarum) never said it was. Isn't it rather beneath you, my good man, to notice the work of this fellow Goethe at all?

The Emperor of Germany will celebrate his golden wedding next month, and it is hoped that the festivities will be attended by the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Spain. There will be fine shooting at Berlin; socialist sportsmen ought to make a pretty good bag.

At the Olympic Club party on Friday evening of last week, the customary athletic feats in filmy costume were omitted, and the young women went away as wise as they came.

O sturdy Musclemen, anew
Display thy wealth of brawn and thow:
Stand forth like Hercules, and clad
The same—no, he did never pad.
But wore (his knotty pate within Its spanning jaws) a lion's skin—
A garb that Esop, all agree,
Hath made impossible to thee.
Stand forth, and dare the searching ray
Of interdigital survey,
And eyes that, mounted on barbette,
Blaze from the fan's high parapet,
To hide thy light if thou dost dare
Again, sack-cloth shall be thy wear,
And ashes; for by all the gods!
I'll scourge thy skin with certain rods
I've boned a corset to obtain,
And which since Friday week have lain
In pickle saltier than the sneers
Of men—an injured virgin's tears.

A letter from a person in Ireland has been received. It was addressed intelligently thus: "The Governor of San Francisco, and Clerk of the Divorce Court, America." The first half of the epistle was handed to Denis Kearney, the last found its way to somebody having clerical relations with Judge Wheeler.

The local "poets" must have a care of their fame. I call Apollo to witness that for more weeks than any one of them has sound teeth I have abstained from persecuting them, in the hope that they would do better if let alone—at least they thought the experiment worth trying, and I had other fools to fry. But what has come of it? 'Pon my soul! the matchless idiots have done worse than before; the more respectfully they are treated the more contemptible they become. And now Joaquin Miller is coming back from the East, his brows bowed with victorious wreaths and his face shining, and they have nothing to show him that he couldn't have written better with his hair cut.

Even the poets whom Miller made his fame by beating are beating ours. Have the goodness to consider this single stanza from the New York Herald, under the somewhat irrelevant title "Like Rosebuds in the May-Time":

"There's not a lady far or near,
Let her be poor or wealthy,
But now can keep, from year to year,
Her teeth pure white and healthy."

I confess this is part of an advertisement of a dentifrice, but it is set to the air of "Yankee Doodle" (with a view no doubt to concert purposes, though I should hardly think it would be very popular), and that entitles it to a place in the lyric anthology. Even retaining the repeated typographical error of the "y" in the third line, the verse is conspicuously better than anything that has been done out here since Stoddard shook his muse and Dan O'Connell laid for her.

The position of Chinese interpreter in a court of justice is apparently not a couch of roses. While undergoing an examination the other day before United States Commissioner O'Beirne, on one of four charges of defrauding the revenue, Mr. Chin Foong, a gentleman in the cigar-manufacturing interest, interrupted the flow of his own testimony in order to explain that in case of his conviction it was his intention to kill the interpreter. The power at such a time to concern himself with the future of another instead of his own evinces a certain unselfishness in Mr. Foong that is encouraging, as implying a moral soil tolerably well prepared for the seeds of the Christian religion, which teaches to take thought of others,

The "missionary element" of our population will not be slow to perceive this admirable rock upon which to build their church, and the court before which he is held for trial may deem it right to convict in order to remove him from the importunities and exhortations of the zealous. Still, it is seldom expedient, and not altogether fair, to kill the interpreter.

Said Mr. Black: "If I'd a man
To start me (and supply a plan)
In business, I would lead the van."

Said Mr. Smith: "I wish I knew
Some enterprising person who
Would set me up and rush me through."

A fool o'erheard and shouted: "Stop!
Of fortune's tide you ride atop—
Why don't you start a Black-Smith shop?"

They did, grew rich, and fought about
Who set the other up, without Resolving that important doubt.

Each knocked the other, with a sledge,
Far colder than an iron wedge:
Men reared their headstones edge to edge.

There, from afar, the fool did see
The names BLACK SMITH, cut large and free.
"Get thy Pale Horse shod, Death," said he.

The report of the Advisory Board in the case of General Fitz-John Porter is both gratifying and unsatisfactory: gratifying in that it will result in restoring to a brave and capable soldier the rank and honors of which he has for sixteen years been unjustly deprived, unsatisfactory in that it can not dispose from high station his worthless and malicious accuser.

This fellow, General Pope, is a bad lot. He once took command of the Army of the Potomac, and straightway issued a flaming proclamation announcing that the régime of retreat was at an end. This document, with characteristic folly, he dated at "Headquarters in the Saddle!" The suggestion of hind-quarters was inevitable, irresistible, contagious; and a blaze of inextinguishable laughter ran along the hostile fronts, by land, and sea, and river, till it had circled and swept the whole armed continent. But afterward, when

The soldier turned his seeking eye
To catch that crest's ascendancy,

And invariably saw the famous "quarters," "round as the shield of my fathers," presented to the enemy and rapidly diminishing to an indistinct point on the northern horizon, the peal of amusement subsided into the silence of contempt. It was at this time that the buffoon was lost in the maligner, and the brave Porter, loaded with his commander's sins, was chased into the desert of disgrace—another proof that a fool is the most dangerous of created things.

By the way, the dispatches have recently made repeated mention of charges of cowardice preferred by General Stanley against General Hazen. It was my fortune to serve during the greater part of the civil war under the immediate command of General Hazen, most of the time as a member of his staff. I have seen him under fire a hundred times. How often he led with alacrity where I followed with reluctance I ought not to be expected to definitely state; it was a good many times.

On one occasion his entire staff preferred to exercise a wise discretion—with which by nature they were certainly endowed, but which according to the scheme of military subordination they did not possess—by not following him at all. In truth we remained among certain trees which had thoughtfully grown where they were most wanted. The General—a tolerably fair mark—rode on for fifty yards or so before perceiving that he was unattended; then, wheeling about, he thundered: "Where's my staff?" No doubt he was agreeably reassured when one of us took the trouble to cheerily sing out: "Here we are, sir—all safe!" But Hazen, may the Lord forgive him! did not act as if he had a spark of gratitude in his composition.

The Stanley-Hazen trouble grew out of a newspaper controversy. The Northern Pacific Railroad was endeavoring to get heavy subventions from the Government, and General Stanley published roseate accounts of Northern Montana, the country which it was to "open up." General Hazen, who was then stationed at the mouth of the Yellowstone, wrote to the New York Tribune the cold truth about that region. (It is the very barrenest and most forbidding on the continent; I explored and surveyed it with Hazen in 1866, and I know.) But Hazen accused Stanley of improper motives. The latter retorted by publishing his accuser as a liar, plus a coward. He embodied these views in a pamphlet for gratuitous distribution; you could have a cart-load of them for the asking, and if you would take enough of them Stanley would give you a chromo—which somewhat resembled Hazen. Stanley was all business.

When Hazen was sent by the Government to observe the Franco-German war, and later the Russo-Turkish struggle, the Stanleyan view of his veracity and courage met him in black and white at every European capital and every military headquarters. Naturally he didn't like it, and recently brought the matter to an issue by preferring formal charges of "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman," etc., and on these charges Stanley was being tried at last accounts by a court-martial of tremendous military swells, and had a whole Falstaff's company of Hazen's personal enemies in attendance as witnesses for the defense. I know them very well, and the circumstances concerning which they testified, and they did lie royally—nay, imperially!

By the way, the Army is, I think, the only community in this country in which one can be tried, and if convicted punished, for not being a gentleman. It is plain that it would be pretty difficult to define, by statute precisely what ungentlemanly conduct is, but it is easy enough to say with a good deal of certainty what is ungentlemanly conduct. In this respect I think the system of military justice preferable to the civil, as also in respect of simplicity. You make your accusation and the commanding general, if he wishes, details as many officers as he sees fit, to form a court, one of whom, the Judge Advocate, is both prosecutor and counsel for the accused. Anything is evidence that the court chooses to hear, and in case of conviction it fixes such a punishment as it deems deserved. This the commanding general affirms or doesn't affirm, according to his judgment of the matter. It is very simple, and entirely superior to cutting for the highest card. I think throwing round for the first ace beats it a trifle.

Mr. Kiddle, the New York Superintendent of Public Instruction, has bloomed as the rose into a full blown spiritualist, and publicly avers that he receives daily communications from the illustrious dead. And now the gross material beings whose eyes, "purging thick amber and plum-tree gum," have not been miraculously cleared of their clouds and can not distinguish spiritual beans when the supernatural bag is open, clamor for the gifted one's removal. To an observer who has been but economically endowed with the useful quality of omniscience it appears that a man with his ear in heaven and his tongue on earth ought to be a rather exceptionally good Superintendent of Public Instruction, though of course it all depends on what the illustrious dead are giving him. The late Mrs. George Washington, whose present address is Paradise, has recently been favoring Mr. T. B. Clarke, of Oakland, with a reasonless quantity of unmistakable taffy.

When any athlete in the agonistic games at Olympia was convicted of foul play he was compelled to propitiate heaven by erecting a bronze statue of Zeus, on the pedestal of which his own name and infamy were inscribed for the execration of posterity. Pausanias described sixteen of these penitential memorials, of which the bases alone remain, and even the inscriptions are effaced. Yet the authors of the new Constitution cherish the ambitious hope that through having appended their names to this monument of their shame they will be ever remembered in connection with the foul play that reared it!

"A well known politician was recently expelled from the green-room of a New York theatre for taking liberties with the ballet girls. Served the wretch right."—Theatrical Journal. Great Scott! I should like to know what kind of a circus performance a ballet girl would esteem a "liberty." Did they keep the villain's clothes.

Charleston, South Carolina, has celebrated the 147th birthday of General Francis Marion by eating baskets of roasted sweet-potatoes in remembrance of that revolutionary hero's meagre fare and famous hospitality to the British officer, as related by Horry.

Marion, this morning of thy birth
Thy sons renounce their jelly-cake
To emulate, if not thy worth,
At least, great Shade, thy belly-ache.

Mr. Gibbon, a tolerably well-known English, or rather Scotch, novelist, and a very good fellow, has recently had a handsome bequest from a wealthy gentleman who admired his work, and at the death of the widow will have the whole estate. Mr. Gibbon doesn't write a word of truth, yet I, who write nothing else, never get a bequest from a reader in all my life; indeed, the more truth I write the more the gentlemen of whom I write it leave me out of their wills. To be sure I have admirers enough, but the gallant Widmer will not die if he can help it, and the gorgeous McComb has no property, and the eloquent Kearney can not write, and the royal Stuart is not of sound and disposing mind, and there is always something to keep modest worth out of its own.

Perish the truth! and perish the wills!
And perish the dead who indite 'em!
I'll write all sweet lies and collect my bills
From the living of whom I write 'em.
By the sweat of the brow the best way to earn bread
Is to butter its owner from heel to head.

Speaking of wills, I am reminded of an Irishman who, learning that a relative whom he hated was down in an uncle's will for a thousand pounds, swore he would keep him out of it if he had to swing for it. It was no idle threat either, for next day he executed it by shooting the uncle.

The latest Captain-General of Cuba makes proclamation that he will endeavor to perpetuate the glorious peace established by his predecessors. He appears to mistake decomposition for disaffection.

A religious journal cites the case of a burglar who was moved by Mr. Moody's preaching to restore some of his booty, as proving that Mr. Moody is "eminently fit to preach the gospel." Yes, to men eminently unfit to plunder a house.

This is fame: John A. Dix is dead, and every newspaper published in the country of this illustrious man reminds us that he was the author of the words: "If any man attempts to haul down the American flag shoot him on the spot." But not one reminds us that he was the author of one of the noblest translations of the Dies Irae. Really, it is hardly worth while to die.

A lady of this city had long suspected her cook of occasionally carrying more provisions out of the house at night than she brought back in the morning, and one evening detected her with a pretty intelligently selected assortment filling a rather large basket. "Dade, mum," explained the offendress, "I did not think you wud begrege a bite now and then to me pore husband in the hospital." "O no, Bridget, we must provide for our husbands, certainly; but remembering whose has the superior claim, I am thinking whether it would be unreasonable to send mine to the hospital and let yours come here."

Marysville exults in a man with two noses. What a nice man to affront: one for each hand! If the poets hereabout were so copiously gifted it would be a greater pleasure—as it is now a greater profit—to pull their noses than to pick their pockets.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

When a lady has served her manager as faithfully as Miss Cary has Mr. Strakosch, singing for him an average of five times a week with never a cold or indisposition to mar the even tenor of his repertoire, I suppose she is entitled to some little privileges not set down in the calculations of opera composers or audiences, especially when what she asks happens to be likely to bring money into the house. And so Miss Cary sang "Mignon." That it is a soprano part, and that in consequence of its being assigned to the contralto of the company, "Federico"—written for a contralto—had to be sung by a light-weight soprano; that the character is one that no more suits Miss Cary than it would Signor Pantaleoni or little Mr. Barberis; that she can neither look, act, nor sing the part, nor anything in the remotest degree approaching it—does not seem to have any weight with either the manager or herself; it is Miss Cary's caprice to exhibit her ignorance of every aesthetic and artistic propriety, and she must be indulged. And so we have had in these two performances one of the most absurdly farcical attempts at opera that I have ever beheld; with a stout, hard-voiced, and unsympathetic contralto singing a rôle that calls for a youthful dramatic soprano, and a thin-voiced, immature, and awkward soprano endeavoring to fill the physical and musical requirements of a part that she never ought to be able to fill, since if she were she would be manifestly no soprano at all. Without going back to Goethe for his conception of "Mignon"—which has evidently had only the slightest influence upon the librettist who prepared the text for Mr. Thomas—this outrage of the musical proprieties brought its own revenge: the performance was abominable. The orchestra was worse than on almost any previous occasion—coarse, noisy, and out of tune almost throughout. The clarinets began below the pitch and held out manfully through the entire overture; then the strings took it up (some of them down), and squabbled away for a time over the diapason; now it was the bassoon that was flat, and now a flute alternately flat and sharp; the horns got shaky, and even the tympani unsettled—the devil was in it but the thing would not come in tune. And during it all the conductor sat placidly there, serenely banging away at his inflexible tempo—which in the first ensemble as well as several other numbers he managed to get almost twice too fast—probably laughing in his sleeve all the while at the set of good-natured dolts sitting behind him, at $3 a seat, fondly imagining that what was going on before them was a performance of Thomas' Mignon. A performance it certainly was, but not much more like Thomas' Mignon than Offenbach's Grand Duchesse.

In this opera Miss Litta did some very nice singing—for her. Her entire treatment of the part of "Filina" was raw and awkward, and only served as additional proof that she has a long and difficult study before her if she really aspires to become an artist of more than second rank; she has well nigh everything to learn. But vocally she is evidently learning it, and what can be made of such a voice as she has I have no doubt she will make. Some little bits were very nicely sung; the Polacca, with its difficult intervals and effective trills, was quite a brilliant performance and made a great success. Much of this, however, must be laid to the account of the music, which, throughout the opera, is so dull and spiritless, so evidently the result of calculation and finesse, that the two tunes, the Polacca and Gavotte, are always welcomed with positive relief, and make their effect if at all passably sung. The Gavotte was not passably sung; it was croaked. For this, however, Miss Lancaster is not entirely to blame. The part is out of her voice and she did with it all that could be expected of her.

Mr. Westberg's "Wilhelm" was, barring his unconquerable stiffness of action, thoroughly satisfactory; his beautiful voice and artistic singing formed altogether the pleasantest feature of the performance. Mr. Lafontaine also carried himself well, especially in the first act—and Mr. Conly made a good "Harper." Mr. Gottschalk was—nil. Chorus ditto, only noisy; mise en scene contemptible.

The transfer of the opera to the Mission Street house has been signaled by a decided improvement in almost every direction; the chorus and orchestra have been augmented to very respectable proportions, and put through a series of extra rehearsals; some new and beautiful scenery has been prepared, extra supers and ballet (?) engaged, and considerable care and expense devoted to accessories, etc. The performances of Aida have been so much better than those of any of the preceding operas that one is almost disposed to gush a bit over them; for once there has been an ensemble that in some degree represented grand opera, and, for the first time this season, Mr. Strakosch may be said to have fulfilled the promise made at the beginning. Whether the giving of the same opera three times in one week out of a subscription of twenty nights is quite a fair proceeding or not is a matter about which there may be some difference of opinion; that several others were promised that can not possibly be given is only a part of the usual tactics of this most unscrupulous of managers. The performance of Aida has served to show our public that the miserable makeshift of the first three weeks was simply what Mr. S. chose to give, not what he was compelled to, since the material for a respectable performance has been at his command from the first. The performances have been mean simply because they were to be gotten through with at the slightest possible expense, the subscription, novelty and clout of the first nights being supposed to carry for a time. Then, when the houses began to thin, the subscribers to growl, and a new deal became absolutely necessary in order to avoid financial disaster, the first decent performance was given. Carmen, promised for next Tuesday, will probably be put on in good form; Don Giovanni and the Huguenots will be quietly dropped out of the promised repertoire, or, if given at all, out of the season for which the subscription was paid in advance, and so out of this promised brilliant twenty nights and ten operas, we shall have had some half dozen performances of two decently mounted operas to balance against fourteen of the shabbiest conceivable ones. Then will probably come the real season; then come Linda and La Sonnambula, possibly Don Giovanni, and even Lohengrin, and then if the subscribers care to hear anything fresh or well done they may pay extra for it. This is the way Mr. Strakosch manages his Grand Italian Opera and the San Francisco public.

Aida is really a very enjoyable performance. Madame Roze, although she lacks both the register and force for the part of the heroine, is so thoroughly artistic and sympathetic, and is so intensely earnest in her personation, that she becomes the life of the opera and infuses into it a warmth and richness of color that, to those who only heard it last year with Miss Kellogg in the title rôle, makes a new thing of it. I can not imagine a more beautiful performance than this; if Madame Roze had but more voice she would be a great "Aida." Mr. Adams, also, throughout his performance of "Radames," has made amends for his continual hoarseness by his delightful singing and acting. After all, to be a fine artist is something better even than to be constantly "in voice;" the singing of one with the thorough culture of Mr. Adams is worth more—even at his worst—than the best that can come from an ignoramus with a throat of silver; and the best advice that I can give to youngsters with tenor voices, who think they know something about singing, is to go and hear what this artist does with what there is left of his once royal organ, and learn that beautiful singing consists of something besides yelling out a B flat or a C in chest.

I am not a fervent admirer of Signor Pantaleoni, and like him least when he forces his upper notes and sings abominably sharp, as he does in Aida. But he gives the part of "Amonasro" with great verve and acts it beautifully. I suppose there was a time when he sang it finely, as well; but it has passed. Miss Cary I have never liked as "Amneris;" she is hard, unsympathetic, and, at times, vocally coarse. She undoubtedly carries the part with great aplomb and sings it like an artist of "good stuff," but in none other that I have seen from her—excepting, perhaps, Mignon—do I so much miss the intellectual quality. Her love for "Radames" does not seem to have any softening influence upon her character—at no moment does the voice betray the passion that is supposed to be consuming and driving her to desperation. She is simply a healthy young woman with a fine voice and good clothes, who occasionally reminds us of a lady whom we met once among the Spanish gypsies somewhere, and, perhaps, once again in a hut not far from Boston, where she was entertaining Madame Amelia Roze and Signor Riccardo Lazzarini. Miss Cary has but one color in her voice, and this one, excellent as it is, one grows very tired of hearing in all situations.

Mr. Frederic Boscovitz, who made his début in this city last Tuesday evening at a Soirée to which Mr. Gray had invited a large number of dilettanti, is a pianist with such exceptional individuality of style that anything like a correct or exhaustive estimate of his playing is very difficult, if not quite impossible, to arrive at after only a single hearing. Eastern as well as foreign accounts had prepared me for much of it that was novel and interesting; the straight-laced classicists have found fault with him as inclined to a too purely subjective style, while the ultra-romanticists took umbrage at a certain reïcence in his playing of the older compositions—Bach, Handel, and others of that period—and would not recognize him as fully belonging to their school. But wherever he has played he seems to have eventually overcome the first impressions of even his most adverse critics, who have generally ended by conceding him very high rank as an interpreter of even such music as they were at the outset convinced was entirely out of his range. From what I heard on Tuesday much, if not all, of this is quite clear to me. The fact is, that with a technique that seems entirely adequate and under complete control, Mr. Boscovitz seems to me to have a vivid and picturesque conception that is at times, so to speak, not well in hand, and that occasionally takes the reins and drives him into what seem to the listener to be a series of fitful, capricious, artistic vagaries; he lets himself go with what he supposes to be the spirit of the composition, but is not always quite sure that it is really the right spirit nor certain that his momentary conception is not under the influence of something like caprice—what the Germans would call laune. Out of a long and varied programme some things were delightfully played; noticeably the Concerto of Ph. Em. Bach, the Barcarolle of Raffi, and—this especially—his own charmingly graceful Menuetto. To me the Concerto was his more beautiful performance; it was exquisitely colored (the new sustaining pedal of the magnificent Steinway Grand enabling him to make a fine effect in the organ points) and phrased throughout in a masterly manner. The lighter numbers afforded Mr. Boscovitz the opportunity to display a lovely, delicate touch and crisp, clear staccato, and, I think, made the best impression on the audience generally. In the heavier ones—Tannhäuser March and A flat Ballade of Chopin—he seemed not quite in his element. But we shall hear him again in his public Recitals, when there will probably be enough said, pro and con, and I can have my say about his playing of Chopin. S. E.

Jules Tavernier has put the finishing touches to his large panel painting, "A Moorish Castle," and it is ready for its place in the Hopkins mansion on the hill. It is a picture—not a panel really—that artist and owner will always be proud of; a thing of beauty, an artistic interpretation of an intelligent and well conceived idea—a work as careful and painstaking in its execution as it is rich and picturesque and poetically pleasing in appearance. It is one of the best things that Tavernier has given us from his brush, stunning in effect, and an effort in decorative art that would command the compliments of the Continent.

MARK TWAIN'S APOLOGY.

Mark Twain was recently at a dinner of the Stanley Club, in Paris, and, being called upon for a speech, is thus reported by the Continental Gazette: "Mr. Ryan said to me just now that I'd got to make a speech. I said to Mr. Ryan, 'The news came too late to save Roger McPherson.' It is sad to know that some things always come too late, and when I look around upon this brilliant assembly I feel disappointed to think what a nice speech I might have made, what fine topics I might have found in Paris to speak about, among these historic monuments, the architecture of Paris, the towers of Notre Dame, the caves, and other ancient things. Then I might have said something about the objects of which Paris folks are fond—literature, art, medicine (then taking a card from his vest pocket as if to take a glance at his notes) and adultery. But the news came too late to save Roger McPherson! Perhaps you are not as well acquainted with McPherson as I am? Well, I'll explain who McPherson was. When we sailed from New York there came on board a man all haggard—a mere skeleton. He wasn't much of a man, and on the voyage I heard him say to himself, 'The news came too late to save Roger McPherson.' 'How too late?' I asked. 'About three weeks too late,' he replied, 'I'll tell you how it happened: A friend of mine died, and they told me I must take his body on the cars to his parents in Illinois. I said I'd do it, and they gave me a card with the address, and told me to go down to the depot and put it on a box I'd find there, have the box put on the baggage car, and go right along with it to Illinois. I found the box all right, and nailed the card on it, and put it on the cars; then I went into the depot and got a sandwich. I was walking round eating my sandwich, and I passed the baggage-room, and there was my box, with a young man walking around, looking at it, and he had a card in his hand. I felt like going up to that young man and saying, 'Stranger, that's my corpse.' But I didn't. I walked on, ate my sandwich, and when I looked in again the young man was gone, but there was the card nailed right on the box. I went and looked on that card. It was directed to Colonel Jenks, Cleveland, Ohio. So I looked in the car, and there was my box all right. Just before the train started, a man came into the baggage-car and laid a lot of limberger cheese down on my box. He didn't know what was in my box, and I didn't know what was in his paper, but I found out later. It was an awful cold night, and after we started the baggage-master came in. He was a nice fellow, Jackson was; he said: 'A man would freeze to death out there; I'll make it all right.' So he shut all the doors and windows, built a rousing coal fire in the stove, then he took turns fixing the car and poking the fire, till I began to smell something and felt uncomfortable; so I moved as far away from my corpse as I could, and Johnson says to me: 'A friend of yours? Did he die lately? This year I mean.' Says I, 'I'll fix it.' So I opened a window, and we took turns breathing the fresh air. After a while Johnson said: 'Let's smoke; I think that'll fix it.' So we lit our cigars and puffed a bit, but we got so sick that we let 'em go out again—it didn't do any good. We tried the air again. Says Johnson: 'He's in no trance, is he? There's doubt about some people being dead, but there's no doubt about him, is there! What did he die of?' We stopped at a station, and when we started off again Johnson had a bottle of disinfectant, and says: 'I've got something now that'll fix it.' So he sprinkled it all around over the box, the limberger, and over everything; but it wouldn't do, the smells wouldn't mix well. Johnson said: 'Just think of it. We've all got to die, all got to come to this.' Then we thought we'd move the box to one end of the car; so we stooped over it; I took one end and he took the other, but we couldn't get it far. Johnson says, 'We'll freeze to death if we stay out on the platform; we'll die if we stay in here.' So we took hold of it again; but Johnson, he couldn't stand it; he fell right over. I dragged him out on the platform, and the cold air soon brought him to, and we went in the car to get warm. 'What are we going to do?' asked Johnson, and he looked ill. 'We are sure to have typhoid fever and a half dozen other fevers. We're pizen, we are!' At last we thought it was better to go out on the platform. In an hour and a half I was taken off that platform stiff, nearly frozen to death. They put me to bed, and I had all them fevers that Johnson spoke about. You see the thing worked on my mind. It didn't do me no good to learn, three weeks later, that there had been a mistake—that my corpse had gone to Colonel Jenkins, Cleveland, and that I'd taken his box of rifles for decent burial to Illinois. The news came too late to save Roger McPherson—about three weeks too late.' Amid roars of applause, Twain closed by saying, 'When I'm not prepared to speak, I always apologize, and that's the reason I've told you so much about Roger McPherson.'

In a late German story the hero gives a rhapsodical description of "the first kiss" in these ebullient words: "Am I really dear to you, Sophia?" I whispered, and pressed my burning lips to her rosy mouth. She did not say yes; she did not say no; but she returned my kiss, and my soul was no longer in my body; I touched the stars; the earth went from under my feet." All of which is very pretty and very poetic, but very indefinite. What the practical reader wants to know is, if that is the transcendental German way of saying that he was at that particular moment lifted clear out and above himself by the toe of the old man's boot. It sounds very like a wail.

THE MYSTERY.

Translated for the Argonaut from the French.

Nathalie de Hauteville was twenty-two years old, and she had been a widow for three years. She was one of the prettiest women in Paris. Her large, dark eyes shown with remarkable brilliancy, and she united the sparkling vivacity of an Italian and the depth of feeling of a Spaniard to the grace which always distinguishes a Parisian born and bred.

Married at eighteen to a man three times her own age, Nathalie thought only of the delight of having so many new dresses, of carrying a bouquet of orange flowers, and of hearing herself called "Madame." Monsier de Hauteville was rich. He loaded his young bride with handsome presents. But, alas! scarcely a year had elapsed when he was carried off by a short illness, and Nathalie was a widow.

Considering herself too young to live entirely without protection, Nathalie invited an uncle, M. d'Ablaincourt, to come and live with her. He was an old bachelor, had never loved anything in the world but himself, was an egotist, too lazy to do any one an ill turn, but at the same time too selfish to do any one a kindness unless it would tend directly to his own advantage. He accompanied his niece when she mixed in the gay world, but when he felt inclined to stay at home he would say to her:

"My dear Nathalie, I am afraid you will not be amused this evening. They will only play cards—besides I do not think any of your friends will be there; but of course I am ready to take you if you wish to go; you know I have no wish but to please you."

And Nathalie, who had great confidence in her uncle, was easily persuaded to stay at home, and would reply, "I believe you are right."

In the same manner M. d'Ablaincourt, who was a great gourmand, would say to his niece: "My dear, you know that I care nothing for eating, and am satisfied with the simplest fare, but I must tell you that your cook puts too much salt in everything; it is very unwholesome! And the dishes are never well arranged on your table. The other day we had six people to dinner, and the spinach was very badly dressed. What will people say of your house-keeping when they perceive such things?"

"You are right, uncle; I wish you would be so good as to look out for a good cook for me. I am very much obliged to you for reminding me of these little things which escape my notice."

The cook who dressed the spinach was sent away, and replaced by another who knew how to prepare many of the old gentleman's favorite dishes.

Nathalie was a coquette. Accustomed to charm, she listened with smiles to the numerous protestations of admiration she received, but sent all who aspired to her hand to her uncle, saying:

"Before I give you any hope I must know uncle's opinion."

It is probable she would have answered differently if she had ever felt a real preference for any one; but heretofore she preferred her liberty, and M. d'Ablaincourt being now master in his niece's house was for his part anxious for her to remain as she was. A nephew might be less submissive than Nathalie, therefore he never failed to discover some decided faults in each of those who sought an alliance with the pretty widow.

Besides his egotism and his epicurism, the dear uncle had another weakness: it was a passion for backgammon; but he was often annoyed at the difficulty of finding anyone to play with. If by accident any of their visitors understood it, there was no escape from a long siege with the old gentleman, but most people preferred cards.

Things were at this crisis when one evening, at a ball, Nathalie was introduced to a M. d'Apremont, a captain in the navy. She raised her eyes, expecting to see a great sailor with a wooden leg and a bandage over one eye, when, to her surprise, she beheld a man of about thirty, tall and finely formed, with two legs and two arms. Armand d'Apremont had entered the navy at an early age, and, although still young, had arrived at the dignity of a captain. He had amassed a fortune in addition to his patrimonial estates, and had now come home to rest after his labors. As yet, he was a single man, and, moreover, had always laughed at love. But when he saw Nathalie, for once his ire was aroused.

"Who is that pretty woman who dances so well?" he inquired.

"That is Madame de Hauteville. Is she not handsome?"

"Oh, yes, she is—appears—perfect."

"Yes, and the graces of her mind equal those of her person. Ask her to dance the next set, and you will find that I am right."

"Ah! but I do not dance;" and for the first time in his life he regretted he had never learned to dance. But he kept his eyes constantly fixed on the lady. Nathalie perceived this, although she pretended to take no notice of him.

"What fun it would be," thought she, "to make that man, whom they say scarce ever speaks to a lady, fall in love with me."

But a few weeks passed when his attentions to the young widow became a subject of general remark, and several of his friends said to d'Apremont:

"Take care. Madame de Hauteville is a coquette. She will amuse herself for a while and then cast you off."

At last the report of Nathalie's new conquest reached the ears of her uncle, and one evening when she mentioned to him that she expected the Captain to spend the evening with her, the old man grew almost angry, and exclaimed, rather hastily:

"Nathalie, you act entirely without consulting me. I have heard the Captain is very rude and unpolished in his manners. To be sure I have only seen him standing behind your chair, but he has never even asked after my health. Of course I only speak for your interest, as you are so thoughtless."

This amiable niece immediately begged his pardon for her inconsiderateness in acting on her own responsibility, and even offered not to receive the Captain's visit if he so desired it; but this he wisely forbore to require, secretly resolving, however, not to allow his visits to become too frequent. But how frail are all human resolutions—overtured by the merest trifles. In this case the game of backgammon was the unconscious cause of Nathalie becoming Madame d'Apremont.

The Captain was an excellent hand at backgammon. When M. d'Ablaincourt heard this he proposed a game, and, understanding how important it was to gain the uncle's favor, he readily acceded. This did not please Nathalie, as she preferred he should be occupied with herself. So, when the guests had dispersed, she turned to her uncle, saying:

"You were right, dear uncle, after all. I do not admire the Captain's manners, and see now that I should not have invited him."

"On the contrary, niece, I find he is a very well-behaved man. I have invited him to come here very often and play backgammon with me—that is, I mean, to pay his addresses to you."

An idea dawned upon her mind. She saw that he had found the way to her uncle's heart, and she forgave him for being less attentive to herself. He soon came again, and often, and, thanks to backgammon, increased in favor with the uncle while he was captivating the heart of the pretty widow also. One morning Nathalie came to the old gentleman and blushing said:

"The Captain has asked me to marry him. What would you advise me to do?"

He reflected for a few moments. "If she refuses him, d'Apremont will come here no longer, and then no more backgammon; but, if she marries him, he will be here always and I shall have my game," and the answer was:

"You had better marry him."

Nathalie really loved Armand, but she had no mind to yield too easily. She sent for the Captain.

"If you really love me—"

"Ah! can you doubt it?"

"Hush! do not interrupt me. If you really love me you will give me one proof of it."

"Anything you ask. I swear—"

"No, you must never swear any more; and one thing besides, you must never smoke. I detest the smell of tobacco, and I will not have a husband who smokes."

Armand sighed, sighed deeply; but he answered: "I will submit to anything you require. I will smoke no longer."

The wedding was soon celebrated. When they appeared in the gay world afterward, the surprise was great that the coquette had really married the sailor. The first months of their marriage passed very smoothly, though the Captain was at times thoughtful, restless, and grave. For a while Nathalie scarcely noticed it, but as time passed on these fits of depression became more frequent. One day, to her surprise, she saw him stamp with impatience.

"What is the matter?" she asked. "Why are you so irritable?"

"Nothing; nothing at all," he replied, as if ashamed of his ill-humor.

"Several times I have seen you appear out of humor without cause. Tell me if I have displeased you in anything."

Armand assured her in the most ardent manner that he had no cause to be anything but delighted with her manner on all occasions; and for a time no signs of impatience escaped him, but soon the moody spirit returned. Nathalie was distressed beyond measure, and imparted her anxiety to her uncle, who replied:

"Yes, my dear, I understand what you mean. I have often remarked it myself at backgammon; he is very inattentive, and often passes his hand over his forehead, and starts up as if something agitated him."

"My dear uncle, what can be the matter? I wish he would confide in me!"

"There are some things a man can not confide even to his wife."

"Not even to his wife! My husband must conceal nothing from me. I can not be happy otherwise."

M. d'Ablaincourt promised to endeavor to discover the mystery, but contented himself by playing backgammon every day.

Summer now came, and they all left Paris for a pretty country seat belonging to the Captain in the neighborhood of Fontainebleau. There affairs assumed a new phase. D'Apremont seemed very happy in the society of his wife, and always anxious to please her, but he left her every afternoon for about two hours, and upon his return appeared unusually gay and lively.

Nathalie was not satisfied. She said to herself: "My husband is certainly happier than he used to be in Paris, but where can he go every day in that mysterious way, all alone and without ever mentioning upon his return where he has been? I can never be happy until I fathom this to the bottom."

Sometimes she thought of following him when he left the house, which he regularly did at the same hour, sometimes even when the house was filled with company, but then she must place the servants in her confidence, and to do this, and act the spy upon the husband who was so kind and devoted to her—no, she could not do such a thing!

One day a young man, who was a visitor at the house, said, laughingly, to d'Apremont, "My fine fellow, what in the world were you doing yesterday, disguised as a peasant, at the window of a cottage about a quarter of a mile from here? If I had not been in haste I should have stopped my horse to inquire if you had turned shepherd."

"My husband disguised as a shepherd!" exclaimed Nathalie, in astonishment.

"Edgar is mistaken; it could not have been me that he saw," replied Armand, turning away in evident embarrassment.

"How was the man you saw dressed? Where is the cottage?" asked Nathalie, hurriedly.

"Oh, madame, I do not know exactly. I am not well enough acquainted with this part of the country, but the man wore a blue blouse. Why I should have taken him for the Captain I cannot imagine as we are not yet in the carnival" was the rather unsatisfactory reply from the young man, who felt he had committed a faux pas somehow.

Madame d'Apremont said no more, but she was fully persuaded the person mentioned was her husband. But why disguise himself? He must be engaged in some very dreadful affair; and Nathalie shed tears as she thought, "Oh, how unfortunate I am to have married a man who is so mysterious!" She now became very anxious to return to Paris, and her husband, always attentive to her wishes, made no objection. But once in town his old moods of impatience and irritability returned, and one day he said to her:

"My dearest, I think I must have my afternoon walks again as I used to take in the country. An old sailor like myself can not sit all the evening after dinner."

"Yes, sir, I see how it is—gr."

"Nevertheless, if you have any objection—"

"Oh, no, what objection could I have?"

He went out, and continued to do so day after day, at the same hour, just as he had done in the country, and as before he regained his amiability.

"He loves some other woman," thought Nathalie, "and he must see her every day. Oh, how wretched I am! But I will let him know that his perfidy is discovered—no, I will wait until I have some certain proof wherewith to confront him." Then she went to her uncle, saying: "Ah, I am the most unhappy creature in the world!"

"What is the matter?" cried the old man, leaning back in his arm-chair.

"Armand leaves the house every evening after dinner, and comes back in high spirits and as anxious to please me as on the day of our marriage. Oh, uncle, I can not bear it any longer. If you do not assist me to discover where he goes, I will separate myself from him."

"But, my dear niece—"

"But, my dear uncle, you who are so good and obliging, grant me this one favor. I am sure there is some woman in the secret."

M. d'Ablaincourt wished to prevent a rupture between his niece and her husband which would interfere with the pleasant life he led at their house; so he promised, and pretended to follow Armand, but soon came back, saying he had lost sight of him.

"But in what direction does he go?"

"Sometimes one way and sometimes another, but always alone; so your suspicions are unfounded. Be assured he only walks for exercise."

But Nathalie was not to be duped in that way. She sent for a little errand-boy of whose intelligence she had heard, and said to him:

"M. d'Ablaincourt walks out every evening."

"Yes, madame."

"To-morrow you will follow him, observe where he goes, and come and tell me privately. Do you understand?"

"Yes, madame."

She then waited impatiently for the next day, and for the hour of her husband's departure. At last the time came; the pursuit is going on. Nathalie counted the moments. After three-quarters of an hour the messenger arrived, covered with dust.

"Well," she exclaimed, "speak, tell me everything you have seen."

"Madame, I followed M. d'Apremont at a distance as far as the Marias in the Rue Vieille du Temple, where he entered a small house in an alley. There was no servant to let him in."

"An alley? No servant? Dreadful!"

"I went in directly after him, and heard him go up stairs and unlock a door with a key he held in his hand."

"Open the door himself without knocking? Are you sure of that?"

"Yes, madame."

"The wretch! So he has a key. But go on."

"When the door shut after him, I stole softly up stairs and peeped through the key-hole."

"Well? You shall have twenty francs more."

"I peeped through the key-hole and saw him drag a great box along the floor—"

"A box?"

"—Then he undressed himself, and—"

"Undressed himself?"

"—Then for moment or so I could not see him, but directly he appeared again in a sort of gray blouse, and a cap on his head."

"A blouse still! What in the world can he do with so many blouses! Well, what next?"

"I came away then, madame, and made haste to tell it to you. But he is there still."

"Well, now, run to the corner and get me a hack, and direct the hackman to the house where you have been."

Whilst he was gone for the hack Nathalie hurried on her hat and cloak, and ran to her uncle's room, saying:

"I have found him out. He is at his mistress' house now, in a gray blouse. He had a blue one in the country. But I will go and confound him, and you will see me no more."

The old man had no time to reply before she was gone with her messenger in the hack.

They stopped at last. "There is the house," said the boy. The lady got out, pale and trembling.

"Shall I go up stairs with you, madame?" he asked.

"No; I will go alone. The third story, is it not?"

"Yes, madame. The left door at the head of the stairs."

Nathalie mounted the dark, narrow stairs, and arrived at the door almost fainting. "Open the door," she cried, "or I shall die!"

The door was opened, and Madame d'Apremont was received in her husband's arms, who was alone in the room, and in a gray blouse, and smoking a Turkish pipe. "My wife!" he exclaimed, in surprise.

"Yes, sir, your wife, who suspecting your perfidy, has followed you to discover the cause of your mysterious conduct."

"How, Nathalie, my mysterious conduct? Ah-h! I see! Look, here is the cause," he said, showing his pipe.

"Before our marriage you forbade me to smoke, and, anxious to please you, I promised not to do so. For some months I kept the promise, but you can not know what it cost me. You will remember how irritable and sad I became. It was my pipe, my beloved pipe, I was regretting. One day while in the country I came across a little cottage where a peasant was smoking. I asked him to lend me a cap and blouse, for I should like to smoke with him, but it was necessary to conceal the smell of the smoke, as it was odious to you. It was settled between us, and I repaired thither every afternoon to indulge in my favorite occupation, and with these precautions deceived you. After we returned to Paris I hired this little room at a distance from home, and here I kept this box in which I always put my coat before I get out my pipe so that no odor may offend you. This is all the mystery."

ARCHERY NOTES.

There is no doubt now but that archery will attain to as much, if not greater, popularity in California than it has in the Eastern States. The enthusiastic reception which the ladies have given this fascinating sport is a reliable indication of its permanent success. During this week no less than thirty archers are known to have joined the ranks, and the army of the great unrecognized will treble that number. The "dark horses" in archery are very numerous. There are lots of males and females who have gone along quietly, practicing at thirty and forty-yard targets in their back premises until they have achieved a degree of skill which makes them formidable antagonists on the field.

Talking about "dark horses" suggests the name of Miss H. T., a young lady who religiously devotes an hour every day to shooting at the twenty-yard range, whose bow is of the neatest trim, string looped up with green ribbon, and whose quiver is ornamented with surpassing taste and skill. She is a San Francisco toxophilite, and, as the legend goes, intends to confine herself to solitary practice until she feels confident of her ability to vanquish all comers.

The American bowyers are going to push their English cousins pretty close for the trade on this continent. Their first attempts were crude and unsatisfactory, it is true, but that they have now learned the art of making good bows is evinced by the opinion of Mr. Will Thompson, of Indiana, who is probably the champion shot of the United States. He gives his experience of a number of American-made bows in a lengthy article in Forest and Stream, the sum and substance of which is, that the American manufacturers are going to turn out the finest bows in the world. But the bows of which Mr. Thompson speaks range in price all the way from $20 to $75, and it seems that a man ought to get a pretty good bit of elastic wood for that figure. Not content with giving us a severe turn at the quotation of those prices, Mr. Thompson coolly assures us that of course the imported Spanish and Italian yew bows can be had at from $200 to $250, which, although it seems a high price, assures the purchaser of the possession of a weapon the very perfection of the bowyer's art. Think of that, ye archers who growl at paying $6 and $7 for bows which only cost $2 50 in England, and then dream of owning an Italian yew.

Although Mr. Will Thompson is enthusiastic in his praise, first of one bowyer, then of another, he is withal a magnificent archer. Not long ago he planted three successive arrows in a circle ten inches in diameter, at one hundred yards. This is a pretty fair example for those fellows who scorn to loose an arrow at any mark under sixty yards.

The grand national archery tournament which comes off in Chicago in August is going to be something worth seeing, for all the crack shots of the country will pull a string at that gathering. Nor is it a settled thing that the Thompsons, Will or Maurice, will carry off the leading prizes. There may be, and undoubtedly are, many "dark horses" who, with the assistance of a little luck, may push those fine shots to prove their mettle. One of the prizes is offered by an American bowyer. It consists of a beautiful silver-mounted case—value of about $135—containing six of the best bows that the manufacturer can produce.

One of the most enjoyable pastimes connected with this sport is roving archery, or shooting at rovers, as some choose to call it. A party of archers sally forth to the fields, one chooses a mark, all shoot in turn, and the nearest scores one, and has, moreover, the privilege of selecting the next mark, and so on until ten, fifteen, or twenty points are scored, whatever the game has been set at. But this involves the loss of sundry arrows, and when an archer pays $9 or $7 per dozen for the same, accidents of this sort are apt to disturb his enjoyment of the game. To avoid this, he has to take the home-made arrow; and I have found in Oakland a man who makes an excellent shaft of seasoned pine, straight, tough, and well finished. Mr. Wight has furnished a number of archers with shafts for roving archery, and indeed for target practice for that matter; but they must feather them themselves, an art which is very easily acquired. His address is Valley and Twenty-fourth Streets, Oakland; and, being himself an archer, he understands precisely what a good arrow should be.

Those purchasing new bows, and reading in works on archery, published Great Britain, of how bows should be cared for, must remember that those writers speak of a moist climate. The wood we receive here has been seasoned in England, and the archer who wishes to preserve his bow for any time should not be sparing of linseed oil before putting it away after the day's shooting is over. Here is a case in point. A gentleman bought a few days ago a lancewood bow. The first time he pulled an arrow to the head, he shattered it, so dry and parched was the wood. He bought another bow at the same store, rubbed the varnish off with sandpaper, oiled the bow for several days before using it, and he has now a piece of wood that won't crack if he attempts to tie it into a double knot. I will conclude this paper with some useful hints to beginners in regard to the rudiments of the bow, which may prove convenient to those who have no experienced archer to give them a first lesson.

Place the target at a distance of say ten yards, and brace your bow. Put the arrow-nock on the string at the place marked for it, with the cock feather to the left. This is done with your right hand, the left holding the bow in a nearly horizontal position. Now, with the nock thus on the string, hook the tips of the first, second, and third finger under the string, taking the arrow between the first and second. Now extend the bow toward the target, draw the arrow to the head, bringing the hand as high and to the ear; look straight and hard toward the centre of the target, but do not even glance at your arrow; blindly direct your arrow by your sense of feeling; there is no such thing as taking aim with an arrow, and he is a bungling archer who attempts it; shoot from the first by your sense of direction and elevation. Study your bow and the flight of your arrows; notice the defects of your shooting, and consider how to mend them. If you shoot continually on one side of the centre, note if your string is straight on the bow, and see if you don't twist your bow with the left hand just at the point of losing the arrow with the right. It is a common mistake with beginners to place the target at the start too far distant. Eight or ten yards is sufficient, and move it back when you begin to get all the arrows in the gold. QUIVER.

The Vision of Life.

Death and I,
On a hill so high,
Stood side by side;
And we saw below,
Running to and fro,
All things that be in the world so wide.

Ten thousand cries
From the gulf did rise,
With a wild discordant sound;
Laughter and wailing,
Prayer and railing,
As the ball spun round and round.

And over all
Hung a floating pall
Of dark and gory veils;
'Tis the blood of years,
And the sighs and tears,
Which the noisome marsh exhales.

All this did seem
Like a fearful dream,
Till Death cried with a joyful cry:
"Look down! look down!
It is all mine own,
Here comes life's pageant by!"

Like to a masque in ancient revelries,
With mingling sound of thousand harmonies,
Soft lute and viol, trumpet-blast and gong,
They came along, and still they came along!
Thousands, and tens of thousands, all that e'er
Peopled the earth, or plowed th' unfathomed deep,
All that now breathe the universal air,
And all that in the womb of Time yet sleep.

Before this mighty host a woman came,
With hurried feet and oft-averted head;
With accursed light
Her eyes were bright,
And with inviting hand them on she beckoned.
Her followed close, with wild acclaim,
Her servants three: Lust, with his eyes of fire,
And burning lips, that tremble with desire,
Pale sunken cheek; and as he staggered by
The trumpet-blast was hushed, and there arose
A melting strain of such soft melody
As breathed into the soul love's ecstasies and woes.

Loudly again the trumpet smote the air,
The double drum did roll, and to the sky
Bayed War's blood-hounds, the deep artillery;
And Glory,
With feet all gory,
And dazzling eyes, rushed by,
Waving a flashing sword and laurel wreath—
The pang and the inheritance of Death.

He pass'd like lightning—then ceased every sound
Of war triumphant, and of love's sweet song,
And all was silent. Creeping slow along,
With eager eyes, that wandered round and round,
Wild, haggard mein, and meagre, wasted frame,
Bowed to the earth, pale, starving, Av'rice came:
Clutching with palsied hands his golden god,
And tottering in the path the others trod.

These, one by one,
Came, and were gone;
And after them followed the ceaseless stream
Of worshipers, who with mad shout and scream,
Unhallow'd toil, and more unhallow'd mirth,
Follow their mistress, Pleasure, through the earth.
Death's eyeless sockets glared at them all,
And many in the train were seen to fall,
Livid and cold, beneath his empty gaze;
But not for this was stayed the mighty throng,
Nor ceased the warlike clang or wanton lays,
But still they rushed—along—along—along!

FRANCES ANNE BUTLER.

The Butterfly's Funeral.

Oh, ye, who so lately were blythe and gay,
At the Butterfly's banquet carousing away,
Your feasts and your revels of pleasure are fled,
For the soul of the banquet, the Butterfly, 's dead!

No longer the Flies and the Emmets advance
To join with their friends in the Grasshopper's dance;
For see his thin form o'er the favorite bend,
And the Grasshopper mourns for the loss of his friend.

And hark! to the funeral dirge of the Bee,
And the Beetle, who follows as solemn as he;
And see, where so mournful the green rushes wave,
The Mole is preparing the Butterfly's grave.

The Dormouse attended, but cold and forlorn,
And the Gnat slowly winned his shrill little horn;
And the Moth, who was grieved for the loss of a sister,
Bent over the body and silently kissed her.

The corse was embalmed at the set of the sun,
And inclosed in a case which the Silkworm had spun;
By the help of the Hornet the coffin was laid
On a bier out of myrtle and jessamine made.

In weepers and scarves came the Butterflies all,
And six of their number supported the pall;
And the Spider came there, in his mourning so black,
But the fire of the Glowworm soon frightened him back.

The Grub left his nutshell to join in the throng,
And slowly led with him the Bookworm along,
Who wept his poor neighbor's unfortunate doom,
And wrote these few lines to be placed on her tomb:

EPITAPH.

At this solemn spot, where the green rushes wave,
Here sadly we bent o'er the Butterfly's grave;
'Twas here we to beauty our obsequies paid,
And hallowed the mound which her ashes had made.

And here shall the daisy and violet blow,
And the lily discover her bosom of snow;
While under the leaf, in the evenings of spring,
Still mourning his friend, shall the Grasshopper sing.

Despondency.

The thoughts that rain their steady glow
Like stars on life's cold sea,
Which others know, or say they know—
They never shone for me.

Thoughts light, like gleams, my spirit's sky,
But they will not remain;
They light me once, they hurry by,
And never come again. MATTHEW ARNOLD.

ABOUT WOMEN.

A Rockland female calls her husband mucilage, because he is such a stick.

Court-plaster covereth a multitude of (ladies' unscratched) chins.

One of the most interesting sights in life is that of a spirituelle young lady sharpening a lead pencil with a table knife.

Eve was the first and we reckon the only woman who did not gather up her dress in both hands and yell at the sight of a snake.

Man may love his wife with the fervor of a clear-draft blast-furnace, yet he will not smile when she trumps over him at euchre.

Women were never cut out for professional base ball players. A woman can do most anything, but she can't slide in gracefully on the home base.

It is said that Kellogg dresses with Quaker-like simplicity. That's nothing. Pauline Markham nearly attains to the simplicity of the South Sea Islander.

A lady in Louisville has a husband who snores. She keeps a clothes pin under her pillow, and when his snoring begins she puts it on his bugle and then sleeps in peace.

A dear little thing remarked that the first time she was embraced she was so afraid that she was going to die, and was going right to heaven; but after a while she hoped she wasn't.

An Eastern exchange says: "Senator Booth, of California, who has withstood the wiles of woman's smiles for more than half a century, has been captured at last by a lively little widow of Washington."

And now Eve is accused of having married too early. We have frequently thought she took the first offer she received, but she was a young and giddy thing, and she knew she was not going to have any mother-in-law.

She placed the hat upon her head
And, glancing at the blue-jay wing,
She puckered up her lips and said:
"Tis just too sweet for anything."
And then she took it off—twas in a store.

The Boccaccio stocking is out in Vienna. The peculiarity of a pair of Boccaccio stockings is, that one is black and the other white. Pretty stockings and low shoes have become a too apparent fact as a part of young ladies' toilets.

A Fairhaven lass, with visions of a bridal trousseau before her eyes, has recently given the gentleman who is paying his addresses to her a gentle hint, by presenting to him a neatly worked card, upon which is inscribed, "I need thee every hour."

A Vassar College girl challenges any girl of any institution in the United States to chew gum with her. She offers to chew a hundred bits' worth of gum in one hundred consecutive quarter days. Gum to be clear of hair and not mixed with shoemaker's wax.

The sun is softly beaming
Upon the mignonette,
And on the snowy cottage.
We see the sign, "To Let,"
Upon the rippled lakelet
The gay Muscovies quack,
While Angelina Minnie
Doth wear upon her back
A porous plaster.

"How did you come to get married?" asked a man of a very homely friend. "Well, you see," he replied, "after I had vainly tried to win several girls that I wanted, I finally turned my attention to one that wanted me, and then it didn't take long to arrange matters."

No fashionable bride of the period neglects to have her picture taken in her wedding robes, and—strange to say—in almost every case the photograph is made before the marriage takes place, notwithstanding the fact that there's many a slip between the church and the ceremony.

A woman may revel in silks and satins; she may make her beauty resplendent with diamonds and opals; she may attire herself in the most delicate colors, until she looks sweeter than the burst of dawn on paradise; but at the same time she will condescend to tie her hair up with the fag end of a shoe string.

There is a common belief among the vulgar as to the presence of a man in the moon. Whatever the disgraceful facts may be about the actual queen of night, there is one kind of luminary that must have a man in it, and that is the honeymoon. Any one who is in doubt on this point should confer with the proper authorities.

The little girl prayed, "God bless papa, and mamma, and Uncle John, and Aunt Jane, and sister, and brother, and baby, and everybody." But the little sister offered a criticism. She said: "If you'd said 'everybody' to begin with, you'd have got 'em all in and wouldn't have had to make so long a prayer." A clean cut hint to our gospel sharps.

Her eyes seemed like two violets;
Indeed she looked benign,
While holding in her snowy hand
A piece of cotton "twign."
She looked like a crimson rose
Which fragrant zephyrs kiss,
As she remarked, the morning glory
Can shortly now on this
"Hump" itself into beauty and perfection.

There was an elopement from Camden, and they came back to beg the pardon of the stern parents of the girl. The father was not in the least ruffled. He told Salie, that is the name of the young lady, that he was very glad indeed she was married, and that if she had asked his permission, he would have given it at once, and she would not have had to risk her neck by climbing out of a three-story window. He was somewhat surprised though that anybody should marry her, and he hoped now that she was married she would endeavor to curb her temper and reform her habits. The bridegroom listened to a part of this, but when it was finished he had disappeared. In fact, eloped again, this time by himself.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MAY 10, 1879.

The new Constitution was adopted by a decisive vote of the people of California. It was accepted after a very thorough analysis, and if demagogism has operated upon the minds of the ignorant, and prejudice has stirred the passions of the vicious, it is nevertheless in accordance with the theory of American government that the majority must rule and the minority must submit, so long as the acts of the majority are legal and the burden endurable. The sun will continue to shine, and the grass to grow, the seasons will follow in their courses, our mines will yield precious ores, our vines will pour forth their purple floods, and great ships with their bellying sails will seek our harbors for grain and wool. We are deeply solicitous lest the result of this election should work to our State an irreparable injury. That it will temporarily derange our industries and disturb our financial condition we do not doubt; but laws are flexible, and the common interest we all have in the welfare of the State and in questions of social order will enable an intelligent people to harmonize what now seems irreconcilable, and adjust what appears to be inharmonious. The most painful feature of this recent election has been the character of the men and the motives that have been called into prominence. It has been the first and only election within our personal experience where class prejudices have been invoked—where it seemed necessary to stir from the bottom all that was bad in the human heart in order to secure a class victory. The whole conflict has been one of strong personal feeling. It has been used to avenge personal wrongs. Every man in the State who has had a grievance against an individual or a corporation, who has gone through the bankrupt court, who has become the victim of bad habits, bad associates, or bad luck, who has had a quarrel with himself, or fate, or God, is out of office when he thinks he ought to have been in, or poor when he thinks he ought to be rich, has somehow thought to get even by listening to the outspoken discontent of the sand-lot.

And now comes a State administration to place this new machinery in motion, a new Legislature to breathe into it the spark of vital life, a Judiciary to interpret, and a Governor to execute its mandates. Already the order goes forth that those who passed the Constitution must administer the government under it. This means that Terry, Howard, Kearney, and the Chronicle must become the fountain-head of justice, law, and social order. This destroys all old party lines, and forms a new political organization to which the others must bend. To talk about a Republican party or a Democratic party in the face of such an organization as now confronts us is suicidal folly. This is no time for party leaders to crack their whips over the heads of their fellows, nor is it a time for intelligent men to wrangle over the non-essentials of politics. For intelligent men, who are property-owners, and who are engaged in business pursuits, to now divide upon questions of party would be impolitic and most unwise. This is one of those periods that sometimes occur to all governments when it is imperatively necessary that all lesser considerations be merged in the greater one of self-defence and self-preservation. When France was threatened by a foreign invasion party differences and personal jealousies were forgotten, and nowhere in the world had party feeling run so high as in Paris. When our Union was threatened, we ignored party estrangements at the North, and united in defense of the nation. This is not an armed invasion from abroad. It is not a warlike insurrection against civil authority, but it is a most dangerous departure when in a government controlled by majorities the ignorant and the propertyless are allowed to have the encouragement they have received in this conflict. We desire it by no means to be understood that men of intelligence and integrity, men who have property and who love social order, have not cast their votes for the new Constitution. There were many in it well calculated to attract the attention of those who are sincerely anxious to work needed reforms. There are those who see to correct in this community as elsewhere, there are wrongs that demand to be righted, and there are oppressions that must be relaxed. Our wealthy men have not been justly mindful of their relations to the community in which they have lived, and from whom they have made their fortunes; they have not correctly administered the trust reposed in them; they have been cold, exacting, heartless, and unconscionable in their personal dealings, and they are, as a rule, guiltless of any sympathy with those among whom they live. Corporations have been greedy, tyrannical, and oppressive, swelling their gains with exactions that, if not illegal, are at least unconscionable. The average corporation is not only soulless, but is heartless and unprincipled.

It would be unwise for any intelligent person to close his eyes to the facts disclosed on Wednesday last. There was a great silent vote that indicates a discontent that had not better be allowed to pass unheeded. It is idle to say that only the ignorant, and the vicious, and the demagogue voted for the new Constitution; this would be an admission that the people of this class are in a majority in California, which is not true. It would be admitting too much; the people of this State are intelligent, thoughtful, earnest, honest people; they have been carried off their feet by circumstances. The farmer, usually the most staid, reliable, and sensible of all our classes, has, by a strange combination of events, been thrown into party alliance with the very worst, most dangerous, and most vicious of our alien population. The farmer has not grasped the situation nor intelligently acted. He has felt himself swindled by an unjust discrimination against him of the land tax, and he is in a measure right. Our taxes are not, and never have been, equally assessed. The working farmer, looking out from under the trees and from among the vines he has planted, and upon which he pays a tax proportioned to the labor he has placed upon his land, sees over the fence or hedge that marks his boundary an almost untaxed estate, kept uncultivated by some great land speculator, and he feels doubly injured—first that the discrimination is made against his industry, and, second that improvement is kept from his neighborhood because this greedy land monopolist will neither sell nor improve. This feeling is not mollified, nor are his resentments softened when he reflects that in a very large number of cases the estate has been fraudulently acquired. The relation of railroads to the farming population has been ungenerous, and the management as a rule has not only been impolitic but unjust. We read the other day that the Southern Michigan Railroad out of an earning of $14,000,000 had made five and a half millions profit. We understand the Central Pacific makes nine millions of annual dividend. Not stopping here to question whether it is legal to place such a burden upon the productive energies of an industrious people, or to what extent the sovereign authority may exert itself to control the business relations of corporations with the communities with whom they do business, we may at least be permitted to hint that the community is entitled at least to courtesy and to fair treatment at the hands of railroad officials.

Let us illustrate by a personal incident. We gave to the North Pacific Coast Railroad a right of way through our farm in Marin County. Mark the fact, we gave the company a right to use the land for railroad purposes. When our tenant went within the lines to cut grass he was driven away with insolence and threats. The policy of that road is to litigate every claim for damage; every animal overrun by them and every damage done is an invitation to a lawsuit. The farmer has the alternative of submitting to a wrong or seeking an expensive remedy. Mining stocks are so handled by our leading operators that dealers are confirmed in the opinion that to the casualties and chances of mining they have the added dangers of fraudulent manipulation. While this contest was pending, Mr. Lloyd Tevis made a combination to advance the price of ice from one cent per pound to two and a half. It costs $5 to manufacture a ton of ice which sells for $50. Now, it would not be surprising if, when a gentleman takes his glass of ice-water or his iced punch, that he should silently toast Mr. Tevis to that future where the manufacture of ice is altogether impossible, and he might perhaps be justifiable in wishing himself a monopolist of the commodity upon the other side of the great gulf. To vote for the new Constitution for such reasons is illogical and unreasonable, but it is not perhaps so unnatural.

The new Constitution promises to punish corporations; it promises to equalize taxation. It was craftily prepared to catch votes, and it has succeeded. It will disappoint those honest-minded idiots who anticipated the coming of the millennium upon its adoption, and will, we believe, disappoint those who think that any very serious or permanent evils are likely to result from it. The whole thing was utterly illogical; there was no sense in it from beginning to end. It began with one class of demagogues and ended with another. It illustrates that we are not impressed with the importance, and do not properly value the privileges, of republican government. Like health, pure water, and fresh air, we are too accustomed to them, and do not appreciate their value till we are deprived of them. Our old Constitution was a good one. It defined and limited the principles that underlie a government like ours. It was modeled after that of older States. It was well enough. It may have, and doubtless did require some amendments, and the instrument provided a rational manner of making these amendments. But the Democracy, flushed with power, having both branches of the State Legislature and the Executive, lusting after a convention, in which every Democratic Senator and Legislator hoped to spend his summer, and to acquire an office out of the new thing he should create, without thought or reflection determined to hold a Constitutional Convention. Governor Irwin, Lieutenant-Governor Johnson, Senator McCoppin, and indeed, the whole staff of party leaders, some for one reason, some for another—none of which were statesmanlike or honorable—pushed the thing through in the very shadow of the storm they saw brewing. The sand-lot mob was then muttering its threats against society; times were hard; people discontented; corporations exacting; wealth was insolent; a dry winter had been followed by a pinching summer; labor was scarce, wages low, and every man of sense in the State saw with great distinctness that it was no time to ordain an organic law. But ignorant, selfish, blatant Democratic demagogues thought they saw an opportunity for earning ten dollars a day by a summer sweat at Sacramento, and saw in the distance the possibility of another and a better office. The average Democrat will willingly live in the Penitentiary, and do hard labor all his life, if you can convince him that he is in office. Once in the early days there was an emancipator in San Quentin, in which General Jim Estell made a speech to the convicts, and threatened to turn every d—n man of them out if they did not behave themselves. Order was at once reestablished, for there is always a Democratic majority among prison convicts.

After the convention was called another class of Democratic demagogues came to the surface, and the tramps and vagabonds of the sand-lot, in association with the more honest but not more intelligent granger, came to the top, and the result was the bungle of conundrums called the new Constitution—a code of laws in every part of which the demagogue, the criminal, and the idiot disclosed his handiwork. Then came the election, and still another class of demagogues and disorganizers came to the surface. Governor Johnson, Frank McCoppin, Senator Evans, and all the other peanut statesmen dodged the issue, or, like Governor Irwin, endeavored to correct the error of the original call by opposing it. Then came forth all the played out old fossils of both parties. Kearney and Wellock gave way to Terry and Howard; dead men formed the processions; ghosts came out upon the platforms; the damned were resurrected; at the trumpet of the archangel of the Constitution political sepulchres gave up their long buried and bad smelling corpses. Ex-Governor Downey and ex-Senator Cole walked forth. Samuel Soule and William A. Piper, emaciated spirits of a long forgotten past, came straggling out. O. C. Pratt and Nathaniel Bennett, like long buried toads, from the riven oak hopped blinking to the sun. John Lord Love, Tompkins, and other small deer came wriggling out like angleworms in a shower. Estee and Campbell, representing the remains of an early Republican formation, struck hands with Burch and Wozencraft, and such like of the old rebel guard. The native-born American farmer was cheek by jowl with the sans culotte of the sand hills. Hibernia, Teutonia, and Pike County arranged themselves in battle line under the leadership of a drayman, a barber, a coak, a corset-maker, half a dozen pettifogging lawyers, and a score of rebels, and good society held its nose while the ragged regiment went reeling and bowling in triumph by.

And now, in accordance with the rules of honorable political warfare, Denis Kearney is justly entitled to become the candidate of the new party for Governor; he has fairly earned it by his patriotic devotion to the cause and his unselfish personal sacrifices. He is a fair representative of the rank and file of the party, and great injustice will be done him and his associates if the old chivalry element is permitted to have the post of honor in the new organization. The slogan and rallying cry of the new party should be "Saint Denis and Ould Ireland." The Honorable David S. Terry should be accorded the second place. Without Denis there had been no Constitution—without Terry there had been no Constitution. The third position belongs to the Chronicle, for without the Chronicle there had been no Kearney; without Kearney no Terry; without both no new Constitution. We would accord to the Honorable David the position he vacated in order to kill Senator Broderick, and would make him Chief Justice. To Volney E. Howard we would also give position upon the Supreme Bench. We would make John Lord Love Attorney-General; Estee should have the pound, and Bob Ferral should be retained as special counsel to prosecute all dogs found estray. Bonnet should be assigned to curl O. C. Pratt's hair; Clitus should have some secondary position. Freud, Vaquerel, Beerstecher, Piper, Senator Cole, ex-Governor Downey, Samuel Soule, and the others who have kindly allowed themselves to be tied to the tail of Kearney's kite for the Chronicle to fly, we would give some very small place—something corresponding with their respective abilities and claims. We shall be curious to see the outcome of this new party combination. We prophesy that it will not long continue a happy family.

It is not so much the new Constitution—that we can stand; it is the devilish residuum of ignorance and crime that has been stirred from the bottom, and now comes to the surface of society to exhibit its arrogance and insolence; it is the whisky-drinking and the beer-guzzling that taints the political atmosphere with its foul and stinking breath. It has been a conflict in which ignorance and vagabondism has striven for mastery. It has brought to the surface all that was bad and dangerous in our community. The discussion on the part of the order-loving has been an appeal to the better sense of the people, and reason and intelligence have not prevailed. It brings us face to face with agrarianism. It shakes our confidence in the intelligence and honesty of the American people, and makes us doubt the permanency of republican government. It convinces us that the United States has committed a great error in inviting to our country so much of foreign ignorance and vice. It suggests to us the necessity of revolutionizing our laws of naturalization, and is suggestive of the formation of a native American party that shall invite to its affiliation only the intelligent and respectable of the foreign-born. However, forewarned, forearmed, and we will be prepared to deal with this element in the future. We must disfranchise the ignorant and the vicious. The absurdity of allowing the man who can not read, or the vicious rascal who hopes to eat his bread in idleness, to form our organic law and to have equal voice with the man of property and intelligence is apparent. The mob thinks it has gained the ascendancy, and will probably never be convinced that it does not dominate society until it endeavors to make its agrarianism a practical success. There is a large class of idiots who indulge themselves in the luxury of thinking they would like to have a little brush with decent people in the way of a riot. We sincerely hope they will not start any commotion in this direction, for riots are dreadful unpleasant incidents in the end to a mob.

And now what becomes of the Democracy—that grand old party with all its splendid traditions? It seems to us as though it is in a bad way. After going to pieces as a national organization—splitting upon the rock of slavery, foundering in the sea of civil war—its wreck had begun to come ashore in fragments, and it was hoped that it could have been so reconstructed as to have attempted another Presidential trip. Indeed, it was patched up, and put together, and fastened, and copped, and strengthened, and painted, and furnished with new masts and new sails, till it begun to look like the old thing. It had secured men for the quarter deck and after deck—volunteers from the rebel army. It had the Senate and the House, and it was just looking for a captain preparatory to taking a crew on board for the voyage. And now comes this insurrection—chivalry and Ireland strike hands away off here in California, and there is danger that no portion of the crew of the great Democratic ship will be allowed to enlist for the Presidential voyage from California. This is important, when it is considered possible that upon the electoral vote of California depends the Presidential election. The Chronicle announces its determination to keep up the present movement till a State administration is chosen to inaugurate and operate the new law. This is logical and consistent. The new party is the majority. It will naturally cohere for the purpose of electing a State administration in harmony with the new Constitution. There can be but one party in opposition to the "Kearney party," or perhaps we should say the "Chronicle party," for to the Chronicle alone is this Kearney attributable. It will rally all to the support of the new organization. Whether it can keep its forces in hand for another conflict time will determine. The Honorable David S. Terry is a strong man, and of strong influence with all Southern men who are not yet prepared to allow the gulf of civil discord to be closed, and can, we think, be relied upon to keep the Pike County farmer and the "Arkansas traveler" in line of battle for another fight. Kearney will be sure to retain a strong following of blatherskites of his own nationality, and, unless the party shall meet with unexpected antagonisms in its nominating convention, it will present a bold front. New parties are zealous, and are apt to be both united and harmonious. The Democracy is utterly demoralized and destroyed as a party. It has lost some leaders and nearly all its rank and file. It is not an exaggeration to say that nearly the whole party has deserted and occupies a resolute attitude against coming back.

The Republican party is intact in its organization; neither dismayed nor demoralized; but it is in a hopeless minority. There are enough Democrats left out in the cold to give it victory, if their cooperation can be secured. The best part of the Democracy, the most intelligent part of the German and Irish people, and all those gentlemen of foreign birth who have property to preserve, are now placed in such a position as that they can, by proper exertion and judicious management, be brought into harmonious cooperation with the Republicans. But it must borne in mind that a Presidential election comes next year, and it is doubtful whether Democratic party leaders will consent to abandon their party organization. If they can become the allies of Republicans against a common enemy, and in such a way as will not compromise their party standing, a victory can be organized.

We reserve to ourselves the privilege of keeping our mind upon the proposition how best to organize for the next gubernatorial election for another week, that we may have time to consider what is best to be done under the peculiar circumstances of our present condition. It is apparent that a few Republican ward politicians, in the interest of men plotting for office, must not be permitted to forestall the action of men who are entitled to lead in party matters; and it must not be forgotten that there is a very large and very respectable number of Democratic voters who are willing now to cooperate with Republicans, if they can do it on honorable terms; and without that alliance the Republican party is in a hopeless minority. This is a time for the exercise of sound judgment by cool and unselfish men.

This Constitutional election has definitely disposed of the Chinese question. It has put a quietus upon its agitation that will not soon be removed. Men of influence, and gentlemen who have given very earnest attention to the business, and have endeavored to arrest Chinese immigration, are so utterly disgusted with the conduct of workingmen that they will let them work out the solution of the problem in their own way. The farming population is in favor of Chinese immigration, and will not become allies of the city workingmen nor aid them to oppose it. If it comes down to a conflict between Asiatic and European foreigners—one with ballots and the other without; if Americans are to have as enemies the ignorant Europeans, and are to be outvoted by them at the ballot-box, then the foreigner must expect and will get but little sympathy. It will take years to reinstate the Chinese question where it was before the laborer arrayed himself against capitalists. Hundreds of men are now saying that as between the Irish, German, foreign, ignorant voter and the Chinese non-voting population they prefer the Chinese. Hundreds are now saying that the Chinese are less dangerous and more desirable than any other class of foreign labor, who, before the election, were earnestly opposed to Chinese immigration. It will be very strange indeed if the workingmen and women of San Francisco do not find they have made a serious mistake in following the demagogues of the sand-lot and the Chronicle into an opposition to the interests of their best friends.

We hear inquiries from all sides as to where the money came from used by the Chronicle. It is our opinion that the Messrs. De Young furnished it themselves from their own resources. It was their opportunity to make a bold dash for journalistic supremacy and party power. They had the sagacity to see that in this conflict of classes was their opportunity to ride a winning horse. We do not accord to the Chronicle any controlling or directing influence of results; those cities and leading towns where the circulation of the Chronicle was largest did not bring majorities. The farmers took the bit in their teeth, and ran without spur or guidance. Kearney is the only real leader the contest has brought forth. The Chronicle, Terry, Howard, and other men of desperate political fortunes saw the coming wave and had the prudence to mount it. We do not agitate ourselves overmuch as to this result. The sober second thought of the people will give a different complexion to affairs, and in a short time the business industries and finance of the country will settle down to legitimate and healthful channels.

Those who are ignorant of party management and unfamiliar with the details of conducting political contests can not readily appreciate the difficulties that surround an election conflict like that we have just passed through. The Great Register of our city contains the names of 47,823 voters, and the election discloses the apparent fact that several thousand abstained from voting. Yet this is not true. The gentlemen to whom the management of election was confided ascertained that nearly seven thousand names upon the register were those of dead men, absentees, and others who would not be present at election day. It was also ascertained that there was a conspiracy on the part of the new Constitution people, fully perfected in all its details, to vote these names. This was detected, exposed, and defeated. Difficulties presented themselves upon every side. There was no party machinery to put in motion; personal difficulties had to be arranged among jealous party leaders; indifferent men had to be driven to the Register's office; information had to be distributed throughout the country; prejudice, ignorance, passion, and jealous discontent had to be met and combated. As it was necessary to disburse money for certain legitimate purposes connected with the election, the Chronicle purposely caused the impression to go abroad that there was a vast corruption fund for the purchase of votes. Such a rumor stirred the cupidity of the class that was naturally for the new Constitution, and when it found there was no such fund it emphasized their antagonism to the old law, because fortunes acquired under it would not be used to bribe them. Messrs. Stow, Coleman, Low, and other gentlemen found upon their hands the most important election that our people have been called upon to contest. They were embarrassed at every step of their advance by meeting new and unexpected obstacles. And although the election has gone against us, we are not disposed to underrate the difficulties of the conflict nor question the prudence, wisdom, and honest purpose of the managers. The money expended in analyzing this Constitution is not wasted; the seed sown in this discussion will bring forth good fruit at the gubernatorial election. Every intelligent man of honest purpose will be impressed with the necessity of securing in the September election an intelligent and patriotic Legislature, an honest and learned judiciary, and a firm executive. With such a Legislature, Court, and Governor, this new Constitution will be placed in operation under favorable circumstances; what is good in it will be utilized and preserved, and what is bad may be amended.

There is no truth in the rumor of a movement to test by judicial decision in the Federal courts the legality of the new Constitution. No such movement is contemplated. It would not be possible if contemplated, and ought not to be attempted if possible. The new Constitution has been adopted by a majority of the people fairly, and in accordance with law. Any attempt to defeat the expression of popular will by technical evasions would be unwise and unjust.

Mayor Bryant was, in our judgment, clearly wrong in endeavoring to strike the name of Stewart Menzies from among the election officers. When a man kills another in a duel or by a premeditated murder, he ought to be forever disfranchised from holding office; but this disability is only worked out by a judicial finding of the crime. So Menzies may have killed his friend, and Terry may have stepped down from the bench to kill a Senator of the United States, while neither are disabled from political position by reason of the duel unless tried and convicted for the murder. We can understand and excuse Mayor Bryant's petulance if it is true that Mr. Stewart Menzies, smarting under party blows, is mean, ungenerous, and cowardly enough to carry a personal resentment into the Grand Jury room—if, as his Honor the Mayor states, he has suppressed testimony and lied about him. Believing, as we do, that A. J. Bryant is a truthful, honest, and honorable gentleman, against whose official record there is neither the stain of crime, incompetency, nor carelessness; knowing the difficult rôle he has been called upon to perform in this time of popular commotion and almost universal official corruption; and having faith in him notwithstanding all the assaults made upon him by politicians; and recognizing how almost impossible it is for an honest man to bring an honest name out of a four-years' public service, he has our sympathy, he has our confidence, and he has us for a friend to vindicate him against his personal and political enemies. We have a qualified respect for Mr. Menzies. He is an earnest man, and doubtless an honest one; but he has an unlovely disposition, and a most unenviable temper—one that makes friends impossible and acquaintance uncomfortable. Life is not long enough for the indulgence of such animosities, and the man who carries personal resentment to the grave will be apt to find himself upon that side of the gulf where the deepest place is the hottest.

The Hon. Carl Schurz, in a recent speech in Boston, discussed this question of the growing antagonism between the rich and poor most ably. He said: "To excite the hatred of the poor against the rich has in all ages and in all countries been the last resort of a most desperate demagoguery. But in a country like ours, where no barriers of privileges separate the different classes of society, where honest individual effort is hampered neither by legal obstacles, nor by prejudice and customs; where every day we see millions of fathers of paupers, and merchant princes who were rocked in a poor man's cradle; where fortune and station, social and public, are equally open to the intelligence, virtue, and energy of all—in this country such appeals should be met with contemptuous ridicule, as well as abhorrence. Such a cry is blasphemous calumny on our political institutions and our social order. Within the memory of the youngest man before me you have seen a rail-splitter from Illinois and a tailor from Tennessee in the Presidential chair of this great republic. You have seen walking in the streets of Boston a cobbler of Massachusetts Vice-President of the United States. You see today a man who commenced his career as an operative in a woolen mill the Republican candidate for the Governorship of this noble Commonwealth. Go over the list of your merchants and manufacturers most envied for their prosperity, of your men most eminent in the professions, in literature and learning—how many do you find of an origin so humble and obscure that you can scarcely trace it? There is no workingman within the reach of my voice who knows whether one of his children will not in thirty years overtop them all in wealth or public eminence. There is no millionaire who is sure whether one of his children may not, before this waning century is out, have to black the boots of the poor man's son for a living. And in a country like this, with its resources and opportunities, where the survival of the fittest is the order of the day; where a measureless field of labor and enterprise never ceases to encourage every honorable ambition—in such a country we must hear appeals to the hatred of the poor rich! Truly, the man who makes such appeals to the people, and the man who listens to them, are both basely serving themselves."

THE MEN GIRLS LIKE.

It is, we believe, commonly understood to be a fact that women are less affected than men by mere personal beauty. And to some extent we incline to this opinion also. Yet what are called "beauty men" have their worshipers and dispense their little favors with as charming a sense of their own condescension and affability as their rivals of the opposite sex. But, after all, a man who has beauty, and nothing more, is apt to fall, and we doubt if he comes under the category of the men that girls like. His serene belief in his own perfections, and his secure conviction that every woman who comes under the charm of his soft eyes and elegant features must fall a victim to their fascinations, have an irritating effect. And the consequence of widespread search after admiration makes such a man difficult, almost impossible, to fix. A girl, as well as a man, may feel with Touchstone that "a poor thing, but her own," is preferable to a thing of beauty shared among her friends. Beauty, vanity, brutality, obstinacy, effeminacy, folly, and selfishness are all in their turns adored by women of all classes. Therefore let us take a typical girl—one who has seen more than one man in her life, who does not live in the country all year round, or in a watering place where a man is a man he never so little of one. Our typical girl shall be intelligent, healthy, good, and fairly well educated. And we need not concern ourselves with the men whom, under pressure of circumstances, such a girl might be induced to marry. The question is, What sort of a man does she like? Is it the young man, turned out by the dozen from our public schools and universities—without an interest in life but his own amusement, whose whole talk is of himself and his own proceedings? Of this young man there are two types, the effeminate and the manly. They are equally uninteresting; but of the two, if she has a preference, our girl will incline to the latter. If such soul as a specimen of the manly type possesses is absorbed in cricket, athletics, yachting, hunting, shooting; if he never opens a book, and can only discourse of his own feats of prowess on land or sea, he is upon the whole less objectionable than his brother, who sits and talks "like a girl," of the balls he has been to, the balls he is going to, the new dances or the old dances, the cut of his own coat, which is so good, and the cut of his friend's coat, which is "much too awfully disgusting"; the division of his hair, the "very, very nice people" he meets (by which, par parenthese, he means people who are "in" society—the higher placed the "nicer"). But we may with confidence say this is not the man our girl likes. Nor do we think she takes much to the lout who finds a type in all classes. He is the man who has no conversation, who professes to despise "worldliness," because the world rejects him; who comes into a drawing-room covered with mud, often with his trousers rolled up over his ankles, if he had been walking, and a general air of here-I-am-and-be-thankful-to-have-me-at-any-price about him; who sits still while his tea is handed to him, and never even offers to help with the kettle and the bread and butter. Nor will the "shoppy" man attract our girl; the lawyer who always lapses into cases and courts; the parsons, who can not rise above schools and districts; the author who quotes his own words; the musician who perpetually airs his special passion—be it Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, or Bizet; nor the painter who is in a continual state of heartburning at somebody else's success. Not one of these men satisfy her requirements. Of course we refer to the time in her life before fate has, it may be, caused her to love a man the very opposite of what her nature tells her to admire. Her man will be neither an Adonis nor a Caliban. He will have some slight power of sympathizing with her, as well as of expecting her to sympathize with him. He will be good tempered and obliging, and the less selfish the better. Being a sensible girl, she will not look for the impossibility of an entirely unselfish man. He will be educated and intelligent, able to talk to cleverer people than himself without appearing a fool, but he will not, as a rule, be a distinctly learned personage. He will be in the habit of paying to all women pretty little helpful attentions, which, because they are done only out of kindness of heart, will not detract from his manliness. And here, we believe, we have made our best guess at the quality dearest to our girl's heart. Manliness is her requirement: by which we mean that she likes a man to be so thoroughly brave that he can not be brutal; so true and strong that she may trust to him, instead of having to be the guide, consoler, comforter, and friend of his uncertain steps. That he should be physically manly is of less importance to her than that he should have a manly mind, broad and fair, and free from littleness. At the same time we believe she would prefer that he should ride and shoot, and be able to enjoy himself honestly in the country, always provided he will not bore her with continued talk of game and bags. To uncommon natures other things are necessary, but with them we have no concern at present. We wish only to convey to our readers our distinct impression that a bright, intelligent, pure-minded girl is by no means so anxious to know what are the types of "girls men like" as to find a type of man she likes herself. And, as a rule, we believe she knows true metal when she hears it ring.

It's no use. These love differences can not be settled by peaceful arbitration. Two young men went into the woods near Aurora, Ill., to play a game of cards. As they were rival lovers, and had not previously spoken to each other for months, it is conjectured that the girl in dispute was the stake that they played for. The winner, however, was not permitted to gain the prize, for his opponent instantly shot him through the heart. An effort to settle rivalry by chance had a not less sad result in Texas. The two suitors were convinced that the young woman would accept either if the other would let her alone, and they agreed to throw dice to decide which should give her up. The loser honestly endeavored to keep the compact, but the woman refused to be disposed of in that way, and wrote to him that she would marry nobody else, and would not even see the winner. The latter would not believe that his competitor had tried to retire from the contest, and so murdered him.

A Camden man read in a paper that a woman's arm had been paralyzed by a pinch. Now he has a paralyzed hand. He tried to pinch his wife's tongue, but she shut down on him. He is a believer now, but not an investigator.

THE PAWN PARTY.

We remember, not long ago, being with a crowd of girls in a country farm-house, some twenty miles from San Francisco, telling each our experience, when a black eyed bundle of mischief, who shall be known as Mary Bowers, rather astonished our weak nerves, by relating an adventure which once occurred to her. We will let her tell it in her own words.

"I never did like Lew Parker anyhow!" She always got mad when she talked about Lew. "I'd as leave be kissed by an orang-outang as a fellow with a bushel of hair over his face. He was just as handsome as he could be, only he wore his trousers so tight that he looked as if he had been melted and poured into them."

"Well, there was a pawn-party at our house last Fourth of July, and of course, Lew was on hand looking as slick as a new beaver. Pawn-selling time came at last, and Nelly Williams was chosen 'pawn-seller,' and Ned Halifax the 'judge.'"

"Heavy, heavy, what hangs over you?" said Nelly, holding a jackknife which had been forfeited by Lew Parker.

"Fine or superfine?"

"Fine. What shall the owner do?"

"He shall lead the girl he loves the best to the centre of the room and kiss her."

"Every eye was turned on Lew, and the girls began to giggle. Lew stood up, and walked toward me, and I began to run. Round and round the tables and chairs, out of the door and down the stairs, into the garden, and under the grapes, with a dozen mad-cap girls at our heels, went Lew and I, until we were stopped by the barn-door, a rickety, crazy thing that was full of splinters and broken nails. There he caught me, and though I struggled like a good one, the fellow nearly kissed me! When I think of it now, I have to laugh; first he was slammed against the door, then I was; but, I knew about the splinters and twisted myself loose, when, biff! he went against the door, winding both arms around me so tight I could hardly breathe."

"Wait a moment," I cried, and his hold relaxed.

"Don't let her go!" cried the girls.

"No; kiss her, Lew, she's only playing you," bawled that wiry-haired old Scruggs, the grocer, and as the moon was shining bright as day they could see everything going on.

"Of course, I didn't like it, so I dropped on one knee in the grass, when down came Lew after me; then, oh, then there was a rasping sound, a momentary pause, a smothered groan, and a rather profane compliment to the barn door. Lew's bands grew suddenly cold, and trembled violently, and as I didn't know what to make of it I raised my eyes to see what was the matter, when he looked straight down into my face, and—but I guess I won't tell the rest."

"Oh, go on," cried Carrie Foster, whose cheeks were like winter apples; "what are you afraid of?"

"Nothing."

"Well, why don't you go on?"

"Why, the rest of it isn't nice!"

"Pshaw! What of that? Ain't we all girls together? Go on."

Well, then, he, turned just as white as a sheet, and you can imagine how I felt when I saw him fold the tails of his coat together behind and make a bee-line for the gate.

"Hold on, Lew, we'll let you off," cried the girls, in a breath, but he never answered them; he just ran like a deer straight up the road till he was clear out of sight."

"Why, what in the world was the reason?" I inquired, demurely.

"Oh, nothing; only he took his meals from the mantelpiece for more than a week afterward, and slept leaning against a rail."

OCEANA.

*Under the reign of the first Caliph there was a merchant in Bagdad equally rich and avaricious. One day he had bargained with a porter to carry home for him a large basket of porcelain vases for ten paras. As they went along he said to the man:

"My friend, you are young and I am old; you can still earn plenty; strike off, I beseech you, a para from your hire."

"Willingly," replied the porter.

This request was repeated again and again, until, when they reached the house, the porter had only a single para to receive. As they went up the stairs the merchant said:

"If you will resign the last para I will give you three pieces of advice."

"Be it so," said the porter.

"Well, then," said the merchant, "if any one tells you it is better to be fasting than feasting do not believe him. If any one tells you it is better to be poor than rich, do not believe him. If any one tells you it is better to walk than to ride, don't you believe him."

"My good sir," replied the astonished porter, "I knew these things before; but if you will listen to me I will give you such advice as you never heard."

The merchant turned round, and the porter, throwing the basket down the staircase, said to him:

"If any one tells you that one of your vases is unbroken, he's a liar, you betcherlife."

LXXVIII.—Sunday, May 11.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Mutton Soup, Egg Dumplings.
Deviled Crabs.
Sweetbread, with Green Peas.
String Beans. Cauliflower.
Roast Beef, with Potatoes in Gravy.
Lettuce, Egg Dressing.
Strawberries. Fruit Cake.
Italian Cream.
Fruit-bowl of Cherries.

TO MAKE MUTTON SOUP.—Take a shoulder of mutton; put it in four quarts of cold water, shred three or four leaves of cabbage, chop one onion and a small bunch of parsley, cut in squares two small turnips, slice one carrot, and add a few leaves of thyme (a little ground will do), plenty of pepper, and salt to taste. Place on a slow fire and boil two hours, when the mutton may be removed and warmed for a side dish. Boil two hours longer. To make the egg dumplings, take the yolks of two eggs, beat well, add three tablespoonfuls of flour and a little salt; thin with cream until the mixture will drop readily from a teaspoon, then drop and boil fifteen minutes, keeping the pot covered. This is an old-fashioned soup, but it is excellent and economical, as the shoulder can be warmed in hot water and served with caper sauce, making a very good dinner.

In last week's paper, in curry and rice soup, read three teaspoonfuls, instead of three tablespoonfuls, of curry powder.

JAPAN AS A PLACE OF RESIDENCE.

I know of no country upon the globe where a person may so thoroughly enjoy life as in the Land of the Rising Sun—the Emerald Isle (or isles) of the East. Here he may build a snug dwelling and defy the cold winds of winter, and in the delightful summer occupy a yashiki (gentleman's residence), so exactly adapted to the climate of that glorious country, and bid defiance to the heat. Nor is it at all requisite that the foreign resident in Japan should possess a fortune in order to live comfortably. Any one with moderate means may set up and maintain quite a stylish establishment, if managed judiciously. Especially is the climate adapted for consumptives. Here, if a person be at all moderate in his cups, it is next to impossible to fall sick. Many invalid friends have I known who came to Japan for change of climate, and, finding the country so agreeable, remained far beyond their original calculations, and long after they had recovered their health. The winters are not unbearably severe. In the latitude of Yokohama and Tokio tolerably cold winds prevail, with a fair sprinkling of snow, and a corresponding share of frost; but the atmosphere is very dry. Fogs are almost unknown. Of course dampness prevails during the short rainy season in spring. Nor, on the other hand, is the summer unbearably hot. If you wish, you can go and pass that season among the mountains, amid magnificent scenery, five thousand feet above the sea. At Nagasaki—one of the most beautiful harbors in the world—the whole of the town is built upon the hill-sides, and exposed to the summer breezes, while sheltered from the blasts of winter. In summer ice and fruits are cheap and plentiful. If the foreigner so wish, he can keep his table according to the most foreign style, and have every delicacy which is procurable elsewhere. In short he can, if he has money, gratify every desire, and move in as select society in Japan as at home. For a summer residence I unhesitatingly recommend a native house, as the rooms are merely divided by sliding doors in place of our ordinary walls, and by taking these away two or more rooms may be thrown into one, leaving nothing but the posts supporting the ceiling, and allowing a free passage of air throughout the house. The floors are covered with thick mats (tatami), which are softer than any carpets, and delightfully cool to recline upon. What a sociable, hospitable, and intelligent people are the natives! Not a foreigner in Japan but has frequently received proofs of their good will, and kind, unselfish nature; and in many cases how poorly have these been required! How little are these people understood by many residents of the treaty ports. Let them be treated with the courtesy to which every stranger is entitled, and they will vie with each other in kindness toward you. I do not allude so much to the native residents of the foreign settlements, who have been irretrievably corrupted by contact with some unprincipled representatives of Europe and America, but to people of Tokio and the country towns. To visit Yokohama, and even to reside there for five or six months, is not to see Japan. Many persons take a trip there, go round the neighborhood in a desperate hurry, examining places of note, and come away under the impression that they know all about it. In order to see Japan properly, and to learn something about it, one must live among those people who have no direct dealings with foreigners, study their customs and ideas; and in order to do so the more easily, and with greater comfort, endeavor to adapt one's self, as far as convenient, to their habits. I know of several foreigners who have resided in Yokohama for years, and who have had large business transactions with the natives, yet know little more about Japan and its people than those who had only read of them in books. When I first visited Japan, about six years ago, I was in delicate health; and, thinking that a trip across the Pacific and a change of climate would benefit me, I took a passage in one of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's steamers. I can scarcely describe my first impression of Japan, save that it was one of pleasure and surprise. Acting upon previous advice, I proceeded to Tokio by the stage coach (a railroad runs there now), and established myself at the house of a friend who resided in the native part of the city. I remained with him six months, at the expiration of which time, thanks to the salubrious climate, I was completely restored to health. But, feeling loth to quit such a pleasant spot, I invested a little capital in my disposal in a business, and remained in the country. At this time of the year how beautiful is Japan! The trees are bursting into leaf; the weather is delightful and invigorating. The swallows are returning to build their nests in their accustomed nooks inside the rooms of the houses and under the protection of the inmates. The whole country is clothed in green; indeed, it never ceases to present this appearance, for, throughout the winter, the pine, fir, camphor, camellia, and a host of others give to the whole landscape a delightfully verdant aspect. Every city and town, if viewed from an eminence, offers to the eye a pleasant picture of a somewhat rural character, owing to the large number of trees and shrubs; for every Japanese householder, be he never so poor, has at least one shrub, and perhaps one or two bamboos, growing in his back yard. The gardens of the better class of merchants and the upper classes are arranged most tastefully in the "landscape" style—rocks, streams, bridges, hills, temples, in miniature, but never is any grass seen. In a gentleman's dwelling the principal apartment, or that into which the honored guest is introduced, is usually in the rear of the house, looking into the garden, while the front part is given up to retainers, domestics, armory, etc. Just now the cherry trees, of which the people of Nippon are so justly proud, are in full bloom at Ueyeno, Asakusa, and Mukojima (Tokio). What a magnificent sight! Thousands visit these and other famous spots for the purpose of feasting their eyes on these beautiful trees, which are not valued at all for their fruit (indeed few of them bear any), but are planted and maintained solely on account of their delightful fragrance and the beauty of their appearance, many of them bearing both white and pink blossoms on the same branch. But to know Japan one must visit it; and in order to study it at one's ease, and to thoroughly appreciate it, must live among the Japanese, away from the foreign settlements, and endeavor to understand them—a very simple task to those who do not go there previously bent on finding fault with and grumbling at everything.

INTAGLIOS.

In the Cathedral Close.

In the dean's porch a nest of clay
With five small tenants may be seen—
Five solemn faces, each as wise
As though its owner were a dean.

Five downy fledglings in a row,
Packed close as in an antique pew
The schoolgirls are, whose foreheads clear
At the Venetian shine on you.

Day after day the swallows sit
With scarce a stir, with scarce a sound;
But dreaming and digesting much
They grow thus wise, and soft, and round.

They watch the canons come to dine,
And hear the mullion bars across,
Over the fragrant fruit and wine
Deep talk about the redwoods.

Her hands with field flowers drenched, a child
Leaps past in wind-blown dress and hair;
The swallows turn their heads askew—
Five judges deem that she is fair.

Prelious touches sound within;
Straightway they recognize the sign,
And, blandly nodding, they approve
The minut of Rubinstein.

They mark the cousins' schoolboy talk
(Male birds flown wide from minstrel bell),
And blink at each broad term of art,
Binomial or bicycle.

Ah, downy young ones, soft and warm,
Dethroned a stillness mask from sight
Such swiftness—can such peace conceal
Passion and ecstasy of flight?

Yet somewhere 'mid your Eastern suns,
Under a white Greek architrave,
At morn, or when the shaft of fire
Lies large upon the Indian wave,

A sense of something dear gone by
Will stir, strange longings thrill the heart
For a small world embowered and close,
Of which ye sometime were a part.

The dew-drenched flowers, the child's glad eyes,
Your joy inhuman shall control,
And in your wince a light and wind
Shall move from the Maestro's soul.

EDWARD DOWDEN.

To Juliet.

My morning rose in laughter—
A gold and azure day;
Dull clouds came trooping after,
Livid and sullen gray.

At noon the rain did batter,
And it thundered like a bell;
I sighed, "It is no matter—
At night I shall sleep as well."

But I longed with a madness tender
For an evening like the morn,
That my day might die in splendor,
Not folded in mist forlorn—

Die like a tone elysian,
Like a bee in a cactus flower,
Like a day-surprised vision,
Like a wind in a summer shower.

Through the vaulted clouds about me
Broke trembling an azure space;
Was it a dream to flout me,
Or was it a perfect face?

The sky and the face together
Are gone, and the wind-blows fell.
But what matters a dream or the weather?
At night it will all be well,

For the day of life and labor,
Of ecstasy and pain,
Is only a beaten tabor,
And I shall not dream again.

But as the old Night steals o'er me,
Deepening till all is dead,
I shall see thee still before me
Stand with averted head.

And I shall think, "Ah, sorrow!
The night that never was may!
The night that has no morrow,
And the sunset all in gray!"

GEO. MACDONALD.

Woman's Need.

But, after all, 'tis love that most we need;
Love only satisfies our woman's heart,
And even our ambition looks to love;
That given, life is light—denied is death.
Man is content to know that he is loved,
And tires the constant phrase "I love" to hear;
But woman doubts the instrument is broke
Unless she daily hear the sweet refrain.

W. W. STOREV.

On a Wedding-day.

As one who strives to summon from the past
Forgotten shapes that once he knew full well—
The lips, the hair, the eyes, that forged the spell
Which held his heart in sternest bondage fast—
Albeit they seem to him as though time cast
Mere shadows of his youth athwart the dell
Wherein his unripe fancy yearned to tell
To ears beloved the love that might not last;
So I, upon this happy bridal morn,
Seek to unloose the load of ill-spent hours,
The miserable waste of glorious days,
God's moments spurned or used in shameful ways
And in the innocence of youth, new born,
Gaze on the virgin sweetness of white flowers.

The Maiden and the Leaf.

A JAPANESE IDEA.

A dead leaf drifted along the snow,
A poor brown leaf with edges torn;
Now here, now there, blown high and low,
An outcast and a thing of scorn!
Alas! Alas!
So life drifts on to hearts forlorn.

Once in a bower, fresh and bright,
Kissed by the sun-rays and the dew,
A maid, to flee the hot sun's might,
Prone on the ground her fair limbs threw,
To sleep, to sleep,
And dream of some one that she knew.

She slept and dreamt a horrid thing—
That she loved from her would stray,
And starting up, deep sorrowing,
Resolved to seek him out that day.

Alas! Alas!

'Twas all too true—he'd fled away.
Her last love token—just a leaf
Of sycamore—love's emblem bright,
She threw away, then prayed that grief
Might bear her off from mortal sight.
Alas! Alas!
Whilst the dead leaf drifted through the night.

LANCINET'S LUCK.

A Free Translation from the Fickle French.

"My friend," said the notary to Sigisbert Lancinet, "here are the 6,500 francs willed and bequeathed to you by your uncle. The legacy-duty, stamps, and fees have been deducted. Put the money carefully away in your pocket, be careful not to let any sharp-looking stranger brush up against you, and get home as soon as possible."

"Worthy sir, your excellent advice shall be followed," said Sigisbert Lancinet, squeezing the good notary's hand, and leaving the office with the dignity of a man who does not have 6,500 francs in his pocket every day of the week.

For Sigisbert Lancinet, Bohemian both by disposition and profession, had never thitherto been the owner of ten francs of his own.

When he was in the street Sigisbert Lancinet soliloquized half aloud:

"What an old ass that notary was! To fancy that I—of all people—would be silly enough to let any one get away with my wealth. Suppose I drove home—no, that would look like a cowardly concession to the notary's fears. Besides, I am not sorry at the prospect of showing myself to my acquaintance in my new rôle of a bloated capitalist."

So saying Sigisbert Lancinet approached a shop-window and looked an admiring glance at his image reflected in the great mirror.

"Heavens!" he exclaimed, starting back in consternation, "can that ambulatory rag-bag be Sigisbert Lancinet? Lazarus in all his glory was not arrayed like unto this. What a shocking bad hat!—a perfect epic of decrepitude. Let me not lose an instant in shooting this tile."

He went to the hatter's and bought him a hat, and when he came out he respired more joyously and said to himself, "Now that is more like the thing—I do not quite so closely resemble a—but hold on! On letting my gaze run to my other extreme I am horrified to observe that the soles of my boots are not waterproof, and that the uppers are a libel on shoemanship. Let me not hesitate one second—"

He entered the bootmaker's.
"By Jove!" he said, on regaining the street, "that job's off my hands, but oh, the frightful discordance. The immaculate varnish of my boots makes my pantaloons look ten years older by contrast, while beside my dazzling hat my coat loses the few pretensions to respectability which it formerly possessed. To appear in such guise would be ridiculous."

He crossed the street and entered a ready-made clothing establishment, whence issuing robed and crowned he—for he had fasted since getting-up time and had got up unusually early so as to be at the notary's office business—felt the inner man assert itself. He found himself at a moment at the Palais-Royal.

"And to think," soliloquized the nouveau riche, "that not once in my brief life have I set foot in the plate-glass doors of these opulent restaurants in the windows whereof are heaped fascinating trophies of game and fruits of Tantalus! Yet I had always hoped—and, indeed, why should I not gratify myself just for once. One doesn't get a legacy every day. What stunning trifles!"

Just as he put his hand upon the handle of the door someone tapped him upon the shoulder.

"Hi, Sigisbert!"

"Hullo, Adolphe!"

"The same. Where are you off to?"

"Going in to breakfast—don't you see?"

"You! Going in to breakfast there?"

"Certainly. And what if I am?"

"Oh, nothing; only it would be a graceful act on your part to invite me to join you, seeing that you are flush and that my pockets are as empty as my stomach."

"By all means; come along."

They breakfasted. They began with Burgundy and continued with claret, and the waiter waxed so eloquent in praise of a peculiarly fine and dry champagne for which the house was noted that they had a bottle of that. Then they had coffee and liqueurs.

At the third glass of Chartreuse Sigisbert Lancinet was the friend of the whole human race without exception.

Adolphe, with the pilot's wary eye, marked his friend's growing good humor, and whispered to him, gently, "Sigisbert, ole fel, I've always said that if there was a good-hearted chap in Paris, Sigisbert Lancinet was the man. For you are a good-hearted chap, as you know."

"I should hope, old boy, that I wouldn't go back on a friend, if he will allow me to call him so."

"Of course you wouldn't. I know you will stake an old friend of yours who only wants three hundred miserable petty francs till next Tuesday to—"

"Never mind what you want them for; that is none of my business. Here are your three hundred francs. So long as Sigisbert Lancinet has a shot in the locker he will not steel his ear against the appeals of friendship. Take my arm and let us go for a walk."

In the Galerie d'Orléans some one accosted Sigisbert:

"M. Lancinet, I am glad to see you looking so well. About eighteen months ago you promised to pay me a bill—"

"A bill—for how much?"

"Five hundred francs."

"Five hundred francs! Whom do I owe five hundred francs to?"

"To me. I keep the restaurant at—"

"Here's your money. Call on Sigisbert Lancinet at any hour of the day or night for money, and if he owes it it shall be paid instantly."

A little further on he met Cydalis, a piquante little brunette, for whom Sigisbert Lancinet's heart used to beat like one—like forty.

In her society he visited the milliner's shop, the jeweler's, the Bois de Boulogne, the Opéra-Comique, and the Maison d'Or.

It was 2:30 A. M. when Sigisbert Lancinet reached his lodging.

To whom the angry janitor:

"You're a sweet ducker, staying out guzzling and muzzling till all hours. You can bet your new boots I'll let the boss know what sort of a tenant he has in you. There's your bed-room candle and a letter that came for you."

"Here, I'll make that all right; this'll pay you for getting up," said Sigisbert Lancinet, opening his pocket-look. It was empty!

Mechanically he opened the letter which the janitor had handed him. It read as follows:

"SIR:—I made an error this morning in giving you 6,500 francs as the net amount of your late uncle's legacy. That was the gross amount, from which should have been deducted duty, stamps, fee, etc., amounting, as per account inclosed, to 753f. 45c. Be so good as to remit me that sum by bearer."

"Yours, very respectfully, X. Y. Z., Notary."

An Idyl

There was a young lady named Fanner,
She had a nose like a bananner;
She taught in a school,
An' she rid on a mule,
But she never could play the planner.

She married a feller named Tanner,
That carried the star spangled banner;
But they fell out and fit—
She's a grass widder yit,
An' he drives a dray in Savanner.

The Scent He Meant.

"Give me a royal sentiment,"
A capricious coquette said
Unto a penny-a-liner bold,
With no sense in his head.

He took some pennyroyal from
A bouquet in his hand,
And gave it to her with a smile
So child-like and so bland.

"This is not sentiment," she cried,
"It isn't worth a cent!"
"It may not be," said he, "but still,
It is the scent I meant."

A Zoological Romance.

INSPIRED BY AN UNUSUAL FLOW OF ANIMAL SPIRITS.

No sweeter girl e'er ever gnu
Than Betty Marten's daughter, Sue.

With sable hair, small tapir waist,
And lips you'd get a gopher miles to taste;

Bright, lambent eyes, like the gazelle,
Sheep pertly brought to bear so well;

Ape pretty lass, it was avowed,
Of whom her marmot to be proud.

Deer girl! I loved her as my life,
And vowed to heifer for my wife.

Alas! a sailor, on the sly,
Had cast on her his wether eye—

He said my love for her was bosh,
And my affection I musquash.

He'd dog her footsteps everywhere,
Anteater in the easy chair.

He'd setter round, this sailor chap,
And pointer out upon the map

Where once a pirate cruiser bore
Him captive to a foreign shore

The cruel captain far outdid
The yaks and crimes of Robert Kid.

He oft would whale Jack with the cat,
And say, "My buck, do you like that?"

"What makes you stag around so, say?
The catamounts to something, hey?"

Then he would seal it with an oath,
And say, "You are a lazy sloth!"

"I'll starve you down, my sailor fine,
Until for beef and porcupine!"

And, fairly hoarse with fiendish laughter,
Would say, "Henceforth, mind what giraffe ter!"

In short, the many risks he ran
Might well a llama braver man.

Then he was wrecked and castor shore
While feebly clinging to anoa;

Hyena cleft among the rocks
He crept, sans shoes and minus ox.

And when he fain would go to bed,
He had to lion leaves instead.

Then Sue would say, with troubled face,
"How koodoo live in such a place?"

And straightway into tears would melt,
And say, "How badger must have felt!"

While he, the brute, woodchuck her chin,
And say, "Aye-aye, my lass!" and grin.

Excuse these steers. . . . It's over now;
There's naught like griffe the hart can cow.

Jackass'd her to be his, and she—
She gave Jackal, and gilded me.

And now, alas! the little mix
Is bound to him with Hyman's lynx.

AN INTERCEPTED LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 8, 1879.

MY DEAR MADGE:—I ought to have a budget of news for you, but have not, for, although there have been two theatres extra running this week, the election has kept people so engaged that there has been no chance to get up a feuilleton about anything, not even Aida, although the people did put on their good clothes and go on Monday night, forming a very respectable-looking crowd as times go. Perhaps as many people have dropped in to see Uncle Dan! as could be found anywhere. A fancy has grown up for these quaint primitive old fellows from the rural districts—these Eastern grangers. Josh Whitcomb introduced them, and, although Uncle Dan! is on the same pattern, he is a different article. How like is human nature the world over! There's an original remark for you; but really when I see these old fellows from Yankee land modeled upon the high-toned heroes of a high-toned English novel, it is the first thought which pops into one's head. Guy Livingstone & Co. are no more insouciant in every day life than these old fellows, no cooler in moments of danger; and that seems to be the main idea. Macauley—I forgot to tell you that "Uncle Dan's" real name is Macauley—has none of the traditional thinness of his species. In fact, he looks as if he came from Tennessee, for he is a great, massive giant, and towers head and shoulders above everybody else, to say nothing of extra width, when they stand out in relief against him. As an actor he is not in any way remarkable, but he has procured a dime novel sort of a play, which is strung together so ingeniously that, upon my word, one finds one's self getting interested in it in the strangest manner. Besides the play, he has brought with him a company which is as remarkable in a way as the play itself. There is not much high art in the group, but each one fits so aptly to his part that analysis and criticism and all that sort of thing fall helpless before the stupendous absurdity of the whole affair. There is a villain, whose prototype you may find in five minutes around the corner at the doors of the dives, and a gang of hoodlums, who might have been hired from Tar Flat for the occasion. Then there are two or three meaningless, vapid women of a not unknown type, and a soubrette. She is a small creature, with more vitality than vivacity, and has a little, shrewd Irish face, pretty withal, and seems quite as much at home in a beer saloon as if she were to the manner born. Voilà tout! Not much material out of which to make an interesting evening; for the wit is cheap and stale, and yet one does follow the old Yankee through quite a mazy plot with a very genuine desire to see the old fellow come out all right.

It is but a step to the California, when the old man's trials are about over, and not a few drop in about ten o'clock to see Boucicault in Kerry. What an exquisite little sketch it is wherever it comes from. It is like a genre painting in its bits of detail, so lightly touched, so perfectly finished. What a charming character is the old serving man with his fealty, his love for the old family, and his unmistakable authority. Boucicault plays it perfectly, and no one knows better than he just how and just when to relieve the tension of feeling when he has worked an audience up to the proper pitch. Jeffreys-Lewis was more like herself than she has been during this Hibernian season, for in neither "Clare Ffolliot" nor "Fanny Power" has she been quite up to her mark. But she makes a very nice mournful widow, and her pretty Irish blue eyes and black locks are at their best under the white cap. It does not come to every one to be mourned as Mr. Gerald Desmond was. It is all very fine to write

"There is a moment when
All would go smooth and even If only the dead could find out when
To come back and be forgiven."

In poetry it is a fine thing, but think of the complications it actually came to pass. However, in this instance it gave Miss Jeffreys-Lewis a chance for a very affecting bit of acting, and quite carried Miss Ada Gilman off her feet for joy. She is an awfully nice little actress, but, what unbecoming coiffures she does manage to get up, quite Medusan in their style, and they seem to place an old head on young shoulders. Change your hair-dresser, Ada. You have a pretty pair of eyes that are worthy a more becoming frame. Good-bye to Boucicault for a time. How delightful it must be to know as much about success as that man knows, to sit familiarly at her daily table, to eat always of her palatable salt!

La Famille Benoiton brought the retired Baldwin troupe out once more, but it has not been much of a success. It has always struck me that for a man to run opposition to himself is to do something excessively absurd. Besides, there must be some element in La Famille Benoiton which has escaped the company, for it is not a hit as it has been elsewhere. With all its French names and localities, it is one of the most essentially American plays that I ever looked at. Sardou might have made it the coming American comedy by simply transferring the people to this side of the pond. I can not imagine that in France, even among the bourgeoisie, the young ladies of any family, however parvenu, could enjoy such boundless latitude as the "Benoiton" girls. But I have known American girls to do such things a hundred and a hundred times again. Filial reverence is an article which has never been imported, although it grows almost rank in the old countries—for perhaps there is such a thing as too much of it—and filial love is almost obsolete. The present feeling is a mild toleration of the old folks, and a high-handed arbitrary authority which keeps the old folks in their places. I think not many will go to see La Famille Benoiton who will not recognize a picture of a certain family in California. The reproduction is exact, not only in the eccentricities of dress, but the liberty of action. There is rather a clever youngster in the play, marked on the bills as Master Herbert Jahn. It is so unusual to see a boy with any dramatic talent whatever that the circumstance is worth mentioning. Singular, is it not, that they are, almost without exception, obliged to utilize little girls in these parts. They have the usual old maid in the play, and, as is usual in French plays, she is a perfect old cat. The French never invest celibacy with anything beautiful. In point of fact, all sorts of people are crowded into the play, chief of whom is "the landlady," a young person of whom nothing is explained. I do not learn whether she is maid, wife, or widow. She has an establishment, but she has no last name, everybody calls her Clothilde, and everybody goes to her in trouble, but they do not seem to be her sisters, and her cousins, and her aunts. In short, it is very difficult to locate "Clothilde" at all, but there she is, and she carries the burden of the play. They have cast Miss Olive West as a leader of the beau monde, and she really acts wonderfully well for a novice, but Kate Corcoran would have served as well in this instance, and certainly would have carried out the illusion. What a genius they have at the Baldwin for getting up handsome interiors. The stage is always sure to be handsomely set—excepting, of course, for the opera. Where in the world did they hide all their scenery during those three weeks.

They have changed all that at the Grand Opera House, for the scenery of Aida alone is worth seeing. I think the management must have walked up to the idea that they had been gulling the people about long enough, for certainly a liberal amount of care and money was expended this time. Old Osiris looms up in the background of that big stage quite remarkably. I was glad to see the old boy once more. He is not pretty, but I like him. He means music, and trumpets, and marches, and all sorts of things. To be sure, he reminded us of our first "Aida," and "a sorrow's crown of sorrow is remembering happier things," but then Epicurus was a wise fellow in his day and generation, and it is better to give one's self quite up to the enjoyment of the moment. We would have heard the music, too, had it not been for the orchestra, but the blowers blew and the fiddlers scraped their loudest. The singers tried to lift their voices over this loud bray, but they retired disconcerted each time, and the musicians, exhausted, lay back and took in a fresh supply of blow for the next encounter. Jack murmured sotto voce that "he wanted to see Pantaloon's tackle 'em," and the dear boy actually wanted to see the struggle. I could see mischief in the big Italian's eye as he walked down the stage. He looked like an unusually bad case of "Mourzouk," and we all felt for a moment that we must dissemble. He is a fine actor, Pantalooni, and he came to the front with considerable pantomime and let out a note or two. The chandeliers clattered and the house shook; another, another, and we thought there was a Kearney riot outside. Then he began to sing! The orchestra braced up for a while and tried hard to make a noise, but their comparatively faint mutterings were as the murmur of a gentle stream beside the explosion of a chorus of cannons. They braced every nerve, they blew and scraped, and tugged and tried, but fell back collapsed, while Pantalooni gave a final note of triumph—a volume of sound which "split the ears of the groundlings," pierced the doors, and was wafted over the South San Francisco hills, awakened the inhabitants of San Bruno, and finally died away in the San Mateo hills. I can't help admiring Pantalooni after his victory, and I think the orchestra may as well give up that fight. It is much easier to drown Marie Roze's voice than Pantalooni's. Marie Roze, by the way, has been much better received as "Aida" than in any part which she has sung. With all the clang and clash of this Aida music, with its weird strains, there is very little pyrotechnic music for the prima donna, so that the lady's somewhat inflexible voice is not strained. Beside, she has a happy knack of skipping trills and runs as dangerous snags, and she does not encounter many of them in Aida. Then she does sing with some expression, and has a very pretty way of looking unutterably miserable, so that altogether it was an immense improvement upon anything Marie Roze has done before. As for Cary her "Amneris" is good. It makes one forget Mignon, which was not altogether satisfactory. The transposition of the prima's part naturally involves the transposition of more, so that every one gets twisted and turned around, and everything seems a medley. But what could one ask more than her "Amneris"? In this Cary looks, acts, and sings her best. I love to see her throw her soul into music; it seems such a big soul, and she puts it all into "Amneris." What does she do with it in Mignon? It is missing somehow. A propos—Gottschalk waked up a little as "Laertes," and sang several notes as if he were not under soporific influence. Westberg, too, sang very sweetly. Perhaps Litta inspired him, for the girl inspired every one else. She sang the Polacca like a thrush, as easily, as naturally, almost as sweetly. Then she acted, positively acted a little, and altogether stirred up a lot of enthusiasm. Bravo, American girl!

Next week we are to have Carmen, and we shall see all those wonderful blue sashes and gilt fringes which form so important a part. Of course, we shall have Aida again. I should not like to think I had beheld that ballet for the last time. I never saw so many different sizes of women in one group in my life, I never saw so many degrees of attenuation, I never saw feet point so many different ways, and I never saw such queer shapes. I take it that it is Egyptian, for it is like nothing in the heavens above or on the earth beneath with which we are familiar. Osiris' stony countenance never moved, so perhaps he is used to it. For the rest the scenery was really beautiful, the costumes were fine, and there were plenty of people on the stage. Adams and Roze sang better, far better than usual, and Adams is dramatic enough for "Radames," which is more than could be said of either of his predecessors.

On Monday Fanny Davenport appears at the California in As You Like It, a most injudicious selection, if she has any new plays. I am really curious to see if she has improved as much as they say. Adieu!

Yours,

BETSY B.

The Loring Club announces its fourth concert—second season—for Thursday evening, May 15, at the Grand Opera House.

The new Minister of Statistics and Anthropometry holds his first official reception, and one of the heads of bureaux who fears that his tenure of office is exceedingly slight does not venture to absent himself though it is but three days since he laid his father low in the clouds of the valley.

"Ah," says the Minister, graciously; "shall I not have the pleasure of seeing your good lady to-night?"

"Your Excellency will really have to excuse her—in point of fact she is getting her mourning made for her poor, dear father-in-law."

NEW YORK CORRESPONDENCE.

UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK, May 1, 1879.

I do not know if the interest which has prevailed here for some weeks back regarding the opening of the Olympic is to be attributed to the public desire to see an old and historic theatre resuscitated, or to mere curiosity as to the play announced. Probably the latter. Certainly, L'Assommoir, or "The Assomoir," as Mr. Daly prefers to call it, has been advertised here with an ingenuity bordering on the necromantic. Papers were full of discussions as to whether it was a proper play or not to submit to that delicate organization, the public; arguments pro and con were advanced, pamphlets were written, and even pulpit polemics hurled at its devoted head. Possibly the notes of preparation at the Olympic may have found an echo on the Pacific Coast, for, assuredly, never was a play better advertised, and seldom has there been, since Uncle Tom's Cabin, a play better calculated in its nature to advertise itself. Yesterday evening, accordingly, there was a large audience at the Olympic—essentially male in its component parts, for except a few actresses and habitual first-nighters there was no ladies at all in the audience. The play, as a whole, was a disappointment. It left too much to the imagination. It assumed that every one had read the novel on which it is founded. That is permissible, perhaps, in Paris, where Zola's L'Assommoir has enjoyed an almost fabulous sale, but in New York those who knew enough about the story to follow the plot were in a minority.

Again, despite promises of realism, we have only a skeleton given of the dream which set Paris crazy, and is still crowding the Ambigu Theatre nightly with the fashion of that city. The usual defects of a French work in an English dress were very apparent in Mr. Daly's Assommoir. French indecency became American vulgarity; French argot became American slang; French verve became American insipidity. In an effort to observe the convenances in a piece whose most salient merit is its daring outrage of them, L'Assommoir has lost its color, and what it has gained in morality it has lost in interest. The play is simply a picture of the effects of drunkenness—a temperance lecture upon the stage. M. Zola draws his example from the lower classes of Paris. He shows us the Paris of the exterior Boulevards—a world of which the society drama knows little. The vice of intoxication is put before the audience in all its revolting reality. Not a degrading detail is lacking. Woman fight, and in the original French use language and proceed to extremities which no stage could reproduce. Delirium tremens is depicted; the concubinage of the Parisian ménage is a main feature of the plot. To adapt this successfully, so as to suit the tastes of an American audience, was no easy task, and Mr. Daly is to be congratulated upon even the moderate success he has achieved. It is placed upon the stage with considerable fidelity of detail. The word assommoir means the crushing blow with which the butcher in the abattoir fells the ox. M. Zola uses it in the meaning of a low drinking shop, where bad liquor is sold.

This production has been the almost exclusive topic in theatrical circles, and has excited an extraordinary degree of interest. Lost Children is now running along smoothly at the Union Square, but it has proved a disappointment. It is a play which reads better than it acts. In spite of a cast strong even for the Union Square, and almost miraculously beautiful scenery, the performance seems tedious and, in a word, the play has not "hit 'em." Exactly why, it would be difficult to say. Perhaps it is too melodramatic for the Union Square; perhaps the two children have to sustain too much of the public interest, and are not old enough for such prominent parts; but it is certain there is a lack of enthusiasm, and manager Palmer doubtless regrets that he withdrew the Banker's Daughter, which was running successfully in its fifth month and could have finished the season to profitable business. The Banker's Daughter goes to Brooklyn, Boston, Chicago, and Philadelphia with the original cast, excepting Sara Jewett, commencing May 19th. Sara Jewett goes for rest and recreation to Europe, and her place will be filled by Linda Dietz. Aimée's season has been nearly a failure so far—quite a failure, indeed, pecuniarily speaking. Fatinitza has been produced at the Fifth Avenue, with Jennie Winston in the title rôle. The opera has become popular, but the distribution is justly anathematized. They speak of a reconstruction. Steele Mackye has opened Daly's old theatre as a comedy house, under the name of the Madison Square. It is designed to run it on the plan of the Comédie Française, which is a cooperative theatre, each artist having an interest in the business and being paid by a percentage of the receipts. The experiment is a new one here, and it remains to be seen if it will succeed.

The Pinafore epidemic is constantly breaking out afresh. The child's performance is one of the latest phases, and there is a Pinafore at the Globe sung by regular darkies. These latter want it distinctly understood that theirs is no burlesque, but that they sing the opera "in dead earnest, suah." When the Captain Corcoran, however, who is as black as the ace of spades, steps forward and tells you "Au zam de captin ob de Pinafore," it is difficult to believe that all is just as it should be.

The Lost Children was played at a matinée on Wednesday, and the profits of the entertainment were very appropriately donated to the founding hospital. Madame Modjeska is doing quite a large business at the Grand Opera House. She is followed by Boucicault. Ellie Wilton has been very seriously ill, but she is better and has been out for a few days. The Snowball and Delicate Ground are playing to nice business at Wallack's, with Coghlan in the leading rôles, vice Lester Wallack en route to San Francisco. You know, of course, that Rose Coghlan has been engaged as leading lady for Baldwin's. I think she will please the Pacific public, especially if she has an opportunity in comedy. The weather here is becoming almost too warm for the theatre, and approaching indications of a warm summer will speedily bring the regular season to a close.

A LOOKER ON.

A Chinese convict at San Quentin has given a strong and startling definition of fever and ague. Between acts he visited the doctor, who brusquely asked: "Well, John, what's the matter with you now?" John savagely replied: "Eight clock, me too hot; half-past eight, too cold; nine clock, too hot; alle time alle same hell."

One of the most agreeable trips that can be made in this State is from San Francisco to Duncan's Mill, on Russian River, over the North Pacific Coast Railroad. This trip, up and back, is made in the same day. At the Russian River terminus is a beautiful and romantic valley, set in a framework of forest clad hills. The Russian River hotel, large, with spacious rooms, newly built and newly furnished, is now open for the summer tourist. It is especially pleasant for families, and it is a delightful place for excursionists from the city to spend a Sunday in the country. The drives in the vicinity are delightful, the ocean is near, and in ocean, river, and brook good fishing is found. Maiden's hair and other rare varieties of ferns abound in the woods. A pleasant place is Duncan's Mill, and a pleasant trip it is to visit it.

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

In the vestibule of Baldwin's and the Grand Opera House can be seen some very handsome pictures of Cary, Roze, Litta, Adams, and other members of the Opera Troupe, from the photographic studio of Bradley & Rulofson. This firm appears to be the favorite with professional people, than whom none are so fastidious, or such competent and critical judges of a photographer's work. Nearly all the pictures taken and sent East bear the imprint of Bradley & Rulofson, and orders are constantly being sent in by stars, who are better pleased with their California sitting than any they have been able to accomplish in the East.

Nature's Revelations of Character, or Physiognomy Illustrated, is the title of a recent work giving a description of the mental, moral, and volitive dispositions of mankind as illustrated in the human form and countenance. Joseph Simms is the author, and his work is the fruit of nearly twenty years diligent observations of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. Published by D. M. Bennett, Liberal and Scientific Publishing House, 141 Eighth Street, New York.

The April number of the BRITISH QUARTERLY REVIEW has been promptly republished by the LEONARD SCOTT PUBLISHING CO., 41 Barclay Street, New York.

The first article, "Christian Theology and the Modern Spirit," advocates a frank recognition and examination of the theological scepticism and unrest of our times; and suggests some of the hints in which the theology of the past will be affected by the critical and scientific spirit of the present day.

"The Ethics of Urban Leaseholds" shows the bad influence of leasehold tenure on metropolitan and urban buildings.

"Wycliffe and his Relation to the Reformation of the Sixteenth Century" gives a carefully written account of the life, opinion, and surrounding of that great reformer.

"Free Trade and Protection" is a timely article, in which a few of the arguments on both sides are briefly examined.

"The Normans at Palermo," a valuable historical article, by Edward A. Freeman.

"The Novels of George Meredith." From the seven complete novels of Mr. Meredith, two, "Emilia in England," and "Beauchamp's Career," have been selected for special notice and criticism. The last named receives warm commendation.

"The Zulu War." A contribution based on some practical knowledge of South Africa, toward the solution of the problem of the permanent settlement of the South African question.

"Contemporary Literature," gives, as usual, a full account of the principal books published during the preceding quarter.

The periodicals reprinted by THE LEONARD SCOTT PUBLISHING CO. (41 Barclay Street, N. Y.) are as follows: The London Quarterly, Edinburgh, Westminster, and British Quarterly Reviews, and Blackwood's Magazine. Price $4 a year for any one, or only $15 for all, and the postage is prepaid by the Publishers.

THE MASONIC SAVINGS AND LOAN BANK,Plaintiff, vs. EDWARD MAGUIRE and ELIZA MA-GUIRE, Defendants.Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in
and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.The People of the State of California send greeting to Edward Maguire and Eliza Maguire.You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein (a copy of which accompanies this summons) within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; if served out of this county, but within this judicial district, within twenty days; or if served
out of said district, then within forty days—or judgment by default will taken against you.The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court for the foreclosure of a certain mortgage described in the complaint and executed by the said Edward Maguire
and Eliza Maguire on the 4th day of June, A. D. 1877, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note made by said Edward Maguire at the same time for the sum of three thousand dollars gold, and interest, as provided in said note, payable to plaintiff, or its order, and taxes, street assessments, and attorneys' fees at ten per cent. on the amount found due, and costs, all in gold coin; that the premises
conveyed by said mortgage may be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of said promissory note, interest,
taxes, street assessments, and attorney's fees, and costs, all
in gold coin; and in case such proceeds are not sufficient to pay the same, then to obtain an execution against said Edward Maguire for the balance remaining due; and also that
the said defendants, and all persons claiming by, through,
or under them may be barred and foreclosed of all right,
title, claim, lien, equity of redemption, and interest to said
mortgaged premises, and for other and further relief.And if you fail to appear and answer said complaint, as above required, the plaintiff will take default against you
and apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 13th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

DWIGHT C. KING, plaintiff, vs. MALISSA KING, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to MALISSA KING, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this twenty-fourth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

VOL. IV. NO. 20.

SAN FRANCISCO, MAY 17, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

A COMSTOCK CORONER.

John Mangus, the Public Administrator and Coroner of Storey County, Nevada, was sitting in the bosom of his family one bleak December night, indulging in the melancholy reflections which so often cloud the mind and sour the temper of men who imagine that a heartless providence has singled them out as a special target for its frowns.

Mangus had a wife and five children depending on him for provender.

Before his elevation to public office he had been an industrious miner, and well to do in the world. He had gone before the people as a candidate, spent all he had in the First Ward, got whipped in the Second, was drunk in the Third, and being unable to circulate in the Fourth was elected there by a sufficient majority to pull him through.

Mangus was a little sore after election day to think that the First Ward had cleaned out his pockets and done so poorly for him. He consoled himself, however, with the reflection that he had maintained the customs of the country by settling down on election day to a coin disbursement basis.

Jones had come down with a million before he could don the Senatorial toga; and Sharon had scattered about a million and a half (being less popular), and (being less scrupulous) gave his constituents a stock deal after his election, and got it all back again.

Mangus was turning over in his mind how he could, on a small scale, imitate the example of the latter, and recover his money.

As he sat gazing into the fire, which was feeding on coal at twenty-five dollars a ton, and ruminating sadly over the past and present, his wife stole softly to his side and tried to cheer him up.

"John, is anything the matter?"

"Everything's the matter. Do you believe in a Providence—a Providence that punishes the wicked and cares for the good?"

"Of course."

"Well, I don't! Look at me. I go to church on Sunday, live at home with my family, don't gamble, and seldom drink. Now, ain't that pretty good for a man livin' in Virginia City? Well, does Providence smile on me? I've been Coroner of this county for months, and look at the death record during that time: one man blown up in Crown Point, brought up here with nothin' on; man shot on C Street, nothing in his pockets but a plug of navy tobacco and an old jackknife; one man scalded in the Savage. Think of that, Betsy. Then look at the Administrator business: two old women pegged out, and I had the handling of some old rickety bedsteads and some pots and pans. Do you call that sort of thing a provision of Providence?"

"I know, John, it's hard, when you come to figure it up; but the Lord will provide yet."

"The Lord ain't on my side, Betsy. But look how Providence stood in with Billings, my predecessor. The first week after he was sworn in there were four men blown to splinters in the Yellow Jacket; then came a cave in the Con. Virginia shaft that panned out two more. His official career was a regular triumphal march. Everything stood in with him. Buildings fell down, blasts went off before their time, plenty of engineers got drunk, everybody was on the shoot, cut, and fight, and teams went crashing through the streets every day or so, running over children. Why, his fees from children alone amounted to more money than I have seen for six months."

"Providence did smile on him, and no mistake," said the wife sadly.

"Then look at the estates he had the handling of. Hundreds of thousands passed through his hands, and about half of it stuck to his fingers, and yet you say it was all the doings of Providence. Look how wicked he was: he gambled, drank, kept a mistress in every town, and was a born thief all the while. How can you reconcile these things to a belief in Christianity?"

"Trust in the Lord, John, and in the end you will be happy."

"Betsy, you make me tired."

Just then Barlow, the undertaker, came in, and his presence cheered the disconsolate Mangus. Barlow was a man who was never cast down and always hopeful for the future. He was warmly welcomed, and when he drew up his chair to the fire he pulled a bottle from his pocket and sang in cheery tones the refrain of the old song that was howled in the hall at Delhi when the great plague was devastating the city:

"Here's a cup to the dead already;
Hurrah for the next that dies!"

This beautiful and touching melody caused a smile to play over the stolid features of the Coroner, and in his enthusiasm he threw a lump of coal in the grate worth at least forty-five cents.

"Bring out some cake, and let's have a hot-schotch at once," he said to his wife, who began to move about quite briskly. "It isn't every night we enjoy the company of Mr. Barlow. How are things with you, Mr. Barlow?"

"Business immense," said the undertaker, rubbing his hands warmly. If the measles in the Second Ward keeps up another week I'll be able to pay the Belcher assessment and have considerable left. For a good, reliable, money-making disease give me measles; of course I mean where you can't get small-pox. The elevation here is too high for small pox, but every country has its little drawbacks and I don't complain. If I couldn't have measles, I'd worry along on diphtheria; but measles is the thing because it takes the children. Take a well fixed family who have just lost a child and they come down handsome for a toney funeral. If it's their only child, of course I charge 'em more. At a child's funeral I make a good spec on flowers. I raise 'em all in my back yard, but I make 'em think they come from Sacramento with big express charges. Now, for instance, when they are droppin' off pretty thick, I make the same flowers do for two funerals. I plant one in the morning, and of course they leave the flowers on the grave; then I take 'em and cover the coffin of the one I bury in the afternoon with 'em, see?"

The Coroner and his wife laughed heartily at these business revelations of Barlow, and highly commended him for his shrewdness.

"Of course," continued Barlow, accepting their compliments modestly, and lifting a fresh glass of hot-schotch from the table, "there are tricks, or rather strokes of business, in most all trades. Now, I often make people think they are gittin' solid rosewood, when it is only varnished black walnut. Take a woman whose husband is dead, and she takes on so that she don't inspect close; if I make her think I'm furnishin' rosewood, it makes her feel better, because she thinks she's doin' the square thing by the corpse. Well, here's at ye."

Mangus lifted his glass and drank with Barlow, and remarked: "That's all well enough for you, but in my business I can't play those dodges; I must take what Providence gives me. You git a regular thing, and my business is spasmodic."

"That's all because you lack brains—brains, my boy," replied Barlow, squeezing a little more lemon into his liquor. "People all seem to think that any damn fool can be a Coroner, but that's where they're wrong. Of course any fool can hold an inquest, but it takes intellect to be able to hold half a dozen inquests on the same man. I was once a Coroner in Frisco in the early days, and with proper care I could make a corpse last for months." Here Barlow looked over his glass and winked knowingly at Mangus, whose face brightened up as if a new light was dawning.

"D'ye see it?" quoth the undertaker, chuckling merrily.

Mangus burst into a laugh, and his wife smiled in sympathy. There was a knock at the door.

"Come in."

As the door opened a gust of wind brought in a shower of snow, likewise a man.

"There's a man killed at the Curry. We've got him here in a cart."

"Take him round the back way, and we'll put him in the dead house," said the Coroner, starting up. The man closed the door, and went back to the cart.

"There's no cloud without a silver lining," said the undertaker pouring out some more liquor.

Mangus knew there was a twenty-dollar fee within reach, and, putting his head out of the door, called to the man with the cart:

"How many was killed?"

"Only one."

"Don't expect to be a millionaire in a minute. One's a blamed sight better than nothing," said the undertaker, smiling blandly at Mrs. Mangus. "Miner is he? Well, there's a hundred dollar funeral at the least, perhaps more, and seventy-five per cent. clear profit. Let me see," he continued, as he buried his mind in mathematics. "Imitation rosewood, size six, eight dollars. Wont need any ice this cold weather, seven dollars saved. White muslin inside, and the stuffing, three and six-bits. Plate with inscription, ten dollars; handles, three on a side, four and a half. If he belongs to a society I can put it up pretty high."

"What have oo dot now?" cried a childish voice from an inner room.

The mother went in and kissed the child. "Father's got a dead man outside; now go to sleep, pet."

"Oh doody, I'll dit a doll, Billy," continued the child, calling out to a neighboring bed. "Wake up, dad's dot a dead man sure."

In a few seconds five curly heads reared up from their pillows, and began discussing the joyful news. The fond father promised each one some trinket or other, contingent upon the arrival of a subject. The corpse had arrived, no mistake, and its coming brought a joy unto that household equal to what the fleshly advent of a live Santa Claus might have produced.

"Now, you 'ain't foolin' us?" asked one, in tones which implied he thought the news too good to be true.

It was over an hour before the happy and excited youngsters could sleep, and by that time the dead had been laid out, cold and stiff, in a building in the rear of the Coroner's.

The little Mangus brood were up quite early in the morning and stole out in their night-gowns to see the corpse.

Little Billy touched the forehead with his finger to see if it was cold, and, finding it came up to his expectations, communicated the fact to the rest, in a terse, "Dead, you bet!"

One could hardly imagine a pleasanter sight than these smiling children, whose hearts were filled with joy at the arrival of the "stiff," and no wonder, for it was the first that had come on to the premises for four months. It being Saturday they did not go to school, and so played their blithesome games all day as only happy children can.

That night the Coroner and the undertaker had a private confab, and the result of their deliberation soon became manifest.

Inside a week a body was found in an old deserted prospect hole, and a few days after another, and the inquests came on thick and fast.

The Mangus family began to assume more importance. The wife was a shrewd woman, and one night she said:

"John, isn't this the same old corpse you are inquesting about once a week?"

"Hush, don't talk so loud; it's the same corpse, but I always inquest him under a different name, and I find him always in different clothes. If Providence won't provide for me, I'll do it myself. I don't propose to wait like Micawber for something to turn up. I'll go and turn it up myself."

"How long will the old fellow last?"

"If this cold snap keeps up he's good for about a month or six weeks more, and when he goes to pieces I may have a fresh one."

"The Lord will provide, John, the Lord will provide," said the wife, cheerily.

Mangus and the undertaker kept their pet corpse in good condition for weeks, and it was inquested pretty often. It was a perfect bonanza for fees, etc., and they looked upon it as a regular member of the firm.

"I begin to like this man," said the undertaker one day. "If ever we had a faithful friend it's this same man."

"Death only can separate us?"

"That is if we die."

"I've got him lying down in an old shaft near the hospital, and somebody's sure to find him in a day or so."

"What shaft? You don't mean the Lee Consolidated?"

"Yes."

The undertaker started to his feet in horror, and exclaimed: "You infernal fool, that old shaft is nine hundred feet deep, and two hundred feet of water at the bottom."

"Great Cæsar, do you mean it? I supposed it had been bulk-headed to within a few feet of the top."

"We've lost him; we never can get him up, and now we're dished unless we can get a new one, or take a dead pauper into the firm. We were just getting him along with us so well."

"We'll never see his like again," answered the Coroner. The poor Coroner seemed to take the loss very heart, and was never the same man afterward. He seemed to lose all enthusiasm in his business, which got duller and duller, and one day an old friend of his, who was blown up in the Belcher and lay four days insensible, came to, with the remark:

"The Coronor will never get me."

This was carried to Mangus, and the expression cut him to the quick; such ingratitude from an old friend, a man whom he had mined with for years, he could hardly believe it. His suspicions of his old friend's treachery were, however, confirmed when he saw him walking about the streets alive and well a few weeks after—not only alive, but going on a big spree as if exulting over his victory in depriving the Coronor of a subject.

No wonder Mangus became a misanthrope.

One day he was missing, and some of the miners passing the Lee Consolidated mine, where the foolish Coronor had thrown his dividend paying corpse, found tracks in the snow leading to the mouth of the shaft, and near by was the Coronor's unmistakable bad hat.

Poor Mangus had committed suicide doubtless, but the more charitable held that he rolled in by mistake.

It was impossible to get the body up at once. Meanwhile the citizens got up a benefit for the widow—the usual balm for bereavement on the Comstock.

The musical, dramatic, and vocal talent of the ledge combined. The receipts of the affair were $350, and the expenses in the neighborhood of $400. By repudiating the bills of the newspapers for printing and advertising the managers were enabled to balance accounts.

Meanwhile the story was circulated that the old shaft was haunted, and such was indeed the fact. Miners who passed the spot after sundown heard strange noises, and at midnight the voice of Mangus calling a jury together was frequently noted. Soon afterward it was said that a ghostly procession of men would file to the mouth of the shaft and disappear. Those who took the pains to stop and listen declared that they could hear the taking of testimony for hours.

One night some men coming off the three o'clock shift heard these words ring out clearly in the frosty air of morning:

"We find the deceased forty-three years of age, a native of Cornwall, England, who came to his death by a cave in the Gould and Curry mine on the seventeen-fifty level, and we believe that nobody is to blame."

A few moments later a crowd of spectral witnesses and jurymen came up from the shaft and melted away into the darkness. Such were the stories which passed current in the city, but I must confess that I never met a man who would vouch for them of his own knowledge.

About three months after the disappearance of the Coronor a skeleton was dragged up from the bottom of the shaft, duly inquested and buried as the remains of John Mangus.

The undertaker a few months after received a letter, which was as follows:

"DEAR BARLOW:—I suppose you attended my funeral on the 17th. The accounts in the papers amused me considerably. I am alive and well in Lima with my family, who have recently joined me. I made some tracks in the snow one night at the mouth of the Lee Consolidated shaft, then threw my old hat there, and stepped backward in my tracks until I reached the road. The rest you know. The body or rotten bones they inquested was the poor devil we did so well with last winter. Poor fellow, he is at rest at last. I wonder if they have overhauled my accounts yet! They'll do devilish well if they ever straighten them. I am running an undertaker's establishment down here. People are dying right and left, and business is splendid. Betsy and all the children send regards. Yours, JOHN MANGUS."

Not long after the books of the Public Administrator's office were overhauled, and there was a deficit of $10,000.

VIRGINIA CITY, NEV., May 10, 1879. SAM DAVIS.

The Detroit Free Press gives currency to this monumental but interesting lie:

On a train coming East over the Central Road the other day was a Californian bound for New Jersey, and the train had scarcely left Chicago behind when he stopped the conductor, and said:

"On which side of the car can I best see the mountains?"

The conductor told him: there were no mountains along the route, and the man indignantly replied:

"What in blazes did you build the road for? What do you suppose I'm traveling for? This must be a one-horse road if it don't take in at least one mountain!"

He cooled down after a while, but in half an hour he tackled the brakeman with the query:

"Does this road pass any old ruins of interest?"

The brakeman couldn't remember any ruins except an old log house here and there, and the Californian was mad in a minute.

"Do you think I shipped on this road as freight or live stock?" he called out. "If you don't run past any old ruins why don't you say so on the time-cards, and not be deceiving people?"

When the conductor next came along the Californian was looking from the window to catch sight of the bridges, and he turned and said:

"If we come to any bridges over eight hundred feet long just give me the word. I don't care about seeing any shorter ones."

The conductor had to admit that the road was trying to get along with a few short bridges, and the passenger bobbed around in his seat and replied:

"What did you build your old road for? If you haven't any long bridges on the line why didn't you hunt for a new one?"

About thirty miles west of Detroit the Californian caught sight of a lake afar off, and, going out on the platform, he asked the brakeman:

"Don't we run along the shore of that lake over there?"

"No; we are as near it as we shall go."

"You are, eh? Then that settles this road with me!"

When I come back I'll ride in a lumber wagon! You can take your confounded old railroad and eat it, but you can't fool me again. Looks to me as if the folks who built it simply wanted to connect Detroit and Chicago, and didn't care a cent for scenery."

Tramps would be more numerous than ever were it not for the self-sacrificing women of the land who marry and support so many men.

OUR OWN POETS.

Too Late.

It grew beside the way, a blossom blue,
That matched its color with the azure sky;
And once a careless traveler, passing by,
Half stooped to grasp the treasure where it grew—
Then left it, pondering on its lovely hue,
But thinking, "No, not now; some other day
I'll claim the treasure when I pass this way."
And so he bade the dainty thing adieu.
One day, long after, came the traveler back,
Seeking the flower with eager look and tread.
In vain. No blossom smiled along the track—
The little flower that he had left was dead.
Are themes like this, then, worth the poet's art?
What if the little blossom were a heart?

Free Will.

He clambered to a jutting point of rock,
And up and down the coast on either side
The breakers thundered, and beneath his feet
Broke into showering spray. He stood and laughed,
And met the pride of inward-rolling seas
With greater pride of man—for he was young.

"O mighty, restless, forceful sea,
That all along thy shore
Art shaking hoary locks at me
With threatening roar!
O leagues of helpless liquid there,
Drawn back and forth by law alone,
As passive as the dumbest stone,
Moved by each motion of the air,
How weak a thing art thou to me,
Who walk about the world, the one thing wholly free!
For human will is king,
Nor yields to anything.
And he who will may laugh at Fate's most mighty sea,
As here to-day I laugh, thou type of Fate at sea."

And as he spoke a towering wave swept on,
And bore him lightly from his place; and 'mid
The jagged rocks his limbs, like bits of straw,
Were tossed and beaten by the breaking wave.

Beyond.

Long is the flight and lonely the way
As the bird flies home at close of day,
But calm is the sleep and sweet the rest
After it reaches its downy nest.

Damp is the mould and dreary the tomb
Before the fair bud bursts into bloom,
But sweet the fragrance and rare the hue
When first it is bathed in morning dew.

Rough is the road and long seems the day
As life's pilgrim struggles on his way,
But bright is the joy and sweet the peace
After this troublesome life shall cease.

Sea-Shore Sentiments.

Towering rocks, rugged and grim,
Storm-beaten, surf-stained, and grey,
Ages come, linger, and die,
And yet ye pass not away.

Solitary, wave-eaten,
Inhospitable and bold,
Warm wavelets may caress thee,
Still thou'rt stern, frowning, and cold.

Seam-marked, dark-creviced, and chill,
Weird in storm, harsh in sunshine,
Softness ne'er marks thy stony brows,
Yet some wild quaint beauty's thine.

RICHARD RULE.

I.—Anticipation.

At some sweet, sudden thought my pulses thrill
With secret forecast of a time—
A coming day—which will its measure fill
With unalloyed delight and bydomel.
What is it I shall find? I can not tell—
I would not live within a rhyme.

I only know that hope is wondrous sweet
With promise that the stagnant calm
Of this monotonous life will break and beat
Around my way in waves bold strong and high.
I do not know where safer paths may lie,
I only wait with outstretched palm.

I know that love's exultant clasp is sure
To guide its treasure to some land
Where faith endures and passion still is pure,
And no wild storms of doubt may change our bliss
To hate's wide fire-struck desert. More than this,
'Tis not for me to understand.

The deep, divine blue of the heavens above
Will fade to pearl beside the hue
Of the empyreal in our heaven of love
If the deep need within me be not sent
As sign of Love's perfection and content,
How could I know that this were true?

II.—Realization.

Is this dull, misty waste the land I sought
With innocent heart in other days?
This keen, white stinging rain the storm I thought Love's hand would guide me through? Why, at my feet
The broken idol lies, and the sharp beat
Of the wild rain around it plays.

Oh, for one day of the long summer calm,
The measureless content I lost!
One day from the soft-breathing land of balm
The better to endure the years which roll
Deep-flooded with regret before the goal—
Years sorrow-stricken, tempest-crossed.

O Hope! O Love! why failed thou in my sight,
Fainting before we reached the end?
On me alone now falls the bitter blight
Of fruitless years, mocked at by memories
From the fair past; how could I know that these
Would not be happy hours to spend?

Is this the love-hued heaven I prayed to find—
This shrouded, starless, deep-gloomed sky?
Why was the longing in my heart confined,
If not to meet response? How should they
Who ask not life deal with its misery
When all life's hope is but to die?

NORTH COLUMBIA, May, 1879.

MAY N. HAWLEY.

HOW JOE SPROUL GOT HIS DIVORCE.

He had been in camp five days. Where he was from, who he was, or why he came, no one could tell. But that he was in camp and had come to stay, there was no doubt. He was quiet and seemed feeble, and he had about him an indefinable air of refinement and cultivation that commended him to the inhabitants of Nimshew as a somewhat pleasant innovation on the class of unpolished miners who then constituted the society of that aristocratic burg.

Nor was this all which had been noticed by the camp. As he stepped from the Oroville stage, everybody observed that he held almost convulsively the little girl whose tired head rested on his shoulder. They saw, too, that, though not old, his forehead was seamed with wrinkles, that his lips drew and twitched nervously at the corners, and that through his eyes looked out a patient, waiting heaviness, that gave an almost pitiful expression to his whole face.

By that delicate sense of perception which often lies hidden under the coarse exterior of uncultivated natures, the rough miners of Nimshew understood instinctively that the stranger was suffering from some mental as well as bodily illness. Their sympathies were enlisted in his favor from that moment, and every person in the camp immediately constituted himself his protector and friend. A day later, when he had quietly leased and occupied the old Lewis cabin standing somewhat back from the street and apart from the other houses, without a word to any one as to his intentions for the future or experiences of the past, the interest became stronger, and they began to speculate how to more substantially show their sympathy and at the same time more fully gratify their curiosity. But little was seen of the object of their interest, however. Only once had he appeared out of doors, and then simply to pace for a brief half hour up and down the walk in front of his cabin, with arms folded and eyes bent down, and look so seemingly abstracted that he did not appear to be conscious of the constant scrutiny of their curious eyes, nor even to notice when genial Hank Ewarts, strolling with well-simulated indifference by the gate, paused to speak to the little girl and coax her to him with flattery and delicate bribery. Beyond this he had not been visible, and at the end of the fifth day the camp knew as little about him as they had known on the first.

The winter was unusually severe even for that district. Three days before the road had washed out on the Diamondville grade, and entirely imprisoned the camp, severing it completely from the outside world. It had rained steadily all day. The depressing grayness of the clouds, which had vested a reflecting tinge even on the sobered complexion of the trees and rocks, gave way, as the sun went down, to still more sombre colors. The tall pines, that stood here and there like sentinels along the sharply outlined ridge of Helltown hill, creaked, groaned, and shivered as they swayed to and fro beneath the fury of the wind, and, bending and waving, lost their naked boldness, mingling more and more indistinctly as the gloom increased. The roar of Butte Creek, turbulent and swollen with the melting snow, came to the ear from the cañon half a mile below the camp hushed and subdued to a hoarse and muffled murmur. The rain pattered drearily on the roofs, and, dripping from the gutterless eaves, trickled off to swell the volume of the miniature river which had gouged out for itself a channel along the one deserted street.

In the spacious bar-room of the Nimshew Hotel a number of "the boys" were gathered around the fire-place, in which a fire of logs was snapping and flickering cheerfully. Male society predominated at Nimshew, and, as a consequence, etiquette often gave way to the exigencies of the occasion. Exposure to the storm had rendered boots, coats, and other exterior garments uncomfortable to their wearers: therefore many had been discarded, and a row of these dampened articles stood drying around the fire. But the picturesqueness of the dishabille somewhat overbalanced, perhaps, the lack of modesty in the assembly. They smoked, and talked, and spread themselves to the warmth, utterly ignorant of the fact that there was anything indelicate or even incongruous in the situation. Indeed, it had been resented as an attempt to "put on airs" when Johnnie Garrell ventured to express disapprobation of even so small a thing as the vapor which the heat extracted from their moistened woollen socks and sent steaming through the room, where it attacked the nostrils with a strength and intensity of odor which literally smelt to heaven.

"Well, whoever he is," observed the proprietor of the hotel—a tall, broad-shouldered man, owing to the name of Big Sam McClellan—"whoever he is, he's here, and as far as I can see he ain't got no friends—exceptin' a' course thet young one. He ain't well, neither, and probably needs medicine and nussin'. Now, thet little child can't do it, and what I say is, is this camp agoin' to sit around and see thet man want—is this camp thet in-cheritable?" He concluded hesitatingly, yet thoughtfully, looking into the fire, and fell to scraping the mud from one of his boots with the poker. There was no answer to the question, and after a pause he continued: "I wonder what ails the cuss ennyhow?"

"There's a woman in it now, you can bet on that," observed Hank Ewarts from across the hearth. "You hear me, that man's been chucked by some female or other, or I don't know the signs. I tell you, boys," he added, leaning forward and emphasizing the words with expressive nods of his head, "women is dangerous things. It's them as ruins many a good man. A man don't shet himself up, and look so kinder lunny and foolish, the way that chap does, if ther' ain't some great and overpowerin' grief a tuggin' at his heart-strings. Women is too fickle, boys, too fickle! You feels fur him, boys; but I tell you it's only when a man's actooally ned experience thet he can pint with certainty to the whole devastatin' effects of a blasted hope."

Hank was at once the orator and Adonis of the camp. In the eyes of the boys he was seldom equaled either in eloquence or love. But to-night, with the recent ending—adverse to him—of a love affair with a certain young lady of Dogtown, over the ridge, still fresh in their minds, they felt that his opinion on such matters was one that carried truth upon its very face, and utterly forbade denial. Therefore there was some surprise when, just as Hank was clearing his throat and preparing, with extended finger, to stigmatize more deeply the base frailty of the sex, a small man from the centre of the circle looked up and interrupted with,

"Some folks 'd say thet this chap hed done suthin' queer. It mought be thet he's skeered to come out."

"If this camp," said Hank, slowly, and flushing slightly as he spoke; "if this camp has fell so almighty low as to require a certificate of virtue an' a public investigation of character from every pore devil as comes into it, you ain't got any too much time, Dave Cohn, to pick up your duds an' leave. Perhaps you would desire the proceedings to begin; but I tell you thet if they does they'll be mighty convincin'."

The little man shrank back, and Hank's hand slid slowly round to his hip pocket as he added: "Perhaps there's some other man here as would like to tell me I lied."

Whether there was or not will never be related, for Sam McClellan leaned forward and earnestly exclaimed:

"See here, Hank, do you know thet what you say is true?"

Every eye was riveted on his face, and every head thrust forward in anxious expectation. Hank's face was a study. The expression of anger had given way to a half-foolish, half-hesitating look, which was almost an evidence of modesty. He blushed slightly, but it was only for an instant. Quickly recovering his composure he proceeded to explain:

"You see, gentlemen," he said apologetically, "I was accidentally strollin' by ther' yesterday an' I seed thet little girl a swingin' on the gate. She was a singin' to herself, an' she looked so purty and cunnin' thet I couldn't help stoppin' an' speakin' to her. I will state here," he added, with a touch of dignity, "thet I didn't do it from the actuations of a mere d-d curiosity, but because I felt it was a dooty—yes, sir, a dooty—arisin' from my feelins' of Christian charity towards the poor."

"But did you talk with her?" exclaimed Sam.

"Well, she was a leetle skeery at first, but after a little we got quite acquainted and sociable like."

"But did you find out anything about her?" said Sam; "for God's sake tell us about it."

"Well, yes," said Hank lazily; "yes, she said her name was Nellie—Nellie Sproul; thet thet old cnve was her lather, an' thet he was sick an' didn't have anybody to look after him but her—an' she's only five years old. I asked her about her mother, pore little child, and she said, 'Mamma didn't like papa,' an' thet the old man was wantin' to git a divorce. The little innocent didn't know what it meant, tho', fur she axed me directly 'what was a divorce.' I didn't want to tell her, an' she insisted so on knowin' thet I jest had to git up and leave her to git rid of it. But thet," he continued, "is why I say there's a woman in the case, an' thet we ought to help to pull the old man through."

"Now, gentlemen, what shall we do? I've knowed this camp fur nigh onto two year, an' never knowed it to go back on a good man because he was poor an' in trouble. I don't want to work on your feelins', gentlemen, but I know thet ther' isn't one of you as hes parients or old folks in the East as would like to see 'em turned off to starve an' die, jest because they happened to be livin' among strangers. An' now," he added, rising to his feet and intensifying the oratorical dignity of his air, "I axes you, gentlemen, as the representative of the a-leet of these diggin's, an' the conscientious inhabitants of a Christian community, shell them pore unfortunates, who hev'n't got the means to purvide fur themselves, suffer an' starve, while we has a plenty an' to spare? Remember, too, gentlemen, thet this little innocent is the first giurl thet was ever in these diggin's, an' thet her presence lends an added respectability to our society at large. Let's look out fur 'em, boys. Let's foster 'em, an' show thet we aire not dead to the sublime and generous actcoations of vertoo an' benevolence within us. Let's adopt 'em, an' advance their coin till they can see a prospect of better times ahead. I will now proceed to start a subscription."

So saying, the generous orator drew from his pocket and laid on the table a handful of coin. The others immediately followed his example, and when the last man deposited his donation there was a goodly pile of money in the heap. And so the old man and little Nellie were adopted by the camp.

It was not long before the boys came to know definitely of the old man's history and troubles, and learned to feel for him a gentleness of pity that was very near to love. His grief had made him simple, and together with little Nellie wrapped up his whole life. The boys listened to him with respectful and sympathetic attention, and it soon came to be universally regretted that the present facilities of the camp denied the old man the realization of what seemed to be his most cherished scheme—to get a divorce from the wife who had deserted him. Indeed, from the time he had first talked confidentially with Hank Evarts after his arrival at the camp, he had been "going below to get a divorce." He was going right away; he was going when he made money enough from his claim to pay the lawyer's fees; he was going when the rains were over, when the new trail over Helltown should be completed, when Nellie should be old enough to understand, when he should be in better health. And so the days went by, and lengthened into months, the claim gave up its treasure and quietly petered out, the rains gave place to summer droughts, the new trail over the hill became old and plainly broken, Nellie grew apace both in mind and body, the old man grew still more sickly and more childish, but still he had not yet got his divorce.

One Sunday afternoon Old Joe and Hank lay lazily sunning themselves on a bed of fragrant pine-needles, talking, as usual, of the former's hopes and troubles. The old man had fished out from the depths of a well-worn pocketbook a picture, and a small curl of yellow hair tied with the traditional blue ribbon.

"They were hers," he said, simply.

Hank accepted them gingerly on an outstretched palm, and critically examined them. The former was a painting—the likeness of a fair young woman of perhaps twenty-two or three. The eyes were blue, and the features had that peculiar baby-like cast of innocence which so effectually conceal the devilish depths of falsity and shame that commonly lie beneath them. It was a beautiful face, and Hank could not forego an exclamation as he glanced at it. The old man smiled faintly.

"Yes, Nellie was pretty," he said; then with an air of self-depreciation: "I know I ain't handsome nor smart, but somehow I do think she loved me—once. It didn't last, though," he continued, drearily. "I believe, too, that I really loved her, and if it wasn't for little Nellie there—I don't know—but—" His voice faltered, and Hank looking up quickly saw that his eyes were filled with tears. He choked them down, however, and with a half sob that gave evidence of the effort, added: "But Nellie is here, and perhaps for her sake—it will be better—to get—a divorce."

The hot tears filled Hank's own eyes, and there was a curious surging in his ears and choking in his voice, as he exclaimed:

"By God, old man, the woman as would treat you like that ought to be shot." And without doubt he echoed the sentiment of the whole camp in the words.

And from these and similar admissions the boys came to feel that Joe still loved his unworthy wife, and that it was not for himself alone that he wanted the divorce.

Yet the camp's investment was not wholly unremunerative. As Hank had predicted, little Nellie did add a refining influence to the society of Nimshaw. She romped and played impartially with all the men—riding on their shoulders, nestling in their arms, scolding them for their uncleanness, rebuking them for their profanity, and often presiding over their meals—a pleasure not unaccompanied by disadvantages to some of them, for she tabooed hats and insisted on so far revolutionizing previous table etiquette of the camp as to abolish the knife as a means of conveyance for food. While herself too young to suffer from the contagion of their coarseness, she in a thousand different ways brightened their rough lives, and lifted them to a higher plane of morality and Christianity, and in return they adored and idolized her.

The old man gradually grew weaker and more childish; the shadow on his hair became lighter, the stoop in his shoulders deepened, and the simplicity and garrulousness of his discourse became more intensely and piteously painful. Finally, one day bedrock was reached, and he was laid in the hotel groaning and muttering unconsciously with brain fever. A female nurse was deemed absolutely indispensable, and Hank Evarts galloped off toward Oroville, with instructions to dispatch as soon as possible the best nurse obtainable in that town.

It would be thirty-six hours at least before she could be expected, and in the meantime Sam McClellan was appointed temporary attendant. Nellie refused to leave her father, and sat by him on the bed; but after a day's anxious watching she became completely tired out, and fell into a sound sleep. Sam then carried her off and put her to bed where she would not be disturbed by her father's ravings.

Sam sat alone and watched the old man as he lay there exhausted. Joe's eyes were half closed, and his face was pale as one on the verge of death. He babbled and muttered continually, now and then raising his voice to a higher key, and then dropping again to the old, dull monotone.

There is a peculiar terror for any one in the presence of insanity, and Sam was not an exception to the rule. His dread made him nervous, and from time to time he restlessly paced the floor. But he found his courage in repeated application to his whisky flask, and finally seated himself on the edge of the bed.

The old man's fever was increasing, and in proportion to the increase he became more and more violent. His hands were picking nervously at the bed-clothes. Sam grasped them, and spoke soothingly to him. "There Joe," he said. "Now, don't take on so, you'll—" He did not finish, for, as if the touch had electrified him, Joe raised himself from his pillow till he sat bolt upright on the bed. Wrestling one of his hands loose, he pointed into a far corner of the room.

"Look Sam," he said, in a whisper, his eyes starting from their sockets, "look, don't you see her—there—yonder."

Sam's hair stood on end, but he managed to gasp out,

"No! Where?"

"There! Don't you see her? Nelly, my wife. Look, look—she's coming nearer! Don't let her, Sam, don't let her. See—she's coming—save me—save me! Help!"

He had been cringing and cowering lower and further back as he spoke, and at the last words, threw his arms around his neck, laid his head on his shoulder, and sobbed like a child.

Between his fear and the whisky he had drunk, Sam was almost stupefied. The more he looked into the dimness of the corner the more the conviction forced itself upon him that he actually could see the outlines of the vision that Joe had conjured up.

"I think I do, Joe," he said huskily, "I think I do." He leaned cautiously forward so as not to disturb the visitant, and grasped the kerosene lamp that was burning on the table. Then raising it with the same caution, he threw it with all his strength at the supposed apparition. "Take that, d—n you," he said, and fainted.

The fire from the broken lamp communicated itself to the building. Hank Evarts, coming up the grade, on his return from Oroville, saw the smoke pouring out of the window, put spurs to his horse, and dashed through the town raising so loud a cry of "fire" that in ten minutes the whole camp had turned out, and was gathered about the hotel. By this time it was in a light blaze, the flames shooting and dancing merrily in the darkness. The excitement and stir seemed to have made the camp mad, and they rushed frantically around like a pack of wild animals. There was no fire brigade, and no one seemed to know what to do; all stood stupidly watching the flames as they crept along the eaves, and played in and out of the shakes on the roof. Sam McClellan had come to his senses sufficiently to drag the old man to a place of safety, but that was all.

He was now wandering stupidly among the crowd, indifferent even to the destruction of his own property. Hank met him, and spoke to him hurriedly. "What!" he immediately exclaimed—it was almost a yell. There was a little movement in the crowd, as pale and trembling, he broke through it and sprang toward the burning building, crying frantically, "Water! Water! For the love of God bring water—Nellie's in the hotel!"

There was a piercing agony in his voice, for he had learned to love the little girl as if she had been his own, and he had just remembered that she had been in the building when he left; that she was too tired to easily waken; and even if she did her strength would hardly suffice to master the clumsy locks and heavy doors of the hotel; that the hotel was sure to go; and that the flames were curling and licking down upon the staircase with a speed that baffled hope.

People think quick in times of danger, and Hank thought of all this. But that was all. He forgot that the Cherokee Company had shut off the ditch for the night, that the neighborhood wells were dry, and that there was not a drop of water nearer than Butte Creek, a mile below the camp. He rushed to the watering tank at the north end. There was about a bucketful of water in the bottom. The crowd pushed and rushed in every direction, screaming for ladders and ropes. But there was not a ladder in the camp, and the ropes could not be used. They had gone perfectly crazy, and crazier than they, as if exulting in their discomfort, the fire burned and roared. Helpless, foolish, scared, dazed, they stood, when suddenly Hank Evarts snatched up a blanket, dropped it into the horse-trough, wound it all dripping around his head and shoulders, dashed through the door and ran up the stairs. There was a yell of admiration from the crowd. Then all sound ceased but the crackling of the fire, and in breathless masses they gathered to await his reappearance. The staircase was now in a blaze, and unless Hank returned quickly he could not return at all. The minutes seemed hours, and yet he did not come. The staircase fell, and a subdued groan went up from the crowd. Suddenly Hank reappeared at a window carrying Nellie in his arms. He beckoned for a rope, but before one could be thrown him he staggered, swerved forward, pitched out of the window, and fell with a heavy thud to the ground. Both were insensible when they raised them, but Hank recovered sufficiently by morning to be up and around town. Nellie was not so fortunate. Hank had wrapped her in the blanket, and this had somewhat softened her fall. But, in spite of all efforts, she could not be roused from her stupor, and lay in that condition all the next day. A doctor examined her, shook his head gravely, spoke of "internal injuries," and, on being pressed, admitted that there was little or no hope of her recovery. Little work was done that day on Nimshaw claims. But all day long a sad and sober group of miners loitered around the door of the cabin where they knew their little playmate and friend lay dying.

Toward evening the old man became rational, and asked repeatedly for Nellie. Gently as possible they told him she was dying. He would not believe it. He could not. He insisted on seeing her; and finally they carried him and laid him beside her on the bed. "She's not dying," he said, "she's sleeping; she'll wake up if I speak to her," and turning himself painfully he said: "Nellie, Nellie, wake up, child." She stirred uneasily, and seizing her hand he triumphantly exclaimed: "I told you so! Nellie, Nellie, wake up, Nellie. Do you know, Nellie, they told me you were dying. They tried to fool your poor old father. Wake up, Nellie, wake up and talk to me." The tender fondness of the tones and the wistful yearning in his voice brought lumps to the throat and moisture to the eyes of many a man unused to such emotions, and the hard, rough miners turned away, and covered their faces to bide the tears.

A rattle of wheels broke in on the quietness, and the stage drew up to the door. It was whispered that the nurse had come, and room was made for her as she entered. The old man had partly raised himself from the bed. He was leaning over the child and did not see her as she entered.

Suddenly his eye caught hers. He sprang up convulsively, extended both his hands toward her, and, with the same tenderness he had just shown toward the child, exclaimed "Nellie!"

The woman started in turn, looked wildly at him, and, exclaiming "Joe! O Joe!" started forward. Then she hesitated, hung down her head, stopped, and almost covered before him. His mood too had changed. A half-nervous, half-fearful expression had taken possession of his face, and he edged cautiously around so as to stand between her and the child. "What do you want here?" he said, querulously, nervously fingering the bed-post, and speaking in a sharp, quick tone, "what do you want here?" "O Joe," the woman said, piteously, "forgive me, forgive me. My child, my child. Let me see her, Joe." She moved as if to come to him. The old man's face was white as death, and his breast heaved excitedly. "It's a lie! It's a lie!" he shouted, "it's a lie! She's not my wife. I know what you want; you've come to take my Nellie from me—go—go—you won't let her, will you, boys? Take her away—away—a-a!" His voice had risen to a yell. He tottered forward as if to ward off her approach, half stumbled, and fell on his face to the floor. A dozen tender hands sprang instantly to his support, but when they raised him he was dead. Old Joe had got his divorce.

MAY L. SHEPARD.

CHICO, CAL., May, 1879.

As an offset to the Monarchs' Anti-assassination Association, it is proposed to found a Grand International Assassins' Revolver Association, with monthly or semi-annual meetings. National "teams" from Russia, Germany, France, Italy, and America, will be allowed to enter. Accurate figures of these royal folk, together with effigies of our popular American actors are to be used as targets, so that firing at either a stage or a genuine monarch will become such an every day affair as to deprive the assassin of all tremor and nervousness. Prizes will be given for the maximum number of shots out of a possible thousand in the cranial as well as the intercostal region, so that those monarchs or actors who are supposed to have no heart will not escape in consequence of that defect. Those who do not care to endure this public method, or because of native modesty or other reasons shrink from attracting attention to their skill and patience in learning marksmanship, can establish a private shooting gallery where they can gain some of the advantages herein mentioned. These establishments are generally provided with figures—an Indian, a hunter, a lion, an owl, and other pictorial targets. They would need only to add a few crowned heads in order to complete the outfit. Of course, in these contests the world renowned assassins from Kentucky, Georgia, Texas, and other States, who have proved that they require no practice, but are already well accomplished in the art of assassination, will not be allowed to compete for the prizes.

"THE SECOND CARD WINS."

A house with two doors is difficult to guard.—Spanish Proverb.

I.—THE LOVELY MRS. CLARE SPEAKS.

I read people at a glance, always could; it was born in me, as it seems to have been born in my husband to dispute it, and I don't care what he says, I shall still think there was some strange secret between Mark Dillon and that woman. There was always something queer about him. I saw it at first, when Sam brought him to our rooms in the hotel and presented him to me as his "old friend from India, who joins us for the opera." I thought it was shyness that kept him dumb, for he only bowed and stared.

"Oh, from India!" I cried, warmly, shaking hands; "the one I am to thank for the rare fan sent to Sam's wife! I am so glad to meet you."

"You have it, then?" he said, looking closely at me.

He was plainly struck with Sam's taste in the choice of a wife. He never got over his surprise, but always watched me with a puzzled air as he might look at a strange bird or flower, even turning to gaze after me.

"Yes, indeed, among my treasures," I said. "I was waiting for Sam to take me to the opera to-night. Here it lies with my India shawl."

I took it up, a gay bunch of bright feathers with a picture on one side, mounted on sandal-wood and silver beaten by the patient toil of India into frost-like flowers and leaves, one spray even twisted round the red tassel.

"Now, do tell me the story," I begged. "You wrote in the note to Sam which came with it that it was enchanted. What did you mean?"

He looked startled. "I had nearly forgotten that," he said. "It was a spell cast by an old Hindoo whom I vexed by smiling at his tricks of magic."

"Has it worked?" I asked, lightly, as I drew on my long gloves while we waited for Sam whose man is so slow in the last touches of his toilet.

Mr. Dillon looked uneasy. "In spite of my common sense," he said, "though I thought I was above such delusions, I must confess that the spell is working.—Where will it end?" he asked himself.

"Oh, how awful! What is it?" I asked, adding with a laugh, "I shall look at my lovely fan with a half fear of it." "Well," he said, after a moment's thought, "I will tell you, for it is not you who are to suffer. But, first, please tell me the date of your marriage."

"Why—the fan was among my bridal gifts! Have you forgotten when you sent it?"

"Oh—yes," he replied, with what seemed a painful effort of memory. "Well, this is its story: While I was at the Rajate of Puttiala, a rich and powerful baboo, Lal Chunder, asked his friends to come and see a great juggler show his tricks. Foreigners and natives all went, on elephants, camels, and horses. The baboo's divan was in the centre of his court yard. We sat round him, the natives smoking hookahs. There was a din of tumtum wallahs, and a troop of nautch-dancers. Then, to the sound of gongs and trumpets, came the sorcerer on a gayly-decked elephant. He made gracious salaams to us, and, after sending paper birds and butterflies in long flights chosen by us, calling up from a far off pack any card we named, and other slight tricks often shown, he had a fire made into which he cast fragrant spices, and, while they burned, he put on a robe covered with strange signs; from a pocket in this he took a wooden ball full of holes where long thongs hung out. Grasping one of these, he flung the ball into the air with such force that it passed, unreeling as it went, at once out of our sight and stayed in the clouds. Then he made climb the thong a camel, who quickly vanished in the sky; a boy was sent after, making many trips, and bringing at each descent something for the baboo's guests. These gifts were left in a pile, while the boy was told to bring the rest on the camel. He went up, but the animal, now loaded, came down alone. The conjurer called three times; then, in a rage, snatched a knife and himself ran up the thong. We could see nothing, but heard his fierce threats and the boy's wild cries. He soon threw down one of the boy's hands, then a foot, then the other hand, the other foot, the trunk, and then the head. He ran down, panting, and with blood on his robe, laid the parts of the boy's body all in place, still raging at him, and gave them a kick, when the boy rose and bowed to us and divided the gifts among us, who were in each case chosen by the magician, after making us pass singly behind the vapors of his mystic fire. With each thing he gave some warning. The natives, much excited, call on Brahma, Vishnu, Calle, and all the calendar of Indian gods, but the foreigners smiled at the fine jugglery, and I laughed out. The sorcerer looked at me long and gravely, and cast that fan to my lot. He came to me, spread it, and, showing me the picture on it, said: 'I have put you there. That figure will go away when you leave the world. Though you send this fan straight as an arrow, it shall yet swerve from its course. When her hand holds it, will be when your sun sinks behind a golden mist!'"

"But I don't understand," said I, "about the working of the spell."

"Come, come," said Sam, bustling in, "what are you talking about, Mark? You look too grave for opera bouffe," and hurried us off.

During the evening I overheard Mr. Dillon ask Sam, "Why did you never write how matters stood?"

Sam took his opera glass and looked over the house, and searched all his pockets for cardamoms, before he answered, "Why should I?"

I knew at once what they must mean. Of course Sam would prefer to have his wife seen, to boasting of her beauty.

After we came home Sam asked how I liked his friend. "What makes him seem so queer?" I said.

"How?" demanded Sam, bristling as usual for fear some one may have slighted me. "What did he say?" he asked, anxiously. "What was he telling you here?"

I told him, adding: "He seems so absorbed and odd."

But Sam, who while I was telling him the story was crazy enough to knock over my best cloisonné bowl and break a vase, only said: "Asked when we were married, did the infernal climate of India must have affected his

So I ceased to wonder at Mark Dillon's odd ways, even at his looking troubled at seeing me carrying that fan, and really trying to have me change it for a carved cherry-stone bracelet he brought from China. I did not mind his losing himself in thought when near us, or watching me as if I puzzled him. Sam had explained it all, but he could never set my mind at ease about that woman.

I pride myself on my power to study character and motives. It is simply impossible to hoodwink me. The moment I first set eyes on her on the overland train I thought, "There is a woman with a story." And to think that even now I do not know what that story was is enough to make me let down my back hair and scream, as I did at Aunt Ann's yesterday when the oysters were not cooked to suit me. She looked able to travel anywhere alone, as she was then. I had my maid and man-servant, of course. What with my lovely Skye, and "Ouida's" latest, my shawls, lunch-basket, candy-jar, and writing-desk (for Sam expects to hear every day), I could not travel without; I don't see how any one can, though Babette was half sick and wholly cross, and Alphonse smelled of cheap cigars in the smoking-car, so that really I did have my troubles. She sat in the next seat, and I could not help showing her some kindness in the way of canned turkey, and stuffed olives, and sherry, for she seemed strong in neither body or purse. She had severe, nervous headaches, and I loaned her my vinaigrette. As she returned it just as we were nearing San Francisco, she said:

"You have been kind to me. I am very grateful. May I ask the meaning of that monogram?" pointing to the initials set in brilliant in the side of the little gold flask.

"My name is Clare," I said. "Those letters stand for my husband's name."

"Ah!" she said, "I am also Mrs. S. C. My name is Capel."

"Indeed!" said I; "that is a name in my husband's family. It is his middle name."

"How strange! but my husband has no relatives living," said she.

I wanted to ask about her husband, but feared she was a widow. She seemed to read my thoughts.

"My husband is in California somewhere," she went on. "I am going to try and find him."

"Then you have not lately heard from him?" I asked.

"Not for ten years," was her startling reply.

What would Sam say, I thought, to such conduct in a husband!

"How surprised he will be," I said.

"Yes," said she. "I did not know where to write."

I wanted to ask if she thought he was worthy of such search, but I saw she was poor. Perhaps she hoped he had money. Possibly she was still fond of him. But I thought he had most likely forgotten her, for, though plainly a bright woman, she had none of the dainty curves and fair rose tints that do a man's eyes good—such as I know please Sam in me. I urged her to come to my hotel. I had reached home Thursday night, a week before my husband expected me. I planned to surprise him, but found he had gone on a hunting and fishing trip to San Gregorio. When he came back, I meant to make him help my new acquaintance. I took her under my wing, chose her room, made Babette dress her hair, and we went down to breakfast together Friday morning, when who should sit in front of us but Mark Dillon! He was so amazed to find I had come that he seemed really nervous.

"Bless my soul—Mrs. Clare!" said he, looking as much at her as at me, and then got very red and confused. I never quite knew before how much he admired me. I felt so glad to be at home again I urged him to come to my rooms after breakfast and practice duets. When he came, Mrs. Capel was with me and I presented him to her. I saw then he did not seem at ease.

"This is a new friend of mine," I told him. "Her husband is somewhere in California, and I am going to help her find him."

"You—help her! Good gracious—no—yes—certainly—oh!—of course—by all means," was his strange reply.

He seemed more absent-minded than ever, as if trying to see his way clear for something. At last he said: "Mrs. Clare, I got a letter last night from Sam. Want to hear it?"

"No," said I, "I found one waiting for me in case I got here while he was gone."

"Ah! with a sonnet to your eye-brow?" he asked.

"No. Sam never writes verse to me nowadays," I said.

"He does to me," said he, "and I want you ladies to hear it," with stress on the word "ladies," as he saw Mrs. Capel about to leave the room. She waited. He went on: "Sam has sent up a rare shot of his, a loon, to be stuffed for our club-rooms. Says he has not had very good luck this season, and it seems to have made him down-hearted, to judge from his rhyms:

PORTENT.
No loon-er-on—but wild growth like the fern,
I feel the hidden current's forceful sway,
I must attend to weird cries of the hern,
Must round the marsh with phantom vapors stray,
And pause, breast-high, where reeds and rushes rear
Their flaunting craze, to watch the white gulls' flight,
As, high athwart wide roving clouds, they veer
Through darkening air like vaning flocks of light.
The sluggish water dreads the storm's first dip,
Turns rolling eyes of light toward sullen sky;
The w o d s, as in the codge of a ship,
Through tangled forest wander piping by.

They mock the cries of ship-wrecked sailors; shout,
And wail, and laugh, till I, excited, scream—
Dead silence follows! for the goblin rout
Theo know man's presence in their sylvan dream.

I turn where cypress branches interlace
To arch against the sun's red wane,
Outlining vast cathedral's gloomy space
Half lit by Gothic window's scarlet stain.

Within this holy hush and solitude
Entranced I linger, and forget—forget—
No Past above me here can darkly brood,
Nor Future watch upon my footsteps set.

What voice of hidden Mephistopheles
With scornful echo startles the lagoon?
I feel the current of my life-blood freeze
At dread derisive laughter of a loon!

Alas!—although I shot him—in my dreams
I hear his warning cry, and watch the storm,
Till, where the lightning through the shadow gleams
Upon the marsh, I see my lifeless form!"

"What nonsense!" I began, when the look on his face and hers stopped me. He had handed her the verses to look at, but, with only a glance at them, she was looking at him with a painfully earnest question in her gaze, while his face was that of a culprit who is caught. For the moment I could have sworn they were not the strangers I had thought them. Then she rose, tried to excuse herself, and started to go to her room, but was so faint, I, with Babette, had to help her reach it.

"Worn out from her journey," I explained to Mr. Dillon. "No excuse needed, Mrs. Clare; I saw for myself."

Then he made a series of failures with our duets for flute and piano which were wont to make us sure of being asked to musical parties. In the middle of Druet's "Semi-ramide" he broke down, and turned it off by asking:

"Where did you make her acquaintance?"

"On the overland train. Ah, you are smitten as I was," I said.

"Are you pleased with her?" he asked.

"Sworn lasting friendship, and vowed to help her find her own true love," said I.

To hide his next mistake he said, "How do you know he is her own true love?"

"Oh, I know he must be," I replied.

"The word fickle is unknown to you?" he asked.

"Yes. Isn't Sam my model?"

He failed again, and begged to be excused from further practice.

Mrs. Capel kept her room with a nervous headache all Saturday, but on Sunday I made her drive with Mr. Dillon and me to the Cliff House. I wisely planned it so neither knew the other was going until too late to pause—starting with her and taking him up on the way. There was a warning of coming storm in the black haze that, as Mr. Dillon said, made the air a magic crystal, showing far-off places as if near, and by the time we had finished luncheon and gone out on the balcony, a wall of fog hid the sea but for what seemed a short space before us. Some one in the parlor played a snatch of Wagner's "Spinning-Song."

"Too monotonous," I said.

"The droning wheel," said Dillon, "but you can hear the foot-fall of fate, see the red sails and black masts of the doomed ship, and, in Listz's version, hear the wind whistle in the rigging." He turned to her as if she had asked a question. "But when the captain finds Senta at her wheel she is bound to another."

"What can be done then?" I asked.

"Truly," said he, still looking at her, "what can be done?"

She thought a moment before replying: "There is the decision of Heine's lover:

"As fickle as the wind thy heart
That flutters to and fro;
With black sails sails my ship,
Across the seas to go."

He sprang up and began pacing up and down, when suddenly a full-rigged vessel, looming through the mist, passed within hail, more phantom-like than real.

"Like a dream!" she said.

"And to them," said he, "this shore looks like dream-land."

"Noiseless, ghostly, and swift as the 'Flying Dutchman,'" she said.

"How absurd for people to rave over that opera!" said I. "That old foggy striding along the beach, so many paces to certain orchestral chords, and so on; nothing to get so excited over as folks like you all do."

"It is because he is fated—like the figure on the fan," he said with a sigh, and asked us to excuse him a while. I was glad to have him go, for she had caught his trick of watching me, and I was impatient under the musing gaze of two.

When he had gone she asked: "Suppose it to be Senta who finds the Captain faithless, what ought she to do?"

"You could ask no better person," I said.

"How do you mean?" she asked, looking at me with wonder.

I felt proud of being appealed to. I knew what should be done, and I told her at once: "Make him pay for the ship she sets sail in."

"Money!" she said bitterly.

"Yes," said I. "A man should pay for forgetting me. But such a thing is not possible to Sam."

"One would think you who have all the money you want would not value it," she said.

"Not quite all I want. Sam has promised me a hundred thousand dollars for my birthday, next week, and I am glad to get it."

"A hundred thousand dollars!" she said, as if wrapt in thought; and after a pause went on: "Suppose a woman to have had two lovers, and to have chosen the one who proves least faithful—"

"Don't fancy such things!" I cried. "Wait till he is found. Oh, why don't you advertise for your husband!"

"Lost, strayed, or stolen," drawled Mr. Dillon, who had lounged back unseen, and startled us by speaking.

"How shall I make amends?" he asked.

"By writing some verses about that mirage-like vision of a sail," said Mrs. Capel.

While he wrote, with note-book on knee, the fog cleared, and there was a strange sunset which charmed them, but I was too vexed over the damp the fog left on my crimps to care.

He said: "A poem in colors!"

She quoted: "The setting of a great hope is like the setting of the sun!"

"Why was that not said in verse instead of prose?" said he.

"Use it," she hinted.

"It would be no worse theft," he answered, "than 'Sweet By and By,' which is but a poor version of the old Irish air, 'Has Sorrow thy Young Days Shaded?'"

Soon after he read to us:

HAP-HAZARD.
In the balcony jutting above the wild ocean,
Like scene an Arabian Night reveals,
Where oft we linger with gay emotion
To look at the rocks and the sunning seals,
To number the clouds and the gulls, wind-shaken,
And name the crowding white horses whose manes
Flap and flutter to spray as they sink overtaken—
Th' sea reclams—

'Twas here we stood when a mist unbroken
Made the world seem sketched on a vapored pane,

Grey walls surrounded, and blurred all token
Whether sun or moon might arise or wane;
'Twas like a dawning or dreamy gloaming
And a potent spell upon you and me,
For as we paused there our thoughts were roaming
Ships at sea.

As if in conjurer's crystal, looming
Through murky depths, sailed a ship afar,
Like thistle-down in its phantom blooming,
Or a floating film a breath might mar;
As if carved of the moonstone's cloudy sheen
Through the mist it glimmered with softened glow,
And its sails afret with the wind were seen Intaglio.

And you murmured, "Perhaps in that vessel one passes
Whom we might have adored had we known;
And it may be their view our own so surpasses
Their fantasies shoreward are blown."
"Alas!" I answered, "We have no warning
When the things that almost occur are near—
Or, like our dreams between dusk and dawning, Disappear!"

Then they fell to talking of omens, second sight, the sway of one mind over another, and such ghostly stuff, to my high glee and scorn.

"People who can believe in such things," I said, "are easily duped."

"Mrs. Clare," he said, "as I have often told you, you must some time be most completely fooled. It is sure to be."

I had not time to tell him what a vain boast this was, when Sam, who had reached town, learned where we had gone, and followed, came out among us. As, nodding to Mr. Dillon, he rushed toward me he noticed Mrs. Capel, but he was quite overcome at the sight of me. He turned pale, his eyes flashed, he could scarcely speak.

"What is it?" I cried. "Are you ill?"

He tried to turn it off with some pretense of a passing faintness, but he seemed stunned. Of course, I understood
—he was vexed not to have been here when I returned.

"Why didn't I hear from you?" he asked Mr. Dillon, angrily.

"I sent a dispatch in reply to your letter," said his friend.
"I never got it," said Sam, crossly.

I think Mrs. Capel must have one of the sensitive electroplate minds Mr. Dillon talks of, for she said nothing, only turning red and pale by turns, watched Sam with searching gaze, as was natural when I had promised her his help. I hastened to make them acquainted, to tell him about her, and beg him to aid her to find her husband, but she put up one hand as if to stop me, vainly tried to speak, and looked an appeal to Mark Dillon—I shall always think his queer aspect then was conscious guilt—slid out of her chair in a deep swoon, from which Mr. Dillon and I had hard work to revive her, while Sam looked on, frightened and displeased.
He was so kind he would not come to town with us for fear of crowding us in her faint state. But I knew he was angry to have our meeting so broken in upon by a stranger. Indeed, it made him take such a dislike to her that he refused to have anything to say to her.

"You are prejudiced," I said.

"Perhaps I am," he replied, coolly, and would have nothing to do with her. He seemed all worn out by his trip to San Gregorio, and in the evening had a severe fit of cramp in his right arm and shoulder. My head was so full of Mrs.
Capel that I had just burst out about it:

"I believe I know where to lay my hand on her husband."

A Bill of Particulars.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—I have translated from the French the following singular document, lately discovered in the library of Saint Genevieve: Jacques Casquin, a painter and designer, having done considerable work in the Church of the Monastery of —, had presented a claim of seventy-eight florins for his services. The old priest, believing the claim overcharged, demanded an itemized bill from the artist, which was rendered, and read as follows:

For repairing and varnishing the Ten Commandments.....	5 florins.
For embellishing Pontius Pilate, and placing a new ribbon on his cap.....	3 "
For making a new tail to Saint Peter's cock, and refitting its comb.....	2 "
For re-nailing the good thief to the cross, and adjusting a new finger to his right hand.....	4 "
For making a new left wing to the Angel Gabriel, and gilding the same.....	4 "
For washing the female servant of the High Priest Caiaphas, and coloring her cheeks.....	5 "
For renovating the Canopy of Heaven, adding two stars, gild- ing the sun, and cleaning the moon.....	7 "
For giving new lustre to the Flames of Purgatory, and re- touching some souls.....	6 "
For a new tail for Lucifer, for repairing his left claw, and mak- ing sundry new things for the damned.....	4 "
For cleaning the robe of Herod, for setting new teeth to him, and refitting his wig.....	2 "
For patching Paul's leather breeches and placing two buttons on his jacket.....	6 "
For new gaiters for young Tobias, traveling with Angel Ra- phael, and a new strap for his traveling valise.....	6 "
For cleaning the ears of the Ass of Balaam and re-shoeing him	5 "
For earrings for Sarah's ears.....	2 "
For a new stone for David's sling, enlarging Goliath's head, and setting back his legs.....	3 "
For setting new teeth to Samson's ass jaw bone.....	3 "
For calking Noah's Ark, and giving that just man a new pair of sleeves.....	6 "
For patching the Prodigal Son's shirt, washing and cleaning the hogs, and putting water in their trough.....	3 "
For setting a new handle to the Samaritan's jug.....	2 " 78 florins.

The simple-minded style of the artist's recapitulation of his services softened the heart of the old priest, who ordered the bill paid. L. H.

Her husband had asked her to just step into the butcher's on her way home and order a sucking pig for to-morrow's dinner. Having executed the commission she was about to leave the shop, but stopped at the door, staring hard and with evident disapproval at some small and ragged hoglets which happened to be passing in leisurely pursuit of their noses. Then she ventured to readress the man of meat:
"Oh, Mr. Butcher, if it isn't too much trouble will you be so kind as to pick out a very nice one?—a real old one, you understand—one that is old enough to have moulted."

EDITORIAL NOTE AND COMMENT.

The friends of the new Constitution are right when they demand for the instrument a fair and friendly test. It has become a law in accordance with the spirit of our Republican institutions. It is the act of a majority of the electors of the State, and as such demands to be treated honestly.
When the Call says that "the fight has just begun," it announces a sentiment that is unfair, unjust, and revolutionary.
But we laugh at the Call. It balanced itself, with a most wonderful skill, upon the top of the fence all through the heat of the conflict, and on the very morning of the election crawled down upon the wrong side; and now, after the battle is lost, it announces with owl's and oracular wisdom that "the contest has just commenced." By this we suppose it means to say that the contest with the Chronicle for small advertisements has now opened in right earnest. We expect to see the air darkened with the missiles, and the atmosphere tainted with the foul smell, of another interchange of stink pots between these journalistic imitators of Chinese warfare —a conflict of sound and smell. No party can succeed in this State, whether Republican, Democratic, or People's, that will not in good faith and without mental reservation declare its honest intention to give the new Constitution a fair trial —a trial in sympathy with the letter and spirit of the instrument; that will not make this open declaration in its party platform, and nominate for Governor a gentleman whose declarations in this direction will be accepted as sincere, and whose past life shall be a guarantee of an honorable determination to honestly do his duty. Members of Assembly and Senate must be chosen in harmony with the same sentiment, and judges must be nominated whose learning and integrity place them above the suspicion of desiring to defeat the fairly expressed will of the people by any indirections or technical evasions. The people who voted for the new Constitution have a right to demand the nomination of assessors who are in sympathy with the spirit of the new law, and railroad commissioners must be designated whose life, character, and honorable standing in the community will be an absolute assurance that they will impartially discharge the duties of their office without fear of the people or favor to corporations. With a just and liberal interpretation of this new organic law we shall find its beauties if it have any; and if there be any incongruities in it, out of which evil may come,
we shall be able to find and amend them.

The secret ballot gives such advantage to the cowardly and the criminal that we would repeal it as soon as possible, and until repealed we would circumvent it by all lawful means at our command. In an election involving constitutional government, one upon which hangs the welfare of the State, and on which our brains and fortune depend, we would not permit the man who lives upon our brains and our wages to set himself up in opposition to our political opinions. For the expression of this sentiment we have no apology. Our property was honestly acquired; we are administering it for the best good of the entire community in which we reside, and we lay down the proposition broadly that our coachman, cook, or gardener shall not vote it away from us, or jeopardize it by any crotchets of communism or agrarianism that he may have brought in his empty head from France, or Germany, or Ireland. We will not threaten him, nor bulldoze him, nor compel him to vote our way, but if he does not vote in harmony with our interests we will exercise our right and our privilege as an American citizen, and we will dispense with his services, and in his place we will either hire some one who thinks as we think, or a Chinaman who does not think at all. We are weary and disgusted with all this sickly sentimentality that encourages, first, the immigration to this country of all the paupers of Europe, then clothes them with political power, and then encourages their insolence and arrogance at the polls. The secret ballot was intended to protect society against the domination of wealth and political power; it is used by the mob to stab society by a stealthy blow. We are in favor of an open ballot, and we would compel every man to come to the polls and proclaim abroad, and in the presence of his fellow-citizens, his preference for official positions. If he is not brave enough to do this, if he is too cowardly to admit his political opinions, and give them open expression, he is no true American citizen, and he might abstain from voting. The workingman and the farmer had at least the manliness in the recent election to openly proclaim their elective rights and openly to exercise them. It was the cowardly and ungrateful clerk and employee of this city that lacked the manliness to openly do what in secret they did do, in opposition to the interests of the employers for whom they labored, and the industries upon which they depend for their maintenance. This change can not be immediate, and we suggest it as an amendment to be engrafted upon the Constitution at some period in the not distant future.

The Workingmen's party is fortunate in possessing a leader that does not want office. Such a man can be the auto-crat and dictator of a political organization. The man who himself is seeking office is always subject to the suspicion of selfishness. Kearney will have great power so long as he abstains from seeking or accepting position. Every man in the Republican and Democratic parties wants a place. All the honorable bilks are in the same fix.

Let us give the devil his due. Denis Kearney has put to shame the great oracle of the chivalry by his honest denunciation of a most atrocious sentiment uttered by David S.
Terry. "Steal all the money you can from your party opponents," said Terry. "Be guilty of taking bribes and then betraying those who bribe you." Howard and the Chronicle both gave their sanction to the double crime. It was left to the drayman to rebuke these "honorable bilks" for their immoral and indecent utterances.

When the mountain refused to go to Mohammed, Mohammed wisely determined to go to the mountain. Now, as Denis has refused to go to David, the only thing David can do is to go to Denis.

It may be pious that induces you to put money in the collection plate at church, but it is shame that prevents you from asking for it back, anyhow.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

My Uncle Ned, wich has ben in Injy and evry where, he says one time there was a feller wich was a lickn his whife, and evry time he hit her there was a dog, and it hollerd, the dog did, like a looky motif. Then the feller he sed to his whife: "Cant you do yure own hollerin?"

Then he thot a wile, and then he went in his house and brot out a other whife, and licked thain too, and wotched the dog, and the dog it howld agin. Then the feller he sed:
"Whose whife is this lde like to know, mine or yourn?"

Then he got a other whife, and licked her, and it was the same way. Then he thot a wile agin, and then he was goin for a other, but the dog it shuke its head and walked a way, much as to say: "A feller cant devote his hole life to one emotion and fore go the chase; the jackus rabbit is forth, and duty beckns me a way. Maybe the other lads can scure the serfices of a fresh dog."

Master Jonnice, wich has got the wuden leg, he says a scientiffle man was a lickn his whife, and evry time she was hit there was a ecko, wich sounded jest like a other man a lickn him, and the scientiffle man he was dlited. Bime by he stoppt and sed: There is some thing singler bout this ecko; it seems to repeat the hard licks in a other kee from the mild ones. Most xtrodinary thing I ever herd. My deer, we must xperriment further."

But mebbey the ecko wasent nothing but jest sum little boy lickin his candy. Lickriss is mity nice too, I can tel you, and one day me and Sammy Doppy was give a stick of it and we was takn turns a suckn it. Billy he cum a long, and he sed: "Johnny, yure a nasty pig for to be sharin that thing, suck and suck about, with sech a dirty face feller as Sammy Doppy!"

But Billy was a ole smarty for his pains, cos I sucked it first evry time.

One night me and Billy had sed our pray, and ast for to be blest, and mother she sed: "Johnny," and I spoke up and sed: "Wot?"

Then she sed: "Johnny, do you kno wot it is to be blest?"
And I sed: "I gess its tendin in a candy store."

But Billy he says its the preachers hands on yure head and him a lookin up for to see wot kind of wether it is goin to be,
cos Billy he seen it that way in a picter.

And now here gose for a story bout a cat, cos once a ole she one and her kitten was lunkn for some thing for to eat, and ol to once the ole cat she sed: "I ges we ar all rite now, you se that rats tail stickn out of that weat sheaf."

But the kitn it sed: "Oh, come, now, we cant eat sech a snaky little thing like that."

The ole cat she sed: "Tru, my chile, it aint jest wot is required by our kneecsty, nor all wich is demanded by our ambission, but if we accep it in a umble and thankfe spirret mebbey it will lead up to sum thing better."

Uncle Ned he says the morl of this fable teeches that we must be content with a smol beginin if we want to obtain a great end, but it seems to me twas jest the other way with the cat, cos the tale was the end and the rat it was the beginin. Rats eats cheese, and cats eats rats, and sossidges is et by me and Billy, and Mister Brily, thats the butcher, he is greesy like a sossidge his ownself.

One time ole Gaffer Peters had bot a long string of sos-sidges for his brecktas. Ole Gaffer he started for to go home with his sossidges, but he had ben a drinkn wisky, and there was a big yellor dog wich kanew it, and the dog follerd him for to git the sossidges and kep a snappn at em wen they was carried in his hand, and wen Gaffer put em in his pocket the dog it tride for to clime in, too. So Gaffer put em in his vest. Bime by ole Gaffer he was drunk like a lord, and lay down in a fence corner for to go a sleep. Then the yellor dog it snook up and snatch the sossidges and ravvled em out, and ran a way with em, and a man he seen it. Ole Gaffer he woke and hollerd: "There goes my breckfas, there goes my breckfas!"

The man he looked at his wotch, and then he sed: "Wel, you gum dasted gluten, its leven o colock, I ges it was prety near all dijested."

A other time it was lookn like it wude rain, and ole Gaffer he started for to go down town, and he put up his umbrelly.
It didnt rain, but Gaffer he woked all round with his um-brelly up, cos he bad for got. So bime by Mr. Gipple met him, and ast him wot for he had it up. Then Gaffer he took it down, and looked a long wile up, and then he sed: "Pears like we was a goin for to have a mity long dri spel, dont it?"

Mister Gipple he sed: "Yes."

Then Gaffer he sed agin: "litle be mity bad for fellers wich has got to have a damp, yumid annisipere, and aint got no umbrellys for to keep off the dri."

Some natif niggers in Africy thay had a big wuden idle wich thay wershopt, cos thay sed it was a god, and one day thay shet up a pig in the pen wich was bilt a round the idle, cos thay sed: "To morro we will sacfice that pig and make a burnt offer to our god."

But nex mornin wen the preests went to kil the pig there was a mitionary preacher, and the preacher he laft like he wude bust, and he sed: "I got you now, you galoots, jest look wot kind of a god you got wich pmits such libbertys as that, cos he cant hellup hisset."

So thay looked, and there thay seen the pig a scratchn hissef aginst the idle and gruntn like it was mity nice.

Jest then the pig it stop scratchn and went to routin with the snoot of its nose, and bime bi it got it under the idle and up set it in a minnit in the mud. Then the mitionary preacher he danced, and slapt his leg, and hollerd wild, and sed: "Wot a all powfle feller yure god is, to be shure, set him up agin, hooray!"

Then the hi preest was the fieroucest feller you ever saw, and he jumped in the pen, and kicked the idle hard as ever he cude, and bust all its bed with his tommyhock, and all the natif niggers thay sed: "Wot a golly be dum busted ole frod that idle was, jest like the mitionary preacher sed."

Then the preacher went rite of and held a thanks given preech, and rote to his biship the joye news a bout the natif niggerses change of hart. But wen he cum back with a bole of wotter for to baptize em thay was all down on the their kances a worshipping the pig.

Pigs tails roasted is splendor than envy the day scooh book is the feller for me.

SAN RAFAEL, May 15, 1879.

THE SMARTEST MAN IN THE WORLD.

I am indebted for the following facts to my friend Fisher, of Boston, who arrived at Baden the day after Ignatieff, and was duly announced in the official list of strangers as "Herr Doctor Professor Fischer, mit Frau, Gattin, und Bed. Nordamerika." Fisher owed his title entirely to his spectacles.

One afternoon Fisher was standing on one of the little bridges that span the gutterwide Oosbach, idly gazing into the water, when the porter of the Badischer Hof came up to him on the run.

"Herr Doctor Professor!" cried the porter, touching his cap. "I pray you pardon, but the high born the Baron Savitch, out of Moscow, of the General Ignatieff's suite, suffers himself in a terrible fit, and appears to die."

In vain Fisher assured the porter that it was a mistake to consider him a medical expert; that he professed no science save that of draw poker; that if such an impression prevailed in the hotel it was through a blunder for which he was in no way responsible; and that, much as he regretted the unfortunate condition of the high born the Baron out of Moscow, he did not feel that his presence in the chamber of sickness would be of the slightest benefit. It was impossible to eradicate the idea that possessed the porter's mind. Finding himself fairly dragged toward the hotel, Fisher at length concluded to render his explanations to the Baron's friends.

The Russian's apartments were upon the second floor, not far from those occupied by Fisher. A French valet, almost beside himself with anxiety and undivided responsibility, came hurrying out of the room to meet the porter and the Doctor Professor. Fisher again attempted to explain, but to no purpose. The valet also had explanations to make, and the superior fluency of his French enabled him to monopolize the conversation. No, there was nobody there—nobody but himself, the faithful Auguste of the Baron. His Excellency, the General Ignatieff, his Highness, the Prince Koloff, Doctor Rapperschwyll, all the suite, all the world, had driven out that morning to Gernsbach. The Baron, meanwhile, had been seized with an effraying malady, and he, Auguste, was desolate with apprehension. He entreated Monsieur to lose no time in parley, but to hasten to the bedside of the Baron, who was already in the agonies of dissolution.

Fisher followed Auguste into the inner room. The Baron, in his boots, lay upon the bed, his body bent almost double by the unrelenting gripe of a distressful pain. His teeth were tightly clenched, and the rigid muscles around the mouth distorted the natural expression of his face. Every few seconds a prolonged groan escaped him. His fine eyes rolled piteously. Anon, he would press both hands upon his abdomen and shiver in every limb from his suffering.

Fisher forgot his explanations. Had he been a Doctor Professor in fact, he could not have watched the symptoms of the Baron's malady with greater interest.

"Can Monsieur preserve him?" whispered the terrified Auguste.

"Perhaps," said Fisher, dryly.

Fisher scribbled a note to his wife on the back of a card, and dispatched it in the care of the hotel porter. That functionary returned with great promptitude, bringing a black bottle and a glass. The bottle had come in Fisher's trunk to Baden all the way from Liverpool, had crossed the sea to Liverpool from Boston, and had journeyed to Boston direct from Bourbon County, Kentucky. Fisher seized it eagerly but reverently, and held it up against the light. There were still three inches or three inches and a half in the bottom. He uttered a grunt of pleasure.

"There is some hope of saving the Baron," he remarked to Auguste.

Fully one-half of the precious liquid was poured into the glass and administered without delay to the groaning, writhing patient. In a very few minutes Fisher had the satisfaction of seeing the Baron sit up in bed. The muscles around the mouth relaxed, and the expression of intense agony was superseded by a look of placid contentment.

Fisher now had an opportunity to observe the personal characteristics of the Russian Baron. He was a young man of about thirty-five, with exceedingly handsome and clear-cut features, but a peculiar head. The peculiarity of his head was that it seemed to be perfectly round on top—that is, its diameter from ear to ear appeared quite equal to its anterior and posterior diameter. The curious effect of this unusual conformation was rendered more striking by the absence of all hair. There was nothing on the Baron's head but a tightly-fitting skull cap of black silk. A very deceptive wig hung upon one of the bed posts.

Being sufficiently recovered to recognize the presence of a stranger, Savitch made a courteous inclination of the head.

"How do you find yourself now?" inquired Fisher, in bad French.

"Very much better, thanks to Monsieur," replied the Baron, in excellent English, uttered in a charming voice.

"Very much better, though I feel a certain dizziness here." And he pressed his hand to his forehead.

The valet withdrew at a sign from his master, and was followed by the porter. Fisher advanced to the bedside and took the Baron's wrist. Even his unpracticed touch detected the fact that his pulse was alarmingly high. He was much puzzled, and not a little uneasy at the turn which the affair had taken. "Have I got myself and the Russian into an infernal scrape?" he thought. "But no—he's well out of his teens, and half a tumbler of such whisky as that ought not to go to a baby's head."

Nevertheless, the new symptoms developed themselves with a rapidity and poignancy that made Fisher feel uncommonly anxious. Savitch's face became as white as marble—its paleness rendered startling by the sharp contrast of the black skull cap. His form reeled as he sat on the bed, and he clasped his head convulsively with both hands, as if in terror lest it should burst.

"I had better call your valet," said Fisher, nervously.

"No, no!" gasped the Baron. "You are a medical man, and I shall have to trust you. There is something—wrong—here," indicating the top of his head.

"But I am not—" stammered Fisher.

"No words!" exclaimed the Russian, imperiously. "Act at once—there must be no delay. Unscrew the top of my head!"

Savitch tore off his skull cap and flung it aside. Fisher was at once to describe the bewilderment with which he saw the actual fabric of the Baron's cranium. The skull cap had concealed the fact that the entire top of Savitch's head was a dome of polished silver.

"Unscrew it!" said Savitch again.

Fisher reluctantly placed both hands upon the silver skull and exerted a gentle pressure toward the left. The top yielded, turning easily and truly in its threads.

"Faster!" said the Baron, faintly. "I tell you no time must be lost." Then he swooned.

At this instant there was a sound of voices in the outer room, and the door leading into the Baron's bedchamber was violently flung open and as violently closed. The new comer was a short, spare man of middle age, with a keen visage, and piercing, deep set, little gray eyes. He stood for a few seconds, scrutinizing Fisher with a sharp, jealous regard.

The Baron recovered consciousness, and opened his eyes.

"Dr. Rapperschwyll!" he exclaimed.

Dr. Rapperschwyll, with a few rapid strides, approached the bed and confronted Fisher and Fisher's patient. "What is all this?" he angrily demanded.

Without waiting for a reply he laid his hand rudely upon Fisher's arm and pulled him away from the Baron. Fisher, more and more astonished, made no resistance, but suffered himself to be led, or pushed, toward the door. Dr. Rapperschwyll opened the door only wide enough to give the American exit, and then closed it with a vicious slam. A quick click informed Fisher that the key had turned in the lock.

The next morning Fisher met Savitch coming from the Trinkhalle. The Baron bowed with cold politeness and passed on. Later in the day a valet de place handed to Fisher a small parcel with the message: "Dr. Rapperschwyll supposes that this will be sufficient." The parcel contained two gold pieces of twenty marks.

Fisher gritted his teeth. "He shall have back his forty marks," he muttered to himself. "But I will have his confounded secret in return."

Then Fisher discovered that even a Polish countess has her uses in the social economy.

Mrs. Fisher's table d'hôte friend was amiability itself, when approached by Fisher (through Fisher's wife) on the subject of the Baron Savitch of Moscow. Know anything about the Baron Savitch? Of course she did.

The Baron Savitch was not of an old creation. There was a mystery about his origin that had never been satisfactorily solved in St. Petersburg or in Moscow. It was said by some that he was a foundling from the Vospitatelni Dom. Others believed him to be the unacknowledged son of a certain illustrious personage nearly related to the House of Romanoff.

Rapid and brilliant beyond precedent his career had been. He entered the diplomatic service of the Czar, and was attached for several years to the legations at Vienna, London, and Paris. Created a Baron before his twenty-fifth year for the wonderful ability displayed in the conduct of negotiations of supreme importance and delicacy with the House of Hapsburg, he became a pet of Gortchakoff's, and was given every opportunity for the exercise of his genius in diplomacy.

It was even said in well-informed circles at St. Petersburg that the guiding mind which directed Russia's course throughout the entire Eastern complication, which planned the campaign on the Danube, effected the combinations, and gave victory to the Czar's soldiers, and which meanwhile held Austria aloof, neutralized the immense power of Germany, and exasperated England only to the point where wrath expended itself in harmless threats, was the brain of the young Baron Savitch. It was certain that he had been with Ignatieff at Constantinople when the trouble was first fomented, with Schouvaloff in England at the time of the secret conference agreement, with the Grand Duke Nicholas at Adrianople when the protocol of an armistice was signed, and would soon be in Berlin behind the scenes of the Congress, where it was expected that he would outwit the statesmen of all Europe, and play with Bismarck and Disraeli as a strong man plays with two kicking babies.

His influence with the Czar himself was supposed to be unbounded. It was whispered that he knew better than any other man the true reason of the disgust with which the Grand Duchess Louise completed her nuptials with the British Prince. Certainly, birth apart, he was considered the best parti in Russia. From poverty, and by the sheer force of intellect, he made himself a man of colossal fortune. Report gave him 40,000,000 roubles, and doubtless report did not exceed the fact. Every speculative enterprise which he undertook, and they were many and various, was carried to sure success by the same qualities of cool, unerring judgment, far-reaching sagacity, and apparently superhuman power of organizing, combining, and controlling, which made him in politics the phenomenon of the age.

Fortified with this information, Fisher felt better prepared to grapple with Rapperschwyll for the possession of the secret. For five days he lay in wait for the Swiss physician. On the sixth day the desired opportunity unexpectedly presented itself.

Half way up the Mercuriusberg, late in the afternoon, he encountered the guardian of the ruined tower coming down.

The upper part of this tower is in a dilapidated condition. The lack of a stairway to the summit is supplied by a temporary wooden ladder. Fisher's head and shoulders were hardly through the trap that opens to the platform before he discovered that a man who was already there was the man whom he sought. Dr. Rapperschwyll was studying the topography of the Black Forest through a pair of field glasses.

Fisher announced his arrival by an opportune stumble and a noisy effort to recover himself, at the same time aiming a stealthy kick at the topmost round of the ladder, and scrambling ostentatiously over the edge of the trap. The ladder went down thirty or forty feet with a racket.

Dr. Rapperschwyll immediately appreciated the situation. He turned sharply around, and remarked with a sneer: "Monsieur is unaccountably awkward." Then he scowled and showed his teeth, for he recognized Fisher.

"It is rather unfortunate," said the Bostonian.

The Swiss coldly bowed, and resumed his topographical studies. Fisher lighted a cigar.

"I desire," continued Fisher, "to avail myself of the opportunity to return forty marks of yours, which reached me, I presume, by a mistake."

"If Monsieur the American physician was not satisfied with his fee," rejoined Rapperschwyll, venomously, "he can without doubt have the matter adjusted by applying to the Baron's valet."

Fisher paid no attention to this thrust, but calmly laid the gold pieces upon the parapet directly under the nose of the Swiss.

"I could not think of accepting a fee," he said, with deliberate emphasis. "I was abundantly rewarded for my trifling services by the novelty and interest of the case."

The Swiss scanned the American's countenance long and steadily with his keen little gray eyes. At length he said:

"Monsieur is a man of science?"

"Yes."

"Then," continued Dr. Rapperschwyll, "Monsieur will perhaps acknowledge that a more beautiful case of trepanning has rarely come under his observation."

Fisher slightly raised his eyebrows.

"And Monsieur will also understand, being a physician," continued Dr. Rapperschwyll, "the sensitiveness of the Baron himself, and of his friends, upon the subject. He will therefore pardon my rudeness at the time of his discovery."

"He is smarter than I supposed," thought Fisher. "He holds all the cards, while I have nothing—nothing, except a tolerably strong nerve when it comes to a game of bluff. So here goes."

"I deeply regret that sensitiveness," he continued, aloud, "for it had occurred to me that an accurate account of what I saw, published in one of the scientific journals of England or America, would excite wide attention, and no doubt be received with interest on the Continent."

"What you saw?" cried the Swiss, quickly and sharply. "It is false. You saw nothing; when I entered you had not even removed the—"

Here he stopped short and muttered to himself, as if cursing his own impetuosity. Fisher celebrated his advantage by tossing away his half burned cigar and lighting a fresh one.

"Since you compel me to be frank," Dr. Rapperschwyll went on, with visibly increasing nervousness, "I will inform you that the Baron has assured me that you saw nothing. I interrupted you in the act of removing the silver cap."

"I will be equally frank," replied Fisher, stiffening his face for a final effort. "On that point the Baron is not a competent witness. He was in a state of unconsciousness for some time before you entered. Perhaps I was removing the silver cap when you interrupted me—"

Dr. Rapperschwyll turned pale.

"And, perhaps," continued Fisher, "I was replacing it."

The suggestion of this possibility seemed to strike Rapperschwyll like a sudden thunderbolt from the clouds. His knees parted, and he almost sank to the floor. He put his hands before his eyes and wept like a child. "He will publish it! He will publish it to the court and to the world!" he cried, hysterically. "And at this crisis—"

"If any sum that you may name will—"

Fisher cut the proposition short with a laugh.

"Then," said Rapperschwyll, "if—I throw myself on your generosity—"

"Well?" said Fisher.

"And ask a promise, on your honor, of absolute silence concerning what you have seen?"

"Silence until such time as the Baron Savitch shall have ceased to exist?"

"That will suffice," said Rapperschwyll. "For when he ceases to exist I die. And your conditions?"

"The whole story, here and now, and without reservation."

"It is a terrible price to ask of me," said Rapperschwyll, "but larger interests than my pride are at stake. You shall hear the story."

"I was bred a watchmaker in the Canton of Zurich. It is not a matter of vanity when I say that I achieved a marvelous degree of skill in the craft. I developed a faculty of invention that led me into a series of experiments regarding the capabilities of purely mechanical combinations. I studied and improved upon the best automata ever constructed by human ingenuity. Babbage's calculating machine especially interested me. I saw in Babbage's idea the germ of something infinitely more important to the world."

"Then I threw up my business and went to Paris to study physiology. I spent three years at the Sorbonne, and perfected myself in that branch of knowledge. Meanwhile my pursuits had extended far beyond the purely physical sciences. Psychology engaged me for a time; and then I ascended into the domain of sociology, which, when adequately understood, is the summary and final application of all knowledge."

"It was after years of preparation, and as the outcome of all my studies, that the great idea of my life, which had vaguely haunted me ever since the Zurich days, assumed at last a well-defined and perfect form."

"My experiments in mechanism had resulted in a machine which went far beyond Babbage's in its powers of calculation. Given the data, there was no limit to the possibilities in this direction. Babbage's cogwheels and pinions calculated logarithms, calculated an eclipse. It was fed with figures, and produced results in figures. Now, the relations of cause and effect are as fixed and unalterable as the laws of arithmetic. Logic is, or should be, as exact a science as mathematics. My new machine was fed with facts, and produced conclusions. In short, it reasoned, and the results of its reasoning were always true, while the results of human reasoning are often, if not always, false. The source of error in human logic is what the philosophers call the 'personal equation.' My machine eliminated the personal equation; it proceeded from cause to effect, from premise to conclusion with steady precision. The human intellect is fallible; my machine was, and is, infallible in its processes."

"Again, physiology and anatomy had taught me the fallacy of the medical superstition which holds the gray matter of the brain and the vital principle to be inseparable. I had seen men living with pistol balls imbedded in the medulla oblongata. I had seen the hemispheres and the cerebellum removed from the crania of birds and small animals, and yet they did not die. I believed that, though the brain were to be removed from the human skull, the subject would not die, although he would certainly be divested of the intelligence which governed all save the purely reflex actions of his body."

"Once more: a profound study of history from the sociological point of view, and a not inconsiderable experience with practical human nature, had convinced me that the greatest geniuses that ever existed were on a plane not so very far removed above the level of average intellect. The grandest peaks in my native country, those which all the world knows by name, tower only a few hundred feet above the countless unnamed peaks that surround them. Napoleon

Bonaparte towered only a little over the ablest men around him. Yet that little was everything, and he overran Europe. A man who surpassed Napoleon, as Napoleon surpassed Murat, in the mental qualities which transmute thought into fact, would have made himself supreme master of the world.

"Now, to fuse these three propositions into one: suppose that I take a man, and, by removing the brain that enshrines all the errors and failures of his ancestors away back to the origin of the race, remove all sources of weakness in his future career. Suppose that, in place of the fallible intellect which I have removed, I endow him with an artificial intellect that operates with the certainty of universal laws. Suppose that I launch this superior being, who reasons truly, into the hurly burly of his inferiors, who reason falsely, and await the inevitable result with the calmness of a philosopher.

"Monsieur, you have my secret. That is precisely what I have done. In Moscow, where my friend Dr. Duchat had charge of the new institution of St. Vasil for hopeless idiots, I found a boy of eleven whom they called Stépan Borovitch. Since he was born he had not seen, heard, spoken, or thought. Nature had granted him, it was believed, a fraction of the sense of smell, and perhaps a fraction of the sense of taste, but of even this there was no positive ascertainment. Nature had walled in his soul most effectually. Occasional inarticulate murmurings, and an incessant knitting and kneading of the fingers, were his only manifestations of energy. On bright days they would place him in a little rocking-chair, in some spot where the sun fell warm, and he would rock to and fro for hours, working his slender fingers and mumbling forth his satisfaction at the warmth in the plaintive and unvarying refrain of idiocy.

"I begged Stépan Borovitch of my good friend Dr. Duchat. If that excellent man had not long since died he should have shared in my triumph. I took Stépan to my home and plied the saw and the knife. I could operate on that poor, worthless, useless, hopeless travesty of humanity as fearlessly and as recklessly as upon a dog bought or caught for vivisection. That was a little more than twenty years ago. To-day Stépan Borovitch wields more power than any other man on the face of the earth. In ten years he will be the autocrat of Europe, the master of the world. He never errs; for the machine that reasons beneath his silver skull never makes a mistake.

"Dreamers have speculated on the possibility of finding among the ruins of the older civilizations some brief inscription which shall change the foundations of human knowledge. Wiser men deride the dream, and laugh at the idea of scientific kabbala. The wiser men are fools. Suppose that Aristotle had discovered on a cuneiform covered tablet at Nineveh the few words, 'Survival of the Fittest.' Philosophy would have gained twenty-two hundred years. I will give you in almost as few words a truth equally pregnant. The ultimate evolution of the creature is into the creator. Perhaps it will be twenty-two hundred years before the truth finds general acceptance, yet it is none the less a truth. The Baron Savitch is my creature, and I am his creator—creator of the ablest man in Europe, the ablest man in the world.

"Here is our ladder, Monsieur. Remember your promise."

After a two months' tour of Switzerland and the Italian lakes, the Fishers found themselves at the Hotel Splendide, in Paris, surrounded by people from the States. It was a relief to Fisher, after his somewhat bewildering experience at Baden, to be once more among those who discriminated between a straight flush and a crooked straight. It was particularly agreeable for him to find at the hotel, in a party of Easterners who had come over to see the Exposition, Miss Bella Ward, of Portland, a pretty, and bright girl, affianced to his best friend in Boston.

With much less pleasure, Fisher learned that the Baron Savitch was in Paris, fresh from the Berlin Congress, and that he was the lion of the hour with the select few who read between the written lines of politics and knew the dummies of diplomacy from the real players in the tremendous game. Dr. Rapperschwyll was not with the Baron. He was detained in Switzerland, at the deathbed of his aged mother.

This last piece of information was welcome to Fisher. The more he reflected upon the interview on the Mercuriusberg, the more strongly he felt it to be his intellectual duty to persuade himself that the whole affair was an illusion, not a reality. He would have been glad, even at the sacrifice of his confidence in his own astuteness, to believe that the Swiss doctor had been amusing himself at the expense of his credulity. But the remembrance of the scene in the Baron's bedroom at the Badischer Hof was too vivid to leave the slightest ground for this theory. He was obliged to be content with the thought that he would soon place the broad Atlantic between himself and a creature so unnatural, so dangerous, so monstrously impossible as the Baron Savitch.

The ladies of the American party met the Russian Baron at a ball in the new Continental Hotel. They were charmed with his handsome face, his refinement of manner, his intelligence and wit. They met him again at the American Minister's, and, to Fisher's unspeakable consternation, the acquaintance thus established began to make rapid progress in the direction of intimacy. Baron Savitch became a frequent visitor at the Hotel Splendide.

Fisher does not like to dwell upon this period. For a month his peace of mind was rent alternately by apprehension and disgust. He is compelled to admit that the Baron's demeanor toward himself was most friendly, although no allusion was made on either side to the incident at Baden. But the knowledge that no good could come to his friends from this association with a being in whom the moral principle had no doubt been supplanted by a system of cog gear, kept him continually in a state of distraction. He would gladly have explained to his American friends the true character of the Russian, that he was a monster whose very existence must even be revolting to right-minded persons with brains of honest gray and white. But the solemn promise to Dr. Rapperschwyll sealed his lips.

A trifling incident suddenly opened his eyes to the alarming character of the situation, and filled his heart with a new horror.

One evening, a few days before the date designated for the departure of the Boston party from Havre for home, Fisher happened to enter the private parlor which was, by common consent, the headquarters of the Americans of his set. At first he thought that the room was unoccupied. Soon he perceived, in the recess of a window, and partly obscured by the drapery of the curtain, the forms of the Baron Savitch and Miss Ward of Portland. They did not observe his entrance. Miss Ward's hand was in the Baron's hand, and she was looking up into his handsome face with an expression which Fisher could not misinterpret.

Fisher coughed, and, going to another window, pretended to be interested in affairs on the Boulevard. The couple emerged from the recess. Miss Ward's face was ruddy with confusion, and she immediately withdrew. Not a sign of embarrassment was visible on the Baron's countenance.

Fisher pitied, but could not blame, the young lady. He believed her still loyal at heart to her Boston engagement. He knew that her loyalty could not be shaken by the blandishments of any man on earth. He recognized the fact that she was under the spell of a power more than human. Yet what would be the outcome? He could not tell her all; his promise bound him. It would be useless to appeal to the generosity of the Baron; no human sentiment governed his inexorable purposes. Must the affair drift on while he stood tied and helpless? Must this charming and innocent girl be sacrificed to the transient whim of an automaton? Allowing that the Baron's intentions were of the most honorable character, was the situation any less horrible? Marry a machine! His own loyalty to his friend in Boston, his regard for Miss Ward, called on him to act with promptness.

And, apart from all private interest, did he not owe a plain duty to society, to the liberties of the world? Was Savitch to be permitted to proceed in the career laid out for him by his creator, Dr. Rapperschwyll? He (Fisher) was the only man in the world in a position to thwart the ambitious programme. Was there ever a greater need of a Brutus?

Between doubts and fears, the last days of Fisher's stay in Paris were wretched beyond description. On the morning of the steamer day he had almost made up his mind to act.

The train for Havre departed at noon, and at eleven o'clock the Baron Savitch made his appearance at the Hotel Splendide to bid farewell to his American friends. Fisher watched Miss Ward closely. There was a constraint in her manner which fortified his resolution. The Baron incidentally remarked that he should make it his duty and pleasure to visit America within a few months, and that he hoped then to renew the acquaintance now interrupted. As Savitch spoke, Fisher observed that his eyes met Miss Ward's, while the slightest possible blush colored her cheeks. Fisher knew that the case demanded a desperate remedy.

He now joined the ladies of the party in urging the Baron to remain and partake with them of the hasty lunch that was to precede the drive to the station. Savitch gladly accepted the cordial invitation. Wine he politely but firmly declined, pleading the absolute prohibition of his physician. Fisher left the room for an instant, and returned with the black bottle which had figured in the Baden episode.

"The Baron," he said, "has already expressed his approval of the noblest of our American products, and he knows that this beverage has good medical indorsement." So saying, he poured the remaining contents of the Kentucky bottle into a glass, and presented it to the Baron.

Savitch hesitated. His previous experience with the nectar was at the same time a temptation and a warning, yet he did not wish to seem discourteous. A chance remark from Miss Ward decided him.

"The Baron," she said, with a smile, "will certainly not refuse to wish us bon voyage in the American fashion."

Savitch drained the glass, and the conversation turned to other matters. The carriages were already below. The parting compliments were being made, when Savitch suddenly pressed his hands to his forehead and clutched at the back of a chair. The ladies gathered around him in alarm.

"It is nothing," he said, faintly; "a mere temporary dizziness."

"There is no time to be lost," said Fisher, pressing forward. "The train leaves in twenty minutes. Get ready at once, I will meanwhile attend to your friend."

Fisher hurriedly led the Baron to his own bedroom. Savitch fell back upon the bed. The Baden symptoms were repeated. In two minutes the Russian was unconscious.

Fisher looked at his watch. He had three minutes to spare. He turned the key in the lock and touched the knob of the electric annunciator.

Then, gaining the mastery of his nerves by one supreme effort for self-control, Fisher pulled the deceptive wig and the black skull cap from the Baron's head. "Heaven forgive me if I am making a fearful mistake!" he thought. "But I believe it to be best for ourselves and for the world." Rapidly, yet with a steady hand, he unscrewed the silver dome. The mechanism lay exposed to his startled eyes. The Baron groaned. Ruthlessly Fisher tore out the wondrous machine. He had no time and no inclination to examine it. He caught up a newspaper that lay upon the floor and hastily enfolded it. He thrust the bundle into his open traveling bag. Then he screwed the silver top firmly upon the Baron's head, and replaced the skull cap and the wig.

All this was done before the servant answered the bell. "The Baron Savitch is ill," said Fisher to the attendant when he came. "There is no cause for alarm. Send at once to the Hotel de l'Athénée for his valet, Auguste." In twenty seconds Fisher was in a cab, whirling toward the Station St. Lazare.

When the steamship Pereire was well out at sea, with Ushant five hundred miles in her wake, and countless fathoms of water beneath her keel, Fisher took a newspaper parcel from his traveling bag. His teeth were firm set and his lips rigid. He carried the heavy parcel to the side of the ship and dropped it into the Atlantic. It made a little eddy in the smooth water, and sank out of sight. Fisher fancied that he heard a wild despairing cry, and put his hands to his ears to shut out the sound. A gull came circling over the steamer—the cry may have been the gull's.

Fisher felt a light touch upon his arm. He turned quickly around. Miss Ward was standing at his side, close to the rail.

"Bless me, how white you are!" she said. "What in the world have you been doing?"

"I have been preserving the liberties of two continents," slowly replied Fisher, "and perhaps saving your own peace of mind."

"Indeed!" said she; "and how have you done that?"

"I have done it," was Fisher's grave answer, "by throwing overboard the Baron Savitch."

Miss Ward burst into a ringing laugh. "You are sometimes too droll, Mr. Fisher," she said.

"Knocking."

"Behold, I stand at the door and knock!"

Knocking, knocking, ever knocking!
Who is there?

'Tis a pilgrim, strange and kingly,
Never such was seen before;
Ah, sweet soul, for such a wonder,
Undo the door!

No! That door is hard to open;
Hinges rusty, latch is broken;

Bid him go.
Wherefore, with that knocking dreary,
Scare the sleep from one so weary?
Say Him, no.

Knocking, knocking, ever knocking!
What! Still there?

O sweet soul, but once behold Him,
With the glory-crowned hair,
And those eyes so true and tender,
Waiting there!
Open, open, once behold Him—
Him so fair!

Ah, that door! Why wilt thou vex me—
Coming ever to perplex me?
For the key is stiffly rusty,
And the bolt is clogged and dusty;
Many fingered ivy vine
Seals it fast with twist and twine;
Weeks of years and years before
Choke the passage of that door.

Knocking, knocking! What, still knocking?
He still there?

What's the hour? The night is waning;
In my heart a dream complaining.
And a chilly, sad unrest.
Ah, this knocking! It disturbs me—
Scares my sleep with dreams unblest.
Give me rest—
Rest—ah, rest!

Rest, dear soul, He longs to give thee.
Thou hast only dreamed of pleasure,
Dreamed of gifts and golden treasure,
Dreamed of jewels in thy keeping—
Waked to weariness of weeping.
Open to thy soul's one Lover,
And thy night of dreams is over;
The true gifts He brings have seeming
More than all thy faded dreaming.

Did she open? Doth she—will she?
So, as wondering we behold,
Grows the picture to a sign,
Pressed upon your soul and mine;
For in every breast that liveth
Is that strange, mysterious door—
The forsaken and betwined,
Ivy-garled and weed bejangled,
Dusty, rusty, and forgotten.
There the pierced hand still knocketh,
And with ever patient watching,
With the sad eyes true and tender,
With the glory-crowned hair,
Still a God is waiting there.

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

Murillo's Trance:

"Here, Pedro, while I quench these candles, hold
My lantern: for, I promise you, we burn
No wax-lights at our chapel shrines till morn,
As in the great cathedral, kept ablaze
Like any crowded plaza in Seville,
From sun to sun. I wonder if they think
That the dead knights—Fernando and the rest—
Whose bronze and marble couches line the walls,
Like to scared children, can not sleep 'till the dark;"

And muttering thus, the churchwarden
Went, snuffing out the lights that only served
To worsen the wan gloom.
And (mindful still
Of his Dolores' greed of candle-ends)
He chid, at whiles, some lagging worshiper,
Nor spared to hint, above the low-dropped heads,
Grumbings of sunshine being in Seville
Cleverer than wax-light, and 'twere best to pray
When all the saints were broad awake, and thus Liker to hear.

So, shuffling on, he neared
The altar with its single lamp alight.
Above, touched with its glow, the chapel's pride,
Its one Ribera, hung—a fearful-sad,
Soul-harrowing picture of the stark dead Christ,
Stretched on the cross beneath a ghastly glare
Of lurid rift, that made more terrible
The God forsaken loneliness. In front,
A chasm of shadow clove the checkered floor,
And, hastening toward it, the old verger called Wonderingly back:

"Why, Pedro, only see!
The boy kneels still. What ails him, think you? Here
He came long hours before the vesper chime;
And all the while, as to and fro I've wrought,
Cleansing of altar-steps and dusting shrines
And such like tasks, I have not missed him once
From that same spot. What marvel if he were
Some lunatic escaped from Caridad?
Observe, he takes no heed of what I say;
'Tis time he waked."

As moveless as the statues
Niched round, a youth before the picture knelt,
His hands tight clenched, and his moist forehead strewn
With tossings of dank hair. Upon his arm
The rude old man sprang such a sudden grasp
As caused a start, while in his ear he cried
Sharply, "Get hence! What do you here so late?"

Slow on the questioner a face was turned
That caused the heavy hand to drop; a face
Strangely pathetic, with wide-gazing eyes
And wistful brows, and lips that wanly made
Essay to speak before the words would come;
And an imploring lifting of the hands
That seemed a prayer:

"I wait, I wait," he said,
"Till Joseph bring the linen, pure and white,
Till Mary fetch the spices; till they come—
Peter and John and all the holy women—
And take Him down. But oh, they tarry long!
See how the darkness grows! So long—so long!"

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MAY 17, 1879.

The new Constitution is now the organic law of California, made so by the votes of a majority of the people, but not by a majority of the brains or the wealth of the State. If this organic law is set in operation by the legislation of the people who voted for it—and by this we mean the brainless and propertyless majority—it will prove a most disastrous affair. If in the coming election a judiciary is chosen from the class of idiot pettifoggers who have identified themselves with this agrarian movement, and upon them devolves the judicial interpretation of the organic law and the acts of legislation giving it force, the condition of things will be doubly disastrous. If, in addition to this agrarian Legislature and agrarian judiciary we allow an incendiary Governor to assume executive control of our political affairs, our position will be truly deplorable. All these things may be averted by a united and harmonious action of intelligent men who have the courage and the nerve to act with prompt decision. If we secure a good Legislature, and obtain men of integrity, character, and legal learning as Judges of our Courts, and obtain an able and discreet Governor, with honest men in the other departments of our State and city governments, all will go well. This is the thing we would do: First, bring about an affiliation of all citizens who propose to range themselves upon the side of good government. If this can be done by preserving the Republican party organization, and making the fight under that party banner, we would prefer to do so; but if any considerable number of good Democrats are unwilling to make that sacrifice, we would so far concede to their prejudices as to meet them half way in concessions, and organize the Republican party upon such a basis as would embrace all who love this country better than any other, and all who think that intelligence, integrity, patriotism, law, and property are more desirable than ignorance, vice, disorder, and criminal idleness. Intelligence, property, industry, and the preservation of social order should be the platform. It should embrace the intelligent, the religious, the moral, the decent, the frugal, and the law-abiding. It should draw the lines distinctly and clearly between the respectable and the disorderly classes. The poor man, who wants work, should feel that it invited him to membership. The rich man should find in it protection for his honestly acquired millions. It should be the party of law. After having placed a ticket in the field, we would elect that ticket by the expenditure and exercise of every honorable exertion that brains and money could put forth.

The duty becomes apparent: at the next election every elector who has the intelligence to understand the political condition, and the honest desire to do that which shall be for the best interest of the State, must for the time lay aside party prejudices, and be willing to fight the battle side by side with all who are endeavoring to attain the same political result. And now we shall see whether principle and love of the State can triumph over the selfish and baser sentiments that too often govern party association. We shall see whether the professional politician, who never rises above the consideration of the emoluments and opportunities of office, will have the ability to compel the honest and intelligent parts of two great organizations to keep apart. If we are not numskulls, doddypoles, and dunderheads, we will come together as a tax-payers', or citizens', or a people's party, uniting the property-owning, the industrious, and the respectable classes into one solid and irresistible party organization. It is most transparent nonsense for anybody to attempt to keep this class apart in the coming election. There is no principle involved other than a desire to secure intelligent legislators, learned and faithful judges, and honest and competent State and city officials. We will give a silver cup to any one who will answer this conundrum: In what does Republicanism or Democracy differ in reference to the administration of municipal government? How this organization or union is to be brought about it is not our province to determine. That the union of the two parties must be accomplished in order to render the result of the election certain is an admitted fact; and this union must be so arranged that neither party shall carry from the result any advantage over the other for the next Presidential election. If the Republican party seeks this alliance, it must be so formed that the Democrats will not feel that they are giving themselves away for the next campaign. It must be an alliance for this fight, and upon honorable terms. The Republican party is perhaps, under the circumstances, entitled to the leading officers. So far as we are personally concerned, we would not be disposed to be very particular, for personally we do not care what are the party affiliations or the party antecedents of any person whom (possessing the Jeffersonian qualifications) we desire to discharge the duties of official position.

We certainly ought not to be divided in choosing a judicial ticket. Let us, for instance, nominate the following gentlemen as Judges of the Supreme Court of California, and then challenge the Kearney party to improve upon it: For Chief Justice, Joseph P. Hoge; for Associate Justices, A. L. Rhodes, E. W. McKinstry, Jackson Temple, I. S. Belcher, James Thornton, A. P. Catlin. There are three Republicans, three Democrats, and one Independent. Three are Southern men, and four are from the North. Four are from the interior, and three from this city, and all are men learned, experienced, and honorable. In their professional, judicial, and social duties they are clean and pure. Would any Democrat or Republican feel that he had compromised his party standing by casting such a vote? Would not the honest men who voted for the new Constitution feel that its interpretation might be left with confidence with such a bench? Would not the farmer of Sonoma County, who voted for the new organic law, recognize in Judge Temple a faithful expounder of its provisions? Would anybody in the northern section question the ability or integrity of Judge Belcher? Would not the men of both parties in the great interior valley admit the integrity and judicial fairness of Judge Catlin? Rhodes and McKinstry have made their records on the Supreme bench. Mr. Thornton is favorably known at the bar of San Francisco, while there is probably not a practicing lawyer in this State that would not recognize in Colonel Hoge a peculiar fitness for the position we have assigned him. In this city and elsewhere in the State, for Supreme and other Judges, there would be no embarrassment in uniting. It will be conceded by all parties that Judges Blake, Myrick, Wright, Freelon, and several of our District Judges, are fairly entitled to renomination. Whatever arguments can be adduced for political offices there is surely no reason why we can not unite on the judicial.

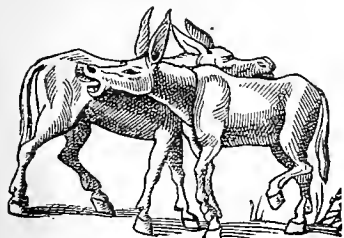

Let us agree, Republicans and Democrats, that for the next four months we will confine ourselves to local politics, and put the Presidential discussion that far into the future. Do not let us embarrass our local issues by interrupting them with Federal politics. In a short time General Grant will visit us, and from the East a cloud of politicians will come to proclaim him the third time a nominee for Presidential honors. We have but little doubt that he will be the Republican nominee. Whether he will or will not become a third time President of the United States depends much upon this coming California State election. The adoption of our new Constitution has sent a thrill of fear throughout the republic. It is accepted in other States as the first agrarian step. It is regarded as heralding the possibility of a national triumph of the discontented classes. It has sounded the alarm to conservatism, and awakened an apprehension of danger to the republic. The prophecy of Macaulay rings in the national ear. A doubt of the permanence of republican government in this country is beginning to be entertained. Are men capable of self-government? Is the universal elective franchise so great a boon? Should ignorance, vice, poverty, and idleness have voice in the direction of government? These questions are being whispered abroad, and with them goes the haunting terror of disorder, violence, and misrule. Then comes the thought of strong government—a government that can and will repress disorder by the strong military arm. With this thought is associated the name of General Grant, the man who is implacable as destiny, cold as fate, and as unsympathetic as the grave; the man who can look upon oceans of blood and not faint. We hope the time has not come in the history of this commonwealth of freemen when we need such a man; we hope the time has not come when the civil power shall become subservient to the military. We pray God that this crisis, this fever of discontent, this speck of class revolt, may pass away from us; that this cloud now gathering in our political firmament may not burst upon our land, carrying with it destruction and subversion of our free institutions. But if it must come, if it has come, if California is to be the first lost battle in the skirmish line of this impending conflict, let us know it now; let us be prepared for it; let us proclaim Augustus; let us place our armed cohorts in battle line; let us have one decisive, long-continued struggle against these alien heresies that have been imported to our country from abroad; let us organize our native-born Americans in the front line of battle, asking those foreigners who love liberty, order, property, and peace to become our auxiliaries and help us to fight the battle of freedom. Let us in this struggle and in the dark night that is settling down upon us put none but Americans, and those adopted allies who have the passwords of intelligence, property, patriotism, on guard.

The loss of this fall's election in California will make Grant President. This fall's election ought not to be lost, and must not be. There should be such a struggle made as will leave no voter unadvised of the importance of the issue and no elector not fully impressed with the consequences likely to follow the political result. This campaign should be an intellectual one; it should be an appeal to the judgment of the thinking classes. To every farm-house and work-shop should be carried the argument of reason. It is not and should not be a money fight. It should be so calmly conducted, and so honorably, that it would leave every demagogue, American tramp, and foreign-born agitator, every ignorant, time-serving, idle, vicious vagabond, to array himself in accordance with his inclinations, and leave every intelligent, honest, honorable, property-owning citizen—foreign or native-born, Northern or Southern, Democratic or Republican—to form a complete political union, a union for self-defense to secure a government of self-defense. Let the lines be drawn distinctly and clearly marked. If good citizens are in a minority let us know it now. Such a line and such a course of political conduct will bring to the union alliance thousands of good citizens who voted for the new Constitution. It will bring all the business men and property-owners of San Francisco. It will bring the great mass of the American-born farmers. It will bring ex-Senator Cole, ex-Governor Downey, William A. Piper, O. C. Pratt, Henry M. Naglee, Samuel Soule, John C. Merrill, Alexander Campbell, Charles Tuttle, Hale of Placer, Doctor Grattan of San Joaquin, Doctor Shurtleff of Napa, Egbert Mott and Paul Morrill of Sacramento, and all other well-intentioned gentlemen who are not after office and who do not come within Kearney's very appropriate designation of "blatant blatherskites" and "honorable bilks."

Kearney stands out in honorable contrast with some of the political vermin that he has hatched from the sand-lot. He shows a becoming spirit when he resents the whispered slanders of his own creatures. When Denis Kearney took up David S. Terry and Volney E. Howard, and breathed into their dead political carcasses the breath of a new life, it ill becomes them—either of them—question the integrity or ability of Kearney. When the "blatant blatherskite" and "honorable bilk" (as Kearney calls Terry) denounces him as "the cowed and beaten dunghill of the political barnyard whom anybody may whip," Kearney has a right to resent it, and when he remembers how Judge Terry came into the Workingmen's party, and into the Constitutional Convention, he has a right to question his motives. He has a right to review Judge Terry and the past acts of his most eventful life, and at least demand that he be not assaulted, nor vilified, nor ridiculed by this Southern gentleman. While we utterly despise Kearney, and would hold our nose from every open pore of his unpleasant carcass, and stop our ears at every utterance of his ignorant and blasphemous mouth, we esteem him as a better man than the Honorable David S. Terry. The following extract from one of his sand-lot speeches stamps Kearney as a leader. He is the only leader the movement has brought forth, and we will now make the prophecy that the Chronicle and the "blatant blatherskites" and the "honorable bilks," who think to sit down upon Kearney, steal his thunder, and obtain from the Workingmen's movement the loot of small advertisements and office, will find themselves in a tight place before they attain their ends. Kearney, in the speech referred to, says: "Recollect that our interests will be the emancipation of 'labor. Recollect that we are working for ourselves, our 'families, and our children. Recollect that we must and 'shall win, as a party, with flying colors. Now, as the 'smoke of battle has cleared away, it would be well to criticize the actions of some of the speakers who advocated the 'Constitution, and I will take this opportunity of chastising 'Judge Terry for coming into the city and county of San 'Francisco to advocate corruption. Judge Terry came here 'on the public platform and advocated the taking of money. 'Now, it becomes my duty as a reformer to characterize 'such language as a disgrace to the reformers of the nineteenth century. A man that will take money, and go back 'on the man that paid him the money, is a worse man than 'a man that will take money and vote for the man that paid 'him the money. This is bad language, bad doctrine, and 'no honest, pure-minded man will ever advocate such a doctrine as that. My friends, the men who do it in the future 'must be spit upon and treated with contempt. Again, some 'of the men who were advocating the new Constitution, and 'who are now advocating the new party, as far as I am individually concerned I say I would rather a thousand times 'vote for Leland Stanford as Governor of California than I 'would for four-fifths of the blatant blatherskites who advocate the new Constitution outside of the Workingmen's 'party.' We can find some place of sympathy for a workingman. He is ignorant; he sees wrongs he can not right, and evils he can not remedy; he strikes blindly, wildly, like the beast that is hurt, but he may be honest in his passion; but for the educated, intelligent, political demagogues, like Terry, Howard, Estee, Love, Van Dyke, and other honorable bilks, we have neither respect nor compliments.

PRATTLE.

A reformer endowed with the faculty divine of sight would forsake his cause; but when Zeal touches his lips with a living coal from the altar, Enthusiasm finds it a convenient season for warming the wax to set her seal upon his eyes. He is born with the words locus sigilli upon his eyelids, and of such is the kingdom of Temperance. Mr. Francis Murphy proudly explains that in New York, last fall, thousands of habitual drunkards (he has the unkindness to call them "old toppers") "signed the pledge;" and he confidently expects to find on his return thither that "the Demon Drink" has received "a fatal blow"—wounded in the house of his friends, as it were. I really do not know what that immortal would do without his fatal blow regularly administered; he would miss it as a toper his pledge, or Mr. Murphy his toper.

It would probably be impossible to convince Mr. Murphy that it is an almost universal truth that the man who signs the pledge—except for the sake of example—is the man who is about to be acutely drunk. Nor would it profit him to know that the Temperance people of all ages have "confidently expected" to outlive the Demon Drink. They lay about them right sturdily; they exalt their voices; they brandish the tongue. Smitten hip and thigh, the hosts of King Alcohol go down before them. They fall in the hour of victory, die smiling, and the world gets as drunk as a lord in their wake.

There is but one miracle—the hopefulness of reformers. I knew a man in England (an educated gentleman, the editor of a newspaper) who believed the time was near when every person in that country would be a teetotaler. He proved it by the statistics of the Good Templars, showing that the membership of that worthy order was increasing in a geometrical ratio. It was easy to figure out the date when the last Englishman would become a Good Templar. I lied to that philosopher: I told him that in America we had the Ancient and Honorable Order of Hibiscans—an association of red-headed men. It was established in 1870. In 1871 it had 1,000 members; in 1872 there were 5,000, and 25,000 in 1873. I flatter myself that I proved by figures, before his eyes, that in the year 1877 every American would be red-headed.

If history is anything but an idle record of unserviceable happenings—bootless facts and incidents without meaning—the crime, the vice, the weakness, and the folly of mankind are incurable; they inhere in human character of which they are the dominant and guiding qualities. We can not eradicate, we can not appreciably mitigate. If Mr. Francis Murphy once stopped drinking too much liquor, he then accomplished a greater work in the direction of temperance reform than he need ever hope to accomplish again. But he never did; the struggle against his habit occurred in the tissues and fluids of his body, and what he is pleased to call his resolution was but the mental record of that process—that mysterious physical change which made alcohol no longer a necessity. He did not stop drinking; his drinking stopped. The toper drinks because he must; the temperate man abstains because he can. Exhortation has nothing to do with the matter.

When the devil repents him of sin;
When snakes to walk upright begin;
When we shiver with fever and grill with a chill;
When eyelashes grow on the chin;
When skulls are turned hary side in;
When the leopard, spot-peppered, eschews all its hues;
When the Ethiopia change, his skin—
Dissuade me the sot from his gin.

"We mean to have the whipping post in this State," says a Kentucky journal, "the people of other States may say what they will." The people of other States have never doubted the justice and expediency of thrashing Kentuckians.

"We honor all who live by toil," says a contemporary. That is because you are a fool, dear. Let us suppose you are set upon a hill and shown all the nations of the earth. You know beforehand that some of these people are worthy, and these you naturally wish to honor with your esteem; some are unworthy, whom it is right to dislike. But you can not distinguish the one from the other. Happy thought—you will make a beginning by setting apart all who toil and honoring them en masse! Can you imagine a more irrelevant classification?—one less suited to your purpose? Do you not know that many laboring men are pestilent rascals of all sorts of kinds? Are you unaware that it is through mental incapacity that the majority of them are condemned to the condition from which all men employ all their intellectual resources to escape? And has no one had the incivility to tell you that mental incapacity is Nature's hatching-house for the meaner vices?—Really, the man who honors another for his vocation, and without regard to his character, is the most accomplished idiot that "government of the people, for the people, and by the people," has misbegotten.

Observe, please, that all this offensive cant about the "dignity of labor," the "honest workingman," and the rest of it, is the shibboleth of "republican institutions." It is a part of the persuasive vocabulary of the stump, whence it has crept through the press into general use. Its original insincerity has vanished in the process of adoption, and what was once a juggling device of the politicians has become a national article of faith. Nothing could better illustrate the power of iteration and the influence of words upon thought than the honorable place which this preposterous clap-net has won for itself among the convictions of serious-minded men. It has actually deceived the class who invented it, and to-day when a candidate for office pours out his wealth of glittering periods in tribute to the "dignity of labor," and in fitly chosen terms bears eloquent testimony to the nobility of the workingman, one's admiration for his golden discourse is dashed by the disgusting probability that he is sincere.

Mr. Moy Jin Kee, of New York, an assimilated Chinaman, has been arrested, the dispatches relate, for grand larceny. It is added that the accused is a Christian convert, and is well connected in San Francisco, his brother being an interpreter in one of our courts. The Chinese of the Eastern metropolis have not hitherto been charged with any higher offense than gambling, Mr. Kee being the pioneer in respect of the graver accusation—a distinction of which, naturally, he is proud. It is to be hoped his brother's connection with the administration of justice may prove serviceable to him in securing such mitigation of its asperities as may be considered due to the uncommon dignity of his crime.

Some months ago an old gentleman living in this city lost his son, who, serving on board a United States vessel, fell overboard and was drowned. The old gentleman applied for a pension, but on Monday last it was definitely refused. On receiving the official negative the poor father was so overcome with grief for the loss of his son that he went out and hanged himself. There is nothing like paternal affection, after all; but really this sorrowing father ought not to have succumbed to his grief without trying the consolation of a law suit.

"If a man offers you money for his vote knock him down."—Denis Kearney. And take his money; there may be more than he offered you.

"I do not doubt that it was for my good that God subjected me to this great peril. Let my body guard be doubled."—The Czar. "The honors I have received abroad have but strengthened my love of my own country: the Presidency of the United States is better than a procession of elephants."—U. S. Grant. "The right of the people to bear arms shall not be abridged."—The President. "Cetewayo and I are out."—Beaconsfield. "I grant you that free trade is best for the prosperity of the people, but look at that Exchequer!"—Bismarck. "Russia has her Nihilists, France her Communists, Germany her Socialists, and many Americans favor Conkling."—Blaine. "I die content."—Tilden.

"I never thought much of him; he was too slick for anything." Such is the estimate that young Mr. Burns, of this city, has formed of young Mr. Hunt, a gentleman who aspired to be his brother-in-law but mysteriously disappeared on the eve of the wedding that was to make him such. The remark suggests a "theory" for the detectives. Perhaps the wedding day found the groom unprepared, and he has retired for a few weeks to slick himself up a bit. Reduced to its real meaning, Mr. Burns's opinion as to the already excessive slickness of Mr. Hunt is of little weight; it shows only that Mr. Hunt was too slick for him. But slickness is like any other quality or characteristic: in a prospective brother-in-law a very little of it goes a long way toward being too much.

In the annual order respecting the decoration of soldiers' graves on Memorial Day, the "Department Commander" of the "Grand Army of the Republic" asks, with significant italics, that his subordinates bear in mind that "we seek thus to preserve the memory of those only who fought in defense of National unity." My Democratic friends, you see how it is. We deprecate a revival of sectional animosities, but a Presidential election is coming on, and this is no time for high-flown sentiment and generous impulse. If your Confederate Congress continues to withhold the appropriations, your Confederate corpses may whistle for their nosesays.

Certain events now occurring in Virginia have given a new and grave significance to that famous political argument which closed so many discussions twenty years ago—"Wud ye have yer daughter marry a nager?" If she intends to live in that excellent commonwealth the lady would certainly do well to choose a husband of her own color. There is a colored man in the State penitentiary down there now whose crime is that somebody's daughter married a "nager," and he had the misfortune to be the man. A United States judge has refused a writ of habeas corpus, on the ground that the United States have nothing to do with marriage—which is no doubt the best way. Still, as this particular marriage occurred in the District of Columbia, where it was entirely legal, it seems rather hard on the ebony husband to shut him up for merely going across the Potomac without a divorce. If they will not let him out of prison I advise him to leave the State.

The Pocasset people, among whom flourish that religious sect of "Second Adventists" who kill children in order to have them rise on the third day, are not altogether clear in their minds as to what it is best to do. The fanatics are apparently determined to murder some more children occasionally, as they may happen to be commanded by the Deity, and the law does not deter them. I should say this is one of those cases in which persecution might be employed with great advantage. It is a remedy that has fallen somewhat into disrepute of late, but there is really nothing like it. Persecution has stamped out a thousand extravagant religions to every decent one that has survived it. If I were Dictator I would distribute crowns of martyrdom with a pretty liberal hand, I can assure you.

The New York Sun complains that the man who first found gold in Arizona has never been suitably rewarded. Who owes him anything? He had a very good thing of it, and might have rewarded himself, but the moment he had picked up enough of the gold to take him out of the Territory he remarked that he wasn't anybody's gor dumdied old miser, and left.

South American advices indicate a near probability that Valparaiso will be bombarded by a hostile fleet. This will be an admirable opportunity for our new Consul, General Foote, to obtain that personal knowledge of the pomp and circus tents of glorious war of which he was so long deprived by taking service in our militia.

In perusing the foregoing gracious pleasantries I am reminded, somehow, of the following verses, written on a bass-wood chip by the light of a waning moon, and chanted by a choir of night-wandering idiots:

Once, o'er the country's utmost span,
When war's infernal clamors ran
Like baying hounds, and men were called
To face the perils that appalled,
McC— sedately sheathed his sword,
Then to the Governor restored;
And urchins huddled undismayed
The harmless horrors of the blade.
"No brave man now," said he, "will prate
Of duty to a single State.
Behold! this arm's now free to strike
For the whole nation—when I like."

The Sheriff of Marin county is "camping on the trail" of an Indian who is believed to be the man that robbed and murdered Paul Rieger. Robbery and murder, indeed, are supposed to be what this child of nature principally gives his mind to. The Sheriff has circulated a description of the villain, in which it is stated that one of his haunts is Russian River Valley, and a friend of mine was reading it. "I have business that will take me up that way," said he; "I'll keep an eye out for that fellow, and may be I can get the reward." "Oh, yes," said I, quoting from the circular, "weighs 180 pounds; a powerful and desperate man; has a Henry rifle, a dragoon six-shooter, an English bull-dog five-shooter, and a bowie knife." It is a promising speculation. "Well, it's a safe one anyhow; I risk nothing. If I catch him I'll get five hundred dollars; if he catches me"—absently thrusting his hands into his pockets—"he won't get a cent."

Mr. Ewing, of the National House of Representatives, is an eloquent man. He closed a speech in favor of the unlimited coinage of silver, the other day, something like this: "When the money which existed before Abraham, before Troy, and which lifted Rome to splendor, was extinguished the world sank for a thousand years into darkness; and when rekindled it lightened the civilization of two continents." The telegraph is no doubt responsible for the confusion of metaphor, but it is clear enough that Mr. Ewing's notion is that both ancient and modern civilization were created by silver money, and that the "dark ages" came of the "single standard." I do not say that this simple view of the matter is incorrect; I say it is uncommon. I do not affirm its author's unfamiliarity with history; I perceive that historians have misunderstood events. I do not charge that his discourse is lacking in sense, but he will not himself deny that it is eloquent. And, finally, while I am far from asserting that Mr. Ewing is a fool, I aver and can prove that he is a member of Congress.

I flatter myself I have presented this statesman's intellectual frailties with studied moderation, yet their total is a mental disability of considerable magnitude. Wherefore, with a clear sense of the opprobrium implied by the term, and pledging myself to maintain its justice by proof or pistol, I hereby call him a Mr. Ewing; and if he suffer from the epithet he will have the consolation of reflecting how rich he served it.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

"I say, Maud," says a young man to a young woman, "really, old girl, you know you ought to bounce that old woman you have to open the door and do chores. She takes snuff and talks like a magpie, and is altogether very revolting."

"I know I ought to, but then, you see, it's difficult to do it. She's my mother. However, I'll give her a talking to."

"What! Refuse to lend a paltry X to me, your other self?"

"That's why. You'd never return the money. I know myself too well."

"In such a shower as this," said a luckless Bohemian who was chilled and wetted through, "I wish I was job."

"Why?"

"Because he was all covered with Ulsters."

"That's a fact. He would be just the man for Uz."

"Then, doctor, mine is a hopeless case—I am indeed attacked by one of those awful maladies which science does not treat—which you do not prescribe for."

"Not so, not so bad as that—we treat such complaints—I prescribe for them."

"But do the prescriptions do any good?"

"Not the least."

They had gathered in tears in the ante-room to weep over and discuss the virtues of the beautiful Mme. de B., cut off in the flower of her age, whose body lay in the adjoining apartment.

"What a pity," said a sympathizing friend, "for her to die in the flower of her age, at twenty-eight!"

"Thirty," said a cousin of the deceased, and burying her face in her handkerchief, gave way to a fresh burst of grief.

Mlle. N., of the Folies-Amoureuses, has a son whose chin shows like a stubble-field at harvest-time, yet she assumes the virtue of youth and gushes like the tenderness of things.

Some one happened to ask the young man his age, and he du filly replied:

"Ma is just twenty, and I am six months older than she is."

A lady was making out her wash-list for the whole household—so many pieces for herself, so many for her husband, so many for the servants, and so on. The item of cambric handkerchiefs being under consideration—

"I have eight," says the lady's maid.

"And I four," says the valet.

"Then your master and I have twelve—that makes a dozen between all of us."

Once upon a time the Mayor of Bougival, being disgusted whenever of a Sunday he had his friends to breakfast on the lawn at seeing a dozen young men from Paris bathing in the stream, clad in innocence and bathing-drawers only, issued an edict that no one should go in swimming in his balliwick who had not a complete bathing costume. Remonstrances, supplications, and petitions were all in vain.

Thereupon the named R. vowed vengeance; bought thirty pairs of bathing-drawers, and each morning for and during the space of one calendar month His Worship received by mail a pair of bathing-drawers and a letter, as follows:

"YOUR WORSHIP:—My bathing-drawers were my last and fondest hope. You have deprived me of them. I go to seek oblivion in a watery grave."

But the Mayor of Bougival did not yield to this demonstration, and the named R. tried different tactics. Every Sunday His Worship, with his family, used to mount in a boat and row down the Seine as far as Maisons-Laffitte.

The named R. called fifty friends to his aid, and on the next Sunday they came, each in his faithful boat, and when the Mayor pushed off from shore the fifty parsons followed his example in single file and escorted him down the river, at first in decorous silence, but soon, at a signal from the named R., breaking into song:

"Since His Worship the Mayor he
Deigns our course to guide,
Let's follow that dignitary
And never quit his side."

At Maisons-Laffitte the oarsmen halted when the Mayor landed, and when, an hour or two later, he again entered his boat and headed for home the long flotilla followed, the oarsmen as before whiling away the tedium of the transit with their simple song:

"Since His Worship the Mayor he
Deigns our course to guide,
Let's follow that dignitary
And never quit his side.
Chorus—Since His Worship, etc."

Early next morning the Mayor resigned, and the obnoxious ordinance was immediately repealed by his successor.

Two brave peasants in the banlieue possess in Paris a daughter who plays minor parts in a very small and not too respectable theatre.

This diva, with the voice of a peacock and the walk of a goose, dwells in the fastnesses of the Rue de Rennes. Her good parents, naturally, are very proud of their offspring, and say to everybody on all occasions:

"Our daughter is the first actress in Paris—the very first one."

And if any of the audience seems astonished the old gentleman explains:

"Yes, sir, the first after you leave the railroad station—on the left-hand side of the street."

Baron De B., ruined by gamblers and women, is induced to marry the very ugly daughter of a very prominent banker, who during the honeymoon makes an assignment to his creditors.

"Confound it all," yells the happy groom; "here I've gone and loved her for herself alone, and not made a mariage de convenience at all."

INTAGLIOS.

Too Late.

Each on his own strict line we move,
And some find death ere they find love;
So far apart their lives are thrown
From the twin soul that halves their own.

And sometimes, by still harder fate,
The lovers meet, but meet too late.
Thy heart is mine! True, true! ah, true!
Then, love, thy hand! Ah, no! adieu!

MATTHEW ARNOLD.

Tears.

Tears are not formed to prove our depth of woe,
For oft in greatest joy the tear-drops flow,
The eye does, therefore, only show in part
The wonder working of the human heart.

EADIE.

Under the River.

Clear and bright from the snowy night,
The joyous stream to the plain descended;
Rich sands of gold were washed and rolled
To the turbid marsh where its pure life ended.

From stainless snow to the moor below
The heart, like the brook, has a warning mission;
The hurried dream in life's sluggish stream
Is the golden sand of our young ambition.

JOHN BOGLE O'REILLY.

It Matters Not.

It matters not when life is o'er how bright
The sunlight lay
Upon our way;
Nor yet how dark the chilly shadows crept
Upon our crooked path—how short the day;
Nor yet how long the dull and dreamless night
In which we never slept.

The birds will sing as sweetly when we sleep
Low in the ground,
As if no sound
Of grief had ever soared the songs of life,
Nor we had meddled with its empty strife;
And they who daily bow their heads and weep
Sleep with a sleep as lasting as profound.

When life is o'er, the best of us will lie
The brother still
Of those who fill
A poorer grave, nor sleep the sweeter there;
If good or bad, if homely or if fair,
One thing remains unchanged—we all must die—
It is the Master's will.

It matters not when life is o'er how few
Of those we met
Come with regret
To view the spot where they had laid us low,
How few of those we loved as friends were true—
How many false; how many tears shall wet
The grave on which the shadows come and go.

Calling the Angels In.

We mean to do it. Some day, some day,
We mean to slacken this fevered rush
That is wearing our very souls away,
And grant to our goaded hearts a hush
That is holy enough to let them hear
The footsteps of angels drawing near.

We mean to do it. Oh, never doubt,
When the burden of daytime droil is o'er,
We'll sit and muse, while the stars come out,
As the patriarch sat at the open door
Of his tent, with a heavenward gazing eye,
To watch for the angels passing by.

We see them afar at high noon tide,
When fiercely the world's hot flashings beat;
Yet never have bidden them turn aside,
And tarry a while in converse sweet;
Nor prayed them to hallow the cheer we spread,
To drink of our wine and break our bread.

We promised our hearts that when the stress
Of the life-work reaches the longed-for close,
When the weight that we groan with hinders less,
We'll loosen our thoughts to such repose
As banishes care's disturbing din,
And then—we'll call the angels in.

The day we dreamed of comes at length,
When tired of every mocking quest,
And broken in spirit and shorn of strength,
We drop, indeed, at the door of rest,
And wait and watch as the day wanes on;
But the angels we meant to call are gone!

MARY J. PRESTON.

A Broken String.

Sing! and to you! no, no! With one note jarred
The harmony of Life's long chord is broken;
Your words were light, and by light lips were spoken,
And yet the music that you loved is marred.

One string, my friend, is dumb beneath your hand;
Strike, and it vibrates at your will,
Falters upon the verge of sound, and still
Falls back, as sea waves shattered on the strand.

Touch it no more, for you shall not regain
The sweet lost tone. Take what is left, or let Life's music sleep to Death. Let us forget
The perfect melody we seek in vain.

And yet, perchance, some day before we die,
As half in dreams we hear the night-wind sweep
Around our windows when we fain would sleep,
Laden with one long sobbing, moaning cry,

One faint, far tone will waken, and will rise
Above the great wave voice of mortal pain;
Hand will touch hand, and lips touch lips again,
As in the darkness it recedes and dies;

Or lingering in the summer evening glow,
When, when the passion of the crimson west,
Burning like some great heart that can not rest,
Stains as with blood the waters as they flow,

Some old forgotten tones may rise and wake
Our dying youth, and set our hearts aflame
With their old sweetness, to our lips the name
Of Love steal softly, for the old love's sake.

ABOUT WOMEN.

Set a wife to catch a wife.

Every woman thinks her own husband the worst.

Girls should remember: "Where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wives."

In the spring the youth and maiden linger in the evening air, And she sighs, in broken accents, "Joseph, don't you muss my hair!"

When two Bridgets get out on their respective front stoops early in the morning there is a scrub race, and she wins who stoops to conquer.

An exchange wants to know why a woman always wants to sit on the floor to put her shoes on. Because she can't sit on the ceiling.

His name was Wrath, and when he asked his girl to marry him she gave him a soft answer; and a soft answer turned away Wrath.

"Don't open your mouth so wide when you laugh, Jane," he said; "it reminds me of a grave yard." And she was laughing at their first baby.

George Eliot says that girls are "delicate vessels," and the Virginia City Enterprise says that, "She is an angel with blue eyes, and lips that are a pink portico to the soul beyond."

A damsel applied for a place behind a counter. "What clerical experience have you?" asked the man of dry goods. "Very little," she said, with a blush, "for I only joined the church last week."

We know not, oh, we care not
What joys await us there—
If women only hold their tongues,
And girls don't bang their hair.

A young lady, who ought to know, accounts for the disposition of the average young fellow to put his arm around a girl's waist by the supposition that he is looking for that rib that was taken from him so long ago.

A most interesting sight to see is that of a young lady, with "lips like rubies," and with "teeth of pearly whiteness," and with cheeks that have stolen the "deep carnation of the deathless rose," with her mouth full of gingerbread!

In the latest London novel two ladies are described as having "that air of affability about them that shows they regard themselves as women who soar superior to anything like an attempt made to sit upon them by other women."

Mrs. Baker, a witness in a Chicago court, felt that she was bound by her oath to tell "the whole truth," and, when the lawyer interrupted her irrelevant story, told him that she didn't mean to let him nor anybody else prevent her from doing what she had solemnly promised to do.

She walked the whole length of the drawing-room car, looking carefully into every division. "Whatcher want, mem?" asked the amiable conductor; "a compartment where there ain't no gentlemen?" "No," she replied, blandly; "no, a compartment where there's only one."

"Truly," said Napoleon, "I have something else to think of than love. No man wins triumphs in that way without forfeiting some palms of glory. I have traced out my plan, and the finest eyes in the world—and there are some very fine ones here—shall not make me deviate one hair's breadth from it."

A little girl who had been on a railroad train when an accident occurred, was told by her mother that she ought to thank God for her escape from injury when she made her evening prayer. She did it in this way: "Thank you, God, for not letting me be hurt to-day; but the next time I go to the city I'll go in a wagon."

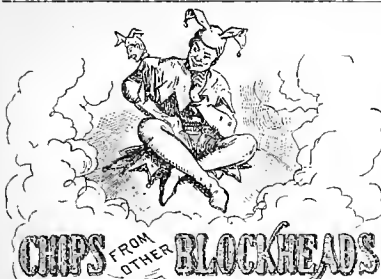

Socrates called beauty a short-lived tyranny; Plato, privilege if natural; Theophrastus, a silent cheat; Theocritus, a delightful prejudice; Carneades, a solitary kingdom. Domitian said that beauty was better than all the letters of recommendation in the world; Homer, that it was a glorious gift of nature; and Ovid calls it favor bestowed by angels.

A Bangor young woman is going to present Longfellow with a penholder made out of the famous vessel Insides. Its base is circled with gold, in which are set three hand-some stones. One of these is phenacite from Siberia, another, zircon from Ceylon, and the other, red tourmaline from Maine. The pen is made from the fetters that bound Bonnivard in Chillon castle.

"No man shall ever kiss me except my future husband," she said, as he was about leaving her at the gate. "Suppose I agree to be your future—" "Why, then I'll kiss you," she replied, eagerly, and she did. Her mother was informed that he had proposed, and the old lady called around the next day to fasten matters, and before he knew it he was eternally booked. It was a mean advantage, but a bird in the hand is worth two on a front gate.

"You make me think," William said, dropping upon the sofa beside his girl, "of a bank whereon the wild thyme grows." "Do I?" she murmured; "it is so nice, but that is pa's step in the hall, and unless you can drop out of the front window before I get through speaking, you will have a little time with him, my own, for he loves you not." But William didn't quite make it, and now you can make him grow wild time and time again by simply asking him what makes him go lame when he walks. He knows, but he's a liar.

A Kentucky girl agreed to elope with a lover whom her parents refused to admit to the house. She descended the ladder in the night and started with him on horseback. "Now, you see how much I love you," she said; "you will be always a true and kind husband, won't you?" He answered, gruffly, "Perhaps I may, and perhaps not." She rode in silence a few minutes, when she suddenly exclaimed: "Oh, what shall we do? I have left my money behind me in my room!" "Then," said he, "we must go back and fetch it." They were soon again at the house, the ladder was again placed, the lady re-mounted, while the ill-natured lover remained below. But she delayed to come, and so he gently called, "Are you coming?" When she looked out of the window and said: "Perhaps I may, and perhaps not," and then she shut down the window.

A wealthy man should eat but twice a day. A luncheon at noon is an ingratitude toward breakfast, and a premeditated insult to dinner.

About the guiltiest-looking people in this world are a man accused of a crime of which he is innocent, and a newly-married couple trying to pass for veterans.

A London paper says that an American girl, by residing in Europe a year or so, will gradually become educated to society, and gradually get rid of her war whoop.

It is claimed by a New England philosopher that poor manuscript often embodies gems of thought, but in a printing office a great deal depends on the setting.

One of the milliner writers on society says that the Duchess of Edinburgh would be pretty if she had a little more chin, and then dilates on her conversational powers.

The rich young lady who recently married a horse-car driver had taken to heart Sir Joseph Porter's pronouncement, that "love is a front platform on which all ranks meet."

Barnum advertises a hairy elephant and a snake without any tail; also a monkey with a ring in his nose instead of his tail, and a mermaid to be weighed in her own scales.

The article that is going the rounds of the papers headed "Liver is King," contains some misstatements. Liver is not king. It is not even a constable. Liver is cheap.

A husband's farewell: "Dear Sal, the doctor tells me our baby's tooth won't be through for three weeks yet; till then good-bye. You always said you loved it more than I did."

The story is told of an Iowa man that has been married four times, and has all four of his mothers-in-law living with him in one house. We believe that story about Daniel now.

Lightning strikes the new wired-barbed fences in Texas, and runs on for it miles. It is the best thing yet invented for stirring up statesmen like those who control the San Francisco Call.

An old bachelor, who particularly hated literary women, asked an authoress if she could throw any light on kissing. "I could," said she, looking archly at him, "but I think it's better in the dark."

That was a mean trick in the fellow last night at the theatre who flung a bouquet with a string attached to it to the leading lady, and hauled it in again as she smilingly stooped over to pick it up. It caused her pain, mortification, and the price of a new corset.

Vassar is soon to have a chewing-gum match. Princeton has a man who can hop on one leg a mile in sixteen minutes. Ann Arbor has the champion sleeper; and Yale has a man who wants to run one hundred yards on his hands for the college championship.

About the poorest "Pinafore" joke of all was tried on Susan B. Anthony. "I shall never marry!" said that lady sternly. "What, never?" exclaimed the gentleman to whom she was talking. "Now you go right away from here," replied the lady with great violence, "or I'll hit you with my umbrella."

"Angelina," said Augustus, eagerly, "I've made aw conundrum. It's real nice, too. What did Jonah find to wide on when he was thrown ovaboard?" Angelina—"Oh, Gussy! Why, he—tell me, darling." Augustus—"He went by the wall way. Ain't that awful jawly, Angelina?" Took me two hours to do it; pon honaw."

The editor wrote an item about the curiously formed branch of an apple tree, and headed it: "A Quaker Shaped Limb." Then he wrote another paragraph about a young lady who was walking 3,000 miles in 3,000 hours, and headed it "Female Pedestrianism." The printer, in making up the forms, mixed these titles up—got the tree head over the walking paragraph—and now he is an outcast and wanderer, and limps.

It is a delicate subject, and we hope we may be pardoned for saying anything about it—this new fashion of wearing a blue stocking on one leg and a red one on the other. It is not natural. Nature is one great harmony, and its laws universal. If it had been intended that women should adopt this style, they would have been supplied with exactly as many legs as there are colors in the rainbow.

A party of artists and art critics came to the following conclusion regarding their dinner: That the hash was low in tone and defective in composition; the beer well drawn but flat; the anatomy of the turkey strong; the bread too freely handled; the veal raw and cold, and hurried in execution; the butter strong; the coffee weak, except in the foreground; and altogether too much impaste in the bill.

Maiden with the rippling hair, laughing eyes and tripping feet, was't for me you smiled so sweet when I passed you on the stair? Do I cause the tell-tale blush of o'er-crimsons all your cheek, and which silent yet doth speak thoughts which glow like sunset flush? Do I cause—confound my glasses! Quick, quick usher, lest I miss her. "There's the lady, there she passes!" No, man, hang it, that's my sister!

In Russia some thieves invented a good scheme for robbing by putting one of their number in a trunk and carrying him as baggage. The trunk full of thief was left in the baggage-room; the contents of the trunk got out and selected what things he wanted, packed them in the trunk and was carried along with them to the next station. The scheme acted well until a chest of Limburger was set on the trunk, when the robber called for help.

During a recent trial in New London a rural juror appealed to the court to know "if the lawyers could not be stopped from bothering the jury. He had become bewildered in the maze of technicalities and subtleties with which the lawyers had apparently mystified the case, and he cried in anguish of spirit: "Then lawyers come here on purpose, to bother and confuse us jurors, don't they, judge?" "I suppose they do, my friend," wearily answered his Honor.

There appeared to be some irresistible force endeavoring to impede his progress as he would shakily advance a step or two and then execute a retrograde movement, bringing up at the starting point. He was undoubtedly as drunk as a lord, and the ground appeared to roll beneath him like unto the ocean's restless waves. All at once he was seen to reel, endeavor to catch himself, and then sink heavily into a heap on the pavement, and when the bystanders ran to his assistance he said: "Atsh sheverest shock fan earthquake ever spershiended, 'n I've bin on ish coast since '50. Mutch damage done, y' reckon?"

One of the orange sellers on the Detroit Campus Martius found a bad specimen among his fruit and carelessly tossed it away. It struck an old woman in the eye, and she made such a fuss over the accident that the man gave her a dozen good oranges to go her way in peace. She had scarcely left, when a sharp-looking boy about twelve years of age slid up to the fruit-seller and said: "Say, are you going to hit any more old women to-day?" "Why, no—not if I can help it," was the reply. "If you are, give me a chance," continued the lad. "I'll bring my mother down here, and you may hit her in both eyes for half the oranges you gave that other woman, and if that isn't fair you can have a shot at dad and me."

Soon after retiring he was awakened by a fluttering noise, as of a bird around the curtain of his bed. He sprang up, struck a light, and saw a dark little creature with wings fluttering about the room. Not being acquainted with natural history, he did not recognize it as a bat, but determined to catch it, if possible, and examine it carefully in the morning. Taking up a felt hat, he began the hunt, and tried to capture the intruder for a long time in vain, but at last he pounced upon it, took it from under the hat, shut it up in a drawer, listened to its struggles to escape—wanting to be sure he had really caught it, and went to bed dreaming of flying dragons. But he was not destined to sleep long. Hardly had he dozed off when a further fluttering awakened him, and, lighting another match, he found another bat. After this one he had another hunt, caught it, put it in the drawer with its brother, and again went to bed. Again, however, he was awakened in a similar manner; bats came not in single spies, but—if the expression be pardonable—in "battalions." Mr. Honey hunted diligently, making quite a collection of specimens, and put them all with great care in the drawer. Heated with the chase, he then opened the window, and, tired out, at last enjoyed a few minutes' sleep. Waking with the morning light, he jumped out of bed and opened the drawer very cautiously to look for his bats; but lo and behold, there were no bats there. He opened the drawer wide, and then discovered that it had no back to it. He had, in fact, been passing all his night in catching the same bat, which had flown out at the back of the drawer as soon as he had put it in at the front, and when the window was opened had finally escaped.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

I want to be a coachman,
And with the coachman stand,
And win the boss's daughter,
And drive my four-in-hand.

He held her fondly on his knee,
It seemed to him divine,
When soft he whispered in her ear,
"Oh, won't you, sweet, be mine?"
She gazed up in his broad eyes,
And, with a smile and pout,
She said, "Now, George Augustus James,
I think you're just about
The Ironage." That settled it.

She gave her fingers at parting
And he tenderly pressed their tips;
And, satisfied not, as he bolder became,
He lifted them to his lips.

His grasp grew ardently tighter,
And her face flushed rosy red,
And he swept a kiss from the proper place—
"From hand to mouth," he said.

There was a young man named McBat,
Who oft had a brick in his hat;
"Her" father turned red
As unto him he said,
"From my daughter just git," and he gat.

"Papa, what made you go to the war?"
Said Jenou, climbing on my chair
"You might have had two fingers more
To twine amid my flowing hair."
"Why, dear, they drafted your brave pa,
And I lost these fingers on a saw."

Once in a while we meet the man
Who rides the wild, untamed velocipede;
Once in a while we meet a man who strides
Around the track to test his walking speed;
Once in a while we meet the man
Who wears the helmet we once all wore;
And now and then we meet the man who quotes
The "hardly ever" line from Pinafore.

A Re-Treat.

They stood before the glittering bar,
The Captain and the man;
They had been comrades through the war,
And foremost in the van.
They drink to the old fighting days,
They recall comrades slain,
And in their eyes to test his light plays,
They sniff the battle-plain.
Of camp, and siege, and guarded pass,
The echoes dead they woke;
The man had long since drained his glass—
At last he dryly spoke:
"I say, my Cap, there's one command
My ears would gladly greet—
Ha! Cap, you do not understand—
Just order a re-treat!" —Sunday Voice.

WHERE TO

SPEND THE SUMMER.

IF YOU WANT A THOROUGHLY
enjoyable place, go to the

GEYSER SPRINGS.

Medicated Baths for the sick; Swimming Baths, Bowling Alleys, Shooting Gallery; pleasant Picnic Grounds for the well. In remodeling the Medicated NATURAL Steam
Bath, due regard has been observed to give special privacy to ladies. This Bath removes TAN-FRECKLES, SAIL-LOWNESS, BLOTCHES, and all IMPERFECTIONS
from the skin, and is recommended by many physicians who have tested its value. A magnificent Swimming Bath has been constructed at a large outlay.

The house has been completely remodeled since last summer, and now is not surpassed by any in the State. The stage ride to this glorious mountain resort can not be surpassed in the world, while the very atmosphere, rarified and aromatic from the breath of fragrant pines, fir, and laurel,
stimulates the senses like old wine.

AN INTERCEPTED LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 16, 1879.

I have been to see the "handsomest woman on the American stage" play "Rosalind." Upon the principle that every eye makes its own beauty, I will let a part of that proposition go without dispute. Moreover, Fanny Davenport is a fine, buxom-looking woman, and has an absolutely faultless taste in millinery matters; but when it comes to seeing her play "Rosalind," a procession as long as "Macbeth's" phantom levee list passes before me, and I shudder with recollection. I remember well the first time I ever saw As You Like It played. The world was young, I am quite sure there were no stage illusions. The diamonds were not paste, and the trees were not painted. The boughs really bunt, and the leaves really waved in the forest of Ardenne, for the pungent odor peculiar to the woods crossed the footlight line and penetrated to my very nostrils. The forms were all copies of Canova models. There were no sawdust calves, I am sure. I yearned to be a duke's daughter or a duke, it mattered little which, so long as I lived in the woods and dressed in Lincoln green, and went around with the hunters singing beautiful songs over my picturesque dinner. I was bewitched with the sylvan and the rural, and I loved "Rosalind" quite as hard as "Orlando" did. She was a charming "Rosalind," too, Charlotte Thompson. Do you remember her? She had quite a genius for dressing herself abominably, and played "Ganymede," if I remember well, in a brown smock frock and cross garters made of things; but she had a pair of bewildering brown eyes and a flow of waving locks, to say nothing of the whitest teeth that ever gleamed between a pair of red lips. She was not altogether a beautiful woman either, but she was arch without coquetry, and piquant without a suspicion of sauciness, and even now ages after, when my enjoyment of the play is something dulled by disillusion and repetition, and my judgment crusted with a score of comparisons, I still place her, if not first and best of "Rosalinds," at least next only to Carlotta Le Clercq. I remember having heard some one ask Adelaide Neilson which of her rôles she loved best to play, and the great actress with the stagginess of manner which clings to them all on all occasions, down to the very peeling of a potato, rolled her eyes heavenward and exclaimed, "Rosalind." "I feel like a very nymph of the woods," said she, "and I revel in my sylvan freedom." They all play it con amore for the matter of that, but how different are their interpretations! Carlotta Le Clercq's is the most poetical, the most Shakspearean, the most Rosalindy—a word which I use without hesitation, since it was coined by a female commentator. Charlotte Thompson's is coy and essentially womanly, Adelaide Neilson's artistic, Scott-Siddons' spirituelle, Ada Cavendish's hoydenish, and Fanny Davenport's manerish. As an experiment in the legitimate, or merely for a change in her repertoire, it is well enough for the lady to essay "Rosalind" now and then. It is difficult to say where she is lacking. I never saw an actress so thoroughly au fait in the technique of her profession. In point of fact, she is perhaps just a shade too much a stage manager. One does not like to see a "Rosalind" give Charley Schultz the cue for slow music or fast, as the case may be. Miss Davenport's elocution, by all the rules, is perfect. She has not a rich, sonorous voice, in fact it is hollow, and not far-reaching, but she uses it well. One can not apply to Miss Davenport's "Rosalind" that line describing Miss What's her name's face:

"Faultily faultless, icy regular, splendidly null."

And yet that line does pop into one's head repeatedly. Truth to tell, it is such a business-like affair that it eliminates all the poetry. The wit seems to rattle off by rote, the sparkle is the manufactured fizz of American Seltzer. Miss Davenport has the hearty ringing vitality for the merely material "Rosalind," but really nothing else peculiar to this most delightful of Shakspeare's womankind. Yet, for all, the lady has improved wonderfully since her last visit, and I can quite fancy that if she will forswear Shakspeare some of her fame is deserved. She is so thoroughly and essentially modern that it can only be in plays of to-day that she excels. Her gestures, her style, her carriage, are all of to-day, her very voice has a modern cadence. She can never be poetical or picturesque, properly speaking, but she is the very incarnation of style, and that ought to satisfy any rational woman.

You should have heard the row the people made over Tom Keane. Really it must be great fun to go away and come back to a reception like that. I do not observe that he has changed any. In point of fact he has not been gone long enough to be unrecognizable, and "Orlando" was a good part for him to make his bow in. He was always rather nice, you know, when dealing with Shakspeare. It was only on the so-called modernism he strangled in quite direct contrast to the star he is supporting. Barton Hill was complimented with a warm welcome also; indeed it was a grand reception night, and everybody seemed to have come back from somewhere, and everybody was glad to see everybody. Barton Hill read the Seven Ages of Man beautifully, and all went merry as a marriage bell, and everybody got as many flowers as if they were prima donnas—what a windfall the florists must be getting—and, well, that's all about As You Like It, which was rather dull upon the whole when you omit the receptions to Messrs. Hill and Keane.

They do say Pique was a much more delightful performance; but then who would go to see Pique when Carmen, the long delayed, the wonderful, the much desired, was to be produced at the Grand Opera House. Everybody was there, even the other prima donnas, for Litta, in plain black silk, and with natural roses in her bosom, and her hair looking extremely well, smiling from one of those uncomfortable mezzanine boxes up stairs, while Cary, in a beautifully embroidered tan silk and a white opera bonnet, beamed with good nature down stairs. I never saw a houseful of people so thoroughly determined to be pleased. The overture was listened to for once, and although it did not call forth any great applause, it tempered the disposition, and attuned the ear for what was coming. I like the music of Carmen immensely. It is full of that intoxicating Spanish melody which goes to the head, which sets one's nervous fingers to playing imaginary castanets, ones toes to dancing imaginary cachaças. One feels like keeping time with waving arms and bending body. In short, one is in a sort of temporary mental fandango that is made up of music and murder, and that eventually stretches the dead body of the wicked cigarette girl in a fruit of one mimic curtain to be closed to sight by a cinder. A tragic picture that suits BETSY B.

PRELUDES—IN DIVERS KEYS.

I think Mr. Strakosch will be willing to acknowledge that San Francisco has given him a genuine surprise at last, and that, after all his world-wide experience as an opera manager, last Wednesday evening was a lesson to him. The would-be clever impresario had held back Carmen, his trump card, until the very last moment in the subscription season for which it was promised (among others not given at all), bringing it forward at last for a single time and with great flourish of trumpets, and—the public would not condescend. They came very sparsely to Aida on Monday night, to Faust on Tuesday scarcely at all—a mere corporal's guard—and on Wednesday, with Carmen at last! probably just enough of a house to pay the salaries of the principals. The facts, our public has grown thoroughly tired of Mr. Strakosch and his half-kempt promises; has ceased to believe in him or respect his word; is not convinced that when he announces an opera he intends to give the whole of it, or, indeed, any of it as it should be given; and will no more of him. The subscribers came on Wednesday. They have been served to five performances of Aida out of a series of twenty nights; the only opera out of the entire subscription repertoire that has been even respectably mounted or properly performed. Even in this there have been little mean economies, as par exemple, the omission of the Bass Clarinet in the orchestra, which in "Anner's" great scene of the last act totally changes the coloring of the accompaniment; the putting the long Italian trumpets of the third act into the hands of a parcel of incompetents—probably cheap—who entirely destroyed what should be one of the most beautiful effects of the March, the entire perversion of the character of the ballet of the third act, etc. But, on the whole, the opera was well mounted and well sung. Chorus and orchestra have been ample, the mise en scene excellent, and the principals satisfactory in the main. Of Carmen the same may be said. But as Carmen is supposed to be a great attraction the subscribers get only one performance of it—the first, which is really a sort of dress rehearsal—with the possible second one—last evening, the last of the season—filled with the fifth time of Aida and the second (presumably first adequate) Carmen reserved for an extra night. Without going back to the shabby nights of the first three weeks of genuine old-fashioned scrub opera at Baldwin's it seems to me that I do not go far wrong in characterizing this treatment of our public as little better than a swindle. It is of a piece with much of the same sort of thing that we have had before, and that, so long as we countenance it, must inevitably stand in the way of our ever having a respectable season of opera. So long as Mr. Strakosch can get houses for "fakes" we shall get nothing better. But Mr. Strakosch can no longer get houses for "fakes," at least none that will pay. Then he gives his operas somewhat better. But the public have found him out; as I said before, we have become thoroughly tired of him and his manner of doing business. And if we are ever to have a decent season of opera, or one that will pay, it must be under different auspices and more honorable management.

Carmen is an opera of the modern French romantic school, the work of a clever musician who knew whatever was to be learned of the technique of his art, had abundant knowledge of the voice and how to write for it, was poetic, imaginative—everything but really musical. It is an opera without either the melody of the Italian or the depth of the German school; for the former it brings finesse, and in place of the latter it has only cleverness. Even the sparkle of the lighter French school is missing in it; it is lost in the straining after novelty that is recognizable in every bar. The music was intended to be original a tout prix, and original it certainly is. But is it rarely pretty. When Fred Lyster said to me one day that there was "nothing new to be done in music, for the tunes are all written," he was probably very nearly right; but he did not take into account the modern French school of composers who make their music without tunes, using chic and esprit instead, and who seem to consider that when they discover a new progression that sounds ugly but is all right on paper they have done something very fine. They call it piquant, and in the sense that caviare and Chili peppers are piquant they are right, without a doubt. But one would hardly be justified in recommending caviare for a steady diet, and to my taste a very small pepper very carefully treated goes a long way toward satisfying. This music of Bizet's is not healthy music, nor is it good music. It has the odor of absinthe about it, slightly disguised by an artificial perfume out of a shop. It has the pallid air of disease, and struts like a padded dandy. It might have been written on a regimen of black coffee and strong cigars, by one who had grown tired of Mozart and whose favorite literature was Rabelais and de Kock. What the wine may have been as it came from the grape it is difficult to say; it has been flavored and doctored until there is nothing now but a hot tasting, spice-flavored liqueur. Some of Bizet's songs are very pretty, and he has done some creditable things for orchestra. But Carmen is not pretty—though it has some good dramatic music in the third and fourth acts—and has not a hundred bars in it to preserve its musical life.

Carmen is an opera buffe that ends with a tragedy. Its first two acts are of the lightest, there is not an opera of either Offenbach or Lecocq in which the thematic material is so trivial, nor one of Ambroise Thomas, or even Berlioz, in which the barrenness of thought is tricked out with more of those forced modulations and rhythmic surprises that are the tinsel behind which the modern French school seeks to hide its musical poverty. But it has an attractive part for the heroine, and wherever it falls into the hands of a clever and beautiful artist it is likely to be a success. There is nothing so attractive on the stage as a soupeon of the forbidden; Carmen is full of it. The tenor and baritone parts are also effective—the tenor dramatically, and the baritone both dramatically and musically. This saves the opera. The ensembles are weak; the choruses, though several in the first two acts, are lively and rather pretty, very trivial and purposeless. The chorus is rarely brought into the action; when it is it is not well managed and makes no effect. The songs of the cigarette girls and street boys in the first act have a certain bonfê flavor that carries them off, and a bit for the tenors alone is really melodious, and has a tune. But that is all there is of it. Not an individual on the stage gets a sound musical phrase to sing, excepting perhaps "Escamillo" in the second act (that is like a bit out of a march for a street band), and the three girls who sing over their cards in the third. The success of the opera rests with its bandsome mounting and the questionable (unquestionable) character of the heroine, and this, I think, is very poor recompense for the four weary hours spent in listening to it.

Madame Roze certainly acts and looks Carmen beautifully. In the singing I wished at times for a little more sparkle in the voice; it seems to call—especially in the third and fourth acts—for a hard, cold, glittering quality, that she does not command. But the first two acts suit her admirably, and on the whole I think Mr. Bizet has every cause to be contented with his heroine. Don José is an ungrateful part for a singer, but a superb one for the actor, and Mr. Adams made the most of it. Nothing could be finer than his conception and rendering of this character; it is worthy of a great tragedian. I do not remember any such fine piece of acting on the lyric stage as this; it is enough of itself to carry the opera even with the music all cut out. Signor Pantaleoni has also a fine opportunity in "Escamillo;" he acts well, looks well, and sings abominably sharp every time he gets the chance. This is the more remarkable when we know that ever since he has sung here Signor Pantaleoni has been loud in his complaints over our high pitch. Why, I should like to know, does he continually make matters worse by singing above the pitch? There ought to be some consistency in all things, even in a great Italian Baritone.

Carmen is well mounted, and well given. It is better sung than anything we have had excepting Aida, and as it is really more difficult to sing than Verdi's opera that is all that can be expected. The chorus shows remarkably good training, and reflects credit upon Mr. de Novellis. The orchestra is as good as can be looked for under Mr. Behrens, who is not by any means a good opera conductor. He seems to pride himself upon being steady, and this he certainly is. But he is also inflexible, unsympathetic and hard. Besides this I doubt whether he is really quite at home with his orchestra. I see things frequently going on around him that would hardly be tried on under a conductor who thoroughly knows his p's and q's, the kind of thing generally done to a piano-score musician. Miss Lancaster makes a pleasant and satisfactory "Michaela," and scored quite a success; in fact, everybody does well.

For next week we are promised the Huguenots, and probably more nights of Carmen. After that we shall have to get on without Madame Roze, who goes to London, and if there is to be any more Carmen it will probably be with Miss Cary as the heroine. Miss Cary has either plenty of that sort of courage that knows no such word as fail, or is blind to a failure when she sees it. And so there is no telling what she may do with Carmen, and if she does make a mess of it, Bizet is dead and our public indulgent.

Pinafore! The air is full of rumors of interesting events in this direction; if they are all born alive we shall have more of them than we can suckle and shall have to put a score or so out to wet nurse. The first, I believe, will be that of the Metropolitan Temple, with a large amateur chorus, and professional principals. Then it is to be done at the Grand Opera House, with Mr. Strakosch as "Buttercup," at the California with Charley Schultz in the same rôle, at Baldwin's with Bishop as "Josephine," at the Standard without any "Buttercup," and the Bush Street without any "Josephine" (not enough to go round), and at all the churches, by all the choirs, accompanied by all the organists, with all the parsons in their original parts. Then comes society. Ah! Then, ah, then we shall have Pinafore!

Mr. Frederic Boscovitz announces a series of three pianoforte Recitals at Steinway Hall, which promises to be of unusual interest to our musical public. Mr. Boscovitz has made this form of concert a specialty in all of the great cities, and always with the most decided success, attracting artists and students alike by his beautiful rendering of many compositions not to be found in the repertoire of ordinary concert players; especially of Bach, Handel, Scarlatti, Kimberger, and what we might term the pre-Raphaelites of pianoforte music. The programme of the first Recital, to be given on next Tuesday evening, includes the great A minor Prelude and Fugue of Bach, in Liszt's transcription, the Spinning Song from Wagner's Die Götterdämmerung, a Rondo of Mozart, Gavotte of Corelli, a selection of pieces by Schumann, and Mr. Boscovitz's own graceful Menuetto, which he repeats by request. The uninitiated may be glad to know that Steinway Hall is above Mr. Gray's music store, on Post Street. S. E.

Some months ago it was our pleasure to notice the fact that Miss Genevieve Stebbins had gone East to perfect her theatrical education. Miss Stebbins is a San Francisco girl, educated under the careful supervision of her aunt, Miss Clapp, for many years a teacher in the girls' High School. Miss Stebbins is a young lady of most promising talent in the direction of the profession she has chosen; with beauty of person, a natural talent for the stage, a very thorough and careful training, we anticipated for her a great success. She has recently made her debut in New York city, in the play of Aftermath, or Won at Last, taking in it the part of "Grace Fleming." The leading New York journals—the Herald, the Evening Express, the Star, the Evening Mail, the Telegram—all speak of her in the most flattering terms. The World says, "Miss Agnes Fleming"—for that is her stage name—"exceeded expectation." And the New York Sun says, "She is the most promising debutante that has appeared for many years." All agree in forecasting her future as one of great possibilities. The fact that a lady well born and thoroughly educated chooses the stage for a profession, and fits herself for it by a long course of preparatory study, is a matter of congratulation to all who love the drama, and who look to it as a means of elevating and instructing the community in which we live. We congratulate Miss Genevieve on her success, and shall welcome her to San Francisco, where she will for herself and her aunt be kindly received.

An actresses' club has been lately opened in Paris, meetings taking place three times a month, and a dinner once a month at 4 p. m. Mlle. Clerly, of the Vaudeville, is president; and Mme. Mathilde, of the Palais Royal, vice-president. Gentlemen are not admitted to the club at any time, or under any pretext.

The Fourth Loring Club Concert of the second season, given at the Grand Opera House last Thursday evening, was well and fashionably attended.

La Petite Mademoiselle, a new comic opera by Lecocq, libretto by Meilhac and Halevy, was produced at the Paris Renaissance on the 14th.

INSULTING THE FLAG.

[The following card of Mr. R. P. Thomas explains itself. It is the indignant protest of an American-born citizen, who fought for his country, and who in the higher and better sense is to be regarded as an American workingman, against the lies told concerning him. An American soldier who fought under the flag is naturally incensed that a howling mob of foreigners should presume to question his loyalty, or interpret his motives in expressing his opinions of an organic law that owes its passage to ignorance and misapprehension, and that in his judgment strikes a blow at the industry in which he is engaged.]

"Richard P. Thomas, the Superintendent of the Standard Soap Company, the manufactory of which company is at Berkeley, and the San Francisco office at No. 204 Sacramento Street, could express his indignation that a tremendous majority of the people of California insisted upon an improved organic law only by a most needless and wanton insult to the flag of the United States. He had boasted before the election that if the new Constitution should be adopted he would have the stars and stripes hoisted at half-mast, union down, over the manufactory of the company. Yesterday he carried his threat into execution. Unless in the case of a vessel at sea, in the direct distress, the flying of the American colors in this position is considered one of the most flagrant insults that can be put on the flag of the free. The brutal exhibition caused a disgust in those who witnessed it that for a time threatened to become aggressive; and it is to the credit of Americans, and as showing how swiftly the deep, underlying feeling of national patriotism will tower over all local differences, however temporarily acrimonious, that the anger was manifested as generally and strongly by those who had opposed the new Constitution as those who voted for it."—Chronicle.

The San Francisco Chronicle published an article before election accusing me of bulldozing, by intimidating the men in my employ, which I will state did not contain one word of truth, which can be proven. After a careful reading of the proposed new Constitution, I found in it that which I considered detrimental to the manufacturing interests of the State—in this for one thing: prohibiting incorporations from the employment of Chinese, making a distinction between the individual and an incorporation. Knowing that manufacturers, in order to compete successfully with cheap labor at the East, must necessarily employ Chinese, or at least a portion of the labor must be done by cheap help, when the State was about to vote for or against the adoption of a Constitution which would take from the manufacturer the cheap labor which was all important in order to successfully compete with Eastern manufacturers, I became greatly interested in the result of said election, and did say that if the State stood by the Old Constitution I would hoist the flag over the works of the Standard Soap Company—to the topmast; if defeated, I should look upon it as an onerous of distress to the manufacturers, and, as a signal of such distress, I would hoist the flag at half mast, inverted, which I accordingly did, and it remained in that position from morn to setting sun. No person made any attempt to interfere with it, as stated in the Chronicle. It was in no way intended to insult the flag, but was a signal of distress of the manufacturing interests—the adoption of a Constitution which discriminated between the individual and the incorporation.

Would I be likely to insult the flag? I would point to my past history. At the time of the firing at our flag on Sumter I was captain of a flatboat on the Allegheny River, hoisting off from Tidgate to Evine. As soon as the news of the attack on Sumter reached me I ran the boat ashore near a blacksmith shop, brought out the anvil, and commenced fring. The next day I left for my home in Syracuse, and with wife, flag, and drum, marched the streets, and recruited a company of cavalry, which I offered to Secretary Cameron. He could not but decline, stating that there was no call for cavalry as yet. A short time after he gave orders to report to McReynolds, in New York, which was accordingly done. My company was mustered into the Lincoln Cavalry, the first company of cavalry mustered as volunteers in the War of the Rebellion. I served in all the engagements during McClellan's campaign, and was wounded at the Battle of White Oak Swamp. During the seven days' fight I was promoted from the company to battalion staff, was honorably mustered out of the service under an act of Congress, and have now my war-worn uniform and sabre ready to again defend my country's flag at any and all times. With such a record, do you think I would insult the flag, as charged. Far from it.

Now, how will this record compare with the records of some of the warm advocates of the New Constitution, backed up by the Chronicle? If I am rightly informed, a resolution was offered in the Constitutional Convention to prohibit the carrying of the American flag in procession on celebration days, and only defeated by four votes. Was that an insult to the flag, or what was that intended for? The Chronicle might better look to some of the warm advocates of its New Constitution, and see what their record has been during the rebellion so far as pertains to their treatment of the flag, before being so ready to point to insult offered to the flag. I felt before the adoption of the New Constitution that it was hazardous to manufacturing interests. I have not changed my views since its adoption. I was against its adoption before and do not like it after. I have expressed myself accordingly, have offered no insult to the flag, and will now endeavor to the best of my ability to prepare for every emergency. I do not, nor will not, submit to the crack of the whip of the Chronicle, without making at least a feeble effort to defend myself when boldly charged with such damnable practices as offering an insult to my country's flag. R. P. THOMAS.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

Don't take too much interest in the affairs of your neighbors. Six per cent. will do.

To the new book house of Billings, Harbourn & Co. we have a long catalogue of favors to acknowledge for books received. Our columns have been so over-laden with discussions and homilies upon the new Constitution that we have had neither time nor space to say of them the pleasant things we would desire. This is the youngest house in the book and stationery line upon the coast. Commencing business only in August, 1878, it has sprung into an institution of first importance. It has made up by energy, enterprise, and honorable dealing all that it lacks in age and experience, till now it is not amiss to rank it among the leading concerns in the book and stationery trade. Commencing as successors to Chilion Beach, it has doubled his business, added an adjoining store, filled its shelves and counters with books of standard and fanciful literature, and crowded its counters with staple and fancy stationery. All the new books and novelties, and all that is ever found in a book store, are there. The firm is composed of four young gentlemen, and, from the throng of fashionable people who are always found crowding their stores, we should infer there was some attraction beyond their variety of book and paper wares. It is par excellence the elite book house of our city and coast. A specialty is made of designing, engraving, and of the printing of monograms, wedding, visiting, and invitation cards. Of one portion of their capital we speak with great confidence—it is ample, and they expend it with unstinted generosity: polite and courteous treatment is extended to all who visit them, and this is what especially tells when one desires to lounge in a book emporium, having no special object of purchase. To be permitted at leisure to wander among pleasant books and pleasant faces is a great delight, and usually results in bearing off some choice selection of reading or picture book. The house of Billings, Harbourn & Co. can not fail, we think, of becoming one of the leading book and stationery concerns of the Pacific Coast.

The season of the Eastern traveler is now upon us. Our streets are thronged with new faces. The Geysers and the Yosemite, the valleys and the sea side places, are beginning to feel the flutter of the tourists' wings. This is a good time to see our State. It puts on its holiday robes of spring, to be changed later in the summer for its brown, dun cloak of ripened grasses, its sea and yellow foliage, its dusty streets and fields. There is one place of all others in San Francisco that the visitor should not omit. There is only one Diamond Palace in the world. A traveler who has shopped in Paris, London, Vienna, Amsterdam, Madrid, or Berlin, has, we are quite confident, never seen a jewelry establishment like that of Colonel Andrews' on Montgomery Street. Its mirror reflections produce marvelous and beautiful effects well worth the notice of travelers, and no stranger has seen all the attractions of our city until he has visited it. An additional attraction lies in the fact that Colonel Andrews makes a specialty of California quartz, agates, and other minerals peculiar to this locality. They are manufactured by him from original designs and drawings, and set in California gold. They become souvenirs of our coast well worth securing. This is a class of jewelry that while it is not expensive is exceedingly desirable, because rare and altogether unique. Colonel Andrews desires ladies and gentlemen visiting his bijou of a Diamond Palace to feel perfectly at ease, whether they desire to purchase or not.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

THE MASONIC SAVINGS AND LOAN BANK,
Plaintiff, vs. EDWARD MAGUIRE and ELIZA MA-
GUIRE, Defendants.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in
and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to Edward Maguire and Eliza Maguire.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein (a copy of which accompanies this summons) within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; if served out of this county, but within this judicial district, within twenty days; or if served
out of said district, then within forty days—or judgment by default will taken against you.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court for the foreclosure of a certain promissory note described in the complaint and executed by the said Edward Maguire and Eliza Maguire on the 4th day of June, A. D. 1877, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note, made by said Edward Maguire at the same time for the sum of three thousand dollars gold, and interest, as provided in said note,
payable to plaintiff, or its order, and taxes, street assessments, and attorneys' fees at ten per cent. on the amount found due, and costs, all in gold coin; that the premises
conveyed by said mortgage may be sold, and the proceeds
applied to the payment of said promissory note, interest,
taxes, street assessments, and attorney's fees, and costs, all
in gold coin; and in case such proceeds are not sufficient to pay the same, then to obtain an execution against said Edward Maguire for the balance remaining due; and also that
the said defendants, and all persons claiming by, through,
or under them may be barred and foreclosed of all right,
title, claim, lien, equity of redemption, and interest, to said
mortgaged premises, and for other and further relief.

And if you fail to appear and answer said complaint, as
above required, the plaintiff will take default against you and apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 13th
day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

DWIGHT C. KING, plaintiff, vs. MALISSA KING,
defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth
Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to
MALISSA KING, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served
out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonorum heretore and heretore heretore existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.
Given under my hand and seal of the District Court
of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this twenty-fourth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

VOL. IV. NO. 21.

SAN FRANCISCO, MAY 24, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

PRATTLE.

It is all very well to talk about the nine lives of a cat, but a king or emperor seems to be the hardest thing to kill that is now hunted. Most of the European sovereigns have been shot at, thrust at, and bombarded by sworn and resolute assassins, but it is an unconscionably long time since one was killed. It begins to look as if these rulers of men had realized Thackeray's imaginative description of George IV. The great satirist sets up "the first gentleman of Europe," and proceeds to pull him to pieces. Garment after garment is stripped away, and under each is found another; and when the last gorgeous vestments is reached and removed—rien! there is nothing!

It must be confessed, though, that if the monarchical nations are prudently protected from regicide by the device of having nothing mortal inside the royal apparel, the two leading republics are but little better off. Hayes and Grévy are a brace of as insubstantial scarecrows as ever tempted the Indian brave in a western corn-field. Marshal MacMahon had at least a back-bone sufficiently stiff not to stoop when he was asked by a passionate and reasonless rabble to sign a decree dismissing in disgrace the gray-headed soldiers who, as was said of Ney, "had fought a hundred battles for France, and not one against her"—veterans who from their country's wreck had saved their country's honor, and against whom not even the blouses and miserables for whose propitiation they were sacrificed had ever dared to bring a graver charge than lack of sympathy with them—them! But Grévy—he is vacuity's ghost—"a phantasm floating in a void." He heads the line of supple statesmen; he is the capital S of the word Subserviency. Hayes is the tail of the eye.

There was enough of Lincoln to kill, and enough to Grant to kick; but Hayes is only a magic-lantern image without even a surface to be displayed upon; the screen upon which he was temporarily projected and defined in order to be voted for has been withdrawn. You can not see him, you can not feel; but you know he extends in lessening opacity all the way from the dark side of John Sherman to the confines of space. It is something to have a President whose existence can be mathematically proved.

True, having changed hands, Hayes has vetoed some bills. A veto is an act of negation, in these instances rightly, as I think, performed. But the admirers of this man may get such comfort as they can from pointing out the things he did not do. The men who "have the firmness to say No" have for some centuries been vulgarly accorded more than their share of honor. "Yes" is the dominating word in this world. "I will not" is a form of compliance familiar in the mouths of women, fools, and devotees; for "Thou shalt not" is the language of morals, authority, and religion.

Oh, deem it not presumption, Lord,
In me to revise Thy holy Word—
No jot or tittle I'd efface,
No menace dire, nor pledge of grace.
No poetry I'd blot (although it's)
Well known to Thee that I hate poets,
But humbly, reverently try
Some missing mandates to supply.
For lo! I fall of dunces ill,
Who've got by heart Thy written will;
I turn, behold! in tears away
From rogues Thy bidding who obey.
Wherever "Thou shalt not" occurs
I'd add "Thou shalt the exact reverse,"
And many a virtue, too, compel
(By plain command and threat of hell)
Which has no corresponding vice
To interdict in terms precise.
Thus I'd exterminate the brood
Of rascals negatively good—
Men Bible-clear, who ought to smart
Beneath the lash at tail of cart.
Each soul (masks, too, would then be thinner)
If not a saint, should be a sinner.
In error, Lord, if I am found,
Observe how clouds my vision bound:
Forgive my narrowness of sight,
And bless me with the larger light
In Thine imperfect Law to scan
A portion of Thy perfect Plan.

Mr. Barbour is good enough to concede to the ARGONAUT a distinguished position among those who assisted in adopting the new Constitution. Now, Clit, this is unkind. This journal did, it is true, do something to lift into prominence you and Mr. Beerstretcher, who had seen fit to connect yourselves with the movement; but you might as well say that the persons who dug the two outer post-holes on Calvary assisted in founding the Christian religion.

The newspapers of this country appear to have settled it among themselves that the rigorous measures adopted by the Czar of Russia for the suppression of Nihilism will prove ineffectual, and that the iron hand of Bismarck will fail to crush the Socialists. I have a less accurate knowledge of the future than it is the happiness of my contemporaries to possess, but I will venture the conditional prediction that if such devil's-fire as Nihilism, Socialism, Communism, and Kearneyism be not quenched with blood it will not be quenched at all. It is idle, this half-sympathetic and wholly uninstructed babble about the vitality of ideas, the futility of force, and the rest of it. Those ideas have most vitality which most commend themselves to strong and resolute rulers. The people may think, and think, but the man with a million obedient bayonets needs not care what they think. The important thing is what he thinks.

In the Czar of Russia and the Chancellor of the German Empire lie the hopes of civilization, for they are in all Christendom the only strong men—the one by virtue of great governmental powers which his predecessors had not the folly to fritter away, the other through similar, though lesser, powers and colossal brains. I firmly believe that if the despotic energies wielded by these two men fail of the purpose to which they are set the days of our civilization are numbered, and in the near future the continents of Europe and America will be devastated by barbarians from the Asian steppes, or infested with cut-throat savages sprung from our loins and wearing the skins of animals about their own.

In Russia and Germany the battle for existence must be fought for us all. Austria and Italy are blindly letting the days of opportunity slip irrecoverably away, like pearls from a string. Spain is a thing of nothing. France, England, and the United States are without government—the people govern. Whom? Themselves. They govern themselves—by themselves they are governed. What monstrous nonsense! Who governs himself needs no government, has no governor, is not governed. If government has any meaning or function it means the restraint of the many by the few—the subordination of numbers to brains. It means the determined denial to the masses of the right to cut their own throats. It means the grasp and control of all the social forces and material enginery—a vigilant censorship of the press, a firm hand upon the church, keen supervision of public meetings and public amusements, command of the railroads, telegraphs, and all means of communication. It means, in short, the ability to make use of all the beneficent influences of enlightenment for the good of the people, and to array all the dreadful appliances of civilization against civilization's natural enemies—the people. Government like this has a thousand defects, but it has one merit: it is possible.

Despotism? Yes. It is the despotisms of the world that have been the conservators of civilization. It is the despot who is most powerful for mischief, and who alone is powerful for good. It is conceded that government is necessary—even by the "fierce democracies" that madly renounce it. But in so far as government is not despotic it is not government. In Europe, for the last one hundred years, the tendency of all government has been liberalization. The history of European politics during that period is a history of renunciation by the rulers and assumption by the ruled. Sovereign after sovereign has surrendered prerogative after prerogative; the nobility privilege after privilege. Mark the result: society honeycombed with treason; property menaced with partition; assassination studied as a science and practiced as an art; everywhere powerful secret organizations sworn to demolish the social fabric that the slow centuries have built up but just erected, and unmindful that themselves will perish in the wreck. No heart in Europe can beat tranquilly under clean linen. Such is the gratitude, such the wisdom, such the virtue of The Masses. In 1863 Alexander II. of Russia freed 25,000,000 serfs. In 1879 they had all joined the conspirators.

The Kearneyism "episode" is not an episode; it is a part of the general movement. Thousands—tens of thousands of armed men are drilling all over the United States to overthrow the government. As there is no government they will depose the functionaries. Do you suppose they will stop at that? I tell you the good god, Majority, means mischief. These people who outvoted you yesterday will have you by the throat to-morrow. The robber is at your casement, and you sleep. You have wedged your door with a school-book, and fastened your sash with a newspaper! The one has taught him his power, the other his wrongs. Where was your censor? I tell you, my countrymen, there is no magic in words. Liberty, Freedom, Progress, Destiny—these are noble names; they mean something. But they do nothing, and the People are buying guns.

Formerly the bearer of evil tidings was only slain; he is now ignored. Pharaoh brained his messengers; they had grieved him, but he spared them. The gods kept their secrets by telling them to Cassandra, whom no one would believe. My friends, I do not expect to be heeded. The crust of a volcano is electric, the fumes are narcotic; the combined sensation is delightful no end. Pray do me the favor to enjoy it. I have looked at the dial of civilization; I tell you the shadow is going back. That is of small importance to men of leisure, with wine-dipped wreaths upon their heads. They do not care to know the hour. I say to you there are signs and portents—whispers and cries in the air; stealthy tread of invisible feet along the ground; sudden clamor of startled fowls at night, and crimson dew-drops on the roadside grass of a morning. I think we shall have some weather shortly, but pray do not disturb yourselves. By the way, gentlemen, I hear that preparations are already making to celebrate the centennial of 1793.

Mr. Orion Clemens, a brother of the illustrious Marcus II., has been shot out of the Presbyterian communion at Keokuk. As Mr. Clemens's offense was a lecture denying pretty much all the allegations of revealed religion he was probably not very painfully affected by his expulsion; but the pastor's sermon, if "appropriate to the occasion," as stated, must have been pretty hard to bear. We all know the story of the teamster who received the kick of a mule in grim silence because he "could not find words appropriate to the occasion." If the shepherd of this erring lamb, Clemens, had a more obedient vocabulary his remarks must have been extremely rasping.

The Church possesses the unerring compass whose needle points directly and persistently to the star of the eternal law of God.—Religious Weekly.

The Church's compass if you please,
Has two or three (or more) degrees
Of variation;
And many a soul has gone to grief
On this, or that, or t'other reef
Through Faith unreckoning, or brief Miscalculation.
Misguidance is of perils chief
To navigation.

The obsequious thing makes, too, you'll mark,
Obeisance through a little arc
Of declination;
For Satan, fearing witches, drew
From Death's pale horse, one day, a shoe,
And nailed it to his door 'undo
Their machination.
Since then the needle dips to woo
His habitation.

It has been decreed by the Congregation of Rites, of the Roman Catholic Church, that gas lights shall in no case be substituted for candles on the altar, though it is not certain whether this prohibition is based upon some religious scruple or has its broader and deeper foundation in economy. At the present rates for gas in San Francisco few churches, either Catholic or Protestant, can really afford that precious fluid. In some it has been suggested that by an arrangement with the directors of the company the surprising bills might be paid in salvation; but as corporations have no souls, and the equivalent of even the most remarkable gas bill would not go very far toward saving the individual immortal parts of the directors, the proposition has not met with much favor.

And this reminds me of a little story. A wealthy banker had subscribed a large sum of money to build a church. The priest called for it, it was handed out, and he was writing a receipt. "What are you writing?" asked the banker. "A check for eternal life," answered the priest, smiling. "Make it payable to order, father."

Another. A gentleman in reduced circumstances was applied to by a notoriously profligate friend for a small loan. "My dear fellow," was the grave reply, "I never felt my poverty till now; I am horribly unable. But I have 'laid up treasures in heaven,' fortunately; I'll give you an order." Then he added, thoughtfully: "You'll have to be identified."

Down in Bogota, it is related by a contemporary, there is a half-breed Indian named Solis (the name appears to have no particular significance) who modestly protests that he is but 180 years of age, though he is believed to be considerably older. His neighbors aver that he has sold himself to the devil, but I think not; that purchaser has not the habit of waiting so patiently for goods to be delivered at his residence—though possibly he does not require them to be delivered when purchased in South America, seeing he is so frequently passing that way. The uncommonly advanced age of Solis is, at any rate, a pleasing evidence of the salubrity of the South American imagination—superior, apparently, to that of North Carolina, where the most resolute negro has never been able to push past 130 without doing herself an injury.

Miss Neilson—may Venus the evil avert!—
Declares that she soon will the country desert.
O actress enchanting, pray don't go away:
We beg thee, entreat thee, implore thee to stay.
Thy grace we shall miss, we shall grieve for thine art,
And thy husbands, returning, will never depart!

It is difficult to agree with the colored people of Virginia that the State prohibition of their marriage with whites constitutes a sorrow of sufficient magnitude to justify an "exodus." There can not be very many whites who are desirous of marrying them, anyhow; so the grievance is at best a merely sentimental one, and it would be wise of them to seriously consider if for an idle affront to their feelings they can afford to break up their homes and renounce the privilege of voting the straight Democratic ticket every time at the shotgun's mouth. Married ladies who amiably interest themselves in match-making will observe with singular emotion the uncommon spectacle of a whole race dismally setting their sombre faces to the far frontier because they are sold in love. Really, this is a very touching affair of

THE GREAT ELECTRIC DIAPHRAGM.

Some Account of the Telegraphic System of the Baron O.—

BY ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.

A peculiarly observant eye might have noted on Clay Street, San Francisco, during the spring and summer of '78, a slight thread or cord shooting up into the firmament from the roof of a semi-detached two-story mansion, otherwise undistinguished from its neighbors and from the hundreds of other houses of the same stamp which embellish or make monotonous the metropolis of the Pacific. The eye must have been peculiarly observant to notice it at all, since it seemed scarcely more than one-eighth of an inch in thickness; but once noticed, it would certainly have attracted the attention and roused the curiosity of the intelligent observer—though it may be questioned whether the passengers on the cable railway, as they went to their offices in the morning or returned tired therefrom in the evening, would have given the matter a second thought if they had noticed it. Nor did it continue there long enough to excite public comment, since it certainly had not been seen there in April, and had as certainly disappeared in September. Though not a regular patron of these cars, I had occasion during the summer to make several trips to the top of the hill, during one of which, in the early afternoon, I happened to be the only occupant of the car. The rampant panel advertisements, which command, if they do not deserve, attention, failed to interest; the languid pose of the conductor in the dummy did not satisfy my yearnings for the beautiful; the blue-bloused heathen, swaggering listlessly along the sidewalk with hands thrust deep into pantaloons-pockets, excited neither feelings of animosity nor speculations in ethnology—in fact, I was thoroughly ennuyé. And thus, with mind open to any object of interest, however trivial, scanning the house-fronts as we rolled slowly up the hill, my eye casually fell upon this slight thread shooting straight up from the roof of one of the houses—up, up, until lost in the cerulean depths of a pellucid Californian sky. I instantly began reasoning on the meaning and object of this peculiar phenomenon. Clearly it must have a meaning, but what could it be? Whether did the cord go? Speculation was unsatisfactory; and, as I could frame no reasonable solution of the problem, I gave it up for the moment, and determined on my next trip to provide myself with telescopic assistance to penetrate the mystery. Next day I procured a very powerful binocular glass, and with it trudged up the hill till opposite the house. On arriving there I proceeded to level it point-blank at the object of interest, considering myself exonerated from the imputation of a breach of propriety on the part of the occupants by the peculiar circumstances of the case. Having brought the lower end of the cord well into the field of vision, I proceeded to elevate the lenses, but found that the cord presently vanished in the azure, at a height which I estimated at not more than a thousand feet. Disappointed at this method of scrutiny, I swept the heavens in the vicinity of the vanishing point, determined by the laws of perspective, and was finally rewarded by the discovery of a small, black speck, or atom, stationed immovably in the air at an immense height—many thousands of feet as I then judged haphazard, for there was no possible way of taking trigonometrical bearings under the circumstances. This black speck or atom was, at all events, a point gained, and I had no hesitation in mentally connecting it with the cord, though I was still as completely mystified as ever regarding its aim, end, object, or ultimate intention. I turned homeward, and, while descending the hill bent in thought, nearly ran against an individual coming up, who proved to be no other than my friend C.

"Hallo!" exclaimed C., "where are you going? I thought you always took the cars. And with an opera-glass, too, I declare! What? Been doing Telegraph Hill, and the bay, and Tamalpais, and that sort of thing, eh?"

"No," replied I; "I have had a more interesting subject of investigation to-day; and as I confess myself utterly at a loss regarding it, perhaps your extraordinary acumen may help me."

"What Gordian knot must I cut, what coil of Cretan labyrinth unravel, to suit your fancy?" rejoined C., striking the stage attitude of "Pistol."

"Well, C., the fact is, there is a coil to unravel; or, rather, I should say, the coil is already unraveled, and a puzzling one it is—by no means a metaphorical coil either, but thoroughly substantial and material."

"Well; away with enigmas. What is it?"

"As you are going up the hill," I replied, "I shall go with you and show you."

"Well, I have very little time. I have an engagement to lunch with the Baron O. at one. By the by, do you know him? No? Come with me, then, and I will introduce you. He is a Prussian savant doing the meteorology of California and the Pacific generally, and, as he means to spend some little time here, he has rented a house higher up the hill. He is always glad to see any one connected with literature or art, and I shall take the liberty of bringing you with me. You will find him something of a Colossus."

"Well," rejoined I, "I shall certainly avail myself of so good an opportunity, and leave my mystery for another day."

By this time we had climbed the hill to the spot where the house I had been examining stood, and just as I was going to call my friend's attention to the fact, to my surprise he mounted the steps and rang the door-bell. I had no time, however, to say anything before the door was opened by a servant in livery, and we were ushered into a pleasant, cool drawing-room, round which was scattered manuscripts and scientific instruments, diagrams, and drawings, all indications that the resident of the place was a man of culture, refinement, and research. I had hardly time to say to C. that my mystery centred here, and to be answered by a meaning smile, when the Baron entered, and, after shaking hands with us cordially, conducted us into a dining room where an elegant lunch was spread. The conversation had been carried on for some time in generals, but I could see that C. was gradually leading it into the sphere of the Baron's own domain in science. After discussing the meteorology of the Pacific Coast, the difficulties that lay in the way of making the weather forecasts, the unreliable nature of those signs and good in other countries, and the intimate connection of electricity with atmospheric disturbances, the

"By the by, I must show you the working of an experiment which I am now undertaking with a view to future practical results in telegraphy; and I think that, apart from its claim to novelty, it embodies a principle which will eventually change our whole system of electric signaling."

"You surprise me," remarked C. "I thought that our compatriot, Edison, had unquestionably achieved the most progressive results in this field; witness the telephone and the adaptation of the electric light."

"Here in America he undoubtedly has a great name," responded the Baron, "but is not a country apt to be too partial to its sons? In Europe his reputation, though very high, does not correspond with that which he enjoys here; indeed it is gravely questioned whether Bell does not more than divide the honors of the invention of the telephone with him, and there are several savants who have passed if not superseded him in the introduction of the electric light."

"Then you do not really give Edison credit for anything he has done!" remarked I.

"Yes; I make an exception in his favor; and, as far as utility is concerned, it is destined to hold a very high place in electric discoveries—and that is the duplex system of telegraphy. This is an invention of Edison, and must forever be associated with his name, for I believe there is no other claimant to the honor. Were it not for the discovery of this wonderful property of electricity, the experiments I am now engaged in would never have been made. I presume you are aware of the principle involved in what is known as the duplex system?"

Not being answered by an affirmative sufficiently assuring the Baron proceeded:

"It is possible to transmit two or more messages along the same line, and in the same direction, by employing receiving instruments which are sensible to strong currents, and insensible to weak ones; or which are affected by a change in the character of the currents from positive to negative, or vice versa. The same rule holds good at either end; and the limit of the multiple messages is dependent only on the sensibility of the instruments, and the fineness of their adjustment. I am not aware that more than sixteen simultaneous messages have been conveyed along a single wire—eight from either end; but, as I say, the possibility of an indefinite numerical augmentation is bounded merely by our skill in mechanics. Theoretically ten million messages may be simultaneously sent with the same readiness as two. With the coarse instruments in present use, even a trifling increase would be productive of inextricable confusion. But as the usages of society and business do not, as yet, demand such wide and extended communication as I have hinted at, there is no fear that the wires in present use will be so crowded with matter as to impair their usefulness."

"A good illustration, however, of genius directed to practical ends (known to none better than to your countrymen) is to first create a want and then supply it. If it were possible for persons divided by seas and continents to converse freely and naturally, and at the same time with the same privacy as they would enjoy if closeted in a room at home, it is only reasonable to suppose that people would not be slow to avail themselves of the opportunity, provided the item of expense—and this is, after all, the most important consideration in a popular matter—did not prove a drawback. But, now, if you will accompany me to the drawing-room, I will make some experiments in your presence which I think will prove gratifying to you. I impose no restrictions upon you, trusting entirely to your own good judgment in making the matter public, since I am happy to say I can afford to indulge my scientific propensities without the necessity of the stimulus of gain; but I would prefer that you would not use my name in connection with the matter, as I have a horror of publicity, and my respect for the unconventional genius of the American press is, I must confess, tempered by a wholesome modicum of dread. Therefore I must beg of you not to make the facts public till I have, at least, left California," continued the Baron, laughing.

Returning to the drawing-room, the Baron led us to one corner where stood a massive, though small, table securely clamped to the floor. Just beneath it lay an iron-bound cylinder or drum about three feet long by six inches diameter, around which were wound close coils of what appeared to be a very fine though strong silken cord; the free end of which passed upward through an aperture in the top of the table, and, running up the corner of the room, disappeared through a hole in the ceiling above. The drum when coiled to its utmost capacity must have held many thousands of feet of the delicate cord, though now but little remained upon it. I also noticed that the shaft or axle on which the drum revolved passed through bearings in the sides of the table, the boxings of which were made of glass. A single solid slab of plate glass formed the top of the table, to which was affixed a piece of mechanism resembling in its general characteristics those instruments which are commonly used in connection with telegraphy, terminating in an oblong box provided with a mouthpiece suggestive of a telephone: the distinctive difference being that this box was at least three times as long as that of an ordinary telephone, and that its sides were supplied with three screws at equal intervals along its length.

I had at once recognized the cord, the origin of which had puzzled me this morning, and I told the Baron how my curiosity had been excited, and what I had done to relieve it. He seemed amused, and rather confused me by telling me that he had been watching my evolutions outside from the window, and had greatly enjoyed my evident mystification.

I bent down and examined the cord, and found that it consisted of many strands of silk finely woven together, and though of very slender appearance, being scarcely more than one-eighth of an inch in thickness—evidently capable of bearing heavy strains. Around it was wound spirally a very fragile wire, scarcely visible to the eye but by its whitish glitter, and with only sufficient helix to bind it securely to the cord.

"Now," said the Baron, making a connection between a metal disk (fixed to the glass slab, through a hole in which the wire cord ran) and the telephone instrument aforesaid. "let us see how the mechanism works to-day."

So saying he applied his mouth to the orifice, and called "Franz! Franz!"

Then turning to us, and examining his watch, remarked, "He should be on time, now."

Scarcely had he finished speaking when a voice issued from the telephone (for so I shall term it) of exceeding clearness, "Fertig, Herr Baron!"

The Baron smiled and entered into a conversation with the voice in his own language.

The discussion became animated; the responses quicker and louder; when suddenly the Baron turned very excitedly to us saying:

"Berlin is in an uproar. The Emperor was shot at by an assassin while driving up Unter den Linden a few hours ago; and it seems Franz has repeatedly called me, but I have been out all the morning, and consequently did not hear him. Though scarcely two o'clock here it is now past midnight in Prussia—my usual hour for getting my day's bulletin."

"Strange that I did not hear anything about it in the city!" remarked C. I glanced over the bulletin at the Chronicle office just before I came up here, but there was no intimation of anything of the kind there. Yet you tell me that chance alone prevented you from obtaining this news several hours ago. Your facilities must be superior to those of the Associated Press!"

"They are," responded the Baron. "The inevitable delays caused by the reproduction of messages at different stations on the route, makes the operation more tedious and protracted than my method. I get my news first-hand," continued he smiling, "and instantaneously."

"Do you mean to say," queried C., "that you have communication with Berlin other than that by the ordinary route, and in the ordinary manner?"

"I do," said the Baron. "I hold at present the actual monopoly of the grandest telegraphic system conceivable to the human mind; a system perfectly simple, and, therefore, perfectly in accord with natural laws; a system, too, capable of infinite extension and of the widest utility."

"Pardon me for my skepticism," rejoined C. "My faith in things is staggered. Nevertheless, you have the best proof of the validity of your system, whatever it may be, in the facts we have just witnessed."

"Don't be alarmed," replied the Baron laughing. "I am no professor of the occult sciences; but shall engage to explain this experiment in a logical manner, and to sustain it by thorough scientific proofs, before you leave. Pray do not relegate me to the spiritual companionship of poor, much-abused Satan, without permitting me to adduce evidence in my defense."

C. blushed—(a prodigy rarer than black swan-down), and the Baron, turning again to the telephone, called as before—"Franz!"

Without the least delay an answer came as if spoken by some one in the next room, and, as usual, in German.

"Cloudy or clear?" asked the Baron.

"Clear," replied the voice.

The Baron made a memorandum in his note-book, remarking that he was engaged amongst other things in collating comparative statistics in meteorology.

"Franz," continued he, "is my man—an old servant—whom I have left in charge of my house in Berlin during my absence. He informs me upon current topics very readily as you see. I am therefore independent of the daily papers for my home news."

"Gute nacht!" here issued from the telephone, and was responded to by the Baron, who informed us that Franz had now gone to bed.

A pause ensued for some moments during which C. seemed to be in deep thought. He at length spoke with great gravity and said—

"Herr Baron, this experiment is as marvelous as it is inexplicable. Much as I should desire to gain an insight into its nature, I am diffident in pressing you on the subject, since it is quite natural that you might desire to preserve secrecy on so important a discovery."

"Not at all," said the Baron. "The only condition I impose is, that you will not say anything about it during my stay in California. You are perfectly at liberty to examine the apparatus, excepting the interior of the box, which I can not conveniently take apart. There are, too, some details connected with it which you must excuse me for reserving the right to disclose in the proper manner and at the proper time. I shall, however, be happy to explain the principle of the whole to you if you have time to listen to what I say."

We assured him that it was our particular desire to learn more, and the Baron, requesting us to be seated, at the same time settling himself comfortably in an arm-chair, and leisurely crossing his legs with the air of a man who is about to enter upon an extended disquisition, spoke as follows:

"Whether the origin of electricity is to be sought for in the penetralia of the cosmic ether, and as a permanent entity of the universe, or whether it is manufactured by some frictional process constantly going on between this planet of ours and the sun—in other words, whether it has an independent existence outside of other forces, or is merely one of the conditions of motion—can only be determined by future observation and experiment. We know, however, that physical disturbances in the solar photosphere cause sympathetic action in our world, and are attended with marked magnetic effects. The sun in its relation to its attendant planets holds the same position as the heart does to the outlying organs in the economy of animal life. Solar pulsations vibrate to the remotest bounds of the planetary system, and perhaps beyond it, giving life or dealing death. Our planet is a vast instrument—an indicator, a telephone—which vibrates in sympathy to every whim of its monster interlocutor. Light-waves traverse the intervening distance of ninety millions of miles in eight minutes; electricity bridges this span in less than the same number of seconds. Yet by employing the geographical mile as a standard for cosmical measurements, we are apt to receive erroneous impressions of speed in relation to space: for even electricity is a calm, staid, and deliberate force when measured in the scale of such a mighty fraternity as planetary diameters and orbits. Now, considering our world in its huge bulk as nothing but an enormous magnet, were it in direct communication with the sun—in other words, if the electric current could pass without interruption from the sun to the earth—life would be, if not an impossibility, at least so precarious as to render it insupportable. The fruits of a continent might be blasted with the same ease as the trunk of a tree; instead of those marine phenomena of inverted vortices, called waterspouts, a whole ocean might be sucked up clear from the surface of the planet, to be precipitated again haphazard in any quarter. Such is the gigantic force of the element or condition of which we know next to nothing, as compared to ourselves and our puny works! A signal instance of the power of electricity occurred some time ago when an iron bridge spanning the Missouri was observed by an astonished witness to rise vertically into the air to the height of several hundred feet during a terrific thunder-storm, and then to fall back into the river. This story was naturally discredited until the engineer who constructed the bridge gave evidence that, as neither the upright stanchions nor the sockets in which they were imbedded were broken, nothing but a vertical lift could account for their becoming separated in an uninjured condition. Happily, the wise Intelligence who gave laws to matter provided against the occurrence of casualties like these by protecting the body of the planet by a covering or envelope, which though perfectly transparent and inappreciable to any of our ordinary senses, is yet as strong as was his massy shield to the Greek hoplite or the Roman legionary, and which presents an impenetrable barrier to the sharp impacts which would otherwise tear the planet in terrible convulsions at each sudden change in the solar conditions. This electric diaphragm extends (so far as I have yet been able to compute its elements) from the exterior limit of our atmosphere to within about two miles of the surface of the earth; but, being electric, it expands and contracts considerably beyond or within these limits sympathetically with solar or planetary conditions on a principle not dissimilar to that of the pupil of the eye. In tropical regions it approaches nearer and is of greater thickness; toward the poles it recedes further, and is of extreme tenuity. The nearer it approaches the earth the more violent are the electric exchanges between the diaphragm and the planet—said exchanges being based upon the same laws of equilibrium which obtain in ordinary commercial business. If the earth, under certain conditions, has imparted more electricity than she subsequently finds necessary from the diaphragm, the surplus does not fail to be returned in due course, and vice versa. The intervening space between these inner and outer electric reservoirs is neutral, and, being unfavorable to the retention of electricity, the fluid is attracted to one side or the other. The diaphragm commonly contains the larger quantity, since it can draw upon the infinite resources of the ether; but that the balance of exchange is occasionally in favor of the planet is evinced in the case of those thunder-storms where the lightning is observed to shoot upward from the ground into the sky.

"But it is to another property of the diaphragm that I wish now to direct your attention, and with which we especially have to deal, and that is its impressibility (if I may use the term) to extraneous magnetic influences. The slightest and most delicate magnetic vibration affecting any portion of its body is communicated instantaneously to the whole. And not only this, but an infinite number of vibrations can be simultaneously communicated; and such communications are each of them separate and distinct, nor do they interfere with each other. To use a simile, when a stone is dropped into the centre of a calm lake, the circular wave-line, which widens from the point of impact can be distinctly traced for some distance; and our failure to trace it to the uttermost shores is simply a circumstance of the grossness of our visual sense. The extreme slowness of such a pulsation as this, and the resistance of such a heavy medium as water, render it practically impossible to trace it for any great distance either of space or time. But in the pulsations of the electric diaphragm the case is different. The electric fluid is of such extreme tenuity that a pulsation originating in any part of it is diffused synchronously through the whole. If, then, I wish to converse with any one on any portion of this globe, all that is necessary is that I should open communication with such person through the medium of the magnetic belt. To do this, we must both be in connection with it. My connection you see over there in the corner. That silken line which runs up through the ceiling is the beginning of that cord which attracted your notice to-day. It is bound with a very delicate platinum wire, which metal I chose for its ductility and conductive qualities. That cylindrical drum which you see below the table is three feet long by six inches in diameter, and has a capacity for containing twenty thousand feet—nearly four miles—of the silken cord, a length more than sufficient to penetrate the diaphragm even in the highest latitudes. A small silken balloon, six feet in diameter, inflated with hydrogen, and made waterproof by a varnish of caoutchouc, is attached to the end of the line, and serves to convey the wire into the region of the diaphragm and to keep it there as long as required. That tiny engine, which you see with crank attached to the pulley of the drum, brings down the balloon and coils up my line in less than half an hour. A similar balloon and line tap the diaphragm from my house in Berlin. To the ends of both are attached telephones. Any telegraphic instrument would serve equally well; but the telephone is the simplest, most convenient, and my favorite par excellence. You have witnessed the operation of my method, and I now ask you," turning to C., and bantering him good-naturedly, "whether I have made good my promise to explain my experiment rationally, or whether I must content myself with the reputation of a dabbler in mediæval magic?"

"Since you throw down the gauntlet, Herr Baron," rejoined C., determined not to be taken at a disadvantage, "I shall, with your permission, put some questions and raise some objections which seem to me pertinent, if you are willing to answer them."

"Allons!" laughed the Baron.

"You yourself admit that you have at present a monopoly of this telegraphic system; in other words, there are no other lines in operation but your connections here and in Berlin. Supposing, however, that there were one hundred or one thousand balloon connections tapping this diaphragm and transmitting simultaneous pulsations through the ether, how would it be possible that your telephone should receive only the message of Franz, to the exclusion of the thousand other messages which are vibrating in every direction at the same time? Pardon me for imagining that the maddening discord of Babel would compare favorably with the utterances of our telephone," and C. lolled back in his chair with the air of a man who has made a successful point.

"You are quite right," returned the Baron, "they certainly would, if all the instruments used were of the same plan or pattern. You will remember what I said about Edison's discovery of the principle involved in the duplex system. Without the discovery of this property of electricity my experiments would never have been made. I must, however, give myself credit for widening and developing the principle which Edison evolved. Under my system this telephone here is sensible only to vibrations emanating from another telephone keyed electrically to the same pitch. Those three screws which you observe at equal intervals on the side of the box are connected with the hands which indicate degrees on the dial plates which surround them. The possible combinations of these three hands upon their respective dial-plates, varying them one degree at a time, are represented by $360 \times 360 \times 360$, or 46,656,000—upward of forty-six millions of simultaneous messages can be transmitted through the ether without the one interfering with the other. Such message, indeed, reaches each telephone, but the vibrations—all of which are recorded at the first stage of the box—may be eliminated on their passage through the second or third. In order to communicate with any one possessing connection with the diaphragm, you have simply to screw your telephone to his combination."

"Supposing," said C., "more than one couple has fixed upon the same combination?"

"You will certainly receive," replied the Baron, "messages not intended for your ears; but as you will be in the same predicament of publishing your private affairs, I imagine that a very little experience will suffice to make you change your combination. Abuse is to some extent unavoidable, but the novelty will soon wear off; and besides the knowledge that you may be haranguing a large audience will make you more careful of what you say—alone a considerable recommendation," continued he, with a dry twinkle of his eye.

"Will not the diaphragm be more sensitive to magnetic disturbances than are the wires of our mundane system? and these, as you are well aware, are often incapacitated by thunder storms?"

"A thunder-clap is telephonically merely a message, and can only be reproduced by an instrument keyed to thunder pitch, an occurrence which you need be in no apprehension of."

"One more question," said C.; "would not a considerable number of such connections entail danger by attracting electricity in the form of lightning?"

"On the contrary," returned the Baron, "the more connections that exist between the earth and the diaphragm, the more balanced and regular will be the adjustment of their magnetic regulations."

"It is, however," urged C., "an expensive system. In any case it could only be used by persons of means."

"By no means," rejoined the Baron. "The only individual expense would be the telephone. One public wire tapping the diaphragm would be sufficient for a small town. Even a single telephone would suffice, under charge of an officer to whom you would simply mention your combination, and who would send your message as you would a letter by post."

"I confess you meet my objections, Baron, as fast as I raise them. May I ask in what manner you were led to imagine the existence of such a marvelous phenomenon as the electric diaphragm—unless you have any private reason for concealing it?"

"None in the world," answered the Baron frankly. "But as the story is too long to tell you just now, can you do me the favor to come to an early dinner next Sunday? It was the purest accident, and I take no credit for it. Quite romantic, too—happened only last summer in the Tyrol. It was a lucky chance which benefited me in two ways—for by it I not only made a discovery, but won a wife. Come upon Sunday, and I will introduce you to the one, and relate to you the other."

SAN FRANCISCO, May, 1879.

MY SHIPWRECK.

In the summer of 1874 I was in Liverpool, whither I had gone on business for the mercantile house of Bronson & Jarrett, New York. My name is William Jarrett; my partner, Zenas Bronson, is dead; the firm failed last year, and, unable to endure the fall from affluence to poverty, he committed suicide. I came to San Francisco three months ago, where there are several persons to whom this narrative will be a twice-told tale.

Having finished my business, and feeling the lassitude and exhaustion incident to its dispatch, it occurred to me that a protracted sea-voyage would be both agreeable and beneficial, so instead of embarking for my return on one of the many fine passenger steamers I booked for New York on the sailing vessel Morrow, upon which I had shipped a large and valuable invoice of the goods I had purchased. The Morrow was an English ship, with, of course, but limited accommodations for passengers, of whom there were only myself, a young woman, and her servant, a middle-aged negress. I thought it singular that a traveling English woman should be so attended, but she afterward explained to me that the woman had been left with her family by a gentleman and his wife from South Carolina, both of whom had died on the same day at the house of the young lady's father in Devonshire—a circumstance in itself sufficiently uncommon to remain rather distinctly in my memory, even had it not afterward transpired in conversation with the young lady that the name of the gentleman was William Jarrett, the same as my own. I knew that a branch of my family had settled in South Carolina, but of them and their history I was altogether ignorant.

The Morrow sailed from the mouth of the Mersey on the fifteenth of June, and for several weeks we had fair breezes and unclouded skies. The skipper, an admirable seaman, but nothing more, favored us with very little of his society, except at his table; and the young woman, Miss Janette Harford, and I became very well acquainted; we were, in truth, nearly always together, and being of an introspective turn of mind I often endeavored to analyze and define the novel feeling with which she inspired me—a secret, subtle, but powerful attraction which constantly impelled me to seek her—but the attempt was hopeless. I could only be sure that at least it was not love. Having assured myself of this, and being reasonably certain that she was quite as whole-hearted, I ventured one evening (I remember it was on the 3d of July) as we sat on deck, to ask her laughingly if she could assist me to resolve my psychological doubt.

For a moment she was silent with averted face, and I began to fear I had been extremely rude and indelicate; then she fixed her eyes gravely on my own. In an instant my mind was dominated by as strange a fancy as ever entered human consciousness. It seemed as if she was looking at me, not with, but through, those eyes—from an immeasurable distance behind them—and that where she sat a number of other people, men, women, and children, upon whose faces I caught strangely familiar evanescent expressions, clustered about her, struggling with gentle eagerness to look at me through the same orbs. Ship, ocean, sky—all had vanished. I was conscious of nothing but the figures in this extraordinary and fantastic scene. Then all at once darkness fell upon me, and anon from out of it, as to one who grows accustomed by degrees to a dimmer light, my former surroundings of deck and mast and cordage slowly resolved themselves. Miss Harford had closed her eyes, and was leaning back in her chair, apparently asleep, the book she had been reading open in her lap. Impelled by surely I can not say what motive, I glanced at the top of the page; it was a copy of that rare and curious work, Denneker's Meditations, and the lady's index finger rested on this passage:

"To sundry it is given to be drawn away, and to be apart from the body for a season; for, as concerning rills which would flow across one another the weaker is borne along by the stronger, so there be certain of kin whose paths intersecting, their souls do bear company, the while their bodies go fore-appointed ways, unknowing."

Miss Harford arose, shuddering; the sun had sunk below the horizon, but it was not cold. There was not a breath of wind; there were no clouds in the sky, yet not a star was visible. There was a hurried trampling on the deck; the Captain, summoned from below, joined the first officer, who stood looking at the barometer. "Good God!" I heard him exclaim. An hour later the form of Janette Harford, invisible in the darkness and spray, was torn from my grasp by the cruel vortex of the sinking ship, and I fainted in the cordage of the floating mast to which I had lashed myself.

It was by lamplight that I awoke. I lay in a berth amid the familiar surroundings of the stateroom of a steamer. On a couch opposite sat a man, half undressed for bed, reading a book. I recognized the face of my friend Gordon Doyle, whom I had met in Liverpool on the day of my embarkation. He was himself about to sail on the steamer City of Prague, on which he had vainly urged me to accompany him. After some moments I spoke his name. He simply said, "Well," and turned a leaf in his book, without removing his eyes from the page.

"Doyle," I repeated, "did they save her?" He now deigned to look at me and smile as if amused. He evidently thought me but half awake.

"Her? Whom do you mean?"

"Janette Harford."

His amusement turned to amazement; he stared at me fixedly, saying nothing.

"You will tell me after a while," I continued; "I suppose you will tell me after a while."

A moment later I asked: "What ship is this?"

Doyle stared again. "The steamer City of Prague, bound from Liverpool to New York, three weeks out with a broken shaft. Principal passenger, Mr. Gordon Doyle; ditto lunatic, Mr. William Jarrett. These two distinguished travelers embarked together, but they are about to part, it being the resolute intention of the former to chuck the latter overboard."

I sat bolt upright. "Do you mean to say that I have been three weeks on this steamer?"

"Yes, pretty nearly; this is the third of July."

"Have I been ill?"

"Right as a trivet all the time, and punctual at your meals."

"My God, Doyle, there is some mystery here; do have the goodness to be serious. Was I not rescued from the wreck of the ship Morrow?"

Doyle turned ghastly pale, and approaching me, laid his fingers on my wrist. A moment later: "What do you know of Janette Harford?" he asked very calmly.

"First tell me what you know of her?"

Mr. Doyle gazed at me for some moments as if to ascertain what to do, then seating himself again on the couch, said:

"You are my friend; why should I not? I am engaged to marry Janette Harford, whom I met a year ago in London. Her family, one of the wealthiest in Devonshire, opposed our union, and we eloped—are eloping rather, for on the day that you and I walked to the landing stage to go aboard this steamer she and her faithful servant, a negress, passed us, driving to the ship Morrow. She would not consent to go in the same vessel with me, and it was deemed best that she take a sailing vessel in order to avoid observation and lessen the risk of detention. I am now alarmed lest this cursed breaking of our machinery may detain us so long that the Morrow will get to New York before us, and the poor girl will not know where to go."

I lay still in my berth—so still I hardly breathed, indeed. But the subject was evidently not displeasing to Doyle, and after a short pause he resumed:

"By the way, she is only an adopted daughter of the Harfords. Her mother was killed at their place by being thrown from a horse while hunting, and the husband, mad with grief, made away with himself the same day. No one ever claimed the child, and after a reasonable time they adopted it. Sorry to deprive them, really."

"Doyle, what book are you reading?"

"Oh, it's called Denneker's Meditations. It's a rum lot. Janette gave it to me; she happened to have two copies. Want to see it?"

He tossed me the volume, which opened as it fell. On one of the exposed pages was a marked passage:

"To sundry it is given to be drawn away, and to be apart from the body for a season; for, as concerning rills which would flow across one another the weaker is borne along by the stronger, so there be certain of kin whose paths intersecting, their souls do bear company, the while their bodies go fore-appointed ways, unknowing."

"She had—she has—a singular taste in reading," I aged to say, mastering my agitation.

"Yes. And now perhaps you will have the kindness to explain how you knew her name and that of the sailor in."

"You talked of her in your sleep," I said.

A week later we were towed into the port of New York. But the Morrow was never heard from.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

There was a dog, and there was a cat, and there was a lam, and there was a ox. The dog it sed to the ox, the dog did: "That's a mity long tail you got there, mister, with a nice tossle to the end, but you can't whaggle it wen you meet yure master."

Then the cat it sed to the ox, too: "No, in deed, and you cant blo it up like a bloon wen you git mad."

Then the lam it sed: "You aint able for to twinkle it, ether, when you think of some thing funny."

The ox he thot a wile, and bime by he spoke up, and sed his ownself: "I plade hooky wen I was a little boy so much that I didnt lern them vain accomplishments, thats a fact, but I got a tolaby good bissen edcation, and I gess mebbly you fellers wude have to cum to me for to bellup you out if you had to fil a order for ox tail soop."

Wen Mr. Gipple was in Africa he seen sum natif niggers wich is call Hotentops, and they likes their beef raw, like dogs, and he see em cut it off of the cattles wile they was a life and bellerin. And sum of the cattles had ben cut up a good deel that way, but not ded. One day the king of the Hotentops he see Mister Gipple, and he said, the king said: "Did you se any cattles long the road you cum? Cos mine hav strade a way and I cant fine them."

Mister Gipple he said: "Yes, sir, jest over be yond that hil is a porter house stake with one horn broke off, and bout a mile further long yule find a rib roast eatin the willers, and near by I seen 2 hotches of bull fiting sum soop bones, and onto the other side the spring I ges yule se a livver and sum tripe a layin in the shade and chewn their cuds."

But Mister Brily the bucher he kanocks em onto the hed with axes and cuts their throte in a minnit, and me and Billy we say hooray! Cows is beef, and a calef it is veal, but little pigs is mutton.

One time I was in Mister Brilys shop, and he had cut off a pigs bed and set it on the top of a barl, and ole Gaffer Peters he cum in and seen it, and he sed, ole Gaffer did: "Mister Brily yure pig is a gittin out."

Mister Brily he loked, and then he sed: "Thats so, Gaffer, you jake take that stick and rap him onto the nose fore he can draw it in."

So Gaffer he tuke the stick and snook up reel sli, and fetched the pigs hed a regler nose wiper, hard as ever he cude with the stick, and kanocked the pigs hed off the barl and you never seen sech a stonish old man! But Mister Brily he ptended like he wasent a lookn, and ole Gaffer he sed: "Mister Brily, you must excuse me, but wen I struck at that pig it dodged and cut its hed of agin the edge of the barl."

Uncle Ned he sez the sabbadges in Feejy eats themselves, and one time there was a mitionary preacher went there for to peswade em to stop it, and one day wile he was goin round the country preechin pork an beens he stoop at a sabbadges house for to git diner. Wen him and the sabbage set down to the table there wasent nothin for to be et any jest a mans leg. The mitionary preacher he was fraid of the sabbage, and didnt kanow wot to do, so he stuck his fork in the leg and turned it over, and sed: "I cant eat this, cos its too done. Wot kind of a cook have you got?"

So the sabbage he took it a way, and bime by he cum back with a other leg, wich wasent only jest warnd thru, and set it on the table and sed: "No gest of mine shal ask for enny thing and not git it. Thats the cook."

Wen Uncle Ned was in Feejy he was in a town were the natif sabbadges had ben civilize, and had a grave yard and a church. A wite man he was the preacher, and he under took all wich died, and he was the docktor, and kep a drug store, and was a stone cutter by trade, and sole tobm stones. Evry grave had a tobm stone, cos he preched that thay cudent go to beven les thay had one, and there was a ephitap on each stone, wich he made em pay for, but thay cudent read it. Uncle Ned has rote some of em out for me. The first grave was a short feller, and this was the ephitap:

"Little Jack Horner, who sat in a corner,
Eating Christmas pie,
He stuck in his gums, and pulled out some thumbs,
And said what a brave boy am I!"

The nex grave was a long one, and the ephitap was as folers:

"Old Mother Hubbard, who went to the cupboard
To get the poor dog a bone.
What bones she kept there I will not declare,
Though it's pretty generally known."

Then there was a dubble grave, without only but jest one single stone, and this poetry:

"Jacky Sprat, who could eat no fat,
And his wife, who could eat no lean,
They rather drew on the towns in view,
And the population between."

The nex was a other tiny little one, like the ferst, and the ephitap it sed:

"Here lies the little girl who had the little curl
Which hung right down on her forehead.
When she'd had her food she was very, very good,
But you bet you when she bit you she was horrid!"

Thems all Uncle Ned coppied out, but he was offt mad, and he hunted up the rite man wich was the under taker and evry thing, and sed: "Wot for have you plade it on them poor ded fokes that way, you wrasle?"

The man he sed: "I done the best I kanew how, cos I aint much scholar and no poet. I lost my library wen Profidence casted me a shore among this binited people, and the poetry wich I knew I hav giv em, with sech improofments as the occasion sugckested. It wude be a goodeel Cristerer not a pitch in to a pore feller wich is a doin his livel best a ordin to his lite, but jest hand me out the Pirets Own Song ook, for the new grave yard wich lme a startin over at Ballywhack."

But Uncle Ned was so digusted he cum a way, cos he new the feller was lyin, and he says he sets his face agin that like a flint. But Missy, thats my sister, she lide like a thet I wen she sed her yung man hadent got no wort on his neck.

SAN RAFAEL, May 22, 1879.

WAS IT DEATH?

One frequently hears, nowadays, of the injection of medicines into the veins, by means of a hypodermic syringe, as one of the new-fashioned modes of cure. My own experience in the matter, limited as it is, may be useful as a warning both to physicians and sufferers, and it may be interesting, first, because it is real; secondly, as we must all die sometime or other, I suppose most of us wonder now and then how it will feel. Now, if what I went through was not death, it was at least so near it that as far as physical sensation went it was practically the same thing.

I had been ill for some time, suffering from frequent returns of severe pains, which the doctors thought might be rheumatic, or might be neuralgic, or might be something else. At any rate, they could not hit upon the medicines either to relieve these pains or to prevent their recurrence. Meantime, while they were experimenting, I was getting weak and thin; so it was determined to try and ease me of my misery, if even only for a time, in hopes that nature would gather a little strength, and perhaps succeed in doing what the doctors had failed in—curing me.

I had a great objection to taking opium on account of its well known injurious effects, and I had borne a great deal of pain rather than take it. The doctors, however, overcame my objections by assuring me that the injection of morphine under the skin was not attended with the same injury to the constitution and was usually more efficacious in cases like mine than any other way of taking the drug. Accordingly I was furnished with a very small syringe, which would hold just the right dose, to the end of which was attached a sharp-pointed gold tube about the size of a sailor's needle. A small bottle of morphine was also provided, and I promised faithfully to use it according to directions on the return of severe pain. My medical attendant was very anxious to try it then and there himself, but as, at the time of his visit, I was enjoying an interval of ease, I would not consent to this, feeling confident—as, indeed, he himself did—of my capacity to administer it, and being without any anxiety as to the result.

That night, before going to bed, several severe twinges which had been at me for an hour or more, gave unmistakable warning of another night of sleepless torment, unless I could find relief somewhere. Of course I thought of the little syringe. If I had had any apprehensions about the effects, I certainly should have had some assistance at hand; but I am an unimaginative individual, taking things as they come, so I said good-night, went to my room, and locked the door as usual. When my preparations for the night were complete, I took my new friend out of its pretty little morocco case, and filled the syringe only about two-thirds full of the solution, for such were my doctor's orders, as I had never previously taken morphine in any way; it is to this precaution I probably owe my life. Then, according to instruction, I pinched up a piece of the calf of my leg tightly between the finger and thumb of my left hand, inserted the point of the tube under the skin, with a dexterity which, I remember, pleased me at the time, as I thought what a skillful surgeon might have been lost to suffering humanity by the untoward circumstances of my early life, and gently introduced into my system the magic fluid which was to relieve me of all suffering. It did it with a vengeance, and with unexpected rapidity, too.

The first sensation was as of something not belonging to me crawling under my skin, and mounting rapidly up my back-bone, spreading thence all over my body, as it went. This was not at all painful to me, nor was I at all alarmed by it, for, though certainly very peculiar, I took it all at first as part of the programme, and troubled myself no more about it than so far as to hastily unlock the door, thinking, "There is no telling how long I shall sleep, and if I don't open the door in the morning they will be frightened."

By this time the crawling feeling had mounted the back of my neck. I could trace it as it moved; my limbs were beginning to refuse to serve me; I was obliged to totter to the bed without putting out my light, for though not the least sleepy, I should have fallen had I not helped myself by chairs and tables. There I lay, eyes wide open, senses all alive, quite out of pain, but no idea of going to sleep. When the crawling thing, whatever it was, reached the back of my head, it seemed to give a slight blow to that part, and immediately I lost all power over my limbs. Still I retained perfect consciousness. I heard the movements going on in different parts of the house. I saw the moon rise and peer in at one of the windows, and I remembered with a slight feeling of annoyance, that, about midnight, the light would come in full upon my bed through another window, the curtain of which I had neglected to pull down. If I had seen burglars breaking into the room I could not have moved nor spoken. I was not troubled about this, however, nor indeed much about anything else on earth. I watched my symptoms with care and interest, and felt certain I was not going to sleep, though what was coming next I could not guess. The only feeling of concern about anything that I remember was a thought that arose in my mind like this: "What a horrible fuss Effie will make when she finds me in this state." Even this did not trouble me much, for it really did not seem to be any business of mine.

By degrees, but so slowly as to be hardly noticeable, I lost all consciousness of my extremities. At first, though I could not control them, I was quite aware that I had hands and feet, as a man in perfect health knows it without either touching them or feeling pleasure or pain in them. Now I seemed to lose them, to go from them, or rather shrink from them, as from sensible contact with a foreign body, more into myself. This peculiar loss of consciousness extended very gradually up my limbs. Still I had my senses; my eyes were open, I could see everything around me, I could hear as well as ever, my mind was clear and perfectly tranquil. I was neither frightened, nor agitated, nor anxious, nor, I must confess, was I impressed with any peculiar solemnity attaching to the occasion. Perhaps this was owing to my habitual matter-of-fact disposition. I seemed to myself just as complete without any arms and legs as when I had them.

Little by little I lost my body, and with equal indifference. Whether my heart ceased to beat and my lungs to breathe at this time I can not tell you, for I had no means of knowing, but if they had I did not seem to miss them. Soon I was gone up to my neck. Then, and not till then, my senses began to grow dim. First, my sight, not as by the closing of my eyes, but objects disappeared, leaving only the impression of light upon the eye; then that, too, faded, and finally no consciousness of the organ remained. My hearing was still with me, or I with it, which ever you prefer to say. Soon it, too, left me. Head, face, body, senses, all seemed gone—everything except a feeling of weight in my tongue, and a round spot in the back of my head where I had previously felt the blow. Then my tongue went, and the round spot was all that was left, yet this seemed just as absolutely and completely me as ever my whole body had been.

This state continued apparently a long while, during which I remember wondering what Dr. S. would say when he saw me, hoping he would not meet with any annoyance about his share of the transaction. As to anxiety about worldly or any other affairs, fear for the future, memory instantaneously flashing before me the events of my whole life down to the minutest particulars—as we are told it sometimes does—I had no such experience, and I admit I can not now contemplate the state I was then in with anything like the composure I felt at the time, though I distinctly thought to myself: "This, certainly, is the last;" yet it was with something of relief at its being so well over.

Even that consciousness of existence went, and there was nothing in place of it for I know not how long. The whole affair, from the first injection of the morphine to the complete loss of sensibility, seemed to me to last some five or six hours; but, of course, I can not be sure that I am right, as I had nothing to measure time by except my own sensations.

The next thing I have any idea of was the feeling of external warmth applied to my cold body. This I felt all over me at once. Then came a terrible struggle within me, but in which I seemed to have no will—it was, probably the first attempt of the involuntary organs to commence their work again. It was very distressing, and if I had known how to get away from it I would have done so. At last I became aware of people moving about me and of warm sunshine around me. With a terrific effort I opened my eyes and saw where I was—out on the verandah, upon which my own room opened, with the warm morning sun and fresh breeze pouring their beneficent influences upon me.

Poor dear Effie was by my side, not making the "horrible fuss" I had supposed she would, but, white and silent, vigorously rubbing me as if her own life depended on it, while the tall, constable figure of Doctor S. was hovering over me, performing some most extraordinary antics, which I was afterwards informed were the most approved artificial methods of restoring respiration. I drew a feeble, gasping sigh.

"Water, Doctor, water!" cried Effie; "he is alive. Dash it over his head and neck." She raised me in her arms as she spoke, turning my face to the breeze. I think I should have choked but for that cool wind blowing over me. A dash of cold water made me draw a long, deep breath, and set heart and lungs at their regular work again. So I "came to," as people call it, and a very disagreeable process it is—much more so than "going off," if I may judge by my own experience of the two.

I was very ill all that day; as weak as a little child, and for days I could not walk across the room without staggering like a drunken man. By degrees I got quite over it, but I think I shall carry with me to my grave the horrible impression of what I suffered in coming back to life.

It seems Effie came to my room in the morning to see why I did not come to breakfast and found me lying on the bed, cold, and apparently quite lifeless. I suppose, in fact, I must have looked very terribly, and really dead, for I can never get her to talk about it. The poor little woman, when I force the subject upon her, cries: "Don't, don't! I never thought to have seen that sight and lived to talk with 'you about it,' and she grows so white I am forced to give it up."

Dr. S. says when he first saw me he certainly thought that I was dead. I believe he has never since prescribed the hypodermic use of morphine. JAMES FITZ WILLIAM.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 22, 1879.

Two Frisco detectives surrounded
An Indian man whom they'd hounded
Three weeks in Marn,
And then they closed in
Where that Indian man abounded.

They sought for him there, and to bind him,
With both of his hands behind him,
Made ready the ropes,
But alas for their hopes—
They had the misfortune to find him!

Under the charmingly alliterative heading of "Paint, Putty, and Piety," a lady writes to the Christian at Work: "I wish you would say a word about putting one's religion into one's work. Last year I built a new house and got a professing Christian man to paint it. He makes good prayers at the prayer-meetings, and says a good word of advice to the young. But he didn't fill the nail holes of the outer and upper trimmings with putty, and he didn't paint the top edge of the doors in the upper story. He took care to slight his work where he thought it would not be discovered. But the nails were drawn out by the sun, causing a leak, so that his neglect in this direction was discovered; then, having occasion to have the top of one door planed so it might shut again—his slighted work told its story. I have discounted that man's piety and prayers ever since. Perhaps this painter treated me as he did because I am a widow. Any way, I prefer Christians who will fill up the nail holes with putty, and paint the tops of the upper doors!"

"I beseech you, gentlemen of the jury," said Attorney Tyler, pulling out a handful of atmosphere, "to remember that your verdict will affect not only my client but his faithful and devoted young wife, who—" The Judge, interrupting: "The prisoner has no wife, Mr. Tyler." "Gentlemen," resumes the eloquent advocate, "the Court says my client has no wife, and I submit to the ruling of the Court. Please, then, consider my client's motherless children." "Mr. Tyler, the prisoner has no children." "Gentlemen, the Court in its superior wisdom has decided that my client has no children. They have, then, the greater claim to your compassion. They are not only motherless; they are fatherless as well!"

IN SUMMER'S DEPTHS.

Three girls, half draped, stood by the sedge bank, where, mocking with low laugh the noonday sun, a cool stream flowed. Their robes of whitest linen swept round their limbs in large uncertain folds, scarce knowing which of all the varied charms from the bold day to veil, but wildered clung, betraying all the more what they would hide.

One dark-eyed maid, in whose voluptuous form a passionate strength was glassed with gentle curves, leaned on a rock, and drooped her languid hand into the waves that rippled in blue rings as round a floating lily. Her deep eyes, moist with the dew of maiden longings, gazed down the still stream, peopling mayhap its depths with gorgeous dreams of sensual beauty. Her half-parted lips, scarlet and wet as some red Orient fruit to its core cleft, seemed opening to the sun—rich fruit of love that burst in ripest hour; tossed in the wind, her black and chainless curls waved, like a pirate's flag, from her proud head defiance to all the world. Stooping she stood with limbs half quivering in convulsive grace, head drooping forward, with an unborn kiss fluttering upon her lips, and long white arms that from sheer wantonness twined round each other; the hot wind, gusty with its mad desire, snatches at her robes; the while she did not strive to gain it back, but stood with heaving bust, proud in the knowledge of her beauty. She seemed born a queen of love. Her glowing form was but soul in flesh; a reckless maid whose very life was love, but whom much love could kill, or unrequited love might make a murderess.

A blonde the second was. Her simple robe drooped heavily around the form that shone beneath. She leaned against a rough-hewn wall, until her flexile shape seemed with its own weight bending. Sweet blue eyes, o'erhung with carved white eaves of heavy lids, as hangs the snow-ledge o'er calm Alpine lake. From head to foot the eye was led along in curves of beauty, rich and rhythmical. Unfilleted her head, and down her neck streamed the rich river of her golden hair that on her shoulders broke, and, foaming, fell into her bosom's valley. One pink hand, like to some brooch from pale cornelian carved, clasped her thin robe o'er her rebellious bust that would be free. The other listless hung, curled like a sleeping blossom; while her feet, white as the daisies that they crushed, were seen budding beneath her robe, as if too timid to show themselves full blown by day, the niting pedestals of the breathing heaven above. A flush, faint as the earliest dawn, was on her cheek. Along the rugged wall she leaned against the rambling eglantine came clambering, and pressed its starry blooms close to her face, and brushed the vermeil down with countless honeyed kisses; above her head, between her and the sun, a maple spread its canopy; and at her feet a throng of purple flowers, that, night and day, gave all their looks to heaven, now turned on her their young, adoring eyes. What charm was in this maid; an atmosphere of pleasure seemed around her, and a glow, soft as the summer's, breathed about her limbs, warming the air, as if young Love were near waving his ardent pinions! Soft and frail, and with a beautiful humility, she, drooping, seemed to ask from out those eyes, deep and unfathomable tenderness, something to love and cling to. She was one, who craved and not demanded to be loved. With such a woman clinging to one's heart sorrow were sweet; it would be such great delight to watch her calm assumption of one's griefs, as if they were her birth-right. None like her to suck the poisoned wound of circumstance, or soothe life's fever. Such this nameless maid seemed in her beauty, slender-shaped and frail, but grand in her capacity for love.

Brown-skinned and glossy as a Spanish nut, lazy and warm, and with rich southern blood mantling her full cheeks with a crimson dusk, like the last glow of sunset when the eve hath half o'ercast it—such the third maid. Each round limb, heavy with indolent grace, seemed made for repose. Of chestnut-brown, her hair swept in rich, sleepy tresses round her head, which as the wind did stir them, seemed to be silk curtains darkening round her dreaming eyes. Through the arched portals of her parted mouth, low broken murmurs came and went and came like talk of sleepers. Gently waving bows made a green twilight o'er her as she sat, swung in a cradle of lithe willow-wands together woven, while a few bronzed leaves fluttered anear, and fanned the sluggish airs into faint breezes. Thus serenely passed this maiden's being, noiselessly along. The basking earth, the hot, un-winking sun shone through a haze, and so all brightest things were softened in her eyes. Her very love was lazy and subdued as tropic noons in matted palm-groves, where the heavy breath of orchids, like invisible incense, steals drowsing the gloom. Indolence beautiful! Slumber incarnate!

Like a music chord in which three harmonies are blent in one, these strike the soul. The dark maid, ideal of a southern rhyme of loves in which fierce pulses of a glowing bust beat the quick time, and broken trills of passion intoxicate the brain and whirl the soul into mad revels; gazing on thy form, thy white, long, and undulating limbs, round bosom heaving to the eloquent strain, and arms that wave a white arch over thy head, memories come apace. And thou, fair girl, like some northern song in which love calmly floats, thou dost steal in with no wild impulse, but with gentle tones, twining thy slender chains around the heart unnoticed till they are fast for ever. Thou lotus-bosomed, houri of the east, fashioned in mould of oriental grace, sunned into ripeness by virgin light, thou may float calmly gazing at the stars and thy beauty nuzzle with the two other harmonies, and make one glorious chord beautiful as eve and morn, and dawn in summer's depths. VIRGINIA CITY, May, 1879.

The seventh anniversary of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Austin was celebrated on the 18th inst., at the Palace Hotel, by a literary symposium and informal gathering of friends and acquaintance. There was wit and wisdom, and music and sentiment, and a presentation of bric-à-brac at the meeting, and such good wishes and heart-felt compliments as few people can command.

It is easy enough to endure the prosperity of a swindling scoundrel, but his explanation of how he started in life with only twenty-five cents and a common-school education is pretty hard to bear.

AFTERMATH.

The Chronicle has over-estimated its powers. In its vanity, having guessed a political result, it fancies it has achieved a victory. Having sailed successfully down stream with all the apples, bottles, and horse-dung of a popular drift, it is ready to exclaim, "Behold how we apples swim!" and now it attempts to destroy the Republican party, destroy the Democratic party, destroy the Workingmen's party, and on the ruins of all these political structures rear another, the corner-stone of which is the new Constitution. The new Constitution is the organic law, which we must all accept and all obey, and it is arrant nonsense and most unblushing cheek for this journal, Dave Terry, and half a score more of old fossilized, played-out Democrats, and half a dozen sore-eyed Republicans, to assume to themselves all the virtues of its honest interpretation. All this champing of the bit is but chewing soap, and all this froth and foam and frenzy of an assumed desire to serve the people is impudent charlatanism on the part of discarded politicians and a sensational press ambitious of circulation and small advertisements. The fever will soon be over, and this new party, formidable as it appears to-day, will be a thing of shreds and patches to be looked back upon and laughed at. The Democrat that drifts away from his moorings under the leadership of ex-Senator Cole, Alexander Campbell, and Sam Soule will want to kick himself; and the Republicans who enlist under the oriflamme of Terry, Howard, Burch, Downey, and those other South American and Irish gentlemen who have kindly assumed the leadership of this new party, will commit political suicide, entitling them to be buried at the Confederate cross-roads with a stake driven through them to keep them down when the Republican party blows its triumphant Presidential blast.

The Republican party has one clear course to pursue. It should go calmly forward, unmindful of all the din and strife that clamorous politicians are raising around it. The new Constitution is adopted, the Republican party accepts it as the law. It now proceeds to elect legislators, judges, and a State government under it. With the Terry wing of the chivalric democracy it has nothing to do; let the rebel chivalry swing their crook-headed hickories. With the Kearney party it has nothing to do; let this ignorant and blasphemous Irish demagogue curse God, and declaim against honorable bilks, blatant blatherskites, hell-born villains, and plug hats. With the Chronicle the Republicans have no present sympathy; it has abandoned the party, is endeavoring to destroy it, and thus ends any connection it may have ever had with the journal. The Republican party is a national one, and can not afford to turn either to the right or the left for this small shower.

When Terry, the Judge, was on earth before,
To the field of dishonor he started,
Whence—the body of Broderick falling in gore—
The spirit of Terry departed.

The statesman's great soul for our guidance stayed
On the hither side of Death's ferry,
Till lawless unreason this fair earth made Congenial again to Judge Terry.

If Kearney had real sense and real honesty of purpose, he might in this broad continent of laborers aid to form a grand and useful party. His motto should be: HONEST LABOR IN UNION WITH HONEST CAPITAL. These two powers combined would move the world; disunited they will tear each other to pieces, and labor will starve and capital become valueless.

If the Constitutional party should run short of candidates, and should desire to make Walter Tompkins, Esq., available for anything more than platform statuary, or figure-head for a public meeting, it can come to us for his credentials as a politician. We hereby authorize Walter to refer to us for a character. We do not know of any other place where he can look for one.

"Tis an editor man of the Evening Post
A-feeling so fine and gay;
And he laughs to himself as he makes his boast:
"Oh, I'm the great J. P. J."

"Tis a carrier man which has letters à peck,
And a-wearin' a uniform gray;
He ups and he says, as he shuffles his deck:
"Two letters for J. P. J."

Then that editor man he did take and spill
The contents of them notes in a tray;
And one was a check and t'other a bill,
Respective, for "J. P. J."

He pockets the check, and he said: "Without axin'
God hears the young ravages moans."
The he rang for a youth, did this J. P. Jackson:
"Take that thing to J. P. Jones."

When Cromwell took possession of Ireland his soldiers resolved, "This country belongs to the saints, and we are the saints." When the Irish took possession of America they resolved, "This country belongs to the Irish, and we are the Irish."

The Chronicle, whose face was covered with italic freckles during the late campaign, is again breaking out in pustules, indicating the itch for small advertisements.

Kearney is an ungrateful fellow. He has used the Chronicle, and now having no further use for it he ruthlessly kicks it aside and throws De Young over his shoulder. Kearney has made the Chronicle write him into a national reputation, and now that the Chronicle can be of no further service Kearney stops the paper.

At the Ninth Ward Republican Club, Alexander Campbell, Jr., made a speech, and appealed to the members that only honest and intelligent men should be placed upon the ticket, and not "honorable bilks" or "sand-lotters." "How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child." There was trouble in the Campbell house when that boy got home, as Alexander Campbell, Sr., is an honorable bilk of the plug hat brigade who is now blatherskiting for the new Constitution.

THE PROFITS OF THE CENTRAL PACIFIC.

We made a mistake in our issue of May 10th, calculated to mislead our readers, when we assumed that the annual profits of the Central Pacific Railroad are $9,000,000. We assumed the fact because we saw it in the Chronicle. It is not true. There is a difference between earnings and operating expenses of nearly that amount, but to the operating expenses are to be added the sum of over $7,000,000 for interest, taxes, general and miscellaneous expenses, legal expenses, civil engineering, and discount on currency receipts, so that the real net as we figure it ourselves from the annual report of the year 1877 is $1,928,913 43, and under the Thurman Act, which has recently passed Congress, and been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, $1,200,000 is to be paid to the General Government as a sinking fund, leaving as a reserve against casualties and for dividends the sum of $728,913, quite a falling off from the grand total of $9,000,000. Again, it must be borne in mind that this amount does not all come out of the people of California. Some 30 per cent., as we are informed, of this gross sum is for through freight passing over the line from China, Japan, and other countries of the Pacific. While we do not appear as the apologist for the railroad people, we can afford to say that we look upon this corporation as having done more for the prosperity of this State ten thousand times over than all the interests and individuals who seem to take so much genuine delight in misrepresenting them. The profits of the Central, the California Pacific, the Southern, and all their leased roads are now being expended in laying track across the vast desert of Arizona with the view of giving to California another transcontinental railroad. In thus reaching out for the trade of Southern California, New Mexico, and Arizona, these people deserve the gratitude of every business man or property owner here. Instead of thanks or decent appreciation of benefits accruing from their exertions, we hear a never-ending jeremiade of complaints; localities, newspapers, and political parties flourish upon this common theme. The Thurman bill takes $1,200,000 annually out of our producers, business men, and traveling community. An unwise measure it seems to us—compelling this community of a million of people to pay in this generation what seventy-five million of people ought to have paid at the end of thirty years. We can understand why the legislators in Congress from Maine and Florida should desire to pass the Thurman bill, but why Senator Booth should have advocated its passage it is impossible for us to reconcile with that kind of statesmanship which favors its own locality. We hope Senator Booth's railroad quarrel has not made him so earnest for the recognition of a principle as to have made him willing to saddle the business of our coast with these additional millions in order that he might get even. This same argument applies with diminished force to John Lord Love, Esq., whose hatred of corporations has so lessened his love of California farmers and merchants as to induce him to aid the government in wrenching this money from our own people, in order that it may go into the United States treasury. We hope the prejudice of business men and the passion of party demagogues may not culminate in a commission that shall think it is serving the State by an unwise interference in affairs they do not and can not understand. It might do our business community, our sand-lot laborers, and our aspiring politicians good to run engines and cars into their round houses for a time. Let business stand still for one week, by arresting railroad traffic, and our community would realize that railroads in our State are not an unmixed evil. There is one principle, the recognition of which is a guarantee against any great abuse by the railroad people. The interests of the corporators and stockholders run parallel with the interests of the State and its people. The roads can not injure State or city without injuring themselves. They can not increase the population of the State without advancing and increasing their own business. We are disposed to let the Central Pacific Company alone so long as we are certain it is using all its money to build new roads, all of which are converging to our city, and increasing by this means our wealth and population. We could upon a pinch do without the Chronicle, and John Lord Love, and David S. Terry who voices the complaint of Stockton, and Volney E. Howard who echoes the woes of Los Angeles, and Samuel Seabough, Esq., but we could not well do without the Central Pacific and Southern Pacific, North Pacific Coast, San Francisco and North Pacific, South Pacific Coast, and other railroads, that are now engaged in the transportation business of our State. It is possible that the new machinery of these various roads is not yet fully adjusted to the industries of our State, and they are not yet working altogether harmoniously. It is quite probable that the corporations are not as generous as they ought to be, and that corporation officers are not always as polite as they might be; and it is also quite possible that farmers have something to learn, and that they are not always reasonable in their complaints. The farmer of the Tejon, the Merced, and the upper Sacramento and the Sierra must not expect that railroad freights can be so adjusted that they can compete in all commodities with the farmers of Alameda. It must be remembered that the lands of these remote sections had no market, and almost no value, before railroads were built. All of these things are to be considered in adjusting reasonable relations between railroad corporations and those who deal with them. If the corporations are guilty of exactions and injustice, these evils should be corrected by law. Railroad corporators, stockholders, and managers must not think themselves above just legislation, nor independent of it. They must recognize the sovereignty of the State and the majesty of the law. They must stand uncovered in the presence of the people, and they must not think to rule the Commonwealth by ruling political parties.

By Emma Frances Dawson.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

Sam looked amazed, gave a husky sort of roar, and that very moment was seized with this cramp that kept his man rubbing him for a long time. When Alphonse had been sent out, I went on, though Sam had to look over some business papers and could hardly attend to me.

"I feel sure that Mr. Dillon knows," I said.

Sam looked up as if annoyed. He can not bear anything roundabout, while I like mysteries. Perhaps because I can solve them.

"Yes," said I, at the risk of vexing him about his friend, "I believe he is her husband."

Sam gave a sigh of relief, the cramp had been so bad. With an admiring glance he cried "By Jove! I never thought of that. There's woman's keen wit!"

But then I always knew I was more shrewd than others. "As a reward of merit" he brought me some fine candies, saying "A Market Street confectioner advertises these as 'high-toned.' Does he mean their rank flavor?"

Perhaps they made me dream, as the lady in the next room says it is the sugar in the whisky-punch which flies to one's head; anyway I dreamed strangely that night. I seemed to stand at the elbow of some man whose face I could not see as he bent over a letter he was writing, a queer letter, and the dream was so plain that I saw him trace each word, and, leaning over him, read as he wrote:

"As disembodied spirits we might agree, but as life is as it is, so dependent on our mortal frames and temperaments, I have made my choice."

I roused from sleep to find myself in bed alone. Babette had left the night-lamp burning as usual. I knew Sam was in the next room casting up accounts, as he often sat up to do. Then, puzzling over Mark Dillon and that woman, I dropped off again—to the same dream—the figure writing with face bent toward the right, and myself standing at his left shoulder. He had written on, and while I watched his hand formed these words:

"Silence, with instant departure for Europe, with a solemn promise never to return or send a message to me by word or letter. These are my sole terms, even if I must pay at the rate of a thousand dollars for each letter in the words."

Again I struggled to my senses; I sat up in bed to be sure I was now awake. Sam came in, and was alarmed, thinking I was ill.

"I wish," said I, "I could give Mr. Dillon a piece of my mind."

"Better not meddle in what does not concern you," said Sam, quite gruffly for him.

An hour or two later, I was roused by Sam's talking in his sleep. "Is she not worth a hundred thousand dollars?" he muttered. He was dreaming of the sum he had promised me. Then he grew angry. "Why won't you go?" he cried, fiercely. "There is the money!"

"Sam! Sam!" I called, "who is meddling now with other folks' affairs? You are dreaming."

Only half-awake, he cried: "You shall not part us!" and grasped me firmly by the arm.

"What is the matter?" I said, waking him at last.

"What was I saying?" he asked anxiously, and scarcely slept again. So I did not wonder he did not want to go to the theatre Monday night, as I had before his return engaged with Mrs. Capel and his friend to do.

"You must guard yourself to-night," I said to Mr. Dillon, as we went to call for Mrs. Capel. "I have lent her the bewitched fan."

I did not think of his taking it seriously, but he muttered: "Great heavens, has it reached her at last!"

"What is that?" I asked. "It seems to me we are all a little crazy about this stranger."

"It is all your fault," he answered; "you brought her here."

"Did I?" I asked. "It was her absent husband—you know very well what brought her—I think you know him." I added this recklessly, but was surprised at the effect; he got so excited.

"Oh, Mrs. Clare," he cried, "don't ask me anything about it. I know nothing, nothing, nothing."

"As well as you know yourself," I went on; "you are—" I faltered. I felt I was verging on rudeness. We had reached her door. I dared not go on. But he understood. "I—her husband! It is like telling a man who is bound hand and foot that he is free! I—"

But his nervous knock brought her at once to her door, and I lost whatever he meant to say.

After we were in our box Mrs. Capel looked at the play-bill. "The burlesque Evangeline!" she exclaimed, and turned to Mr. Dillon. "You have known a burlesque Evangeline in real life. There are such foot-balls of fate."

He looked quickly at me. "We will not talk of unhappy things to-night," he said; then turning to her, added: "Silence is golden."

Bent on making us enjoy, he brought us flowers and candy, and talked more than his wont. He toyed a while with the Indian fan, sketching the history of fans, and ending as he returned it to Mrs. Capel with: "Among the Asiatics a fan on a plate of special shape told a condemned nobleman his sentence, and when he reached to take the gift, was the moment of losing his life."

"What a sigh you gave as you took the fan, Mrs. Capel," I said, "as if you had been sentenced."

"To exile—with no hope of reprieve," said Mr. Dillon.

Some stir of late-comers caught my glance; when I again looked at Mrs. Capel her breast heaved, the fan, half open, shook in her hand, behind it I caught a glimpse of a long slip of paper like a check.

"I feel faint," she said. Mr. Dillon brought her some water, and then she sat back out of sight, and he talked to me about those we knew who were in the house. But as I do not choose to let people dupe me with secrets right under my eyes, I soon said:

"Was that a love poem?"

"What do you mean?" he asked.

"That paper slyly thrust in and creased to fold with the fan," I said.

I think the sounds from the orchestra screened a muttered no, he looked so angry.

"Was it poetry?" I insisted.

"Not poetry, but a bit of philosophy—and a secret of mine," he added.

"I shall ask her to let me see it," I said, for I was provoked that he should try to fool me.

He seemed confused, and, turning, looked at Mrs. Capel. The fan lay closed in her lap. "Allow me," he said, gently taking it from her. At the same moment his glance roving over the house fell on some one he knew. "Excuse me," he said, and rushed out. He came back almost at once, and sitting beside me, opened the fan and withdrew a slip of thin paper from the sliding sticks and gave me. I quickly unfolded it and found—a blank!

"Mrs. Clare, you have a very vivid fancy," he said, with his cynical smile which makes me sometimes almost hate him, and think if not Sam's friend I would cut him.

"Only think," he went on, "how all these common-place people around us have each a story as picturesque and diverting as any play. There is a chance for your fancy."

"I should like to know all about their private lives," I said.

"Heaven forbid!" he cried. "Never try to go behind the scenes in real life. You would find the same dingy make-shifts, curtains, traps, and sudden steps up and down, as on the stage."

Mrs. Capel came forward and seemed like herself again. But I watched them both, for I felt that I was on the track of a strange story. Coming out I was behind them, and found on the floor where Mrs. Capel had been sitting a sheet of paper, on which these lines were written (without doubt Mr. Dillon had meant them for me. He must, man like, have forgotten for the moment that I had lent the fan, and that it was not I who would find them in it, and his feint about the blank paper was done to hide his shame at his blunder. It was all quite plain):

A Fantasy.

"Eclipse, and sound of shaken hills and wings Darkening, and blind inextinguishable things."

I.—THE FAN.

Ivory th' fan, and like film in its fret
Whose fateful realms
Knew on the neck of Marie Antoinette
Balefully flaming her rare carcanet
Of famous gems.

Embroidered lace was that bauble unfurled,
Whose shadow's freak
Often at court and play watched by the world,
Feigned 'twas a blush-rose on rouged and empearled
Pompadour's cheek.

Fairest since Feast of the Lanterns far glimmer
(Three thousand years!)
Where lovely Kans's soft eyes lent their shimmer
Over her mask—the first fan—this makes dimmer
Those Fame reveres.

II.—SPREAD.

High is the horizon, queerly awry,
A pallid moon
Ruminant wanders through ashen blue sky,
Far to the right, slanting, three curlews fly,
Near dips a loon.

Who is this roaming alone by the sea?
Drift on its shore,
Wind-blown, oblique, as wild dream-phantoms flee,
Why does he, smiting his brow, turn to me?
What loss deplore?

Dread is the scene with prophetic alarming—
Fate and Despair!
Meantime the orchestra thrills with its charming "Traumbilder," Lumby, composer, embalming
Castles in air.

III.—FURLED.

Tropical feathers with down on their tips,
Once poised in flight,
Over mid-ocean and wandering ships,
Desert mirage, or the simoon's eclipse,
At cloudy height.

Filagree silver and sandalwood frame,
Brings shifting scene;
Vast mining tunnels with torches aflame—
Mystical rites in the great Brahma's name—
All haunt 'this seren.

Mists of enchantment around you uproll
From fan and gloves.
As if each flower you've worn sent its soul
Like painter's dream where to earth downward stole Cherubs, or Loves.

IV.—THE TASSEL.

If—as the Magi held—when worst astray
In Life's blind ways,
We but invisible fibres obey
Spun from the pitiless stars as they sway
Through ordered maze—

I was but fashioned like this tassel's skein,
(Frosted its flame.)
Chilled by your coldness yet fire in each vein,
Passed through your careless hand (O bliss in vain!)
Like puppet-game!

V.—THE BOX.

Trifles may prophecy—even that case
Th' fan lay soft in,
Broad rounded top with a narrowing base,
Black on the white of your satin and lace,
Shapes a coffin!

Tuesday, I was on my way to the street, the elevator had just touched the ground-floor, when I found that stupid Babette had given me the wrong gloves, two of the same hue, but where one had twelve buttons the other had but six. I signed to the boy to go up again, but he waited for a couple just coming from the street-door, who entered, and, in the change from outdoors to darkness, did not see me in the corner, but kept on talking.

"You must cheer up," she said, "and not look on life as a losing game."

"Perhaps you thought it one," he sneered, "till you had the chance to cry check-mate. You can talk thus when you could give up the certainty of happiness in a second venture, give up the most constant of your girlhood's lovers, for the possibilities of money!"

"But think of those possibilities," she answered; "happiness is among them as surely as money need not be reckoned in happiness. You can not judge; you have not known the bitter taste of poverty."

"But I do judge. I know you are lost in a golden mist. I can not see how you could keep from seizing your freedom."

"At the cost of that butterfly's wings?" she asked. "Why should I break down a lovely flower? I could not hurt one who has been kind to me."

"But my conscience is not easy to have matters go this way," said he.

"What is a man's conscience?" she said. "A passing gust of wind that blows in the line of his glance, always coming up behind him, never blowing against him!"

"But he has obeyed the dictates of conscience in—"

"Dictates of conscience!" she broke in, "in a man who knows no difference between a desire and a duty!"

"I can not wonder that you are bitter," he said, "to find your husband as you have—"

"O Mrs. Capel!" I cried, grasping her arm, "have you found him? Oh, I'm so glad—kiss me, my dear. Oh, tell me all about it. Come to my rooms—I will not go out this afternoon."

I suppose I startled them both, seizing hold of her in the dimness, for she really screamed: "O my soul! I didn't see you!"

"Great heavens! Mrs. Clare!" cried Mark Dillon. "Mrs. Capel is not well. She is on her way to her room to lie down. She has found—"

"A kind friend in you, Mrs. Clare," she broke in. "I feel your sympathy. No—I have not found—the man I married."

Then the elevator touched our floor, and she and I stepped out. Mr. Dillon bowed and went down again. Mrs. Capel's eyes gleamed, and her lips wore a tense curve, as she begged me to excuse her, she needed rest. As I watched her pass down the hall her air made me think of the woman Sam can not bear to see walk into the dining-room because her gait recalls some one he has known. The more I thought over their strange talk together, the more sure I felt that there was some secret between them. I meant to know what.

Our hotel gave a hop on Wednesday night. Sam and I were on the floor waiting for the music to begin. He often gets the band to play what he likes.

"Have you told the leader what you will have?" asked Mark Dillon, as he strolled up to us. "Shall I name 'The Open Road'?"

"Or 'Man Lives But Once,'" Sam answered, and his friend gave the order.

When we sat down he joined us, saying, after one of his old, long looks at me:

"Well—Mrs. Capel has gone." Sam walked off, as he always did when she was spoken of. So dull of Mr. Dillon not to know I was the one most interested in her.

"Without a word of farewell!" I said.

"Oh, yes," he answered; "she sent a good-bye to you. She got a letter Monday night that caused her sudden start. She meant to leave yesterday morning, but missed the train."

"Poor woman!" said I. "How I wish we could have helped her. She had her journey for nothing."

"No," he said; "she gained by it—experience."

"Yes," said I, "she is richer, I suppose."

"Ah?" He spoke as if surprised.

"Yes," I answered, "in thought and feeling."

"Oh—yes," said he; "yes, I think she is richer. It has been worth to her at least a hundred thousand dollars."

He was watching me so closely that I knew he felt I suspected him, and I changed the subject by asking: "Isn't it a shame about the break in stocks?"

"Break! Why, you are dreaming. Stocks are booming."

"Oh, no. Sam has just lost in them the hundred thousand dollars he promised me for my birthday."

"Is it possible? I was not aware—oh, yes, to be sure."

His wits seemed to be straying, but I suppose he was lost in admiration of my exquisite dress: gold-colored satin and cloth-of-gold embroidered with seed pearls. Or was he thinking about her?

"How would her husband have felt if she had found him?" I asked.

"How can I more than another answer that question?" said he. "Ask Sam."

"I am sorry for him," I said.

"For—whom?" he asked.

"For her husband," I answered. "He has lost a good wife."

"Well," he said, musing, "I once thought she had a soul. But only a few souls are made. Half the world have none. I'm afraid she was like the most of us, mere painted slides on the lantern of Life. But suppose—we will say—suppose she had found him married again?"

"But," said I, losing patience, "she didn't even find him."

"Oh, no," he replied, quickly; "I didn't say she did."

He had been idly playing with my Indian fan, and now suddenly asked if I did not think the figure in the picture less plain than of yore. "The old juggler really could foresee, then," he muttered. But I wanted to solve the mystery, and began by asking:

"Why don't you marry?"

He smiled. "Shall I say I am the victim of the cruel laws of being, or of chance? I only wait at a banquet where I inhale the odor of other men's cake, and hear the plash of others' wine."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"That married women please me most," he said.

Of course, I knew it all the time, but was surprised that he owned it to me.

"But lately," he went on, "my wonted pose of looker-on has been disturbed. I have just been a heavy loser by getting too absorbed in another man's game."

"What was it? Faro?"

"No—yes—yes it was a very good game of faro—do you know what that is?"

"No. How is it played?"

"It is all chance," he replied, "the first card loses and the second card wins."

He bowed and loitered off through the whirling, jostling throng. I was glad to lose sight of his cynical smile and sound of his affected drawl. It was two or three hours later, just twelve o'clock, when tired of dancing I sat listening to the "Oginski," and waiting for Sam who stood not far off, telling some one the love-lorn legend of the music. After the last bar I heard his words: "Here the Polish lover, mad with despair, went from the ball-room out into the night and shot himself."

A chilly wind swept round me, a gust that tore my fan out of my tight-gloved left hand which was trying to also hold bouquet and handkerchief, while I beckoned Sam to come. "They must have opened a window somewhere," I told him. "Do have it closed."

"I feel the wind, too, now I come here," he said, picking up my fan, and going to see about it, but he came back without finding any reason for the blast. "I feel it only here," he said, but we went to our rooms. As we left the elevator, a rush of cold air again chilled us to the marrow. I shivered, and trying to draw my cloak more closely round me, the fan slipped out of my hand as if some one had snatched it, and in some odd chance was thrown over the banisters as we passed the stairs, and falling many feet on the marble pavement was wholly shattered. I could have cried, I was so vexed to lose it. I wished I had taken the cherry-stone bracelet.

"The house seems full of draughts to-night," said Sam as he locked our door.

Shivering, too, I answered, "I wonder how far Mrs. Capel has got on her journey."

"She can't be colder in the cars than we are here," said Sam, poking the fire which we always have at night, but all at once it seemed to have been needless, for we had to open the windows. Sam tried to comfort me for the loss of the fan, but he was in a very jolly mood, and kept pirouetting all through the rooms. "By Jove!" he cried, "This is a world worth living in, isn't it? Oh, Minnie! You looked as sweet as a peach to-night. I'm so proud of you!—I'm very sorry about your fan."

"Oh, I am!" said I. "There is nothing like it in this country."

"Not only that," he said, "but I hate to have Mark know it is ruined. But I'm so happy to-night I can't grieve so much. Come and kiss me, Minnie."

Dear Sam! There never was a more fond and faithful husband! How I pity wives with husbands who can be false!

II.—PASSAGE FROM THE DIARY OF MRS. CAPEL.

Thursday morning.—My nerves have been so shaken by the ordeal I have passed that I could not rest well last night. As I lay in my berth the very motion of the train seemed to throb against my brain. "You are not the same poor creature who passed over this very road a week ago—not the same—not the same!" I could not keep from thinking of poor old Mark. How true he had been! But what folly it would have been to trust any man again! I drew my watch from under my head, made out to see that the hands were on twelve, and then dropped to sleep as to a series of strange visions. Out of blank darkness suddenly shapes itself before me that fan from India, which will confront me. I can not turn so that it does not follow, until I see and cry out: "Why—the figure is gone from the picture!" Then it all vanishes. Now I see the beach near the Cliff House. There is a full moon, and Mark paces there alone, though a high wind is blowing. But such a weight is on my soul that I groan myself awake. (Could he have been there, I wonder? Was his mind looking out on the moonlit sea and lovely sands, reflected in mine, and vividly defined against the chiaroscuro of dreamland?) Then I am in a ball-room, the band playing the wildly sad "Oginski," full of deep-drawn sighs and longing. I am conscious of a swarm of dancers, yet seem to be only sure of Samuel and my lovely friend who sits near him, looking very beautiful, and takes no notice of Mark, who comes up with some queer disfigurement of his face, and behaves very strangely, snatching her fan out of her hand and flinging it on the floor. (Probably I dreamed this because I knew he disliked to see her have it.) She pays no heed to him, but shivers, Samuel gets her fan, and soon they all three leave the hall, she and "Clare" acting as if chilly. Mark again tears the fan from her, and dashes it down as if from some great height. Dream-like she does not notice him, though grieved to lose her fan which, I see, is shivered to bits. Then I lose sight of all of them—I hang across the firm but unseen arm of some shadowy presence that bears me away with it. I hear no voice, but feel borne in upon me these words: "Beyond even the possibilities of Money!" I float in mid-air, though it does not seem so much that I move higher and higher, as that my old surroundings drop away—is that the city with its web of lights far below? and that vast silver shield must be the ocean! Clouds bar off that view. I am chilled and breathless. How dazzling the stars grow! Is that dim speck our world—down there by the moon? Is this—I feel the unseen arm loose its hold, and the vapor that seems like a presence shoots far above, as if torn from me. I am falling, falling through endless depths. I awoke with a convulsive start to find myself in the swinging train, with the crazy beat upon my brain. "Not the same! Oh, not the same!"

III.—PARAGRAPH FROM SAN FRANCISCO PAPERS OF THURSDAY EVENING.

Last night, Mark Dillon left the hop at the hotel and with a party of gentlemen drove to the Cliff House. Leaving them at supper, he went out on the beach at midnight, and shot himself in the temple. No cause for the suicide is known. He was a man of refinement and culture, but had spent most of his fortune in foreign travel. He was well known in society as musician and poet, and in his pocket were found these lines (dated yesterday):

A LOST HOPE.

Of when the sun has set
A wondrous after-glow will linger yet;
Through darkening dome the trailing gorgeous hues
Unite, dissolve, slow change to shadows gray—
As echoes of some haunting tune perplex
That come and go and vex,
And all the idler's hollow thought confuse
With occult sway.

When a great hope has set
Long must its halo stir a deep regret,
Illuminating oft the gloomy thought
With rays from sunken argosy.
The floating cloud of foiled sweet fancies hued
By it, are viewed
With aching heart and soul that, half-distraught,
Yearn—oh, how helplessly!

OUR OWN POETS.

Love's Patience.

As some fair and stately flower,
When its life is full and sweet,
Blossoms in that perfect hour,
Far from careless feet—

Knowing that, without surprise,
Those for whom its gift was born
Shall approach with gentle eyes
On its birthday morn:

Even thus Love's gift, I know,
In some future, far and sweet,
Cometh with still tread and slow—
But I wait its feet.

No more than the rooted flower
Must I seek the coming grace;
If I wait a while, some hour
I shall know its face.

Horace.—Book III, Ode IX.

HE. Whilst thy favor I possessed,
Nor on a rival beamed thine eye,
Circling thy snowy neck around
Happier than a king was I.

SHE. Whilst no other love was thine,
Whilst thy Lydia reigned supreme,
Great my fame and great my name,
Nobler than the Roman's queen.

HE. Thracian Chloe holds me now,
Player on the harp so rare;
Death I would not fear to face,
If the Fates my love would spare.

SHE. Me Thuriian Calais burns
(Cupid's flame from heaven above);
Gladly twice for him I'd die
If the Fates would spare my love.

HE. How if Love, as 'twas of old,
Round us threw his brazen chain?
Chloe left, and thou restored,
Wouldst thou take me back again?

SHE. Lighter thou than any cork,
Fairer he than any star,
Stormier than the ocean thou,
Yet I'd love thee better far.

SAN JOSE, May, 1879.

WALTER H. ELLISON.

Koos-te-teen.

I.
Along Alaska's rugged shore,
Where rolls the Stickeen to the sea,
In bygone years now near a score
Was wrought the deed I tell to thee.

Below the turbid river's mouth,
Whose yellow waters stain the bay,
A league or farther to the south,
A low green wooded island lay.

Thereon the winter village stood
Of all who owned the Shakes' sway,
A wild and fierce and savage brood
As ever saw the light of day.

Rimmed by a virgin forest grove
Their square low dwellings dot the shore,
Around a little sheltered cove,
In scattered clumps of three or four.

Each group contains a septate tribe
Whose chief in war their leader makes,
Although in peace all are allied
By slight allegiance to the Shakes.

But oft, for real or fancied slight,
Their savage temper mounts so high,
In fierce, prolonged, and deadly fight,
Each band will with its neighbor vie.

One winter night the Nan-ee-eyes
The Ki-es-kit-ee-tans did feast,
And there a frightful feud did rise
That cost a score of lives at least.

A word, a blow, a keen knife-thrust,
And all the lodge did stream with fire;
'Twas like a whirlwind's sudden gust—
A furious storm of savage ire.

The first rude shock of conflict spent,
The guests fled to their own abodes,
Whose wooden walls some shelter lent,
To push the war by safer modes.

Thenceforth the intervening space
Was bullet-swept by day and night;
Who but an instant showed his face
Was sure to feel his foeman's might.

The Ki-es-kit-ee-tans were led
By Koos-te-teen, a warrior tried;
Long years of strife his name had spread
In growing terror far and wide.

Erect and strong, of middle age,
Square-browed, high-checked, and gl'ring eyed,
Lined on his face, as on a page,
His savage will and haughty pride.

Quick was his soul to anger's torch,
And swift his hand to bloody deed;
Whoever felt his hatred scorch
Of buried shirt had instant need.

Still, in his mind, with passions grown
And formed in Nature's sternest mould,
Such stubborn virtues held their own
As made the Romans great of old.

Week after week, with varying tide,
The battle raged. With bitter cold
Their many ills were multiplied,
And hunger pinched them, young and old.

No hope of peace till man for man
And chief for chief should equal fall;
Such custom held the only plan,
And custom bound them one and all.

At length the tally even stood,
All but the chief of Nan-ee-eyes;
His loss will Koos-te-teen make good,
His life alone between them lies.

II.

A rifle-shot along the beach,
Blown by the Fates, we made our camp—
A band of white explorers, each
Well tried by many a weary tramp.

Some kindness to the wounded done,
Without regard to either side,
Perchance his warrior heart had won—
Mayhap 'twas but a touch of pride.

Howe'er it was, one starry night
From Koos-te-teen there came a slave,
Sent as a herald to invite
The strangers to his master's grave.

That day in council he had said,
In tones that reached the listening foe:
"The war will end when I am dead;
My life but brings my children woe."

"A few brief years are mine at best,
My soul has heard my people's cry;
To-morrow's sun will bring them rest—
To-morrow Koos-te-teen will die."

"Then let the hostile chief prepare.
At sunrise Koos-te-teen will go
Midway between our strongholds, where
A single shot can lay him low."

The level rays of morning's sun
Scarce shot athwart the wintry scene,
Ere forth in range of every gun,
Alone, unarmed, stalked Koos-te-teen.

Wrapped in his brightest blanket-folds,
Bedecked with all his bravery,
To death as to a feast he holds
With proud barbaric dignity.

If aught of fear his bosom felt
His swarthy visage gave no sign;
Undimmed his parting glances dwelt
With stately step he neared the line.

Brief space, a deathlike stillness falls,
And then a loud and sharp report;
Pierced by a dozen musket-balls,
He met the death he dared to court.

III.

Within the lodge in state he lay
Who late his all had sacrificed,
While round, the last sad rites to pay,
Were gathered those his spirit prized.

The warriors, painted, plumed, and dressed
In all their gauds, each, gun in hand,
Their stolid features grief-oppress,
Formed round their chief, in silence stand.

Amidst the throng, the rites to urge,
The medicine men's weird figures flit;
With streaming eyes, to chant the dirge,
Crouched on the ground the women sit.

With measured strokes the Indian drum,
Wee-laden, throbs upon the air,
And funeral voices shrilly come
In wailing tones of deep despair.

An old soothsayer signal makes—
Forth from the lodge the corpse is borne;
Its way the wild procession takes
To where the beach is smooth and worn.

Upon the sands the funeral pyre
Of fragrant cedar wood is made;
Thereon in waiting for the fire
The clay of Koos-te-teen is laid.

Shrill and more shrill the mourners cry
As draws the Death-Song to its end;
A sudden crash of musketry—
And lo! the lurid flames ascend.

A Simila.

Not in the garish blaze of noon
Most rapturous the landscape seemeth—
When Summer walks with pictured shoon,
And verdure-kissing glory beameth;

But when soft Twilight's stilly hour
Like a sweet dream of song descendeth,
And with its dewy spell of power
The heart with Nature's beauty blendeth.

'Tis then the mountain, field, and lea,
Bathed in the mellow tints of even,
Prompt the rapt soul most glowingly
To paint its mental map of heaven.

And so 'tis then when Fortune's blaze
Above the unclouded soul is brightest
That Love its dearest form displays—
For the best heart is not the lightest.

But when the hours of trial come,
Like gloaming shadows dark and palling,
Love's purple light doth tint the gloom,
On all like heaven-dipped mantle falling.

The drift of circumstance which rules below
Is not to us entrusted—tools of law
In birth, rank, wealth, condition high or low.
Life is a splendid emerald without flaw
For some, for others but a pebble poor,
Common, dim, slighted, trampled in the mire,
A stone of stumbling to the senseless boor
Who spurns it from him, till, its central fire
Struck by a shivering blow, one shock of light
It blazes forth the diamond of a queen.
Showing the world's dull, gross, astonished sight
'Tis not the setting makes the gem serene:
So spirits cold and dead for lack of strife
May by rough use be quickened into life.

II.

But when life seems as wedded to all joy
As love to beauty, let it gravely weigh
The oft-told fable of the priceless toy
On the globed bosom keeping holiday,
And lending lustre to the luccent throat.
Of that famed queen who was so fair to see,
That the nice-balanced judgment scarce might note
Which should the borrower, which the lender be;
She with a matchless grace her arm extends,
Plucking it from its throne whenas they dine
And drops it in her goblet; Antony bends
An eye of worship on the act divine;
Nile plashes; all the courtiers laugh; so end
Great Cleopatra's pearl dissolved in wine.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MAY 24, 1879.

The formation of a new political party to put in motion the machinery of the new Constitution is illogical, but it will nevertheless be done, and the organization will prove a formidable one. Already the initial steps are taken, and all over the State the process of crystallization is now going on. If we were called upon to prophesy what the political situation would be on the first of next September, we would say: Three political parties—the Republican, pursuing substantially its present organization; the Democratic, under the name of Constitutionalists, or New Constitution party, endeavoring to unite all who voted for the adoption of the new organic law; and the Workingmen's party of California, who will carry with them the original sand-lot element. The Republican party will pledge itself to carry out in good faith the provisions of the new organic law. The Constitutionalists will affect to distrust the honesty of Republican professions. The Republicans will charge upon the Constitutionalists a deliberate purpose to legislate with agrarian and communistic purpose. The W. P. C. will call hard names, make up faces, and swear at both parties. The Constitutionalists will charge the Republicans with an ulterior design to defeat the provisions of the new Constitution with hostile legislation. The issue thus formed will be as marked and distinctive as the lines drawn upon the adoption of the instrument. The Kearney following, which was never a large one, and which is daily diminishing, will cut but a small figure as an independent organization. The Granger element will never affiliate with the sand-lot party, nor acknowledge Kearney as a leader. The Democratic leaders will fall down; there will be no Democratic ticket in the field, leaving the meaner majority of that party to go over to the Constitutionalists and the better minority to go to the Republicans. This will present a distinct issue, which we will formulate thus: The Republicans, for conservative interpretation of the new Constitution, with a view to preserve order and protect property; the Constitutionalists, for such legislation as shall lead to radical and venturesome experiments, with the design to punish corporations. The Republican party will lose from its ranks some workingmen and some farmers; it will gain from the Democracy many intelligent men who are property-owners, and who look with apprehension upon radical changes; it will gain very largely from property-owning foreigners. The Constitutionalists will take with them the rank and file of the old Democracy, nearly all the rebel chivalry, and all of the more moderate of the Democratic elements of the sand-lots. Thus, there will be presented a distinct and intelligent issue, and thus there will be formed two strong organizations. There will be no outside distinctive issues. There will be no place for any other party. It will afford the Democracy a good pretext for not running a State ticket.

After carefully reviewing the political situation, we are convinced that there is but one safe and honorable position to take, and but one honest policy to pursue. Such is the relation of parties and such the uncertainty as to results, that there is but one safe path to follow. We regard this coming election as by far the most important one that has ever occurred in California. A new Constitution formed under most favorable conditions, in itself a curious jumble of contradictions, has been imposed upon the people of this State by a combination of political accidents. With anything but an intelligent body of legislators to give it vitality, it will prove most hurtful to us. Unless we have an intelligent and honest judiciary to interpret it, it will be a calamity. An entire new system, with an entire change of officials, to put in force an entirely new organic law, presents a condition of affairs quite anomalous. We have been disposed to think that non-partisan organization, such a one as would bring together in harmonious action men of all political parties, was desirable. We started out in this direction with the generous idea that there might be formed such a union as would bring together all the intelligent and property-owning classes into a compact party organization, for the purpose of launching our new Constitution. We interviewed half an hundred Democratic gentlemen and party leaders, and found no response in accordance with our views. It was deemed impracticable, because there is to be a Presidential election next year, and it is regarded advisable by the more prominent party leaders of the Bourbon faith to let California go to the devil head-foremost in order that they may be entitled to a post-office next year if Governor Tilden or some rebel brigadier-general should happen to be struck by the Presidential lightning. Hence there is nothing left but to maintain the Republican organization, inviting all liberal-minded men to cooperate with it. Not an hide-bound, radical, impracticable close corporation, with an unfriendly primary test, to be run by a gang of professional barnacles, each of whom desires an office for himself or who is retained as a professional office-broker to get place for some friend; but a liberal, broad, honest, and comprehensive organization, that will invite to its cooperation all respectable persons of every party—an organization that shall stand pledged in honor to carry out in good faith the new Constitution, and to give it a fair legislative and judicial interpretation.

The State Convention of this party must be a deliberative assembly of representative Republican gentlemen from all parts of the State, called together for consultation and choice of candidates, and not a packed caucus of old party blisters under the leadership of ambitious Federal officials to put up a cut and dried programme. The corporations must keep their hands off; their parasites and sycophants must not only not appear, but the convention must not be under their direction and advice. This Republican convention must be a representative body of the intelligence, wealth, moral influence, and decency of the State of California. If such a convention is possible, and it can be freed from the manipulation of the vile gang of party leaders that now for these many years have disgraced and dishonored it, and led it to frequent and disgraceful defeats, it can place such a ticket in the field as will commend itself to the Republican electors. The Republicans are in a majority in California. They represent the intelligence, wealth, and moral worth of the community. They are composed of the better class, and while we admit the worth of many gentlemen who have not been ashamed heretofore to be regarded as Democrats, we claim for Republicans a vastly higher political, social, business, and moral standard than we are willing to accord to the Democracy. We are dealing now in generalities. The very large number of most excellent Democratic citizens, and the very large number of utterly debauched, worthless, and good for nothing vagabonds and public plunderers in the Republican party, compel us to thus qualify our statement. If, therefore, the Republican party can come under the healthful control of honest men, and a ticket can be chosen that will give us assurance of honest government, we shall take pleasure in commending it to the support of our readers; if there shall be a different outcome, we shall prefer the success of the Constitutional party.

The danger to the Republican party is its strength and its great probability of success. The breaking to pieces of the Democratic party—its utter demoralization—gives such strong assurance of a Republican walk over, that the Convention will become the battle-ground of its own contending factions. There will be no man in its ranks so utterly worthless that he will not think a nomination equivalent to an election. But it will be well for Republican leaders to remember that on former occasions the same confidence has, by reason of nominations unfit to be made and of the arrogant and insolent dictation of worthless party usurpers, been driven to most humiliating and unexpected defeats. Such a calamity is within the possibilities of this campaign. An honest Convention, a respectable ticket, with non-partisan judicial candidates and a simple platform, with an honest purpose to give the new Constitution a fair and generous interpretation, places the success of the Republican ticket beyond the possibility of defeat. Kearney will resent the attempt to destroy his Workingmen's party, and it is probable that he will not be so easily crushed out of existence. The Northern and native-born of his following and the Irish will not all of them enlist under the standard of the man who killed Senator Broderick. There are many loyal men who will not readily affiliate with this distinguished Confederate brigadier-general, and will not forget his mad endeavor to destroy the Union in the interest of a slave-holder's rebellion. Kearney thinks that he has laid the foundation of a great national labor party—we are not quite sure that he has not. In alliance with men for whom he has no respect, and who have nothing but contempt for him, and with whom he has no sentiment in common, he looks upon success as a victory more disastrous than any temporary defeat. History is replete with such lessons. We have been personally identified with laying the foundations of a great national party. When it began in California it was but an handful of earnest men; but they were earnest, and were never drawn aside from the main issues. The Republican party in its infancy had a giant struggle in its principles, and never formed any alliance in order to gain some temporary advantage. This adherence to its own party purpose told in the end, and after more than one defeat it became the dominant party of the State and of the nation. Kearney has this example for his imitation, and, while he will distrust our advice as interested and selfish, he will not, we think, lay down his arms or disband his forces in order that the chivalry wing of the Democracy may have the prestige of this year's victory for next year's Presidential election.

Such a reorganization of the Republican party, shaking itself free from the dictation of any and all corporations, putting itself under the leadership of honest men, nominating as candidates those who are known as not belonging to the Federal ring, making a platform pledged to an economical administration, and to a fair and just interpretation of the new Constitution, would commend itself to those Republican farmers who voted with honest purpose for the adoption of the new Constitution. Without the cooperation of this class the Republican party would be in a hopeless minority; without honest party work the vote of this class can not be obtained; without the farmers there is no Republican party. They are its rank and file. They can not be fooled, nor bamboozled, nor hoodwinked. It was this class that defeated Gorham for Governor. This class elected Booth. Farmers can be overreached in politics; they can be outwitted at conventions; they can be swindled in primary elections. The court-house cliques that live on county offices can always send delegates to a State Convention. The city politicians can always cut and dry things to their prejudice. Slates can be made up, and programmes put up; tricks can be played; combinations can be made, and the country delegates sent home with fleas in their ears, while the city smarties, the ring rascals, and the paid hirelings of corporations, have their own way. But when the farmer gets home and reads his ARGONAUT, and begins to think, he sees the little game; he resents it, and he either abstains from voting by staying away from the polls, or he casts his ballot for a bolting ticket, or he votes for an honest man on the opposition ticket. The farmer is honest, and hates to be fooled if he knows it. Hence we say to the managers of the Republican party that any departure from honest work will send the party to a deserved defeat. Hence we say to the adventurers, and old party dead-beats, and frauds, who are now attempting to put up a State Convention, that they can not succeed.

San Francisco is to-day fairly humming with the busy intrigues of a miserable gang of unprincipled political vagabonds, who are now forestalling the popular wish by dirty party work in the wards. They will probably send a compact delegation from San Francisco to the State Convention to work in the interest of a cabal. We are informed of this conspiracy, and we are powerless to prevent it. We shall endeavor to go as a delegate to the State Convention from our ward, where we have lived twenty-six years in the same house, but the chance is not one in a hundred that we shall succeed. If we fail, we shall endeavor to get a proxy in order to have a voice in the Convention; and if we fail to get a proxy we shall go in any event—if not as a delegate, we will take a seat in the gallery and look on. The ARGONAUT will give faithful and honest opinions upon all political questions. It was started for that purpose. It was established to denounce Republican rogues in California, to defeat dishonest political conspiracies, and to punish party vagabonds. This summer's politics will be uncommonly hot, and we anticipate for ourselves an earnest campaign. We should like to have every native-born American farmer in California take our paper. If there are any in the State who are too poor to subscribe for it, and will announce that fact, we will send it to them gratuitously. We are in sincere and earnest sympathy with the small farmers who till their own acres. We were born in this class. All the memories of our younger and better days belong to the country and the farm. We think the farmer honest, patriotic, and intelligent. We think liberty, freedom, law, and good government will look away from the city to the country for their ultimate protection. We see the redundant populations of cities tending to ignorance and vice, and the time is not distant when metropolitan laws must be made from the rural districts. We write this in no hope of any possible political or other advantage to be received. Our ambitious days are over; our personal aspirations for office, or party or public honors, have been murdered, and we accept the fate. It is better so, for now we can dare to tell the truth. No man in a republican government who is in office, or who ever hopes to be, dare tell the whole truth. We desire to put ourselves and this journal in friendly correspondence with country people. We think we can do them good, and, as God lives, we think the only hope and refuge and safety of the American commonwealth rests upon the intelligence and integrity and bone and sinew of the country people.

In view of the recent political agitation, under the leadership of an Irish drayman, a newspaper published by two young Jewish gentlemen, and a Confederate brigadier-general from Kentucky, we have been led to some serious political reflections. We do not criticise anybody for being Irish, or Catholic, or Jewish, or Confederates, as such; but when Confederates and Jews and Catholics and Irish undertake to reform the country in which we live, and to make the laws under which we must exist, and elect the officers whom we must obey, it sets us to thinking, and we can't help wondering if Americans are, after all, so utterly debauched and demoralized and worthless as to need the interference of this alien reformatory element in our politics. We ask ourselves, whether this corruption in office, this swindling and stealing, this scrambling for places, does not come in part from the source from whence these reforming agitators spring? whether our immigration laws might be amended and our naturalization laws repealed? whether there is not too much of this foreign element in the country, and whether it is not dangerous, and whether it ought not to be resisted by the organization of an American party whose duty it should be to resent the insolence and resist the aggressions of this foreign invasion?

And right here, and now and always, when we use the word American, we embrace all foreigners who are Americans in sentiment—whom seek our shores for commerce, business, pleasure, home, anything but politics. Men of intelligence and integrity who mind their own business, no matter what the land of their birth or their religion, are our countrymen so long as they do not undertake to control and make a business of the politics of the country. This distinction we always draw. The foreigner is entitled to everything the country possesses, and we would not exclude a reputable person of German or Irish birth from holding office. But when they band together and invoke their nationality or their religion, and because of their class vote presume to dictate the politics of the country, we have a right to resent it. It is the Irish vote, the German vote, the Jewish vote, the Catholic vote, that we quarrel with. It is appealing to an unpatriotic sentiment. It is taking an ungenerous and mean advantage of Americans. We have a prejudice in favor of our native-born. We are opposed to this clannish feeling. We observe that in banks, mercantile houses, and general business operations, Irish employ Irish, Germans employ Germans, Jews employ Jews. If a foreigner gets an office, his deputy is a countryman and co-religionist, while the American employs all nationalities—Jews and Gentiles, Catholic and Protestant, Irish and German. If Americans acted in this way the community would be divided into jealous contending classes.

We are only endeavoring to secure for Americans their political rights. We demand that in this country they are entitled to equal privileges with the most favored foreign nations. We think Americans are brave and patriotic; that, North and South, they achieved distinction on the battlefield. We repudiate the idea that there was any greatly added glory to our arms from soldiers of foreign birth. The percentage of foreign-born soldiers in our armies was very small, and of that number foreign nationalities had their full share of those who enlisted for bounties and who shirked the dangers of the battle-field. We are of the opinion that there is a warmer and a firmer patriotism among the native-born than can be possible to those of alien birth. We think Americans more enthusiastic than our adopted fellow-citizens; that they are just as honest, and that in all respects, for this country and its future, they are the superiors of the foreign-born. It stands to reason that foreigners should have less restraints in this, to them, foreign land. Lord Clive would not have robbed England as he did India; and, had he done so, would not have replied to a parliamentary commission as he did. Recounting his opportunities of plunder, he described in vivid language the situation in which victory had placed him. A great prince dependent on his pleasure; an opulent city afraid of being given up to plunder; wealthy bankers bidding against each other for his smiles; vaults piled with jewels and gold thrown open to him alone. "By God, Mr. Chairman," he exclaimed, "at this moment I stand astonished at my own moderation." We are surprised that Cassebohm took only $20,000 out of the two and a half millions under his control, and we stand in admiration of Hubert's integrity that he does not take the balance.

All this leads up to a table of defalcations, swindles, and tangled accounts that have occurred in our city, which we produce as the text upon which every thinking man, native or foreign-born, may write his own sermon. There is a barrelful of sermons, which we commend to the serious and prayerful consideration of intelligent and well disposed citizens of all nationalities:

We trust our foreign friends will excuse us for the expression of these indulgent sentiments in favor of the oppressed and down-trodden Americans.

It would be a curious bit of newspaper literature to go back over the files of the Chronicle and collate the eulogistic notices of the white-plumed Henry of Navarre—the blue-eyed orator of the sand-lot; the impassioned, the eloquent, the gifted, the magnetic, the fervid, the God-born leader; the man who bearded the President in Washington, and thundered his denunciations from the steps of the national capitol; who crowded Faneuil Hall, the old cradle of liberty; who electrified the men of Massachusetts; who lighted the fires of reform at the foot of the monument of Bunker Hill—and contrast them with its present editorial writings, in which Kearney is represented to be ignorant, mercenary, vicious, altogether unprincipled, a blackmailer of corporations, and former of piece clubs. After months of abject fawning upon this wild ass of the sand-lot, and fairly licking his brogans, the Chronicle now turns upon him and says: "Kearney went to Boston for Butler and made an ass of himself in Faneuil Hall in the presence of the nation. He brought ridicule, shame, and disgrace upon California, and has made us a by-word of communism and ruffianism in the estimation of our sister States. The people of this State have enough of Kearney. They do not want any more of him, and will not tolerate either him or his insolence, ignorance, and vice any longer. The New Constitution party can not and will not pack any such dead weight."

If it had not been for the Chronicle and the Call, this braying donkey of the sand-lot would not have been heard beyond his own thistle-field. Our State has been disgraced and dishonored abroad; we have been made a by-word of communism and ruffianism in the estimation of our sister States, but it has been the vile and unprincipled daily press of San Francisco alone that has been heard beyond the locality where Kearney has emitted his political blasphemies. The people of California have had enough of Kearney, and they will get enough of the Chronicle. We hope the time has come when we shall cease to tolerate the insolence of Kearney, and we hope the time is coming when an intelligent people will no longer tolerate the insolence of the Chronicle.

It looks somewhat politico-comical for ex-Senator Cole to enlist under Commander Terry for a campaign against the Republican party. It seems quite absurd that the son of Lord John Love's father should "take pleasure in introducing the Hon. David S. Terry as one who is anxious to bring the people of this State under the control of the law." That Judge Alexander Campbell, Clitus Barbour, Volney E. Howard, and Beerstecher should deem the equalization of taxation so important a matter.

Volney E. Howard said in his speech at the new party conference: "It is not for a man whose hands are stained with blood, the blood of assassination, to go about in the public streets prating about the 'unthinking majority.' That is not the sort of men to take charge of the public interests of this State. That is not the character of men wanted here, nor the class of men to whom the people of this State can confide their interests in connection with the new government now about to be put into operation." This is personal to at least one honorable bilk.

He also said that as the recording angel has blotted out Uncle Toby's oath, it might blot out the term "honorable bilks." A cloud burst of angels' tears would not deface this word. Kearney has branded it in with a hot iron upon the flanks of the Chivalry Democracy, and it will stick. No hair will ever grow over the spot.

Beerstecher has seen snakes—in India. They lick people, and so he proceeded to lick Howard, and slobber over him, and drivel at the mouth. He said: "I have seen that gentleman's conduct; I approve that gentleman's conduct, and, sir, I shall swallow him as long as I live, sir. I shall scratch his ear, sir, and I shall tickle his elbow, sir. I have seen the names of seven able American jurists suggested by the ARGONAUT for the Supreme Bench. I do not approve them, sir. My colleagues and my constituents do not approve them, sir." Dash this Dutchman.

C. S. Ringgold said to the Constitutional resurrectionists: "I have resided in California twenty-seven years. I am not worth a cent, but I will risk my last dollar as freely as the wealthiest citizen to put this new Constitution in force. I will risk every dollar of other people's accumulations to try this experiment with other people's property. I am a Democrat. I have no principles to risk, no reputation to lose. I have voted with the Democracy for twenty-five years—early and often."

Thus Clitus arose, and thus he spake: "In order that wealth may not cripple us with the thumb-screws, let us cut off our thumbs. Now, sir, we have set out for a common goal. Let us capture the County Jail and board ourselves. The Workingmen's party has never slopped over; an empty bucket never slops over; an empty head never slops over; I never slop over. My colleagues have suffered in this city; I have suffered. At one time I was very nearly driven to work for my living. The Workingmen's party came to my relief. I now live upon it. I will stand by it as long as it supports me. You honorable bilks have stolen a horse, and now you propose to swap it with us and get one of your own. We never swap horses in crossing a stream. I would rather go to the County Hospital. It is a good place for Barbour."

Colonel Younger, of Santa Clara, is a famous cattle-breeder. He is trying the experiment of a party cross-breed between the chivalry Democracy and the sand-lot Irish—sire, David Terry; dam, Denis Kearney.

W. F. White, of Santa Clara, has been suffering from the oppressions of republican government for thirty years—ever since he left Ireland. He has only succeeded in getting a farm of one thousand two hundred acres, and taxes are so burdensome that he is anxious to return to his ancestral cabin and pig and hog, unless he can be Governor of California.

The Hon. A. W. Thompson of Sonoma says "It is not a nice thing to be told that the Workingmen's party monopolizes all the virtue of the State, because he don't belong to it, and he is virtuous." He also says, "I believe I am as good a man of my kind as there's going, and I am a Democrat." Now, we will not dispute that he is good of his kind, but don his kind.

Judge J. B. Southard was the only happy man in the consultation over the new Constitution. The immediate cause of his happiness was because he saw "so much harmony." As there were two distinct parties, and they could not agree to come together upon any terms, it must follow that the Judge saw double. Sorry to see the Judge falling into his old habits.

John P. Dunn spoke for fear that if he had remained silent his club would think he had said nothing. He did speak, and still said nothing, so he achieved a double purpose. Mr. Dunn says the W. P. C. want to do as they have always done. We ask Mr. Dunn what they have done?

Judge William B. Norman is one of those old Democrats who came over with William the Conqueror. He voted for General Jackson, the Resolutions of '93, and the new Constitution. He has been lying in the mausoleum of the dead Democracy now for a decade or two. He is, therefore, a decayed politician. "I am," says ex-Senator Norman, "one of the founders of a party coeval with the history of this government from its foundation." A toad blasted out of a primordial rock could not be more lively; but our advice is for him to crawl back and not come out at the sound of the final trumpet unless he recognizes a Democratic call; this is a false alarm. This is Kearney's bugle, but what a wriggling it is making among the worms in the Democratic grave-yard.

The Honorable Caleb Dorsey came to America with Columbus in the year 1492. Since then he has resided in "old Tuolumne." All his life he has belonged to the Democratic party. He is not willing to be swallowed by Beerstecher's snake. He would rather swallow the snake if it crawled out of his boots. Caleb was sorry to see the "spirit" that had arisen in the consultation. It was not the kind of spirits that he liked to imbibe.

Lord John Love is a prematurely old politician. He somehow reminds us of that little old man who got upon the back of Sindbad the Sailor, and who Sindbad finally got rid of by getting him drunk. John was born upon the back of the Republican party, and it has been reeling along with John on it like an Indian papoose on a board ever since, and he has been drawing suck over its shoulders. Now, the other fellows have got him, and we hope they may enjoy him.

We suggest to the new party of old fossils the name of Nathaniel Bennett for Supreme Judge. His renomination would call up some exceedingly interesting reminiscences of how he happened to resign the Supreme Bench, of which he was once an ornament.

How does it happen that Denis Kearney was not invited to the consultation in reference to the formation of a new party? The invitations came from the Chronicle office. There was a time when Charles would not have forgotten to send for Denis. This is Mr. Pickering's opportunity for small advertisements.

The Chronicle charges Kearney with inconsistency in this, that he abuses lawyers, and yet has spoken from the same stand with Judge Budd of Stockton. There is no apparent inconsistency in speaking with Budd or Bob Ferial, as they are neither of them lawyers.

There is a conspiracy on foot to nominate a certain old political hay-seed as the Republican candidate for Governor. It did not win the last time, and it will not win this time. The same agencies that beat the conspiracy before will defeat it again. He can not be elected—the entire wealth of the corporation that backs him won't suffice to make him Governor. Money can make a candidate, but it can't make a Governor this time.

CRITICISM.

Criticism is in general the expression of individual opinion. There are no immutable laws to govern individual taste. One could wish, for the sake of those who suffer under the merciless lash of private opinion publicly expressed, that there were some definite rules by which we could abide. We are obedient to the restrictions of grammar and the requirements of rhetoric. But it is when individual genius cuts out a new path for itself that criticism is aroused. True genius is compelled to this step—it is only imitators who will be content to follow in the paths which others have made. It should be essential that genius be criticised by genius. No one who can not compose a poem should have power to destroy an epic; no one who has not realized by experience the inspiration of literary effort ought to lay profane hands on another's work. There has been no greater master of the art of criticism in this country than the clear sighted poet and writer, Edgar A. Poe. His work in that direction was not so extensive as we could wish, but it was instinctively accurate, understandingly appreciative, just, and discriminating. His criticism of Mrs. Browning's poems is an aid to a more thorough understanding of their beauties and defects than one is likely to get without having read it. One could find it in his heart to forgive a critic all the harsh things which he might say of one's work, if he only took pains to point out its beauties with the keen appreciation which Poe showed. It is not enough to say that the beauties of literary work will be apparent of themselves. Where only fault is found the casual reader will be led to suppose there is little else. And criticism should include both provinces, that those who see wherein the beauty of their work lies may be encouraged to continue, instead of being discouraged at the number of their faults.

"My critic Belfair wants a book
Entirely different, which will sell and live;
A striking book, yet not a startling book—
The public blames originalities.
You must not pump water unawares
Upon a gracious public full of nerves—
Good things, not subtle—new, yet orthodox;
As easy reading as the dog-eared page,
That's fingered by said public fifty years,
Since first taught spelling by its grandmother,
And yet a revelation in some sort;
That's hard, my critic Belfair!"

Truly it is hard. "The public blames originalities." A new phrasing of ideas, the mere matter of routing out some obsolescent words which exactly express the ideas one wants, or the original combination of new words weighty with meaning instead of stereotyped expressions—are all matters for blame. The style has taken the critics unawares, and they are not sure that they ought to admire or encourage; nay, they are quite sure they ought to condemn, and they do. "The gracious public, full of nerves," don't want to be enlightened by the advent of new methods of composition; the "spring-waters" of the fountain of genius are too "startling," are not "orthodox," and are not "easy reading." "Your adjectives are superabundant; they are also far-fetched. Would it not be as well to say 'the blue sky' as the 'azure heavens?'" My critic Belfair, adjectives are the life and soul of description; without them prose would be tame and poetry insipid. You can not talk for five minutes without using them in your conversation to aid and illustrate. There should be a reasonable limit to the number which is used. If I choose to use "azure" in place of "blue" in describing the color of the heavens, it is merely a question of individual taste. One does not insult one's readers by presuming that they have not sufficient intelligence to comprehend one. In the language of a celebrated lexicographer, "I am bound to furnish good definitions, but not brains to comprehend them." If my critic Belfair is just enough to admit that my use of adjectives is in accordance with grammatical rules, and only chooses to quarrel with me on the score of heterodoxy, why he has one resource left him—to write a book himself which shall come up to the critical requirements. Mayhap he will have more charity for hardly-worked and poorly-paid writers ever after. It is not that we object to criticism as an essential accompaniment of our performances, if the aim be to benefit us instead of influencing public opinion against our productions. And there are critics who handle our work with a view of displaying their own erudition in literary matters, to the exclusion of our interests and natural rights. If we have cause for pride in our performances, it must be rigorously subdued, and praise is regarded as a weakness on the part of a critic. But see how judiciously Poe mingled praise and blame in his critique on Mrs. Browning's Drama of Exile—so skillfully, indeed, that we can not forbear quoting a few sentences as an example for all other critics: "It is not our purpose to demonstrate what every reader of these volumes will have readily seen self-demonstrated—the utter indefensibility of the Drama of Exile considered uniquely as a work of art. We have none of us to be told that a medley of metaphysical recitations sung out of tune, at Adam and Eve, by all manner of inconceivable abstractions, is not exactly the best material for a poem. Still it may very well happen that among the material there shall be individual passages of great beauty. Her wild and magnificent genius seems to have contented itself with points, to have exhausted itself in flashes; but it is the profusion, the unparalleled number and close propinquity of these points, which render her book one flame, and justify us in calling her, unhesitatingly, the greatest—the most glorious—of her sex." Critics hold no very enviable position at best, but its agreeability would be intensified by a judicious mingling of praise and blame, for no work is worthy of criticism which has no good points. But while "the public blames originalities" there can be no change, for "they are the people and wisdom shall die with them."

MAY N. HAWLEY.

NORTH COLUMBIA, CAL., May 15, 1879.

A German doctor, after years of profound inquiry, has made the delightful discovery that "early to bed and early to rise," etc., is a delusion. He finds that most long lives have indulged in late hours, and that so far from any decided benefit being gained from getting up early, it rather tends to exhaust physical energy and shorten life. So far from the early morning hours being the most invigorating, they are, on the contrary, apt to produce lassitude, and are to some constitutions much more injurious than dewy eve.

After the Wedding.

All alone in my room at last—
I wonder how far they have traveled now;
They'll be very far when the night is past—
And so would I, if I knew but how.
How lovely she looked in her wreath and dress,
She is queenlier far than the village girls;
There were roses, too, in her wreath, I guess—
"Twas they made the crimson among her curls.
She is good as beautiful, too, they say,
Her heart is gentle as any dove's;
She'll be all that she can to him always—
(Dear, I am tearing my new white gloves!)
How calm she is with her saint-like face,
Her eyes are violet—mine are blue—
(How careless I am with my mother's lace!)
Her hands are white, and softer, too.
They've gone to the city beyond the hill,
They must never come back to this place again;
I'm almost afraid to be here so still—
I wish it would thunder and lightning and rain.
Oh, no! for some may not be ached;
Some few, perhaps, may be out to-night;
I hope that the moon may come out instead,
And heaven be starry and earth be light.
It's only a summer since she's been here,
It's been my home for seventeen years;
But her name is a testament, far and near,
And the poor have embalmed it in priceless tears.
I remember the day when another came—
(There, at last I've tied my hair!)
Her curls and mine are nearly the same,
But hers are longer and mine less fair.
They're going across the sea, I know;
Across the ocean—will that be far?
(Did I have my comb a moment ago?)
I seem to forget where my things all are.
When ships are wrecked do people drown?
Is there never a boat to save the crew?
Poor ships! If ever my ship goes down
I'll want a grave in the ocean, too.
Good-night, good-night! It is striking one.
Good-night to bride and good-night to groom!
The light of my candle is almost done—
(How I wish that my bed were in my mother's room).
How calm it looks in the midnight shade!
Those curtains were hung there clean to-day;
They're almost too white for me, I'm afraid—
Perhaps I may soon be as white as they.
Dark—all dark—for the light is dead;
Father in Heaven, may I have rest!
One hour of sleep for my aching head—
For this aching heart in my poor, poor breast.
For his sweet sake do I kneel and pray:
O God! protect him from every ill,
And make her worthier every day.
The older the purer, the lovelier still.
(There, I knew I was going to cry!)
I have kept the tears in my soul too long.
Oh, let me say it, or I shall die!
As heaven is witness I mean no wrong.
He never shall hear from this secret room,
He never shall know in the after years
How seventeen summers of happy bloom
Fell dead one night in a moment of tears.
I love him more than she understands,
For him I loaded my soul with truth;
For him I am kneeling with outstretched hands
To lay at his feet my shattered youth.
I love, I adore him just the same,
More than father, or mother, or life;
My hope of hopes to bear his name,
My heaven of heavens to be his wife.
His wife! Oh, name that the angels breathe,
Let it not crimson my cheek with shame!
It is her name, her word to breathe
In the princely heart from whose blood it came.
Oh, hush! Again I behold them stand,
As they stood to-night, by the chancel wall;
I see him taking her white-gloved hand,
I hear his voice in a whisper fall,
I see the minister's silver hair,
I see them kneel at the altar-stone;
I see them rise when the prayer is o'er—
He has taken their hands and made them one.
The fathers and mothers are standing near.
The friends are pressing to kiss the bride—
One of those kisses had birthplace here,
The dew of her lips is not yet dried.
His lips have touched hers before to-night—
Then I have a grain of his to keep;
This midnight darkness is flecked with light,
Some angel is singing my soul to sleep.
He knows full well why many a knave
So close to his lady's lips should swim;
God only knows that the kiss I gave
Was set in her mouth to give to him.

ANONYMOUS.

Trodden Flowers.

There are some hearts that, like the loving vine,
Cling to unkindly rocks and ruined towers,
Spirits that suffer and do not repine—
Patient and sweet as lowly trodden flowers,
That from the passers' heel arise,
And bring back odorous breath instead of signs.
But there are other hearts that will not feel
The lonely love that haunts their eyes and ears;
That wound fond faith with anger worse than steel,
And out of pity's spring draw idle tears.
O Nature, shall it ever be thy will
Ill things with good to mingle, good with ill?
Why should the heavy foot of sorrow press
The willing heart of uncomplaining love—
Meek charity that shrinks not from distress,
Gentleness, loth her tyrants to reprove?
Though virtue weep forever and lament,
With one hard heart turn to her and repent?
Why should the seed be broken that will bend,
And they that dry the tears in others' eyes
Feel their own anguish swelling without end,
Their summer darkened with the smoke of sighs?
Sure, Love to some fair region of her own
Will flee at last and leave us here alone.
Love weepeth away—weepeth for the past,
For woes that are, for woes that may betide;
Why should not hard ambition weep at last,
Envy and hatred, avarice and pride?
Fate whispers that so low is your poor lot,
They would be rebels; love rebelleth not.

The late Elizabeth Cook, of Newton, Mass., bequeathed none of her estate, worth $100,000, to her numerous relatives. She gave $15,000 to her lawyer and physician, and released fifteen creditors from their liabilities. Her will is to be contested.

A WORD FOR THE IRISHMAN.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—Since the first publication of your journal I have read it religiously every Sunday. I like it. Its smack of Bohemianism pleases me. Something about your ARGONAUT carries me back to Paris and the Quartier Latin. In one of your past issues I read an account of the reign of the Commune in Paris. It was good. I, too, was there. I was in Montmartre when the first gun was trained on the Republican government. I saw the recreant Garde-Nationale turn over to us by the company. I saw Paris literally running with good red French blood. I saw Paris full, the last barricade taken, and the last little gallant French gamin go down with "Vive la peuple" on his lips—but this is not what I intended to write about. Sometimes I think you are hard on my countrymen. I am an Irishman, though educated nearly altogether in England and France. I admit it is rather hard to ask a journalist to analyze the character of a lot of ignorant foreigners, who are threatening the peace of his country, before denouncing them. But the Irish character is such an anomalous one, that a little light on the subject from a native might help you in your future dealings with them. Perhaps I am presumptuous in offering it. Well, if you think so, consign this to the waste basket, and at least give me credit for a good intention. I have lived among Irishmen in their own country and found them (I speak of the peasant class) a good-natured, hospitable people, fond of excitement, ready-witted, and possessed to an extraordinary degree of the faculty of adapting themselves to others' ways. Now, it is to this last attribute that I lay all their misfortunes abroad. They come to America, and in a few years find themselves possessed of rights and privileges that in their own country it would have been hardihood to dream of. They meet their countrymen who have preceded them here, and who, under the able tuition of a few unprincipled American demagogues, have become full-fledged politicians, and, in the natural order of things, seek to vie with their predecessors in political insolence. The wily tutors who taught them politics, and wanted them only as stepping stones to office, never impressed upon them the fact that the franchise has its responsibilities as well as its rights. The stump teacher appealed only to the worst passions of his too pliant pupil, and made all that was conservative in the community supply in Pat's imagination the place of his hated landlord at home. Paddy is a funny animal. He must have something to love and something to hate. His religion ever supplies the former, and circumstances too often supply the latter. Again, the action of the Republican party, which I assume represents to a great extent the native-born population of the country, is such as tends to make the Irish people vote as a unit. I refer to their deep-rooted antipathy to the Roman Catholic Church. Now, though I am a Catholic, travel and contact with the world has almost entirely blotted from my mind the boundary marks of sectarianism; and yet I have heard Catholicism assailed in such a way as to make me angry—so reckless the statements, so groundless the arguments. In the last Presidential election I belonged to the Hayes Invincibles; I was not a citizen of the United States, nor, for that matter, am I now. All my friends were Republicans, and my interest in politics was so small that I blindly followed their guidance. Here it was I learned the impossibility of an Irish Catholic making a consistent Republican. My sympathies were with them as representing the conservative interests of the country, but what man can affiliate with a party that makes by-words of his religion and nationality! It is time for Americans to bury the Jesuit bugbear with the bloody shirt. In the course of a correspondence held with a friend of mine, who is an attaché of the British Legation in Berlin, I endeavored to enlighten him on the various issues in American politics, and among other things spoke of the fear that existed among certain classes here that the Jesuits would interfere with the public schools, etc. His reply, I think, was a good one. He said: "Americans need have little fear of Jesuitical influence. They are too busy here on the defensive to be able to act elsewhere on the offensive. Besides, they haven't the right stuff to work on in America." You are yourselves responsible for this foreign annoyance. You admit foreigners to equal political rights with yourselves five years too soon. The class of foreigners who as a rule come here are laboring men with families, and it consequently takes them a long time to accumulate property. "The man who owns property loves order" might have become a proverb if Benjamin Franklin had spoken it. An unqualified franchise, too. Ye gods, think of it! The framers of your Constitution were too pure. They dreamt not of the ward politician of this century, and my benighted countryman, Denis, held no place in their imagination. However, what is the use of crying over spilled milk! You have taken us for better or worse, and make the best of your bargain. Don't by your intolerance compel us all to be sand-lotters. All Irishmen are not Workingmen (so-called) and Democrats. Kearney's fiasco will soon peter out. It takes a great man to make a permanent success of a mob, and if the truth were known this drayman already thinks it a sorry job. It must have been a strange state of society that made this gosssoon of the fishing village an agitator; but then circumstances made a hero of Taissant Louveture, a negro slave.

CON CREGAN.

SACRAMENTO, May 10, 1879.

The story of a young man in Iowa descending the walls of a well twenty-one feet deep, and ascending again with a woman weighing one hundred and thirty pounds under his arm, is all right. It is just such lies as this that made George Washington the father of his country.

LXXX.—Sunday, May 25.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Rice and Tomato Soup.
Fried Barracuda, Sauce Poutelle.
Jellied Chicken.
Summer Squash. Asparagus.
Roast Beef. Potato Croquettes.
Cucumber Salad.
Charlotte Russe. Raspberries.
Fruit-bowl of Cherries, Oranges, and Apricots.

TO JELLY CHICKEN.—Take one chicken if a large quantity is needed, but generally half will do; cut in small pieces, cover with soup stock, and boil until thoroughly cooked. Remove the bones, cut the meat in small pieces, add red pepper, salt, a very little ground cloves, a little allspice and mace. Have two hard boiled eggs sliced, and a cucumber pickle thinly cut. Butter a mould, lay the slices of egg nicely round the sides, put in the pickle, and mix the pieces of the chicken with the liquid in which it has been boiled and pour into the mould. This is to be eaten cold, and may be made of veal as well as chicken. A little minced ham improves this dish.

INTAGLIOS.

The Room's Width.

I think if I should cross the room,
Far as beside you like a thought,
Should stand beside you like a thought,
Touch you, dear!

Like a fancy. To your sad heart
It would seem
That my vision passed and prayed you,
Or my dream.

Then you would look with lonely eyes—
Lift your head—
And you would stir, and sigh, and say—
"She is dead."

Baffled by death and love, I lean
Through the gloom,
O Lord of life! am I forbid
To cross the room?

ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS.

The Little Sisters of the Snow.
(Sanguinaria Canadensis.)

When April woods are all in bud,
And wistful south winds blow,
When rushing brooks are bright with flood,
And hill-tops bare of snow,

Then in the forest's lonely glades
The careless bluebirds see
A crowd of white-capped little maids
Rise from their nursery.

Each cell, a dark and wrinkled leaf,
Close folded from the sun,
Keeps sweet novitiate, cool and brief,
For every tiny nun.

More white than milk that foams and flows,
They lift their placid heads,
Amid these rough and rocky homes,
From out their leaf-strewn beds.

No trace of passion or of pain
Across their brows is drawn;
They bow not to the sun or rain,
Nor turn to meet the dawn.

Yet dare to pluck one bud away
Where that pale conclave grows,
From the chill stem you make your prey
What scarlet life-blood flows.

Dear Little Sisters of the Snow,
Beneath that virgin veil
What fires of hidden passion glow
To mock your drapery pale!

And we who gather, scant of ruth,
Your blossoms cold and fair,
Pluck also some unbidden truth
That startles us to prayer.

Such a Little One.

A squad of regular infantry,
In the Commune's closing days,
Had captured a crowd of rebels
By the wall of Pere la Chaise.

There were desperate men, wild women,
And dark-eyed Amazon girls,
And one little boy, with a peach-down cheek
And yellow clustering curls.

The captain seized the little waif
And said: "What dost thou here?"
"Sapristi, citizen captain!
"I'm a Communist, my dear!"

"Very well. Then you die with the others!"
"Very well. That's my affair,
But first let me take to my mother,
Who lives by the wine-shop there,

"My father's watch. You see it;
A gay old thing, is it?
It would please the old lady to have it—
Then I'll come back here and be shot."

"That is the last we shall see of him,"
The grizzled captain grinned,
As the little man skinned down the hill
Like a swallow down the wind.

For the joy of killing had lost its zest
In the glut of those awful days,
And Death writhed, gorged like a greedy snake,
From the Arch of Pere la Chaise.

But before the last platoon had fired
The child's shrill voice was heard—
"Houp-la! the old girl made such a row
I feared I should break my word!"

Against the bullet-pitted wall
He took his place with the rest;
A button was lost from his ragged blouse,
Which showed his soft, white breast.

"Now huz away, my children,
With your little one—two—three!"
The chassepots tore the stout young heart,
And saved society.

JOHN HAY.

Disqualified.

You speak of love? Why, love and I
Are such old friends, my very dreams,
When I was small and most unwisdom,
Were wove of love and love-like themes.

You speak of joy and peace and rest?
And herd these things with love, sweet sir?
Why, love and rest are bitter foes,
If ever God and Satan were.

You'd make me happy? And by love?
Love hath not made his own for joy,
But most for sorrow and for sharp
Endurements—not for peace to cloy

And leave them sick and satiate.
At rest within your arms? Why, yes,
Because I do not love you, nor
Do you begin love's half to guess.

Love gives not peace, or joy, or rest;
He measure's out a bitter draught—
The honey, then the bee's quick sting
To compensate the sweet, that's qualified.

He give's not bliss—your bliss. Why, since Dead Shelley's clear, keen, sense-full verse
First smote and taught my childish heart
Love's first fruition and its curse

I know, sweet sir, that bliss is pain:
That near the rose's heart there stays
A thorn that's restless, thin, and sharp,
That kills the quiet of one's days.

Go out, and in the wide, wide world
You'll find some safer hand than mine
To clasp in yours—some one who believes
That they are one, the oil and wine.

But I, who know the serpent's tooth
That glitters in love's splendid gift,
Hug closer to my heart the pain,
And clasp the lute for all its rift.

To speak of love and rest a-breath!
Of love which is an anguished ache—
Relinquish now, press again—
Doubt, terror, fear—all for Love's sake.

Sweet sir, in days forever gone
This Love and I were such good friends—
I do forget myself maybe—
I loved a man once. There it ends.

THE LATEST FRENCH BONBONS.

A young man at St. Petersburg who was bound to kiss a beautiful young lady of his acquaintance (very slight) seized the chance offered by the Easter season, procured a costly Easter egg and presented it to her. She accepted it, but when he was about to imprint a—
"a one upon her ruby lips she drew back.

"Why, everybody gives everybody else Easter eggs and kisses them to-day," said the young man.

"I know it, but you being a comparative stranger and not an intimate friend should have appeared in full dress and presented me with the egg before kissing me."

The young man did not let the snow grow under the runners of his sleigh on his way home, changed his dress and returned and addressed the customary salutation to the young woman.

"He is indeed," replied she, but drew back when he attempted to kiss her.

"Why is this thus?" said the young man nettled.

"Haven't I got on a dress suit?"

"Yes; but you haven't got an Easter egg. You seem resolved not to conform with the usages of good society."

X. is egotistic in the extreme.

The other day he had occupied about ten minutes in delivering some personal reminiscences of himself when he was interrupted:

"Where was I—what was I saying when I left off?" he asked, the interruption being at an end.

"You were saying 'I'—replied one of the listeners with the passing tribute of a yawn.

Before the Cadi a Mahometan was brought up for burning down a Christian's house.

"Where is the complainant?"

"May our souls be a sacrifice, but he is in the other world. He was burned up with his house."

"The Koran," said the magistrate, "provides that where the complainant is unable to appear, if his abiding place be known the culprit shall be taken there and confronted with him. In the present case the plaintiff does not appear and is known to be in the next world. Let the law be executed—ditto the prisoner."

♫ Gone to meet his victim.

Yesterday, Rue Hauteville, a mister finds himself in the rear of a youth of a fifteen years, who himself marches behind a child of eight or ten years.

All at once and without any reason apparent, the youth sends the cap of the little in the gutter.

But at the same instant this had funny (mauvais drole) receives at the base of his loins a blow of the foot of first class of the mister, who says to him of the tone the most solemn, in showing him the sky with the finger:

"The vengeance of heaven."

An elderly gentleman finds himself at a masked ball set upon by three lively dominos, who finally ask of him in chorus:

"Oh, is it true you are sixty years old?"

"Whoever told you so, ladies, told you a no-such-thing," cries the old gentleman, gallantly. "I'm twenty years old for each of you—that's what I am."

The Faculty gave the young man up, but his faithful servant stole noiselessly to his side and sobbed through his tears:

"Master, my dear master, I heard them say the wick was flickering in the socket, and I've gone and put a new wick in the lamp and more oil. We may be happy yet."

A clergyman of an original turn of mind is passing by a parishioner's shop, and in order to emphasize a great moral lesson, bounds suddenly in crying "Boo!"

Naturally the parishioner starts.

"You did not expect me to call?"

"I did not, by a blessed sight."

"Suppose it had been Death—where would you have been? Chaw on that!" and the excellent clergyman vanishes.

"My dear Baron," said she, timidly, "I am such a silly child, while you are so witty and accomplished, and have such an irresistible way of putting things that I wish you would show me how to—"

"How to what, my dear?"

"How to let you know delicately but firmly that I want you to let me have fifty louis that I am most desperately in need of."

Unapproachable circus advertisement from a Rheims paper:

"M. Eugene, better known as the Wild Beast Wrestler, has challenged the Victor Brothers and M. Napoleon.

"He is engaged to wrestle single-handed against M. Victor, known as 'Spring'; M. Napoleon, alias 'The Eel,' and M. Victor, jr., the most redoubtable of the trio, otherwise 'The Hogshead-Carrier.'

"Some gentlemen having desired to open books on the result, M. Eugene is prepared to back himself at 7 to 8.

"Every one can assist at all the phases of this Titanic struggle, during which the elder M. Victor will preserve upon his lips in the midst of his most strenuous efforts the irresistible smile which has won for him the title of 'Victor Springtime.'

"This smile has already won many hearts. We respectfully invite the attention of the ladies to it.

"M. Eugene, if he should issue the conqueror from this terrible struggle, confidently expects the plaudits of the public.

"The piano will be presided over by M. Olala, a young artist with a brilliant future before him. M. Olala will also favor with several solos on the flute."

The manager had invited his friend to call round and see some of the wondrous attractions he had collected for the season's tenting tour, specifying in particular a giant as big as a house and twice as human.

"I say, old fel," says the friend, after a careful inspection, "I don't want to cast a gloom over your entire community, but I don't think your giant is quite up to the representations in the small bills."

"Well," says the manager, "he is a little off. I didn't think he seemed quite up to himself to-night."

WHERE TO SPEND THE SUMMER.

IF YOU WANT A THOROUGHLY

enjoyable place, go to the

GEYSER SPRINGS.

Medicated Baths for the sick; Swimming Baths, Bowling Alleys, Shooting Gallery; pleasant Picnic Grounds for the well. In remodeling the Medicated NATURAL Steam Bath, due regard has been observed to give special privacy to ladies. This Bath removes TAN-FRECKLES, SALLOWNESS, BLOTCHES, and all IMPERFECTIONS from the skin, and is recommended by many physicians who have tested its value. A magnificent Swimming Bath has been constructed at a large outlay.

The house has been completely remodeled since last summer, and now is not surpassed by any in the State. The stage ride to this glorious mountain resort can not be surpassed in the world, while the very atmosphere, rarified and aromatic from the breath of fragrant pines, fir, and laurel, stimulates the senses like old wine.

For tickets and all information call at No. 2 New Montgomery Street, and 214 and 426 Montgomery Street. Rooms may be engaged by letter or telegram.

AN INTERCEPTED LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 28, 1879.

MY DEAR MADGE:—I have been thinking as I walked into one empty theatre after another this week what heart-sickening work acting must be, with empty house and a sleepy public to drop the plummet of disappointment. Listen, the English actor, once said that he liked to see even a dog wag his tail in approbation, while some fellow, who was evidently undergoing the unsatisfactory operation of writing for posterity, once wrote: "One thunder of applause from the pit, boxes, and gallery is equal to a whole immortality of posthumous fame." What, then, must be to the players that faint, dismal, would-be bit of cheer which a handful of people will labor to extend simply to delude themselves into the idea that they are having rather a good time? And this applause never does seem so hollow a mockery as when all is light and brilliant on the stage, as for example in The Millionaire's Daughter—a title which you see for yourself is simply an evasion—which has been played for one week to a large and appreciative circle of red plush, and yet has drawn better than anything else in town, not even excepting the opera. As a bit of cold, stupendous effrontery, this cribbing of The Banker's Daughter is something surprising. Plays have been written from time to time, and men have stolen them, but in this instance they have not even had the grace to put upon the bill, according to custom, the significant intimation that the same play is running under another name in another theatre in another city. It is simply announced as being by J. A. Herne and David Belasco. Herne is the apologetic looking actor who occasionally makes a bit in dialect parts, and in this instance has cast himself as the rapid American, the part in which Polk made such a point in New York. Belasco is probably another man. I know nothing of him save that he has a patent elastic conscience. That is quite sufficient. It is a long time before a man with a patent elastic conscience draws a line. Some one has said that a fairy tale is but a dream of the heart realized. Every girl fancies herself an enchanted princess, and every boy—ah, well, fate has circumscribed a girl's dreams at best, and they all end in a band-box and jewel-casket—but the boys dream of doughty deeds of daring without, and I love of all things to see a boy read a dime novel on the sly. I can easily tell by his rapt interest, his flushed cheeks, his dilated eye, just when the little rascal is yearning most to be a grand scoundrel, for that is the plain English of it. The scouts and trappers are fine fellows, but it is those debonair brigands, pirates, and highwaymen, those charming fellows who appropriate other people's wares in such a really delightful way, who solemnly enchain his fancy. If I could be a boy and dream a dream, and hope some day to be a poetical appropriator, I should say to myself: "Heaven sends us into the world with but two equipments, mind and body. All that we gather by the way is legitimate pay for sharks like me. I shall take the chickens from my neighbor's roost, the pennies from his pocket, the dollars from his wallet, the doors from his safe, the shine from his good name, the coppers from his eyes when to him such ware avails nothing. But there I will stop short: I will not kidnap the children of his body to make organ grinders and tambourine players of them, nor the creatures of his brain to make spurious imitations from." And yet to what a vast extent this smuggling in ideas is carried on. The playwright is far from being the only victim. It is only the boldness of the piracy which challenges remark and attention. In the case of The Banker's Daughter the adapters, or whatever they may call themselves, have simply overreached. They have presented us the skeleton of a charming play, but so crusted with literary inexcellences, if one may coin a word, as to quite coarsen it, and have made us just sufficiently familiar with it to spoil it with us as a novelty should some manager undertake to bring it out in Union Square form according to first intention. I wondered much what was the charm which kept this play running so many weeks in New York, and which has even brought about its restoration to the boards after the failure of Cazuran's last play. It was really strange to see how very like in many of their elements were The Banker's Daughter and Divorce, that much-worn Daly play to which Miss Davenport clings with such fatuity. One can stroll from the Baldwin to the California, and in a short twenty minutes find two mimic families in precisely the same fix. A husband and wife separated, jealousy, a former lover, a child, and husband and wife brought together by that child. Of course the attendant circumstances are different. In The Banker's Daughter we are taken to Paris. Funny, isn't it? No one writes a successful American novel any more without transporting all his people across the Atlantic, and this passion for travel has crept into the plays. For that matter one does not do duty as a well regulated American without going to Paris some time or other—so this is a touch of nature after all. They have set the play beautifully up at Baldwin's, and the scene of the ball at the American embassy is particularly attractive. It ought to be. The length of time they take at this theatre to set a scene taxes the longest patience, and nothing but the beautiful results which they sometimes give us would prevent people from getting up and leaving the theatre in groups. We might all be snugly tucked in our beds by eleven, but the scene-shifters nightly protract the end of The Millionaire's Daughter till midnight. The delay is as unnecessary as it is tiresome, and even the charming toilets of Rose Wood and Kate Corcoran do not reconcile people for one moment. What a querulous, testy, grumbling fellow Charles Thorne must be, if the adaptation is anything like the original. Whether it is the fault of Mr. Herne or of the part itself it is not easy to say, but how the humor of the rapid American citizen could have interfered with the grave hero it is impossible to conjecture. Mr. O'Neill has cultivated repose until it has become almost second nature, and is such a very engaging sort of husband that a looker-on wonders at the lady's taste in retaining any remembrance of her former lover. I do wish they would not cast Lewis Morrison for "former lovers." He is so excessively melo-dramatic that it becomes absurd. Love acts upon him exactly like dyspepsia, and ever since Conscience he has been afflicted with somnambulism as well. He was wonderfully good in Conscience, and better yet in Engaged, but in The Millionaire's Daughter he acts as much like a trance medium as anything else, and the effect is uncomfortable. One does not like to be dissatisfied, either, when a player is really trying to do well. One is visited with similar compunctions on Miss Davenport's account. She is really so earnest, so energetic, has been so faithful a student, as any one can see, that your conscience reproaches you for not being satisfied; and yet it is just because she is so eminently business-like, so utterly uninspired, that she never carries her audience away for one moment. Her sobs are dry as sand, her voice as hollow as a gourd. Yet I know there must be something she can do well; perhaps it is comedy. I am inclined to think that she may be a charming "Lady Gay Spanker," and that the promoted rustic belle, "Lady Teazle," may not suffer at her hands. In point of fact, nature and art have been at war over her, for, while in talent she is essentially a juvenile, an ingenue, nature has framed her for a "Hermione." However, many an actress gets the better of nature as well as many a woman who is not an actress at all. It has almost come to be an unequal contest, except where nature revenges herself with avoirdupois. And what a fearful retribution! Why does not some clever fellow invent something for the reduction of those daughters of song whose girdles grow with their fame? I once saw Don Giovanni, when each of the three nightingales weighed not less than two hundred pounds. The effect was something stupendous. A propos, we are to have the three prima donnas in the Huguenots, the bills say, and it looks awfully queer. Talking of what is coming, that dearest of old ladies, Mrs. Judah, is to bid farewell to the stage a week come Wednesday, as the old way hath it. Good-bye to the stage! It must be hard to say. It must be hard to leave that life of glittering triumph and swift reward, to cast off a certain mantle of romance which always envelopes the player who is before the public, to be a simple self again, and nevermore a poet's phantasy. Hazlitt says of players: "They are the only honest hypocrites. Their life is a voluntary dream; a studied madness. The height of their ambition is to be beside themselves. To-day kings, to-morrow beggars, it is only when they are themselves that they are nothing. Made up of mimic laughter and tears, passing from the extremes of joy or woe at the prompter's call, they wear the livery of other men's fortunes; their very thoughts are not their own. They are, as it were, train-bearers in the pageant of life, and hold a glass up to humanity fairer than itself." It must be like the reaction after hashish or opium to come back to every-day commonplace life from such a condition as this, especially after having sipped the nectar draught of popularity, a draught which never grows stale, even to the old, whose tottering steps warn them to give good-bye. Perhaps nothing could so decisively separate the old era from the new as Mrs. Judah's farewell. She is identified with the old times. She has been a feature in all the brilliant engagements; she has been an integral part of the drama in early California. But the time has come to say farewell, and I think I will take occasion to say it just here, Madge, for really as nothing is going on that is at all worth talking about, there is consequently nothing to tell.

Yours, BEISSY B.

Sullivan, the composer of Pinafore, objects to the absence of his own original orchestral score in the performance of his opera. To quote Mr. Sullivan's own words as used in a private letter: "Orchestral coloring plays so large a part in my works that to deprive them of this is to take away half of the attractions. The pianoforte arrangement of the Pinafore does not in the least represent the orchestral accompaniment, and I am told in a letter from a friend in New York, who has heard the opera here very often, that the effect of the whole is quite different as performed in American theatres. This is a pity, because, for a very small sum, a manager might have had a copy of my score, and my work would then have been given to the public as I wrote it, instead of in a garbled form, for, however cleverly it may be scored by the local managers, it is not mine."

The piano-forte recitals announced by Mr. Boscovitz are in a state of temporary suspension, owing to the receipt by that gentleman of a telegram from Mr. Wilhelmj, announcing his arrival in this city about the middle of next month, and requesting his cooperation. We shall lose nothing by it, since two artists are better than one, and the presence of Mr. Boscovitz will enable Wilhelmj to give us a much better programme of chamber music than if he came alone, or with a mere accompanist.

Arthur Sullivan and W. S. Gilbert are assuredly coming to this country in the autumn to attend to the production in New York of their new comic opera. An entire company is to be formed in London for the representation of the piece. Mr. Gilbert will arrange all the details of the stage management. Mr. Sullivan will conduct the orchestra at the opening performance.

New York dramatists and proprietors are getting pretty thoroughly disgusted with San Francisco managers. For deliberate and disgraceful theft some of our theatrical text butchers are very hard to beat.

The female pedestrian champions of New York and Chicago—Fannie Edwards and Madame La Chapelle—start on their challenge walking match at Platt's Hall to-night.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

The repetitions of Carmen have only served to confirm the impression made on me by the first performance. The houses have been meagre: the public does not care for the music, and is evidently not disposed to pay $3 a seat for the pretty decorations and costumes. The few good dramatic bits bear a re-hearing very well, and strengthen my conviction that Bizet had the stuff to have made a much better opera out of it, and would probably have done so, had he been a little less a musician of the modern French school. If this school is to be judged from Carmen, Mignon, Hamlet, and other of its recent successes, there is but little good to be hoped for from it.

The third performance of Martha, on Monday night, drew scarcely anything of a house, but was—at least on the stage—a very pleasant one. Everybody was in good voice and spirits. Miss Litta is at her best in this opera, and sings it beautifully. A better "Nancy" than Miss Cary could not be desired; the part fits her like a glove, and she wears it most becomingly. The same may be said of Mr. Lafontaine, as "Tristram;" he not only sings the music well, but also acts the part as well as I ever saw it done. Mr. Westberg, who can not act at all—he does not seem to have the remotest idea of it—sings his "Lionello" so charmingly that one is almost disposed to forgive his being such a stick. The sound of a pure, genuine tenor note is a matter of too rare occurrence in our season of Grand Italian Opera not to be welcomed with delight. And so I feel grateful to Mr. Strakosch for bringing the angular Dane to sing in only two operas, and wish we might have had some more of him. Mr. Gottschalk, who sang "Plunkett"—a bass part—was as stupidly inefficient as usual.

These late performances have at least had one excellent result: they have taught us to appreciate some of our resident artists who are permitted to share in the work, if not the glory, of the Grand season. Of Mr. Lafontaine I have had occasion to speak at various times. His "Tristram" in Martha, "King" in Aida, and "Gypsy" (I forget his other name) in Mignon, have been admirable personations. Miss Valerga, also, made quite a feature of her little part in Carmen, lending to the "card trio" of the third act just the necessary timbre of voice to make the number thoroughly effective. In the orchestra Mr. Solano has done double duty, as violinist and harpist, doing both well; and Mr. Walther, with his great tone and perfectly clear execution of the most difficult passages, had made it possible to shin through with only one double bass. Grand Italian Opera with one bass is funny enough, to be sure; but fortunately Walther has tone.

I wonder that it does not occur to Mr. Behrens that when he has but one bassoon in his orchestra, and uses original parts in which two of those instruments are called for, it would be better to let his single representative play the second part so as to have the bass, instead of a middle voice, to carry. In passages scored entirely for the reeds it is the second bassoon that usually carries the bass (if they are divided), and I venture to submit that in most cases the bass is of some little importance. In Martha, the other night, fully one-half the passages for the reed corps were left in the air without a semblance of support. The same thing had happened several times before, but in most operas it is not as noticeable as in this one, which leans largely upon the reeds.

It is not a wise ambition that prompts Miss Cary to desire to add "Leonora" in the Favorita to her already very extensive repertoire, nor did her essay of the rôle seem to awaken any great curiosity on the part of the public; she had the poorest house of the season. Miss Cary sings the part very well, as far as the mere singing of it is concerned. But it is a part for a mezzo-soprano, and Miss Cary's voice has no suggestion of the soprano quality in it; it is pure contralto even in the upper register; large, round and beautiful, it is at the same time heavy, unwieldy, and not really sympathetic. It is one of the finest voices in the world—in its proper place. But in attempting music written for a soprano, it is entirely and unmistakably out of place. This was sufficiently apparent in Mignon; it is still more so in La Favorita. Besides this, Miss Cary lacks many of the essentials for a successful dramatic rendering of "Leonora": she is neither graceful in her action nor of sympathetic appearance; her figure—fine in itself—is stiff and her features immobile. She has fine dresses—the first three entirely inappropriate—and acts with routine, but—I fancy she had better leave "Leonora" to the dramatic soprano.

Some of us who heard Martha, on Monday night, regret that the management had not read the criticism in the Alla of Tuesday morning and "strengthened the cast" by the substitution of Mr. Conly for Mr. Gottschalk, as that paper says was done. I thought the notice a little rough on Mr. Conly. I learn also, from the same paper, that Miss Cary's "portion of the score" of Favorita was transposed, and infer that that of those who sang with her (she has only one solo number) was left in the original key. I heard nothing of the transposition, myself; but then, firstly, I don't belong to the Alla staff, and, secondly, I was there.

By the by, I can not imagine a worse specimen of the worst style of Italian opera than this same Favorita. It is at once coarse, noisy, vapid, and inane; is badly written and vulgarly instrumented. The musical form of every number in it is of the crudest, and even the ensembles, in which Donizetti is usually happy, are weak and ineffective. The fact that it is an opera for a mezzo-soprano, the Spirto Gentile, and final duet, have kept it alive. But it is well worthy a place in that perdition that has already swallowed up forty-five or fifty others by the same composer.

The avant courier of the Pinafore's is announced for next Monday, at the Bush Street Theatre. A large chorus, good band, and effective principals ought to make a bright and attractive performance of it.

Miss Sherwin gets her début at last, and Traviata is to be given on next Tuesday. A new, fresh-voiced prima donna will be something to look forward to. S. E.

Bradley & Rulofson have got out some very fine photographs, cabinet size, of Madame Marie Roze in different costumes as "Carmen." They are hard-some souvenirs of the prima donna, and a beautiful specimen of the photographer's art. The firm mentioned make a specialty of theatrical and professional work, and their reputation for finish, excellence of execution, and style is as well known almost as the subjects themselves. For a photograph that will give satisfaction go to the gallery of Bradley & Rulofson.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE
Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
THE MASONIC SAVINGS AND LOAN BANK,
Plaintiff, vs. EDWARD MAGUIRE and ELIZA MA-
GUIRE, Defendants.
Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in
and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.
The People of the State of California send greeting to Edward Maguire and Eliza Maguire.
You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein (a copy of which accompanies this summons) within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; if served out of this county, but within this judicial district, within twenty days; or if served
out of said district, then within forty days—or judgment by default will taken against you.
The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court for the foreclosure of a certain mortgage described in the complaint and executed by the said Edward Maguire
and Eliza Maguire on the 4th day of June, A. D. 1877, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note made by said Edward Maguire at the same time for the sum of three thousand dollars gold, and interest, as provided in said note,
payable to plaintiff, or its order, and taxes, street assessments, and attorneys' fees at ten per cent. on the amount found due, and costs, all in gold coin; that the premises
conveyed by said mortgage may be sold, and the proceeds
applied to the payment of said promissory note, interest,
taxes, street assessments, and attorney's fees, and costs, all
in gold coin; and in case such proceeds are not sufficient to pay the same, then to obtain an execution against said Edward Maguire for the balance remaining due; and also that the said defendants, and all persons claiming by, through,
or under them may be barred and foreclosed of all right,
title, claim, lien, equity, redemption and interest to said
mortgaged premises, and for other and further relief.
And if you fail to appear and answer said complaint, as
above required, the plaintiff will take default against you and apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.
Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 13th
day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.
[SEAL] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By J. H. PICKENS, Deputy Clerk.
L. E. PRATT, Attorney for Plaintiff, 230 Montgomery
Street.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
DWIGHT C. KING, plaintiff, vs. MALISSA KING,
defendant.
Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth
Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.
The People of the State of California send greeting to
MALISSA KING, defendant.
You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days
(exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served
out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be
taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.
The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds
set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference
is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.
And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and
answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.
Given under my hand and seal of the District Court
of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this twenty-fourth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

OLD BIBLE-BACK.

A Man with Two Very Distinct Individualities.

BY E. H. CLOUGH.

Standing in the centre of a motley group of miners, teamsters, gamblers, store-keepers, and mountaineers, Old Bible-back delivered himself of the following extravagant oration:

"I'm the best man in forty counties an' don't ye furgit it. I'm jist out o' the Nevady Legislature an' I'm up to all the tricks o' the game, from a lobby combination to three-card monte—name yer game an' count me in. I'll bet any man in this yer town that I ken jump higher, hit harder, dive deeper, an' come up dryer'n the best sport you can perdooce inside o' twenty minutes. What'll ye hev? Name yer game, gentlemen—two to one that I'm the best collar'n elbow man in the crowd. Who wants the bet? Don't all speak at once."

He paused for a reply, and eyed his audience with an expression of such sincere confidence in his ability to win the bet that a broad-shouldered Cornishman, who had moved forward with the evident intention of obtaining further particulars, edged back to his former position, remarking as he did so:

"There's a stiff patterer, but ee don't b'lieve thee'll mek a bloody fool o' me afore ee finds out w'at thee's drivin' at."

And yet, as far as physical appearances were a criterion, the Cornishman need not have feared the result, for the man who had bantered for a collar and elbow fall was far from being a giant, either in height or muscle. In the first place he was old—his long, gray beard and the deep furrows that seamed his mahogany-colored face attested that fact. Then again, he was stoop-shouldered, and this was the most remarkable feature in his anatomical make up. His chest had once been broad in proportion to his rather short stature, but constant application to some occupation requiring a half leaning posture had contracted it while allowing the shoulders to retain their position. He wore a coarse flannel ulster, and his stooping attitude compelled it to drape the upper portion of his frame in such a manner that a deep crevice was revealed along his back from the base of his neck downward.

"Looks like a section o' flume topped 'ith warped boards," criticised one of the miners in an undertone to a comrade. The latter laughed at the comparison—a laugh that seemed to irritate Old Bible-back, for he swung his hands aloft and shouted:

"Ye'd laugh out o' the other side o' thet clam o' yours ef ye'd gi' me half a show to give ye a fall or two. Come on, some of ye, gi' me a chance to make expenses. I'm jest dyin' to gi' s'mebody a tussle. But mebbe collar'n elbow don't suit yer refined tastes. Mebbe ye go yer pile on fur jumps, mebbe yer in on hard hittin'—w'at is yer game? I'm game fur anything thet's got muscle an' grit in it. I'm blood, I am—blood from the word go an' I don't back water fur no man. W'at's the matter o' you roosters?—don't ye bet on nothin'?—ain't ther no thoroughbred in this yer camp? Bah! I'm blamed ef I ain't dead ashamed o' myself fur comin' yer. W'at d'ye s'pose I came to Idaho fur? Fur fun? Not much. They told me in White Pine thet all the bloods hed come up yer—workin' over to the Black Hills huntin' games, an' sich. I'll bet fifty dollars to a Piute cayuse thet White Pine lied. I'll take an even bet thet ther ain't a man in the crowd thet knows an ace high bluff from a full hand bet. I'll go a hundred to twenty thet ther ain't a man in Silver City thet ken prove up a thoroughbred record."

This last challenge produced a sensation in the assemblage and caused a tall man, clad in buckskin, to elbow his way to the front, with the remark:

"Hold on, stranger. I reckon yer hoistin' in yer rock a little too fast on the thoroughbred racket."

The old man eyed his adversary keenly for an instant, and then, with an aggravating sneer, replied:

"Thet's so; I'm bluffin'. It's more fun to bluff'n 'tis to strike pay gravel in new diggin's, but it don't hydraulic 'ithin ninety per cent. o' hev'in' anything in it. Thet's a clar gain o' clatter in the sluice-boxes though, an' mebbe that's a pint or two in the game."

"Look yer, stranger," answered the tall man, "thet's all chin, an' we don't know but you're givin' us a little game fur yer own amusement. P'raps yer jest w'at ye say ye are. P'raps yer fur on the jumps an' windy on the run. We don't calk'late ye ain't, an' p'raps ther's jest ez good men in Silver City ez you are—p'raps ther ain't. But when it comes to denyin' thet we ain't blooded ye strike whar we live. When ye blow about sech games o' skill ez runnin', jumpin', divin' hittin', and them larks, p'raps we're liable to back a little; p'raps we don't come to the center fast enough to suit lightnin' calk'lators and forty-mile express trains; we ain't payin' much attention to jimnastics in these parts this season much; but when you talk science to us we're in ev'ry time. Ther mayn't be no billiard sharps in Idaho, an' I'll admit thet we don't know much about croquet or ten pins, but we're all h—I on keerds, stranger."

"Cassino, I s'pose—twenty-one mebbe; purty good at euchre likely, 'specially w'en the little joker's 'lowed in the game," sneered the old man.

"Not much, stranger; we don't play no ol' woman's games in this yer camp. We're scienced, we are."

"Name yer game, young feller; I'll bet it's—"

"Poker," interrupted the man in buckskin.

"Now yer talkin'," retorted Old Bible-back. "Whar'll we settle the bizness?"

"Come 'ith me; I'll show ye," and the tall man led the way to a neighboring saloon, followed by Old Bible-back and the entire crowd. It was "four-handed" when the game began, but during the fifty-eight hours that it lasted the number had varied, sometimes being reduced to two, and occasionally occupying the closest attention of six. The tall man in buckskin left the table and returned five times, each time leaving lighter than he returned. Over a hundred men sat down at that table during the progress of the game, but not one of them left it with enough to pay for the drinks. And through it all Old Bible-back sat, stolid and apparently unconcerned, shuffling, cutting, dealing, and "raking down" all the "fat pots."

On the morning following the conclusion of the game there was a vague suspicion afloat in Silver City that sundry and divers speculators, resident in that thriving metropolis, had been most completely "salted," to use the somewhat vigorous expression of certain heartless satirists, who had not been possessed of sufficient capital to take a hand in the disastrous diversion. And when it was ascertained that the stranger had disappeared as suddenly as he had appeared, the community unanimously agreed with the tall man clad in buckskin when he announced that they "might hev busted him on the runnin' an' jumpin' rackets, but when it came to a rattle in square science the ol' man was thar ev'ry time, you bet yer boots."

Six months after this little episode, on a crisp, bracing morning in December, in the snow-shrouded Main Street of Pioche, Nevada, a mining expert who had witnessed the Silver City affair, and whose nomadic occupation had rendered it necessary for him to report on certain bonded mines in this vicinity, observed the self-same old man haranguing a similar congregation on precisely the same subject that had formed the basis of his remarks in the Idaho village—namely, his ability to achieve greater results in any line of sport than could be accomplished by any other man in Nevada, and his entire willingness to back his propositions with coin laid on the most preposterous odds. And he was, by his method of argument, his apparent confidence in his ability to perform what he proposed, creating such a profound impression upon his hearers, that for a considerable length of time no one responded to his innumerable challenges.

"I'm turtle-necked and bow-backed," he was saying, "but ef any man in this yer outfit, tenderfoot or native, big or little, drunk or sober, thinks he ken lam me on any racket I've named, let him try it, an' thet's all. I ain't blowin' my horn to scare sage-hens an' jack-rabbits; I'm shoutin' fur coin, I am. I'm dead on it ev'ry time—I'm a thoroughbred from Omaha, an' don't ye furgit it neither."

The tone of banter assumed by Old Bible-back was too much for the equanimity of a small man with a thin face and a fur cap, and he interrupted the bold orator by inquiring:

"Say, ol' man, how are you with a navy six at twenty paces?"

"A navy six!" shouted the old man, "a navy six! Why, ol' son, thet's jest my gait—thet's my strong suit. Make it thirty-five paces an' I'll bet forty to fifteen I ken smash the bull's-eye five times out o' six an' make a true line shot with the other one."

"Coin talks," said the little man, stepping forward and shaking a couple of twenty-dollar gold pieces in his hand.

"Coin talks," answered Old Bible-back, drawing a handful of gold and silver from his pocket, and meeting his challenger half-way.

"Forty to fifteen?" inquired the little man.

"Thet's w'at I said," replied Bible-back, counting his money from one hand into the other. Then suddenly: "I left my six-shooter in Austin; s'pose I ken git one to suit in this yer town?"

"Why, of course, you ken," the other replied, "I don't s'pose yours is any dif'rent from mine, is it?" and the little man drew a ponderous weapon of superlatively murderous aspect, from his scabbard, and handed it to Old Bible-back. The latter examined it critically, and returned it with the remark:

"Taint worth h—I room."

"What's the matter with it?" indignantly cried the owner of the pistol.

"Taint a hair trigger."

"What's thet got to do with it?"

"You can't play no ten-pound triggers on me."

"How'll this un do?" asked one of the crowd, producing a revolver similar to the one owned by the little man.

Old Bible-back examined this one, as he had the other, and then returned it with a sorrowful expression on his wrinkled face.

"Wuss'n the other," he said.

The little man was evidently becoming very angry, for with an impatient gesture he exclaimed:

"Look here, my venerable ol' duffer, this ain't a ten-pound trigger, nor thet un ain't neither, an' —"

"Bet ye two to one that ther ain't a weapon like mine in the town," interrupted Old Bible-back.

"Two to one be blowed! I'll bet you don't —"

"Bet ye three to one ye can't find a weapon in town ez'll suit me," and Old Bible-back thrust his money into his pocket and grinned amiably upon his opponent.

"You be dashed," was the profane reply of the little man, "I don't b'lieve you've got sand enough to last ye over night. You're a bluffer, an' mighty snide or I miss my reckonin'."

"Bluffin' mos' always walks off 'ith the pot anyhow," answered the old man, with an exasperating wink of his dexter optic, and a quiet, contemptuous laugh.

"You can't prove it, anyhow," retorted the other.

"Jest you name yer little game, an' ef I don't, jest gi' me fifteen minutes to leave town an' I won't kick. Ef it's a bluff game yer after I'll give ye a chance too quick."

The preliminaries were soon settled and the game began. All that night the money clinked, and the cards fell with monotonous regularity. Noon of the following day came, and still the game went on with only short cessations for hastily prepared lunches. The necessary stimulants were absorbed in the intervals between the deals. The hands of the clock marked nine o'clock of the second night, and still the crowd of interested spectators ebbed and flowed, through the Pantheon Saloon, to and from the little "club room" in the rear. It was a hotly contested trial of skill and nerve, embodying as it did every known trick and short-card sleight familiar to professional gamblers, every phase of audacious deception native to the modern American science of draw poker. As in the Silver City game, the faces around the board were continually changing—only one player retaining his original seat. At forty-five minutes past twelve o'clock by Murray McGovern's stem-winder Old Bible-back "showed down" four queens and "raked down" the pot, beating Jack Curtis' "ace full on tens," and ending the game.

It never was known with any degree of certainty as to the exact amount carried off on the morning's stage by the man whom the speculators of Pioche had "picked up for a flat," for the simple reason that not one of the gamblers who had been bitten would acknowledge the full amount of his loss. Thus ended the mining expert's second experience with Old Bible-back. The third time that the expert saw this Machiavelian "bluffer" was in a printing office in Inyo County, California. He had occasion to report on a certain quartz mine at that place, and, becoming acquainted with the editor of the local hebdomadal, visited the office, and almost the first person he observed as he entered the establishment was Old Bible-back. There he leaned, from the summit of a tall stool, in front of a case full of type, "stick" in his hand, and was busily "setting" on a half-column leader.

of the Potato Rot"—being a concise statement of fact (compiled from the encyclopædia) in regard to a subject at that time of paramount interest to the intellectual grangers of Inyo County.

Having recovered from his first surprise at so unexpectedly discovering the last man on the face of the earth who, according to his preconceived estimate of the character of the man, should have been in that particular place at that time, the expert approached the printer and accosted him with:

"How do you do, sir?"

"Purty fairly. How's yerself?" The old man had not even glanced at the expert, but continued to space out his line as if nothing had happened to divert his thoughts from that particular minutiae of his occupation.

"Excuse me, sir," said the expert, "but I think I have seen you before."

Old Bible-back did not reply, but bent forward to catch the next line of his copy.

"I am sure I have met you before," the expert continued.

"Weren't you in Silver City about nine—or perhaps it was ten months—ago?"

"I've bin thar."

The type fell against the steel rule with the steady click, click, click, so familiar to the habitués of a newspaper office.

"And weren't you in Pioche about four months ago?" asked the expert.

"Don't recollect the date to a minute, stranger," answered the other, as he raised his rule and again bent forward to read his copy.

"You cleaned the boys out very neatly in both places—they're wondering who you were in both Silver City and Pioche to this day. It was as handsome a job as I ever saw put up."

The expert was smiling as if he thought he had perpetrated a most consummate piece of flattery upon the old man. His smile vanished, however, and a look of surprise took its place when Old Bible-back ceased his work, and, for the first time, raised his eyes from his case with the abrupt question:

"What job?"

"Why those games of draw you played—don't you remember? The boys picked you up for a tenderfoot, you know, and you bluffed them into the idea that you knew a full hand from a four flush."

"Don't know one card from another."

Old Bible-back had resumed his work, and, after deciphering an unusually illegible word in his manuscript, proceeded to place its component letters in his stick. The expert, thinking that the old man wished to "chaff" him, smiled, and resolved to indicate to him that such a course of action was altogether "too thin."

"What was the longest distance you ever ran, old man?" he inquired, with a quizzical wink.

"Ain't on the run," was the laconic response.

"What's your average jump?"

"Ain't on the jump."

"You've done some pretty good shooting in your time I should judge."

"Couldn't hit the side of a mountain."

"Well, you're a pretty hard hitter, ain't you?"

"Do I look ez ef I could hit anythin'? Might strike a man fur a dollar or two, but you wouldn't call that hittin' him hard, would ye?"

"How about collar and elbow?"

"Collar an' what?"

"Collar and elbow—wrestling?"

"Ef yer talkin' 'bout collarin' my landlord an' ras'lin' fur hash, mebbe I'm a little 'bove av'rage—not much, though."

"I suppose you're A 1 in your trade—printing—ain't you?"

"Can't earn my salt—A 1 printers don't work in these kind o' shebangs."

At this moment the editor entered, and the expert, half-amused and half-astonished at the somewhat peculiar character of the ancient typo, turned on his heel and sought further and more explicit information from the scribe.

"What! Old Bible-back! Have you been interviewing him?" and the editor laughed. "Well, you won't get much out of him. He don't pump worth a cent—the pensive clam is personified garrulity compared to him."

"But who is he?"

"All I know about Old Bible-back is what I learn from the tramp printers that sometimes wander in here. They say that he is a quiet, hardworking 'print,' talks little, attends to his own business strictly, and only gets 'tight' once in a great while. The most singular thing about the old man, however, is this: 'Whenever he does go on a spree he leaves the town where he has been working, and does not return until he is perfectly sober and ready to take his cases again.'"

"When he returns does he bring back much money?"

"I never heard that he ever did. When a man goes on a spree he generally wakes up broke, and I don't suppose that Old Bible-back is any exception to the rule."

During this conversation a light had dawned upon the mind of the expert. Old Bible-back had two distinct individualities—a sober, quiet, somewhat morose disposition, and a second nature stirred up by strong drink, characterized by cunning, methodical boasting, tending to beguile the strangers whom he invariably sought at such times into testing his wonderful aptitude for the intricacies of draw poker. But did he, while in his normal condition, really forget what had transpired during his periodical sprees, and what became of the profits accruing from the poker games he played while laboring under the hallucinations produced by ardent spirits? These were the questions that puzzled the expert.

Elora.

As subtle-tongued Lilith of old
Bound round her victim's heart one thread
From her fair head of tawny gold.
That all might know when he was dead
What passion slew him for her sake—
Thus, O Elora! may they take
My heart from out my breast some day,
And find the meshes of thy hair
Drawn round it in a yellow snare,
And its life strangled utterly.

As false Lilith in serpent guise
Betrayed the innocent, gentle Eve,
Who in a serpent may believe?
Thou, O coquette, hast serpent eyes
For luring wisely, and thy form
In sinuous beauty takes by storm
Unwilling hearts. I pray thee cease—
Is't not enough for thee that peace
Caa never dwell with me again,
Since thou hast filled my soul with pain?

The pale cold beauty of thy face
Beams down upon me as a star;
Oh, that thou wert as pure and far,
And I beheld thee in some place
Where idol-worship ruled the land!
Alas! thou wilt not understand
The anguish of a farewell breath—
But oh! had evil been less fair,
Or mortal moved thee by despair,
I could have loved thee till my death.

Science vs. Fact.—A Metaphysical Dilemma.

A learned professor, once making a speech
To a bevy of youngsters, attempted to teach
This nice point of mystical lore:
How a thing can be mended and mended again,
Until of its primitive parts none remain,
And still be the same thing as before.

Then one of his hopeful disciples arose
And said: "By your leave, sir, I wish to propose
A question: for once in my life
I bought me a jackknife; it had but one blade;
The blade was soon lost, but another was made;
Pray tell, was it still the same knife?"

The professor declared his assent, and the youth,
With the air of an amateur-seeker of truth—
And now holding a knife up to view—
Resumed: "Next the handle was lost, but ere long
I had it replaced by another as strong;
Pray, is this the old knife or a new?"

"It is still the same weapon; the truth is quite clear,"
Quoth the doctor; but young Academicus here
Another like weapon disclosed.
"It is made of the old blade and handle," quoth he.
"Pray tell us, professor, what kofie this may be."
It is plain the professor was posed!

The Execution.

A maiden, with a frenzied eye
And wild and incoherent tone,
Stood in the market place on high
Of some old city on the Rhone,
Appealing to the passers-by
To save her lover, doomed to die.

Her piercing cry such terror had
That many crossed themselves from fear,
While others said that she was mad,
And some few stopped her tale to hear;
But many with the crowd went by,
For he was being led to die.

She'd followed the procession while
It wended to the market place;
With bleeding heart she saw the pile
Where he must die before her face;
Then springing on a platform she Poured forth her burning oratory.

"Pray, hear me, friends. Oh, pass not by!
Stay, stay, and listen, one and all!
I know you would not let him die
If you but only knew the whole.
He's done no wrong against the laws;
They're killing him without a cause."

"He is not guilty of that crime;
The traitor is another man.
I'd prove it if I had but time;
Oh, save him for me while you can!
O save him, save him, noble friends!
Rush up and snatch him from those fiends."

"He must not die. It can not be
While you are here to hear my tale;
For you can save him yet for me,
And you will never let them kill
A guiltless man before your eyes—
And it will kill me if he dies."

"Poor girl!" some kindly burgher said.
And then they parted and went by.
A shriek so terrible and dread
Broke from her in her agony,
So awful in its wild despair
That the kind burgher shed a tear.

They left her standing there alone.
She thought, if they would hear her tale,
That rather than his blood should run
An insurrection would prevail.
She saw no folly in the deed;
She only thought he must not bleed.

Poor loving girl! She tore her hair;
She raised that sobbing broken cry
Again in all its cold despair
In all its speechless agony.
She gazed down toward that awful pile,
And saw her lover die the while.

Spellbound she gazes on the scene,
Her fingers o'er her bosom lock;
Half breathless, see her forward lean—
She sees his head roll from the block!
She hears the shouts, the noisy tread;
She can not think that he is dead.

"I'm dreaming now. This can not be.
O God! wouldst Thou let this be done?
See, see! Oh, horror! Yes, 'tis he!
They hold his head up to the sun.
O God! in mercy heed my groan—
Now let me go where he has gone."

THE GREAT ELECTRIC DIAPHRAGM.

How the Baron O. made his Discovery.

BY ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.

According to the promise given in our last visit C. and I repaired to the Baron's house on Clay Street about noon on Sunday, and were received with the greatest cordiality. After some conversation a lady entered the room, and was introduced to us by the Baron as his wife. She was very young, looking scarcely more than seventeen, and certainly to my eyes very beautiful. Her hair, of a delicate dark brown, was arranged simply in a knot at the back tied with blue ribbon—a veritable instance of that simplex munditiis so uncommon to the fashions of an advanced civilization, but which yet drew encomiums from the pen of a graceful sybarite like Horace. The faint blush of morning seemed to suffuse her cheek with a brilliant warmth which harmonized well with her pale olive complexion and dark, velvety eyes. Her nose, slightly rebrousse, lent a charm to her rounded face and faultlessly proportioned head, which, in its turn, surmounted with perfect poise a figure lithe and girlish in its delicate outline, but rich in the promise of a mature and voluptuous womanhood. Truly a glorious woman, such as you seldom see, full of that languid fire of sensibility which always pervades those in whose veins runs the ichor of the Sunny South. Well might the Baron cast admiring glances upon her as he drew her to his side, and planted a most unconventional and old-fashioned kiss upon her cheek. And I must not omit to say that he was by no means unworthy of such a bride. Not at all like the ordinary German baron of romance and reality, who can be usually predicated fat, gross, heavy, stolid, pompous, and arrogant, this particular Baron was tall, well-made and elastic, though slim—his physique denoting vigor, promptness, and energy of character. His close-cut beard and full moustache of brown dorée hue set off to advantage a well-poised head, whose massy features indicated strength of character and pertinacity of purpose; while the square proportions of the forehead betokened that intelligence and talent of which his previous conversation had rendered apparent he was the possessor. A man in the full vigor of life, and one who had evidently taken care of the splendid constitution he had inherited, he was of that class on whom the progress of years takes little or no effect; and who, having reached the maturity of manhood, retain their faculties of body and mind unimpaired for a long period, and seem to grow not older, but more matured, as life goes on.

Putting his arm around his wife's waist, he half-pulled, half-carried, her into the dining-room, whither we followed him, there to sit down to a plain but exquisitely cooked dinner, flanked with long, tapering flasks of Johannisberg, which the Baron, who was a connaisseur in matters pertaining to the table, and, what is even rarer, a person of excellent sense in their ménage, told us he had brought with him and could recommend.

When the noble vintage of the Rhine had gladdened our hearts, the Baron, speaking to his wife across the table, said:

"Love, these gentlemen have come to hear the story of how I became aware of the existence of the Electric Diaphragm; but as our connection was mainly due to the same cause, you must pardon me if I refer to it during my narrative, and also call on you to help me."

The Baroness blushed and smiled, looking more lovely than ever, but the reserve and modesty which were primary characteristics of her nature if anything increased.

Last summer [began the Baron] I was traveling in the Tyrol; in fact, spending some months there en garçon. I need not explain to veteran Bohemians like yourselves what that means. The Tyrol, if anything, is more Bohemian than Bohemia itself. Suffice it to say that I was enjoying a free, untrammelled, unconventional existence, sometimes living in little towns, sometimes at country auberges, sometimes at shepherds' cabins within sound of nothing but waterfalls and rang-de-vaches, sometimes still deeper in the northern solitudes with nothing but a knapsack, an alpenstock, and a guide—always, however, intent upon gleanings of information in meteorology, for this has been my particular forte ever since I left college. My knapsack on such expeditions contained besides the usual traveling necessities an aneroid barometer, a thermometer, a sextant, chronometer, and compass, so that I was prepared to make any calculations regarding altitudes, latitudes, or meridian distances which might be of assistance in my researches—and last, but not least, a telephone. My possession of a telephone, no doubt, strikes you as strange, and excites your curiosity; and it does certainly seem a needless and incongruous article in a tourist's or meteorologist's outfit. It was in reality far otherwise. I was then, indeed, experimenting on the analysis of sound vibrations in high altitudes, and no place could offer me such advantages for prosecuting this study as the awful solitudes of the Tyrolean Alps. I had already arrived at marvelous and unlooked-for results, but had as yet not the faintest conception of the true nature of the discovery it was my good fortune to make. My first practice had been with two telephones. I would separate from my guide to a distance of several hundred yards, or even a mile away, and by leaving him instructions, and giving him signs as to the modulation of his voice, had discovered that the sound current in its passage through the diaphragms (entering at one orifice and issuing from another, for my telephone was already duplex) became greatly amplified and intensified, the diaphragms seeming to perform the same office to the sound-wave as lenses do to light-rays in the telescope.

I continued my experiments with double diaphragms adjustable by screws, and little by little was approaching the completion of the instrument you saw the other day. The principle which I was striving to elucidate merely related to the transmission of sound, without the shadow of an idea that this could be accomplished through a natural aerial medium performing the same function as a terrestrial wire. I found that by the use of one duplex telephone with adjusted diaphragms and magnets I could distinctly understand what my guide said at the distance of a mile when his voice was modulated to a certain key, but that all other sounds were either lost or indistinguishable. I was lost in conjecture, and puzzled to account for all these phenomena, when a happy accident revealed the whole matter to me; and another matter, too, Aurora, is it not so? [interluded the Baron, coming round to the head of the table, setting his chair close to that of his wife, and putting his arm round her waist, at the same time bestowing on her lips a sounding smack that must have been quite audible in Berlin through the medium of the telephone in the next room if only Franz were listening.] Aurora is not her name, gentlemen, but she came to me at dawn, and like the dawn, and at the dawning of my discovery, so I always call her so.

Toward the end of August last I left the little hamlet of Schneewalden, which lies nestled on the northern bosom of the Julian Alps, on the bank of a small tributary of the Adige, or Etsch as it is often called, with the intention of climbing the snow-clad peak of La Marmolata which towers above the valleys of the Tyrol on the one side and the plains of Lombardy on the other to a height of nearly twelve thousand feet. My trusty and veteran guide, Paul, was my companion, with whom I had already climbed many mountains, explored many valleys, and made many experiments. Paul was an apt disciple in the abstruse science of meteorology, and what he lacked in sounding nomenclatures and minute distinctions he more than made up for by his solid sense, unerring judgment, and sagacious Alpine lore. Forty years of age, weather-beaten as a sailor, tough as one of his compatriot pines, with eye like the Illyrian eagle, a sure clutch on an alpenstock, a wary foot, a nostril that could detect an avalanche or sniff a thunder-storm with the same critical acumen as that displayed by Juvenal's Roman epicure, whose palate was so nice that he could discriminate at the first bite whether an oyster hailed from the bottoms of Baia or the beds of Richborough—Paul was the paragon, the Phoenix, the ne plus ultra of guides.

It was half-past three in the morning when we left Schneewalden mounted on mules of unyielding pertinacity, encouraged by the paternal benediction of the worthy landlord of the Wirthshaus, and followed by the admiring eyes of a group of Tyrolese peasants who were clustered around the old Roman gateway—for Schneewalden, despite its present obscurity, had afforded a vantage ground to some keen Prætor whose will still lay stamped and imbedded in that solid masonry which had survived the disruption of his bones by well nigh two thousand years.

For the first few hours our journey was uneventful, though picturesque; and we went singing up the defiles, accompanied by the liquid music of the limpid, silvery rivulets which ran at our feet. By noon we had penetrated well into the belt of the pine and cedar, and, though the sun stinted none of his warmth, the air had a crisp, fresh buoyancy which gave zest to our mid-day meal, which was recherché and appetizing, for our landlord, under the able tutelage of Paul, had put up two well-stocked panniers of provisions, as we had calculated on, at any rate, a two days' trip, and wished to provide against emergencies. After dinner we jogged steadily on, purposing to spend the night in a deserted cabin near the snow limit known to Paul.

"We shall get there," said he, "by five o'clock. The sun does not set till seven, so you will have time to make your calculations at your leisure. Here we shall leave the mules in the morning, and must make the rest of the ascent on foot, reaching the summit, if we have any luck, by noon."

We arrived at the cabin, gave the mules their rations of oil-cake, made a fire from the logs which the proverbial mountain generosity had provided for the chance wayfarer, and, while Paul was preparing supper, I unpacked my instruments and proceeded to take observations. The barometer indicated a height of nine thousand five hundred feet. The sky was clear, the horizon sharply defined, the temperature 34° F., with a brisk breeze from the east.

I took out my telephone, unpacking it more from habit than with any intention of using it, and sitting down on a boulder began to turn the screws which adjust the diaphragm in a listless, mechanical way. Suddenly I caught the sounds of a conversation. I listened. It was evidently an altercation or dispute, by the high and violent tones employed, but I could not understand the language. It was certainly not European either in sound or manner. I was utterly at a loss to comprehend this phenomenon, for I had as yet no inkling of the truth, and listened eagerly for further developments. Presently I began again to turn the screw, and this time a distinct succession of rattling sounds like the discharge of musketry issued from the orifice. Continuing to listen, I finally resolved the sounds into peals of very distant thunder, there being a genuine difference both in nature and in volume which I could readily detect. The claps continued, and I called Paul's attention to the fact.

"Paul," said I, "my telephone is treating me to a thunderstorm for a change. Can you see or tell anything about it?"

Paul came out of the cabin, scanned every point of the horizon, and finally fixed his gaze eastward.

"You grayish clouds," he said at length, "look like storm, but they must be at least a hundred miles off in the Somering Berg of Styria. We cannot hear thunder that distance. Your telephone must be the devil," and he crossed himself devoutly.

We were then actually camped within the limits of the great electric diaphragm, which is pierced only by mountains of high altitude.

I had not yet however grasped this fact, though indeed on the threshold of the revelation.

We went in and had supper. The night became colder, the wind more gusty, and so we put plenty of logs on the fire, and turned into our blankets, Paul shutting the door, after giving a final look eastward.

"There will be a wild night," said he. "We shall have a storm in less than two hours. God help those who are abroad!" and he crossed himself before finally rolling in.

I had packed my instruments as was my custom in my knapsack, and putting it beneath my head as a pillow, was soon in dreamland. Not long, however. I should suppose it was about two hours, after that the wind awoke both of us. The thunder was roaring about the mountain peaks, the lightning glowing in forks and orbs of fire on every side. I was restless and could not sleep, and felt somewhat amazed at the prospect of being detained for a day at the cabin, which was a likely casualty, if the storm did not abate, when in a lull of the wind and thunder I heard a voice. It was that of a woman, clear and silvery, yet inexpressibly pathetic.

"Ah Dio! padre mio povero!" (O God! my poor father) were the words, in liquid Italian, that seemingly floated out of nothing—apparently close at hand, yet at the same time vaguely far; a strange combination of contiguity and distance, both weird and bewildering.

I rushed to the door, followed by Paul—surprised at my strange demeanor and ignorant of the cause—and shouted lustily across the night. Anyone in the neighborhood of the cabin would certainly have heard that shout and answered it; but there was no answer but the wail of the wind and the sullen roar of the thunder. There was evidently nobody outside—the voice I had heard had not proceeded from this quarter; and then the thought flashed through me like lightning—the telephone. I sprang to the knapsack, and, tearing out the instrument, applied my ear fearfully to the orifice. I heard a sound of weeping, and then a voice, as before, in Italian:

"Courage, dear father; the storm may soon be over. Giacomo will surely bring assistance."

"Corpo di Bacco!" responded a gruff voice; "was ever such luck? Carriage broken, horses gone, no wine, no rugs! We shall freeze to death before morning. The road is snowed up; Giacomo will never find it."

"Trust in God, dear father," fell sweetly, as from the lips of an angel.

"Ostia dia!" was the laconic rejoinder of the masculine voice.

[Here the Baron again interluded with a sounding smack upon the lips of his partner, who had by this time been drawn into very close proximity to her lord and was blushing like Aurora in the embraces of Tithonus.]

I had heard enough to convince me [he continued] that some travelers were lost in the snow-storm, and it needed no second thought for me to resolve instantly to go to their assistance, the more so as the lady's voice had sounded sweeter than anything I had ever heard before in my life.

It was the work of only a few minutes to saddle our mules—not forgetting the panniers with the provisions and wine, for the lost ones, wherever they were, were evidently hungry and cold; and, telephone in hand, I started forth, accompanied by Paul.

"Where do you think they can be?" I asked of Paul.

"The storm came from the east; they are most probably there," replied Paul.

"What is the nearest road—for their carriage has broken down and they must be on some road?" I inquired.

"The Ampezzo Pass," responded Paul. "We can strike the nearest point at about eight miles from here, midway between Cortina d'Ampezzo and Cadore; but we shall have a terribly rough time of it."

"It must be done, Paul, were it rougher than the ascent from Tartarus," said I, for I had become immensely interested in the success of our enterprise.

The mules bore us bravely across the abrupt, jagged, snow-bound country, and hour after hour passed away in crossing ravines, traversing glaciers, rounding chasms, and picking our way over breakneck ridges and precipitous banks.

During all this time I held the telephone in my hand, and in spite of the seriousness of the situation, and my inexplicable sympathy for the persons I knew to be in trouble—in spite of those vague thoughts which were beginning to take possession of my brain, and instilling into me, like the after-memories of a half-forgotten dream, possibilities in acoustics whose wildest imaginations were destined to be more than realized—in spite of all this, I say, and that I stood on the brink of a discovery which might well fill me with feelings of awe and gravity, the drollery and ridiculous nature of the situation were too much for me, and I actually laughed—not an ordinary, self-contained laugh, but peals of laughter which contrasted strangely with the storm, the darkness, and the solitary scene. Paul said nothing, but looked surprised. Well as he knew me, he had not yet to my knowledge witnessed such contradictory traits in my character exhibited at once.

Picture to yourselves the spectacle of two men mounted on mules crossing Alpine glaciers through a midnight storm, and one of them holding a telephone ever and anon to his ear, and would you not in the character of spectators admit the irresistible incongruity and irony of the situation? There being no spectators but Paul and myself, who were likewise the actors in this drama, we had a double rôle to enact which each of us did in his own manner.

The telephone still continued from time to time to utter forth the plaintively modulated accents of the lady and the querulous rejoinders of her companion, but though we had now been journeying for five hours in an easterly direction, the tones seemed to originate from a source as far distant as they did at the outset. My past experience had never presented me with a phenomenon like this, for the best experiment I had as yet been able to make with Paul was at a distance but little more than a mile, for the reason, as I afterward discovered, that I had never yet chanced to practice them at altitudes sufficiently great to penetrate the magnetic belt. Now these voices evidently originated from a point many miles distant from our first starting-place at the cabin, and could not be explained as heretofore on any of the recognized theories of acoustics. The phenomenon could only be explained, as I even then apprehended, on the basis of an electric medium or conductor similar to the ordinary telegraphic wire, between these voices and myself. It also seemed to presuppose the existence of another telephone at the end of this line of communication whatever it might be. Here, however, in these Alpine solitudes there could be no artificial communication—there must be a natural one. I will not now detail the ratiocinative steps by which I was led to the general deductions which I have since reduced to a concrete and practical form—for they were not fully established for several months afterward; indeed, I was engaged in a more pleasant occupation than even meteorology, and Urania yielded gracefully to Venus. [Here followed the usual duet, or interlude, with the Baroness.]

But I am anticipating [he resumed]. During the next two hours the sky cleared, the wind subsided, the air became more keen and biting, the waning moon rose faintly in the east, and, as the first gray of dawn hung like an indistinct pall upon the horizon, we came upon a line of ground from which the trees had evidently been cleared, though there was nothing to indicate the existence of a road other than this. All was covered under at least two feet of pure, virgin snow.

"This is the Ampezzo Pass," said Paul.

"Are they up or down?" inquired I, anxiously, for my telephone had been dumb for more than an hour. We had, indeed, left the inferior limit of the diaphragm, though I was not then aware of it. Paul jumped off his mule, and clearing away the snow from the track, searched carefully and examined critically the ruts of the road.

"A wagon or carriage has passed here lately toward the south," he said at last.

"Then, if it belongs to those we are in search of, they must be higher up the pass," said I; "let us push on."

We had now little difficulty in pursuing our journey, since the track, though snow-covered, could be readily kept by simply following the lines of trees or rocks which bounded it on either side. Besides, the faint light was rendering objects clearer every minute. Another half hour passed in climbing the mountain, and, just as the first rays of the sun, glancing up a defile that ran down to the Illyrian valleys on the east, was making diamonds of the snow flakes at our feet, I beheld approaching a vision which seemed the veritable incarnation or impersonation of Aurora, the goddess of the dawn. [Here followed the interlude and duet as before]. Yes, gentlemen, it was indeed Aurora, my Aurora—this Aurora whom you see now before you, who had left the carriage, which we could see a furlong up the pass, and was trudging through the snow in hopes of meeting or procuring assistance.

I need hardly say that she was presently seated upon my mule, which I guided carefully to where the dismantled carriage lay. Chattering and shivering within the carriage reposed an old gentleman—the father of Aurora—too depressed both physically and mentally even to swear (a very bad sign!), until resuscitated by the genial influence of wine and the external friction of our rugs. He was a Venetian merchant, who had been seeking summer recreation and health at some of the spas of Germany, and who, being both wealthy and a bon vivant, preferred to travel in his own conveyance accompanied by his only daughter. Their carriage had broken down at this point. Their courier was ahead, and the coachman had gone after him to procure assistance. They had spent a most miserable night, narrowly escaping freezing to death by using the linings of the carriage, cut up by penknives, for wraps. Our appearance was most welcome, and the method of introduction added romance to its pleasure. The coachman returned soon after with fresh horses and a wheelwright, and the carriage was presently again on its way to Cadore. Need I say that I accompanied it thither as a sort of body guard against further casualties; and that, arrived thither, I found I had pressing business in Venice. Need I say that La Marmolata was forgotten—that my pressing business took the form of a nuptial ceremony, that Aurora and myself when we passed out through the portals of San Marco were as one. And my explanation of the transmission of the voices without the agency of a primary telephone to impart them to the diaphragm? I have never been able thoroughly to solve this question. I incline to think that the vibrations were communicated through the medium of the glass windows of the carriage, which were tightly closed, acting in the capacity of a diaphragm. Further experiment may prove either the truth or falsity of this position. It is, however, sufficient for me to be aware of the facts that the voices came as I have stated them, that they were the means of providentially saving, perhaps, a human life, and that they were certainly the means of introducing me to, and crowning my life with, a blooming and beautiful bride.

The Canada Pomponé.

In Marin County, winding among the hills that lie between the Nicasio Valley and Novato, is a long, narrow glen, still known as the Canada Pomponé. It is crossed and re-crossed with farmers' fences now, and the abundant timber that once covered the base of the hills closing the cañada has generally disappeared. The ravines, stripped of the redwood, laurel, and madroña that once sheltered living springs of cool water, no longer supply a stream to the laguna—the laguna is dry, and willows and tules have entirely disappeared. There is nothing romantic about the Cañada Pomponé now—it is simply good dairy land. But twenty years ago, salmon and trout used to go away up to the head of the valley, the little lagoon was full of waterfowl, deer were plentiful, there was a tradition of elk, and grizzlies were an unpleasant fact. The Cañada Pomponé had a history long before the Bear Flag was raised in Sonoma or the battle of Olon Vali was fought. It was once the lurking place of an outlawed Indian named Pomponé, who gave the padres and the Californians of early days a great deal of trouble. Before the secularization of the missions Indians were very numerous in Marin. Pomponé tried to incite the rancheros to rebellion, and he robbed and murdered settlers till he became a terror in the vicinity of the mission of San Rafael. He was finally dislodged by the united efforts of the rancheros of Marin, and subsequently captured south of Yerba Buena. The authorities burned him alive at the pueblo of Monterey. The old bridge trail from Nicasio to Olon Vali runs through the cañada. Often, in riding with old settlers and vaqueros, the exploits of Pomponé were the topic of conversation as we passed his old stamping ground, for the Nicasio Indians believed then that the spirit of the outlaw still tenanted the valley, and they threw beads, fragments of cloth, or some other trifles, to conciliate him whenever they came to a certain rock in the cañada. Returning from a rodeo with some young Californians and an Indian boy, I remember that the little Indian turned his horse away from the trail for a moment to cast his silent offering to the manes of Pomponé. We rallied him for his superstition when he returned, and assured him that Pomponé was a desgraciado, and deserved his fate. The little fellow straightened up and looked as vindictive as a young wildcat. "Yes," he said; "they did right to burn him, eh? Well, he was my grandfather—y muy hombre." We let the young savage alone the rest of the ride. And a remembrance of the incident would never have occurred to me, but for the arrest lately, by the Sheriff of Marin County, of this same grandson of old Pomponé as the probable author of the Reiger tragedy.

ANGLE.

Lord Derby was recently asked whether M. Waddington, the Prime Minister of France, was an Englishman or a Frenchman, he said, "and the Prime Minister of England is a Britishman."

RUSSIAN NIHILISM.

This secret conspiracy has, as supposed, twenty thousand members. It has several papers: The Alarm Bell, published in London, the Onward, published in Geneva, the Country and Liberty, published in St. Petersburg.

Says the Onward: "Republican ideas are dreams. Garibaldi is a century behind. The Parisian Commune did not go far enough. The burning of Paris in 1871 was a streak of light into the future, but they had not the courage to finish the work; half measures will not do; our school will not take such; it will wage a merciless war against society, a war of plundering, burning, and murdering."

Says the Alarm Bell: "We must destroy the middle class and bury the old world under its ruins; family institutions must be annihilated, the right of property abrogated, religion put away, yea, liberty considered a hollow question."

Says the National Execution: "When the hour is come, the Socialists will arise, arms in hand, and make execution of all hangmen, merchants, and property-holders; they will spread terror among all who differ in opinion; they will destroy all—persons and things alike—whatsoever may be in their way. Who is not for us is against us, and must fall under the bullets of our revolvers."

Says the Country and Liberty: "We judge of life and death, we warn and threaten, we publish the names of those who are condemned, we give faithful accounts of every murder."

These papers are spread among the army and working-men, in hotels and barracks, no one knows by whom. A man showed the police a secret press; three days after he lay killed in the street, with a paper pinned on his breast: "Executed by order of the revolutionary committee. Death to traitors."

The Standard, a very reliable daily paper of Amsterdam, gives the following extract from the Catechism of the Nihilists:

"Chap I.—On the duties of men toward themselves.

"§ 1. The revolutionist is a devoted being. He has no personal interests, affairs, sentiments, or inclinations, no property, no name. All is absorbed in him by one thought, one passion—the Revolution."

"§ 2. In his inmost, not only in words but in deed, he has broken with civil order and the whole civilized world, with universally recognized laws, morals, and customs. He is an implacable adversary, and where he assimilates to them, it is to destroy them the more.

"§ 3. A revolutionist despises all doctrine, and relinquishes all science of these times, leaving it to coming generations. He knows but one science: destruction. For this, and for this alone, he studies mechanics, physics, chemistry, and perhaps medicine. For this he studies night and day the living science—men, characters, relations, and conditions of the actual social order. The aim is one: the most rapid, most sure destruction of the abominable world's organization.

"§ 4. He despises public opinion, and hates the actual moral doctrine, where it is outspoken. To him all is moral that favors the victory of revolution; all is immoral and criminal that opposes it.

"§ 5. The revolutionist belongs no more to himself; he spares neither the State nor the civilized world, and may not ask to be spared himself. Between him and society there is war to death—open war or secret, everlasting and mortal. He must accustom himself to bear all tortures.

"§ 6. Severe to himself, he must be so to others. All feeling of affection, the effeminate sentiments of blood relation, love, gratitude, he must oppress with a cool passion for the revolutionary work. Night and day he must have but one thought, one aim: the destruction of society. Whilst following this aim coolly and incessantly, he must be ready to die, and to kill any one who hinders him in attaining the aim.

"§ 7. The spirit of the true revolutionist excludes all romance, all sentiment, all enthusiasm, all excitement, even all personal hatred and vengeance. The revolutionary passion, becoming a daily habit, must be joined to cool deliberation. Always and everywhere he must not follow his personal lusts, but only that which the interest of the Revolution prescribes."

In the possession of the Russian officer, Doubrovine, recently hung in St. Petersburg for attempted assassination, were found in addition to a revolver and dagger, and life-preserver, a bowie knife (engraved on one side "Act," and on the other "Defend yourself"), and a small quantity of cartridges. Besides these, and establishing his connection with the secret revolutionary societies, there was found, a document in his own handwriting, headed: "Notes for Russian Officer-Terrorists, 1878," and dated December 6, 1878. The Official Gazette states that this document contains a whole code of instructions for the use of arms, poisons, forging passports and stamps, for making combustibles, and other means (as stated in one of the notes) for effecting public demonstrations, armed resistance to the police authorities, and, in short, all other measures to which the revolutionary parties resort to carry out their programme. The following is the conclusion of these notes: "You know, gentlemen, that a large number of revolutionary enterprises of the greatest importance have irreparably failed through ignorance, unpardonable imprudence, thoughtlessness, and other circumstances of the same kind. You know that Hippolyte Myschkine, when he went in the uniform of a gendarme officer, with the view of liberating Tchernyevsky, put his cordons (aiguillettes) on the left shoulder, instead of fastening them on the right shoulder, and this circumstance was sufficient to excite suspicion on the part of the Commissary of Police of Vilomsk. The results of this mistake were very deplorable, and above all irremediable. Jean Kovalsky (who was shot near Odessa on August 2, 1878) carried about with him for many years a revolver on the system of Adams-Dean, without knowing it was a wretched system, and, as a matter of course, this revolver missed fire, and the blackguard Debredélew (second captain) remained alive. Vera Sassoulitch also did wrong in choosing a Bourdelogne revolver of moderate calibre. Mme. Fedorov fired also with a revolver of the same system, and that is the reason why she * * *. If our dear comrades—the Socialists—must die, let them die making the largest gaps in the ranks of our inhuman, savage, and brutal enemy."

Religion is like a corset. It sustains, but squeezes.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

There is life in the operatic camp. Three new operas, including a début, have fallen within the past week, another contra-bass has been specially engaged to add clat to the last nights, and Carl Formes seduced from his retirement that Don Giovanni might be given with at least one thoroughly efficient feature in the cast. That Mr. Formes' "Leporello" was a satisfying, even more than satisfying, performance, I have no doubt the entire audience of last Wednesday night will be agreed. The veteran artist was in his best voice and spirits, and gave a rendering of the part that seemed at times almost as fresh and unctuous as I remember hearing it from him twenty odd years ago. Every note of the music was beautifully sung; the rapid parlando of the recitatives, fluent and voluble as in his best days, was delivered with fine tone and an easy, expressive handling of the Italian text, while the occasional bits of cantilena—the dangerous places for a singer of failing powers—were very nicely managed and had all the freedom and smoothness of style to be looked for in one who has been a truly great singer. A little tendency to overdo the buffo character of the part was probably due to Mr. Formes' lack of confidence in what remained of his vocal powers. It was, however, an unnecessary precaution. There was quite enough voice for the part; more than enough to dwarf the entire personnel of the cast by contrast, although it never seemed forced, and scarcely ever used to its full volume.

Going back to the Huguenots, I have to report one of the worst performances I ever witnessed. There were redeeming features, as, for instance, the first song of the "Queen" in the second act, and the great duet of the fourth; but as a whole it was a miserable, slovenly, shabby Huguenots. The chorus was abominable, orchestra ditto, and mise en scene contemptible. The opera was given with the so-called "London cuts," with the red pencil further applied by Mr. Strakosch to something like one-half of the music of the second act. This made short work of it, to be sure, but left plenty of time for long waits between the acts, which was utilized to its fullest extent. I, for my part, smoked cigarettes in the lobby, and wished alternately that Meyerbeer had never written any operas, Strakosch never heard of such a place as San Francisco, and Behrens remained in his proper place of chorus-master our orchestra at the grinding out of entr'actes on Bush Street, and the chorus—well, any where else.

The only point in the Huguenots really worthy of mention was the Duet of the fourth act—between "Valentine" and "Raoul;" this was indeed a fine performance. Mr. Adams had suffered—as all tenors do—in the first act from the unfortunate arrangement that places the most difficult and trying thing he has to sing in the entire opera at the beginning. The Romanza of the first scene (as given here) like the first song in Aida, embraces almost the entire register of a tenor voice, and is essentially a song for a tenore di grazia, whereas the rôle is that of a robusto and can never be adequately given by an artist who has the qualities that are requisite for this first number. As a natural consequence of this faulty construction—and it is a fault in both Verdi and Meyerbeer—a perfectly smooth and satisfactory rendering of the hero part of either opera is exceedingly rare, and, what is more, is never looked for by those who know what is to be asked of a singer. Mr. Adams was mange in the Romanza; what with a condition of hoarseness that prevented the free use of his mezza-voce and a desire to save his voice for the arduous work that was before him, he achieved a comparative failure in it, and was so unfortunate as to break on the final note of the cadenza. This break, however, was precisely the kind of blemish that our audience can appreciate, and it eagerly seized the opportunity to prove itself up to the criticism of grand opera; Mr. Adams had tried for a high note, and failed on it, consequently all the artistic singing of the rest of the Romanza must go for naught, and Mr. Adams was sent back to his place at the festive board—with two candles on it—in disgrace. When, in the second act, he, together with Mr. Conly, carried the quartet on his own shoulders—neither Messrs. Pantaleoni nor Gottschalk being able to find their intervals or make any tone—and, in the "duel scene" of the third, had the septet to sing almost by himself, it was not recognized as more than an easy thing to do—only singing part of a quartet or septet—so that I was really surprised to hear the Duet of the fourth so warmly applauded. I suppose it must have been the high C flats that got the house, and indeed they were beautifully sung. The entire Duet was superbly given; Madame Roze—who, I believe, sang the part for the first time—was a passionate and dramatically satisfactory "Valentine," and Mr. Adams quite at his best. His voice rang out with the old great timbre and was handled with consummate skill, while at the same time his acting was simply magnificent. It was the one thoroughly satisfactory moment of the entire opera; waited for through four dreary acts of unfulfilled expectation it was in some sense a recompense for them. I knew better than to stop for the fifth, but hear that they were all safely butchered at last.

Miss Litta sings the florid music of the "Queen" very nicely; Miss Cary's "Urbano" is hardly so satisfactory. Miss Cary, when at her best, can make a beautiful part of it—she looks and acts it admirably—but her voice seems to be tired; I fancy she needs rest. And, when she is somewhat rested, I think a short course of solfeggio would do her no harm; what with much work and no opportunity to practice her scales, etc., there is a certain stiffness beginning to be apparent in her work. Contralto voices—especially the big ones—are apt to be a bit unwieldy, and require constant application to keep them flexible. And Miss Cary's is such a lovely voice that it seems a pity that it should not be always heard at its best.

That Mr. Conly makes a respectable but not very efficient "Marcel" understands itself. The part is too great, in every way, for Mr. Conly; he does the best he can with it, and, at the first representation, sang out of tune more than I fancied he would be able to. But with an orchestra as uncertain in intonation and attaque as the one he had before him this was hardly to be wondered at. Signor Pantaleoni, who sang "de Nevers," was simply abominable. He did not know his part, and gagged it for the gallery; and he was applauded for it to the echo. In the ensembles he was out half the time; in mostly where there was an opportunity to yell on a high note. Applauded again. The same applies to his "Don Giovanni" (only he was out oftener and utterly failed in the two great scenes with the "Commendatore") and, as far as the gagging is concerned, to "Germont" in Traviata. In this he occasionally belted out a few notes and shook his fist at the gods; then the house would come down. Signor Pantaleoni is a success here, but he would scarcely dare to try this sort of thing in those opera houses where a success counts for something. He would get his applause on the wrong side of his head.

La Traviata, for the début of Miss Amy Sherwin, did not draw much of a house, and did not deserve what it drew. The opera was hastily gotten up, imperfectly rehearsed—or rather insufficiently—and badly performed. All of this added to the difficulties under which Miss Sherwin was already laboring—lack of thorough acquaintance with the music, which she had never sung before, and a voice somewhat impaired by an illness from which she is hardly recovered—and rendered her début less satisfactory than it would no doubt otherwise have been. The young lady has a good soprano voice of extensive compass, and the promise of excellent quality. She has also a certain intuitive dramatic feeling which, with the great earnestness and sympathy that was observable in her performance of Tuesday night ought—after proper training—to go far toward making her a good dramatic singer. But all this is still in the crudest state with her; she requires study, training, and experience. With somewhat more of routine she would not have sung herself out in the first act, as she did, and left herself without a voice for the remaining three, nor, indeed, would she have undertaken to sing at all with her voice in its present state. As I say, the début was made very hard for her. Signor Lazzarini is not a sympathetic "Alfredo" (he can neither sing the music nor act the part), and Signor Pantaleoni—who might have helped her materially had he chosen—was occupied in alternately exaggerating his points for the benefit of the gallery, and playing the buffoon for the amusement of Miss Cary, who occupied one of the lower proscenium boxes. Miss Cary was undoubtedly amused, and I am content that she should enjoy her bit of sport, when she gets it legitimately. But I—and many others, with me—thought the whole business not over delicate or considerate under the circumstances.

Don Giovanni was, on the whole, a pleasant and rather enjoyable performance. I suppose some little credit for this belongs to Mozart; the music is really very pretty. I may say that I prefer it even to Carmen, and I am assured that some of the airs will endure and make the composer quite a reputation. Much of it was nicely sung—well enough, say, to help one to overlook the shabby mounting and execrable performance of the orchestra. If the conductor could have killed the opera by his merciless banging through of the various numbers, he would assuredly have done it. But Mozart is not easily slaughtered; he will bear a great deal of ill-treatment and yet remain beautiful. On the other hand Mr. Behrens accompanied the recitatives very well on the piano-forte; if we must have this form of accompaniment (which I suppose was unavoidable) there is something in having it well done. Of Mr. Formes' "Leporello" I have already spoken. It was delightful. Signor Pantaleoni's "Don" is none at all; what he remembered of the music he could not sing, and as he does not seem to have the first idea of acting the part I could not understand what he was poking about the stage for, anyhow. Miss Litta, too, was not in good form. The dailies (they seem to have the entrées behind the coulisses, and are posed to an almost suspicious extent) report her to have been ill, which, however, was not noticeable in her voice, which was as powerful as usual. In fact, in the "Trio of the Masks," it was much too powerful; while Madame Roze and Mr. Adams were singing the music carefully and artistically she was bawling away as though she had a big Verdi ensemble in hand with a chorus behind and half a dozen trombones before her, and was determined to make the most of it. It is respectfully submitted that this is not precisely the way a delicately constructed and lightly accompanied polyphonic trio of Mozart should be sung; f's were as cheap in his day as in ours, and had he desired it he could easily have put in three or four for "Elvira." Madame Roze's "Donna Anna" is, after "Aida," her best performance; she is a true dramatic soprano—with a small voice. But one grows accustomed to its want of power and reconciled to it through her really eminent artistic nature. With all the limitations of her vocal powers acknowledged, I would infinitely rather hear her sing the great dramatic parts than the large-voiced stupids whom I have heard in them. The same thing applies to Mr. Adams and his huskiness, which was more than usually noticeable in "Don Ottavio."

If one cares to hear "Zerlina" sung by a contralto it is impossible to find a more charming one than Miss Cary. She is "Zerlina," as she is "Nancy," "Azucena," and "Siebel." The things Miss Cary does well she does very well; so well, indeed, that I am always sorry when I am forced to recognize that lack of aesthetic appreciation that seems occasionally to possess itself of her better judgment and misleads her into a belief that she can successfully cope with parts that belong only to a dramatic soprano. Where "well enough" means as much as it does in Miss Cary's case, it is surely better, and wiser to let it alone.

Mr. Remenyi seems to have arranged matters so as to get ahead of Mr. Wilhelmj—in point of time at least—and will be here with his fiddle on the 6th inst. Besides his fiddle he will bring Mr. Dulcken—an accompanist—and Miss Emma Thurston, soprano. Remenyi has considerable notoriety as a violinist of the ultra romantic sentimentalist school—in this country, at least; in Europe he has no reputation, to speak of—and will undoubtedly be interesting to hear. His eagerness to get ahead of Wilhelmj may to some of my readers seem like a shrewd bit of business, but I do not understand it in that light. I prefer to consider it only as a piece of modesty. He is undoubtedly perfectly well aware that when the great violinist has once been heard he will not have a ghost of a show, which seems to be the case elsewhere.

AN OPEN LETTER TO GEORGE C. GORHAM.

GEORGE C. GORHAM, ESQ.—SIR: The people of this State are about to enter upon a campaign which will result in the choice of officers for every department of the public service. There is every prospect that the contest will be a close one. It is probable that there will be at least four tickets in the field, and men of the best judgment in all parties look forward with concern to the result. A new fundamental law has been adopted, old traditions have been discarded, new experiments have been instituted, and those to whom the responsibility of effecting this change is to be entrusted are to be chosen in a few months from this date. They will hold their offices for four years—the supreme judges for twelve years. If they are men of high purpose, their efforts may be of lasting benefit to the State. If they are political adventurers, demagogues, charlatans, their career may entail mischief such as one must shudder to contemplate. This great commonwealth will stagger under the load for years—a very corporate Sindbad under the weight of a malicious fiend. I, sir, am a young man. I hope that I fully appreciate the wisdom of deferring to that judgment, experience, and discrimination which come only with advancing years. But I love my native State, and I look with anxiety to the issue of this struggle in which her prosperity, her future, is at stake. I dread the apathy which rouses itself only when the enemy is at the door of the tent; and I feel that it is preëminently the right of those who look upon the fair fame of California as their birthright to sound the alarm of danger.

At the very hour when the conflict is impending the public press announce your return from Washington "to take charge of the Republican campaign." Your career in this State is not unfamiliar to the public. Through its great length and breadth your name is frequently upon the lips of your fellow-men. Your ability, which is of no mean order, and your persistence and assiduity, have brought you prominence, if they have not brought you respect. Added to your other properties, a skill in what is known in politics as "manipulation" has made you the leader of that class of statesmen whose patriotism is so great that they spend their lives in the attempt to persuade a strangely reluctant public to accept their services. With your lot cast among a generous and hospitable people, with your affiliation with a great party whose devotion in time of peril had won the nation's grateful esteem, with your energy, and will, and intellectual endowments, it was in your power so to win the confidence of this commonwealth that she would teach her children to emulate your example and to revere your name. Have you done this? Walk in yonder street past the marble resting-place of Thomas Starr King, and then ask yourself that question. If the silent protest that comes with suggestive comparison from that monolith be not enough, turn to the past. Remember how you were nominated in 1867 by tricking your party out of their first choice for Governor, and how, thereupon, you were repudiated at the polls. Do not evade the thought by the suggestion that a Democratic sentiment had grown up. "Lay not that flattering unction to your soul." From the time of Stanford and Low, every election, except those where your paralytic touch was felt, has shown this State to be Republican. Newton Booth had no difficulty in beating the most popular man in the Democratic party, and at the Presidential elections the result has been a Republican victory. Next, call to mind how you reappeared on the stage at the convention in 1875 with a set of resolutions already drawn in your pocket. You shifted the scenes, and pulled the wires that set the poor puppets and marionettes dancing to your music. Does your memory serve you as to the result of that contest?—How Mr. Irwin walked into the capitol and took his seat in the Governor's chair? Remember, also, how you were the professed friend of the railroad until denunciation became so severe that you allied yourself with the people. In which allegiance, pray, were you insincere—to them or to us? And if you deserted them when it became your interest so to do, how will you act by us? Then, there is the personage whom Joaquin Miller calls the "little brown man," and whom you once delighted to honor as "a friend and a brother." Candidly, Mr. Gorham, the people of this State do not like your "brother." And they do not like his brother, either. You twain occupy the position of the renowned Dr. Fell. You doubtless remember the couplet.

Now, sir, the people of California look to the Republican party for relief in this emergency, and there are able, earnest men in that party who do not shrink from the responsibility. But they cannot disregard the experience of past years. They look with dismay upon the prospect of your activity. They know that the State will not marshal itself under your leadership. They fully understand that the party can not "carry you," and that nobody except the dismal and rheumatic regiment of mildewed politicians will follow your standard. Your personal friends will not tell you these things. You might read them in the opposition papers, and then you would not believe them. But it is a fact that the people distrust you, and that your active participation in the coming election will probably defeat the ticket which you advocate. Should you and your friends pronounce a thousand times that this distrust was unfounded, the fact would still remain, and would have to be met. That self-distrust, which is every man's best guide, will suggest to you that a prominence which is not in compliance with, but in spite of, the general voice, has neither merit nor honor. That patriotism, which is every man's highest duty, will lead you, if you have it as you profess, to look rather to the public weal than to your own preferment, and if the former is to be obtained by your self-abnegation, to withdraw yourself from the public gaze.

A YOUNG REPUBLICAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 29, 1879.

One of the most interesting books sent to this office lately for review is "The Full and Complete Statement of the Forgeries and Frauds of H. S. Tibby, late Secretary of the Dupont Street Commission and Board of Public Works for widening Dupont Street and opening Montgomery Avenue. Prepared by I. W. Lees, Captain of Detective Police, and H. S. Healey, Clerk of Detective Department. Published by order of the Dupont Street Commission and Board of Public Works. San Francisco: Bunker & Hiester." This compact little volume of 164 pages is replete with suggestions, plethoric with figures and cash accounts, and something that should be in the hands of every ambitious office-holder.

INTAGLIOS.

Beside the Brook.

"I go a-fishing, and he sped
With rod a line, where by-paths led Neath latticed boughs, beside the brook
Where fish were lured with cunning hook.

"I'll read in solitude awhile."
With favorite book and morning smile,
Through winding ways she sought the nook
She loved the best, beside the brook.

Later I passed; the line and book
Were queerly twined beside the brook;
While, in the grove, the angler's prize
Was reading love-songs in his eyes.

—Scribner for June.

Not Yet.

Not yet, O friend! not yet;
The patient stars

Lean from their lattices, content to wait.
All is illusion till the morning bars
Slip from the levels of the eastern gate.
Night is too young, O friend! day is too near;
Wait for the day that maketh all things clear—
Not yet, O friend! not yet.

Not yet, O friend! not yet;

All is not true;
All is not ever as it seemeth now;
Soon shall the river take another blue,
Soon dies yon light upon the mountain brow.
What lieth dark, O love! bright day will fill;
Wait for thy morning, be it good or ill—
Not yet, O love! not yet. BRET HARTE.

The Old Accoutrements.

There hangs a sabre, and there a rein,
With a rusty bit and a green curb chain;
A pair of spurs on the old gray wall,
With a mouldy saddle—well, that's all.

Come out to the stable—it is not far;
The moss-grown door is hanging ajar.
Look within, there's an empty stall
Where once stood a noble horse—that's all.

The good black steed came riderless home,
Flecked with blood drops, as well as foam.
See, yonder hillock, where dead leaves fall,
The good black horse pined to death—that's all.

All? O God! It is all I can speak—
Question me not. I am old and weak.
His saddle and sabre hung on the wall,
And his horse pined to death—I have told you all.

FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE.

A Florida Lyric.

Let the plover pipe in the marshy grain,
The hart and the hind go play,
But the fowler lurks in the maiden cane,
And the huntsman hides in the bay.

The eagle may soar like a rising shout
To the very depths of the sky,
But the whistling bullet will find him out,
Though he be ever so high.

The salmon may leap in a fringe of froth,
And the trout in the lake may laugh,
But the fisherman's net will have them both,
And cruel the barbed gaff.

If ever the blue sky wears a sun
That is glad in the sight of day,
The sorrowing stars come one by one
And gather its glory away.

And if ever the heart is rich and strong
As a bridegroom's first caress,
The death-grief comes in its cruel wrong,
And turns it to bitterness.

Then let the plover pipe in the grain,
The hart and the hind go play,
But the fowler lurks in the maiden cane,
And the huntsman hides in the bay.

W. W. HARNEY.

Sheila.

The King of Borva sits alone,
For Sheila has departed;
His bonny bird has southward flown,
And left him broken-hearted;
No more he sees her dear blue eyes,
In his her soft hand lying;
'Tis not her voice that now replies,
'Tis but the breezes sighing.
"Sheila, my own little daughter,
My own where'er thou art!
Oh! come across the water,
To thy father's lonely heart."

And Sheila, in the far-off town,
Sits cold and broken-hearted;
Life's golden leaves are turning brown,
The dreams of days departed.
Her father's heart, her rocky home,
Oh! how they call and greet her;
And he is there beside the foam,
With arms outstretched to meet her.
"Sheila, my own little daughter,
My own where'er thou art!
Come back across the water,
To thy father's loving heart."

The Safeguard.

A baby crept to his father's knee.
And was lifted up and lulled to rest
Till his blue eyes closed, so tired was he;
And his little head fell peacefully
At ease on the ready shoulder there,
While the baby hand so soft and fair
Lay like a shield on his father's breast.

Of old 'twas said when men draw near
To fierce temptation of deadly strife,
And lost their way in a maze of fear,
Or periled their souls for worldly gear,
By an unknown way an angel hand
Would lead them out of the dangerous land
Into the light of a nobler life.

The story is true for the world to-day;
We see no white-robed angel mild;
But out of the dark and perilous way,
Where men and women forget to pray,
Into the peace of a purer land
They are led by a gentle, shielding hand,
The hand of a little helpless child.

—Sunday Afternoon.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

Gotes butts, and Uncle Ned he said: "Johnny, one day there was a gote in a field, and it took after Bildad, wich you better xplain to yure bunted readers is the new dog. Bildad he run toward a hi fence for to git over, but the gote it cot him and buted him cruil on the tail, and he wirlid over and over, and lit on the uthar side of the fence but dident kno it cos he was bwildered, and scrambled back over the fence agin, lifely as ever he cude, and the gote it let him have it a other time, and wocked a way. Bildad he was a stonish dog, and shuke his hed, much as to say: 'I never see so many buttigotes, one in evry feeld!'"

If I was a gote I rather be a sheep, cos gotes is milked, but sheeps is shingled, and the rose is red, and the vilets blu. But Billy he says let him be a cracky dile with fritefle teeth, and notches on his back like a saw.

Mister Jonnice, wich has got the wuden leg, he says theres a dile wich was a sho, and it was in a pond. Mr. Jonnice he set on the edge of the pond a watchin the dile swim, but the keper he said, the keper did: "Beter look out for yure legs, sir, this ere dile is powerfle fond of legs, and he don't git menny here, pore fellow."

So Mister Jonnice he tuke of his wuden leg and hid it, and wen the keper he cum round agin Mister Jonnice he sed: "You was rite about that dile."

The keper he looked and he was a stonish, and he said: "Shant I run for a docktor?"

Then Mister Jonnice he thot a wile, and him by he sed: "No, I dont think I wude, not for a wile yet, enny how. Diles is use to over eatin theifselfs."

The keper he sed: "You are the coolest man, wots left of you, wich I have ever saw."

Mister Jonnice he sed: "Wel, I have all ways went on the princple its no use cryin for yure leg off, but lde be mity bliged to you for a drink of wisky."

Wen the keper had brot it Mister Jonnice had put on his wuden leg agin, and was a standin up lookn at the dile, and the keper he was a stonisher than ever, partickler wen Mister Jonnice sed he had ben standing there a our and had never see him before.

One time there was a rinosy rose met a cammle, and it sed, the rinosy rose did: "If I had sech a xcresence on my back like thasn of yourn lde hav a operation pformed."

The cammle it said: "Taint very prety, thats a fack, but seems to me yure nose isent jest the kind wich ot to be turned up at xcresences."

Mister Pitchel, thats the preacher, he said: "Johnny, how mercifl is the ways of Profidence, the rattle snake, wich is pison, is compel for to wear a neck lace of bones on his tail for to give notice."

Uncle Ned he spoke up and he sed: "Jest so, Johnny, it was too much trubble for to not put the pizon in, and the rattles was the nex best thing."

Then my sisters yung man he sed: "Yes, Johnny, them rattle bones is mity usefle to the frogs, and mice, and little birds, wich thay parolize with teror so thay cant hurt theifselfs a tryin for to git a way from the snake."

Then Mister Gipple he said, Mister Gipple did: "And you see, Johnny, the boy constricter wich aint got any rattles wasent made pizen."

Then my father he spoke up and sed: "I hope you pious fokes wil xcuse a pore bunted infiddle for remarkin that Providence has forgot to put enny rattles on a wumans tung."

And now for a story about ole Gaffer Peters.

One day Jack Brily, which is the wicked sailer, swears and every thing, he was goin by old Gafferses house, and he foun him digin a wel, and a boy was pulin up the rocks in a bucket with a winlass. So Jack he giv the boy 2 bits, an sed: "You go and git sum candly, and lde pul up for you til you git back," and the boy done it. Then Jack he put his bull dog in the bucket, and let it down, and the dog it jump out in the wel with Gaffer, wich boilder wild, and the dog too. Then Jack he cot ole Gafferses cat and pitch that down, too, and the dog tackled the cat between Gafferses legs, and the cat it run up Gaffer like he was a tre, and all yellin like Injens, there wasent never such a fite! After a wile Jack he let the bucket down and hault ole Gaffer up with the winlas, lookn mity beat and his close tore bad. Fore Gaffer cude git his breth Jack he sed: "Tel you wol, Gaffer, if I hadent come a long yude had a pretty rough time of it, I ges, cos that boys gon for a other cat."

Then Gaffer he helped Jack git the dog out wich had kild the cat, and Jack and the dog thay went a way, and wen the boy come in site Gaffer he met him morn halef way, and licked him til he was sick a bed, and wen Billy he sassed the scoohl master he was licked, too, yes, in deed, and made beller.

Uncle Ned he says: "Johnny, lemme take yure paper and rite sum nice poetry for yure little readers." So I lettin, and here thay are.

THE DAINTY GIANT.

Giant, giant, so defiant,
O what have you been eating?
A grain of rice, and a spoonful of spice,
And a Democratic meeting.

A MOURNFUL TALE OF PERRY AND JANE.

Perry Peak he swam the creek
To try to find some water.
Jane Jordan she fell up a tree,
And the alligator got her.

THE SOURD MONKEY.

Monkey, monkey, ugly fellow,
All your hair is long and yellow,
And you've finger-nails, too, to match.
You're a very naughty person!
To sit scowling there and cursin',
Just because you have no yellow fleas to scratch.

THE REMARKABLE OLD GENTLEMAN.

There was an old man who said with a grin:
I'll spit out my teetl, if they ache,
And then you'll observe me spit 'em all in
Whenever you give me a cake.

But Missis Dippy, wich has got the red head, and Mister Hector Stuart, wich wants to wear a crown onto his wooden feller, thay can beat sech poetry as them, I gess, to holler!

SAN RAFAEL, May 29, 1879.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

Two men who have looked upon the wine when it was red pass unsteadily along the street, and one of them insists on stopping before an optician's window to gaze in rapture on a thermometer.

"Sh buffe, sh buffe!" he exclaims, almost melted to tears; "but sh wifful washe—wifful washe."

"Whash? Whash wifful waste?"

"Spirish 'ermometer!" exclaims the enthusiast, sitting down on the sidewalk and bursting into tears.

Her liege lord had a bad cold, and she, though she is perpetually nagging him and even wishing he were dead, goes in tears to confide to a friend the gloomy apprehensions inspired by her poor dear husband's hacking cough.

"Ah, my dear," she concludes, "I shall immediately call in the best medical talent the directory affords, for if I were to lose my husband I know I should go wild."

"After whom?" says her friend.

At a Red Republican banquet the chairman rises and begins his speech thus:

"Fellow-citizens:—At this festival where fraternity reigns over all—"

Frightful cries of "No! no!" "To below the tyrant!" "No reigns—this is a republic!" warn the orator that he is touching on dangerous ground. He adroitly recommences:

"Fellow-citizens:—At this festival where fraternity is equal among us all"—(Frantic applause.)

Young Actress—You have no idea, my dear, of the progress I am making. Last night I acted "Lady Macbeth."

Old Actress—Are you sure you did?

"What a delightful fellow that Edward is—so jolly—his pocket-book always open."

"Yes; to any one that wants to put anything into it."

A hoteller of Naples had made to be made some chimneys, without too much knowing what it is which is a chimney.

A Frenchess arriving in his hotel he proposes her a chamber orate of this appendix.

"And your chimneys smoke they?" him demands the travelless.

"But certainly, madame, certainly," responds the hoteller, in reswallowing himself with pride.

An ambitious young clerk in a wholesale grocery establishment resolves to enter the civil service, and so presents himself before the examiners. One of the questions is: "What is coffee, and where does it come from?"

"Oh, come now, you know," says the candidate; "I can't give away the boss—allow me to plead privilege. That's a professional secret."

The Court—Wretched man, you have committed murder! What can have impelled you to so horrible a crime?

Prisoner—Your Honor, when the wolf is fierce with hunger he will kill.

The Court (coldly)—It would be more sensible on his part if he were to go and look for work, in no matter how humble a capacity.

"Have you heard the news, my dear?"

"No; what?"

"That Diana and Florence have made up."

"No; have they though?"

"Yes; each frankly admitted that the other was wrong, and perhaps she was too, and now they are the best enemies in the world."

A gommeux (dandy) was retailing as his own an anecdote which a person present said was one of Voltaire's.

"That may be," said he, after showing a little embarrassment, "but it remains to be known which of us told it first."

Mlle. Jeanne's canary bird has just become a mother.

"But how old is the bird?" inquires little Jeanne.

"Three years."

Jeanne (stupefied)—"So young and already to have children."

A lady sees her servant reading a book.

"If you have nothing to do, Françoise, come and help me."

"I don't wish to work to-day, madam."

"Why?"

"Madam forgets that Easter Sunday should be kept holy."

"True. I shall not insist."

And Françoise resumed her edifying pastime.

"Is it a religious book you are reading there, Françoise?"

"No, madam, it is my cook-book."

A propos of the death of the French headman a curious article by Camille Desmoulins on capital punishment has been unearthed. He advocates the selection from among the imprisoned murderers of the most ferocious of their number to be employed as headman that "in the punishment of criminals these wretches might always behold the doom they had merited and perhaps were not to escape." It might be urged that these executioners would bungle their work. Camille proposed a plan "which should be welcomed by all gentle minds and which has already been proposed in the National Assembly by a just and merciful man, Dr. Guillotin. Employ a purely mechanical instrument, where there will be nothing to do but to cut a rope and let an axe fall." But Camille saw that it might be objected that the opprobrium of being an executioner would still rest upon the man that held the scissors, and made provision for the objection thus: "Place an astronomical machine upon the scaffold; at the hour of noon the action of the sun will detach the moon, and the celestial body which beholds the crimes of the universe will become also their avenger!"

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

"The Christian at Work."

The day is come, and the carpets
Are dragged outside the house,
As a man is dragged to the station
At the close of a big carouse.
I see the wife and her handmaids
Wade through the suds and the dust,
And I feel as though the pie of my life
Was nearly all under crust.

Come, give me a club with a handle
As long as the month of May,
And I will wattle the carpet
The whole of the livelong day.
I wield the stick they have brought me,
With a flap, and a thud, and a hiss;
Oh, better a year and a half of sleep
Than fifteen minutes of this! —Harvey.

A Picnic Episode.

Oh, the tiny little ants,
How they clamber up our pants,
At the picnic 'neath the willows in the glen—
How they seem to take delight in
The obnoxious sport of biting!
Indefensible and modest gentlemen.

It's delightful when one's cooing
To the damsel he is wooing,
To feel the playful creatures in his pants,
And upon the perfumed air
He throbs a soulful swear
At "his sisters and his cousins and his ants."

Tobias—So to Speak.

Yes, his front name is Tobias,
And he isn't over pious,
And his eyes are on the bias,
So to speak;
And his only aim and bent is Nobby clothing—for this gent is Just a bit non compos mentis
Like and weak.

And this feather-weighted gent he—
Though not over one and twenty—
Has of knowledge quite a plenty,
So to speak;
For he'd rather be a prancing,
And kicking at a dancing,
Than his stock of wit enhancing,
Learning Greek.

Though he apes the drawl and stammer
When he dons his sleek claw hammer,
Yet Tobias shoots his grammar,
So to speak;
And he questions very rarely
(So his clothes are hanging fairly)
If his brain be fashioned squarely
Or oblique.

No, he has no education,
And his beauty took vacation
'Bout the time of his creation,
So to speak;
And upon mature reflection,
Taking each distinct bisection,
I've decided his complexion's
Rather weak.

Though his shirt has not a rimple,
Nor his beardless chin a dimple,
Yet he boasts a chronic pimple
On his beak;
And his voice is not reliant,
For at times it is defiant,
And at times it is a pliaot
Little squeak.

Now, it seems to me so funny
That this half-demented sonny
Should be loaded down with money,
So to speak;
While the writer of this ditty,
Who you see is rather witty,
Has to scrub about the city
On his cheek. —New York Commercial.

Lies to the First Fly of 1879.

Dance on my nose with your tickling feet,
Blue bottle fly;
Sing in my ears with your buzz to greet
Me, as I lie.

You will seek me out in my dark retreat,
With an eager zeal that no screen can beat,
And I try to slap you clear into the sweet,
Sweet by and by.

I haven't seen you since 'seventy-eight,
Little house fly;
And I see you now with the bitterest hate
You can defy.

Oh, how I hate you, nobody knows,
Author of half of my summer woes;
Oh, how I prayed that you might be froze,
Villainous fly.

All through the winter you did not freeze,
Not much, Mary Ann.
Now all the summer you'll do as you please,
That is your plan.

When in the warm afternoons we would sleep,
Near us your wakefulst vigils you'll keep,
Precious is sleeping, but waking is cheap,
Sleep, ma, if you can.

Oh, how I wish that my two broad hands,
Spread left and right,
Stretched from the poles to equator's bands,
Giants of might,
Some summer day in my wrath I would rise,
Sweeping all space with my hands of size,
And smash all the uncounted millions of flies
Clear out of sight.

Vain are my wishes, oh, little house fly;
You're hard to mash;
Strong men may swear and women may cry,
"Teething their gnash;
But into the house your friends you'll lug,
You'll bathe your feet in the syrup jug,
And your cares you'll drown in the baby's mug,
Cheeky and brash.

Still, precious lessons, dear little house fly,
You teach to me,
Hated or loved, you tell me that I
Happy may be.

Why should I care, when I tickle a nose,
Whether its owner's conduct shows
That he likes it or hates it, just so it goes Pleasant to me.

* This line should read, "Gnashing their teeth," but a little poetic license was necessary to bring in the rhyme.—Harvey.

ALL ABOUT WOMEN.

It's the early girl that gets the coachman.

That is the best part of beauty which a picture can not express.

An aged girl prettily describes getting old as "standing at life's west window."

The best are the cheapest. This is more especially so in the matter of wives.

And now the Eastern paragraphs are referring to Rose Wood as a sister of May Hogany.

The most popular man with the ladies is the one who never met with a homely woman.

Few women, except geniuses like Harriet Hosmer and Rosa Bonheur, part their hair in the middle.

No man can ever tell just how much money a widow is worth until he marries her for it. It is one of those cases where you have to take your chances.

She threw a stick of wood at the old hen and killed two of the little chickens. Natural result of a woman throwing at anything; she always hits something else.

Folly soon wears out her shoes. She dances so fast we are all of us tired. Golden wires may annoy us as much as steel bars, if they keep us behind prison windows.

A fashionable woman at Vassar was asked by the classical professor for a definition of ambrosia. After some hesitation she replied: "I think it is a kind of hair oil."

They grow tall women on the Mississippi. A river poet writes that he "kissed the clouds from her sweet fair face." It seems almost incredible that he could do any such thing.

Bachelor Sam Scudder of Wild Cherry Creek is quite bald. When the girls see him coming they say, "Here comes Bal'sam of Wild Cherry," and then they all begin to cough.

Miss Anna Oliver, who has taken charge of a Brooklyn church, has this financial creed: Trust in God. Never spend a dollar until it is in your pocket. Do your utmost to help yourself.

Georgia thought she had a live Countess in her midst, but the female turned out to be a board bill jumper only. A countess always pays her board, even if she has to blackmail the landlord to get the money.

A little boy once called out to his father, who had mounted his horse for a journey, "Good-bye, papa, I love you thirty miles long." A little sister, quickly added, "Good-bye, dear papa, you will never ride to the end of my love."

"You are right," says a lady correspondent, "we do not go to matinees and academy exhibitions to flirt;" and then she asks: "but if we do it is because our husbands never will find the time to accompany us on account of business and their own pleasures."

An unknown but evidently married paragrapher says when a woman combs her back hair into two ropes, holds one in her mouth until she winds the other upon her tuck comb, and then finds that she has lost her last hair pin, she feels that the sex needs two months—one to hold the hair in and the other to make remarks with.

A popular concert singer, advertised to participate in an entertainment in a Missouri village, excused her absence on the ground of having a severe cold in the head, and the next day received the following from an admirer: "Thiz is gousse greze; melt it, and rub it on the bridge of yore noze until cured. I luv you to distraxshun."

"Pop, didn't you ever have two or three wives besides mother?" "No, never!" exclaimed the old man furiously. "What, never?" repeated the young hopeful; "you should have said 'hardly ever.'" Then the old man took him up stairs, and for several minutes he danced such a Pinafore hornpipe as Dick Deadeye never dreamed of.

The Vassar College girls have adopted the following glove language: Drop a glove—You betcherlife. Half unglove the left hand—What are you givin' us? Tap the chin with the glove—Chew your own wax. Crumple the glove in the left hand—Never! Crumple the glove in the right hand—Well, hardly ever. Turn the glove inside out—Wipe off your chin. Fold the gloves neatly—I regard you as a bald-headed snipe of the valley. Put on the left glove—I'll put a head on you. Slap the back of the hand with the gloves—Look out; I carry a razor.

Olive Logan relates this in one of her letters: "I heard of a rather amusing reply given the other evening at a ball by an American girl in London society, who had strayed away from the ball-room. Her mother subsequently discovered her in a remote nook with a gentleman, who had his arm around her waist, while she rested the tips of her pretty little fingers on his manly shoulder. 'Daughter, what's all this?' exclaimed the irate mamma. The daughter looked up calmly and replied: 'Mamma, allow me to introduce Captain X. to you. I had promised him a dance, but I was so tired that I couldn't keep my word, and I'm just giving him a sitting-still waltz instead.'"

A Yonkers woman calls her husband "Milwaukee," because he's got a reputation for beer.—Yonkers Gazette. And a Meriden woman calls her husband "Antediluvian," because he's such a dry subject.—Meriden Recorder. And a New York woman calls her husband "Clarence," because he's such a slow coach.—Court Journal. And a Detroit woman calls her husband a "cop," because he's such a beat.—Detroit Free Press. And another New York woman calls her husband "Æolian," because he's so windy.—Claude de Haven. Quite likely this has gone far enough, but we can not help referring to the Syracuse woman who names her husband "Bologna," because she don't know what on earth he's made of.—Syracuse Times. We don't often do it—that is, very seldom—but there is a woman in Camden who calls her husband "Music," because he's such a lyre.—Philadelphia Item.

MACAULAY'S PROPHECY.

In the light of present and prospective events we can not forbear to quote from the words of Lord Macaulay in a letter to a citizen of Pennsylvania, written two years before the civil war, which is given in the May number of the North American Review:

"I have long been convinced that institutions purely democratic must sooner or later destroy liberty or civilization, or both. In Europe, where the population is dense, the effect of such institutions would be almost instantaneous. What happened in France is an example. In 1848 a pure democracy was established there. During a short time there was reason to expect a general spoliation, a national bankruptcy, a new partition of the soil, a maximum of prices, a ruinous load of taxation laid on the rich for the purpose of supporting the poor in idleness. Such a system would in twenty years have made France as poor and barbarous as the France of the Carolingians. Happily, the danger was averted; and now there is a despotism, a silent tribune, an enslaved press. Liberty is gone, but civilization has been saved. I have not the smallest doubt that, if we had a purely democratic government here, the effect would be the same. Either the poor would plunder the rich and civilization would perish, or order and prosperity would be saved by a strong military government and liberty would perish. You may think that your country enjoys an exemption from these evils. I will frankly own to you that I am of a very different opinion. Your fate I believe to be certain, though it is deferred by a physical cause. As long as you have a boundless extent of fertile and unoccupied land, your laboring population will be far more at ease than the laboring population of the Old World; and while that is the case the Jefferson politics may continue to exist without causing any fatal calamity. But the time will come when New England will be as thickly peopled as Old England. Wages will be as low, and will fluctuate as much with you as with us. You will have your Manchesters and Birmingham, and in those Manchesters and Birmingham hundreds of thousands of artisans will assuredly be sometimes out of work. Then your institutions will be fairly brought to the test. Distress everywhere makes the laborer mutinous and discontented, and inclines him to listen with eagerness to agitators who tell him that it is a monstrous iniquity that one man should have a million while another can not get a full meal."

"Through such seasons the United States will have to pass in the course of the next century, if not in this. How will you pass through them? I heartily wish you a good deliverance. But my reason and my wishes are at war, and I can not help foreboding the worst. It is quite plain that your government will never be able to restrain a distressed and discontented majority. For with you the majority is the government, and has the rich, which are always a minority, absolutely at its mercy. The day will come when in the State of New York a multitude of people, none of whom have more than half a breakfast, or expects to have more than half a dinner, will choose a Legislature. Is it possible to doubt what sort of a Legislature will be chosen? On one side is a statesman preaching patience, respect for vested rights, strict observance of public faith. On the other is a demagogue ranting about the tyranny of capitalists and usurers, and asking why anybody should be permitted to drink champagne and to ride in a carriage while thousands of honest folks are in want of necessities. Which of the two candidates is likely to be preferred by a workingman who hears his children cry for more bread? I seriously apprehend that you will, in some such season of adversity as I have described, do things which will prevent prosperity from returning; that you will act like people who should in a year of scarcity devour all the seed corn, and thus make the next year not of scarcity, but of absolute famine. There will be, I fear, spoliation. The spoliation will increase the distress. The distress will produce fresh spoliation. There is nothing to stop you. Your Constitution is all sail and no anchor. As I said before, when a society has entered on its downward progress, either civilization or liberty must perish. Either some Cæsar or Napoleon will seize the reins of government with a strong hand, or your republic will be as fearfully plundered and laid waste by barbarians in the twentieth century as the Roman Empire was in the fifth, with this difference, that the Huns and Vandals who ravaged the Roman Empire came from without, and that your Huns and Vandals will have been engendered within your own country by your own institutions."

Of this prophecy and opinion the writer of the Review article says: "These are strange and ominous words—the more ominous, indeed, since a few years have in part tested their truth and wisdom. In an age where the events of a whole year of our fathers are often crowded into the narrow compass of a month, sometimes of an hour, we have seen the shadow of Macaulay's prophecy come upon us with a rapidity that would have astonished the great historian himself. The sails of the Constitution are still set with the Stars and Stripes streaming at the fore, the mizzen, and the peak. But the anchor is still wanting, and we are drifting carelessly and unaware on the unseen rocks ahead. No Cæsar or Napoleon has yet seized the reins of government, but who can tell the day or the hour when the safety of civilization in this hemisphere will call for one? In that dark hour he will appear as surely as Napoleon succeeded Robespierre, or our civilization will perish."

If all the powers of Europe should combine and conspire to overthrow our institutions, no plan could be devised more effective than driving to our shores the advocates of Communism, Socialism, and Nihilism, who would be sure to establish a reign of terror and destruction. Our naturalization laws must be changed; twenty-one years residence here is not unreasonable to be asked of a foreigner who seeks to be a citizen. The policy of Bismarck in encouraging the emigration of the disturbers of Germany must be met by laws checking immigration. We do not want the criminals of Europe who are such from instinct, heredity, and choice. Again, the writer in the Review rightfully presents the matter:

"But all the antidotes that the mind of man could devise would not silence the seditious tongues that are daily pouring their venom into the souls of the people. An end should be put to all plots against society. The man of capital, and the man whose only capital is his labor, should alike wish it. Let Congress, by investigating the principles and proceedings of the Socialistic Labor party, first assure themselves of its pernicious nature, and then let it proceed to destroy by legislation this network of conspiracies. Let our legislators next assure themselves that the organization is led and inspired by German agitators, and if they are true to their trusts they will proceed to a general revision of the immigration laws. A thousand Chinamen can not bring to our shores the mischief that is brought by one apostle of Lassalle. The time has come when America should cease to be the "dumping-ground" of Europe. Horde-like immigration, with its collateral consequences, if it ever was a blessing to the United States, has ceased to be so now. It has become the curse of an answered prayer. Not only has it reduced to one-half the population of pure and genuine descendants of the choicest race that, in modern times, has dwelt upon the earth, but it has peopled our soil with the worst refuse of other lands. It would indeed seem high time that legal limitations be at once imposed upon indiscriminate immigration."

"No one can blame Prince Bismarck for the sagacity with which he secretly encouraged the emigration of German Socialists to the United States. The application to this purpose of the enormous sums supplied by the secret-service fund, and of the revenues derived from the confiscated estates of the Crown of Hanover, is a fact well known to many statesmen of Europe, though ignored by our own. Our daily papers are constantly announcing the fresh arrival of Socialist leaders, driven from their own country by the recent repressive measures. It is not to the German Chancellor that we must look for protection against these importations. It is to our own Government, which is highly censurable for not taking notice of such arrivals, as was done by Secretary Fish, though, unfortunately, but on one similar occasion. In Germany the Imperial Government, supported by the Church of Rome, is straining every effort to drive the Socialist from his native soil."

The iron will and hand of the police alone have jurisdiction over millions of German citizens, and the steps by which suppression is enforced are of a character so drastic and arbitrary that exile becomes a boon compared with the suffering to be endured under the ban of the new law. And America alone offers to these outcasts the hope of unmolested combination. With these facts before them, will the people of the United States persist in their usual course of apathy so long as their apparently immediate interest is not affected? Then let them consider that not only the best interests of society, but the best interests of property, are at stake. On the eve of great events our people are ever more sanguine than those of other countries. It was so before the great war of secession; it was so before Black Friday; it was so before the strikes of 1877. No sooner did the danger become visible than all marveled how it could have come so suddenly upon the country. Yet, in the case of the strikes, we had had our warning on the day succeeding the Christmas of 1876."

The plant which has found root in our soil must be killed before it bursts upon us full blown. The powerful and growing organization which now honeycombs the country must be laid low before we have forgotten the smoldering fires of Pittsburg, and the insurrection which extended through fourteen States of the Union—an insurrection which destroyed millions of property and hundreds of lives, in many cases successfully defied the local authorities, and for the first time in American history revealed its power to an organized mob. No thoughtful man can dwell upon our defenseless future without fear and apprehension, although the great mass of our people close their eyes to dangers past and coming. With that same tranquillity and inward satisfaction with which honest Lucretius gazed from the land upon the wrecking ship does the average American mind view the mighty struggle now waging in the German Empire."

Socialism in America is no longer a myth, it is a fact; it was the spirit which showed itself in the recent election of the Kearney Constitution.

Americans have always admired a righteous and honorable resistance of a poverty-stricken people to despotism, but they have no sympathy with the disorder, terrorism, and tyranny of the new creed proclaimed by modern Socialists in Germany, and against it they will rise as a people; but ere it becomes too strong to be crushed without bloodshed, let it be weeded from the land. Some can not understand how the pernicious doctrines of Socialism can take root and thrive in the free air of our republic, and are disposed to laugh at our fears; but let them beware, for, perhaps, they are laughing away the liberties of their country."

At an evening party one lady was making an asp of herself in the matter of another, of whom she said vehemently that there wasn't such another in the city for everything that was unladylike or unwomanly.

"Sh—sh, my dear, whispered a friend to her, "you are forgetting yourself."

Paneron had a comma for a nose, but nevertheless consumed pecks of snuff and ceaselessly flourished a handkerchief as big as the mainsail of a frigate.

"I know why you do," said Cherubini to him one day; "it's to make people think you have a nose."

A gentleman who thought that the price asked for the ground floor of a house was somewhat steep, told the janitor so.

"Well, ye-es; perhaps it is high, but then there is an elevator."

Henry Ward Beecher, writing from Pittsburg, while on his way to lecture for $350 a night, complacently says: "Here are hundreds of men who live on a dollar a day, and lay up something every year."

When the Mayor of Leadville gets drunk he loses his office, and the next best shot in the city is escorted by the grateful citizens to the city hall.

Truth is stranger than fiction, but then it isn't half so interesting. And then nobody likes to be familiar with strangers.

What is the best way to prevent the night from going too far? Put on the break of day.

The Dead Love of St. Jerome.

"Wasted with woe and midnight prayers
Was the love of St. Jerome."—Old Legend.

My brown hair ripples on his breast (Wailing the wind goes by);
A sharp cross near his breast was pressed—
I loved his faintest sigh.

How could he leave me? (Hark! I heard
The wild blast grieve along).
Why shun his mournful "paradise bird,"
Chanting a holy song.

Which charmed his raptured heart and brain?
(O night-wind, wildly play!)
I lie entranced 'neath cloistered pane,
And die for him away.

One morn a lovely pilgrim came
(Sad night-bird, weave thy song!)
Her heart a wild impassioned flame,
Her love a spell of wrong.

Dark curls streamed o'er her sable vest,
But mine were golden brown;
My glance he deemed a dove's unrest,
When rosy clouds look down.

She told her beads within his cell
(She wove dark coils of death).
They sighed, when evening shadows fell,
With love's delicious breath.

I mind me now, in my lonely grave
(Rave on, thou fitful blast!)
Of a sudden plunge beneath the wave
That brought me peace at last.

'Twas drenched, and chill my throbbing breast;
(O night-wind, sob no more!)
The wild bird soars, with sable crest,
To sing my sorrows o'er.

He prays, a cross within his grasp,
While the storm raves o'er the world—
Come, false one, shield me in thy clasp,
The night is bitter cold.

I was St. Jerome's "maid adored"
(Yet sweet, pale nuns pass by).
He praised the church, whose zealous word
"Brought virgins ever high."

I was St. Jerome's "maid adored,"
But in the grave dwell I;
Each maid, each kingdom he "adored,"
Shall sadly sink and die.

ALHAMA.

The Old Canoe.

Where rocks are gray and the shore is steep,
And the waters below look dark and deep;
Where the rugged pine in its lonely pride
Leans gloomily over the murky tide;
Where the reeds and rushes are tall and rank;
Where the weeds grow thick on its winding bank;
Where the shadow is heavy the whole day through—
Lies at its moorings the old canoe.

The useless paddles are idly dropped,
Like a sea-bird's wings that the storm hath stopped,
And crossed on the railing, one o'er one,
Like folded hands when the work is done,
While busily back and forth between
The spider stretches his silver screen,
And the solemn owl, with his dull "to-whoo,"
Nestles down on the side of the old canoe.

The stern half sunk in the slimy wave
Rots slowly away in its hidden grave,
And the green moss creeps o'er its dull decay.
Hiding the mouldering past away,
Like the hand that plants o'er the tomb a flower,
Or the ivy that mantles a fallen tower;
While many a blossom of the liveliest hue
Springs up o'er the stern of the old canoe.

The currentless waters are dead and still,
And the light wind plays with the boat at will;
And lazily in and out again
It floats the length of its rusty chain,
Like the weary march of the bands of time
That meet and part at the noonday chime;
And the shore is kissed at each turn anew
By the dripping bow of the old canoe.

Oh, many a time with a careless hand
I have pushed it away from the pebbly strand,
And paddled it down where the stream ran quick;
When the whirls were wild and the eddies were thick;
And laughed as I leaned o'er the rocking side,
And looked below in the murky tide,
To see that the faces and boats were two
That were mirrored back from the old canoe.

But now as I lean o'er the crumbling side,
And look below in the sluggish tide,
The face that I see there is graver grown,
And the laugh that I hear has a sober tone,
And the hand that lent to the light skiff wings
Has grown familiar with sterner things;
But I love to think of the hours that flew,
As I rocked where the whirls their wild spray threw,
Ere the blossoms waved or the green grass grew
O'er the mouldering stern of the old canoe.

ANONYMOUS.

A Book-Marker.

It holds my Bible leaves apart,
This poor shorn tress, so sad to see,
As memory murmurs to my heart
How you died, love, and left for me
A barren waste of weary years,
Sown with dark doubts that sorrow breeds.
I grasp at hope, but vex my ears
With jangle of discordant creeds,

And wonder is it quenched, that sweet
Soft radiance of a life benign,
That made my grosser pulses beat
In humble harmony with thine?
And are they dead, the nameless bliss
That only foolish lovers know,
Live lips that quivered to my kiss
In those bright summers long ago?

Or, haply, past the nether wave,
Shall Sundered spirits meet again?
Is there no knowledge in the grave,
Or promise for the sons of men?
The wintry sunset sheds a ray
Across the Book. I read and trust
That you shine somewhere, far away—
I can not think that you are dust.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MAY 31, 1879.

The Executive Committee of the Republican State Central organization, acting in form and by authority, has, after mature deliberation, unanimously adopted and published the following address to the Republican voters of California: "The Republican State Central Committee desires to urge upon you the necessity of organizing promptly for an earnest and vigorous campaign. You are called upon this year to perform a double duty—to assist in securing a faithful and effective administration of the new Constitution and to support the time-honored principles of your party. The contest which has just resulted in the adoption of that change in our organic law was waged without reference to national party lines, and had but one issue—whether the new Constitution should be ratified. The Republican party accepts the result as an absolute finality, and pledges itself to a faithful interpretation and administration of its provisions in all honesty and sincerity. That party is preëminently the representative of loyalty, of respect for law, of faithful adherence to compacts. The principles on and by which it stands are inseparable from these characteristics; its members have ever been noted for their insistence upon a strict regard for Constitutional requirements; and in urging the Republicans of the State to rally around their party banners, we are only giving the best assurance conceivable that the candidates whom they will put forward may be trusted to administer the new Constitution fairly, fully, and in all sincerity and good faith. It is the more necessary to stand by the party organization to-day, because great and momentous national issues are in controversy. In addition to four Congressmen, California elects a State Senate whose members will vote on the election of a United States Senator. These considerations alone point to the absolute necessity of a vigorous party campaign. But these are not the only incentives to energetic action. In 1880 the Presidential campaign opens, and the Republicans of California can not afford to be negligent in the preparation for a struggle which may involve the whole future of the Republic. The issues now presented are inferior in gravity to none which the party has been called to confront since its defense of a threatened Union. Advancing with ever-growing audacity, the Democratic leaders have conspired to paralyze the Federal Government and to revive the obsolete and heretical doctrine of States' rights with aggravated extravagance. To compass their purpose they have undertaken to intimidate the Executive by threatening to withhold supplies; and further to embarrass the Administration they have resorted to the device of appending political measures to appropriation bills, and causing it to be inferred that they will bring the Government to a standstill if their demands are not conceded. It is against the dangers which this condition of national politics involves that the Republican party must prepare to contend with all its energies. We have exaggerated nothing in ascribing to the situation a gravity only second to that which confronted the nation in 1861. The occasion calls for all the loyalty and resolution which the memories of a glorious past can inspire and evoke. Though almost a generation has elapsed the patriots who fought to preserve the Union are not yet dead. The policy which they periled their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to uphold and defend is not yet abandoned by its friends; and it is to that spirit of patriotism, to that stern resolve, to that noble liberalism, that we confidently appeal to-day. The mission of the Republican party is not ended while the enfranchisement of the negro continues to be a sham and a pretense, while the republican government in ten States is a mockery, while the men who fought to destroy the Union stand triumphantly upon the steps of the national capitol and plot the reversal of the judgment which the swords of our patriots recorded. That party stand pledged to preserve the faith of the Government in all its promises to its creditors; to provide as a circulating medium for the use of the people a currency which shall be of uniform value, whether gold, silver or paper, and to make a dollar, whatever its form, absolutely worth a dollar. To disband, to falter, to fail now in recognizing the duty and need of action, would be to surrender the purposes of a lifetime, to stultify the teachings of a generation, to renounce the approval of contemporaries and the gratitude of posterity. It is not from the Republican party that such weakness, such apathy, is to be expected. That party is to-day, as ever, the responsible depository of whatever high and holy aspirations the people of these United States cherish. It stands for ordered liberty, equal justice, enlightened education, constitutional government, and equitable legislation. It is the exponent and guardian of that liberty which rests upon understanding, and of that freedom which is distinguished from license. It stands to-day, as ever, for the poor as for the rich, for the passionless administration of a justice which knows no respect of persons, and for all that can enfranchise, elevate, and ennoble mankind; and because it stands for these it is the natural and implacable foe of that party which aims at anarchy, sanctions license, and seeks to tamper with justice under the plea of a more perfect democracy, and which shelters and sanctions corruption under the pretext of a magnanimous catholicity. Against the doctrines which assault the freedom, purity, and republicanism of our institutions, it is the duty of all Republicans to oppose their utmost efforts; and to such a contest you are now invited, in the full and abiding confidence that you will respond with characteristic enthusiasm to the summons, and that you will not cease until your efforts shall be crowned by a glorious success."

This is the language of the entire document, worded with the requisite nicety, and drawn to touch the party enthusiasm of the Republican voter. It recites clearly the party acceptance of the new organic law, promises honest men for its interpretation, throws in a hint of the importance of the Presidential campaign of 1880, indulges in a little bit of buncombe about the heretical States' rights doctrines of the Democratic leaders; the dangers similar to those of 1861 that threaten; the attitude of the solid South on the steps of the national capitol; the sham enfranchisement of the negro, and winds up with the usual appeal and apostrophe for efforts that shall finally "be crowned by a glorious success." It reads beautifully, but what about carrying out the letter and spirit of these fine promises? The text-book is all right, but how stands the first class in primary political manipulation? This is what the Republican voter wants to know. He understands perfectly well, and without written, or printed, or spoken assurance of the State Central Committee, that the Republican party is the only rallying point left for respectability and patriotism. He has seen the Democracy slowly droop and dissolve, and finally drown in the elements of its own dissolution. He has marked the rise, and progress, and triumph, and quarrel of "Kearney and the gang" of "honorable bilks," and the only thing now wanted is an assurance that his fealty being given to the Republican party, "the party of order, liberty, equal justice, enlightened education, constitutional government, and equitable legislation," he will not be murdered in his confidences by the intriguers and bummers of his own household. Given this assurance, and he is undoubtedly ready and willing to make the effort that will "be crowned by a glorious success;" for with safety and solidity in the Republican camp it is not a difficult undertaking to campaign against the present front of opposition politics. Not only is the new party a thing of shreds and patches, but its leading spirits have been met and vanquished before. It is a resurrection, this new life. For many years after the era of the Vigilance Committee this State and city were eminently American and politically respectable. The elements of evil which infest every community slunk into obscurity, official position was fairly acquired, and official duty honestly and independently performed, and the demagogue was virtually dead. But some of the human thistle-down that the old Vigilance Committee scattered blew inland, gradually got over its scare, and set the leaven of hatred to work to get even for the past. This leaven has at last lifted the political crust. If the Vigilantes had been a little more thorough, the old Bourbon politicians would have run further before they rested, and their disciples and descendants would not be struggling with Kearney to-day for the spoils of an accidental victory. But they had the good luck to be permitted to linger, and the good fortune to live, and the good judgment to strike hands with Kearneyism when it came, and the skill to catch the Chronicle, when, obedient to its tastes, it tumbled; and the patriotism to recognize as leader a Confederate general from Kentucky, who argued against the admission of California into the Union unless shackled with slavery, and the charity to condone the offense of a brevet rebel having upon his hands the stain of a Senator's blood. This is the material and the temper of the new organization, this the complexion of the enemy, with the exception of a few honest farmers gone daft on the despotism of great corporations and the mirage of double taxation, that is mustering its forces for a conflict with the Republican party. Already it has made a mess in its swaddling clothes. It is trying hard to get rid of the wet nurse, Kearney, and repudiate not only his influence but his paternity. Like the whelp that it is, the young jackal refuses to recognize the source of its blood, and stabs the breast that nursed, and warmed it into life. With this cabal none but the old political fossils and exiles can afford to affiliate. It is as ungrateful as it is insincere. It is as selfish as it is low-born. It is as dangerous as it is unscrupulous, and as imbecile in its capability to reform existing abuses as it is arrogant and brazen in assuming to itself all the virtues necessary to an honest interpretation of the new organic law. And yet, with all this said and admitted, the new party has strength. It has confidence, enthusiasm, an early organization, a newspaper, and a blind and stubborn following of the forlorn hope that is bound to win, in order to get in once more before a natural death snatches its recruits back from the resurrection of their political graves. It will fight hard and strike deep for the mastery. It will plot and compromise with the Democrats, betray the working-men, bamboozle the horny-handed sons of toil, and invent and encourage and nurse dissension among Republicans. And it looks now as though Republicans are disposed to help them along in the scheme. It looks very much as though the next general election would be a scrub and scrambling race; a wrangle and a riot over the county, and town, and legislative, and small judicial offices; a campaign of compromises for a few political peanuts.

To offset this, and to stand to win, the Republican party must stop quarreling and buckle down to honest and earnest and immediate work. It must choose its candidates with a discretion that will be at once recognized and approved. It must stand firm, and unyielding, and unanimous. It must sacrifice nothing to the demands of Federal officials, and lean but little on the issues of 1880. It must talk less of "the enfranchisement of the negro being a sham and a pretense," and more of the interpretation of this new Constitution. "The mockery of republican government in ten States" is of little importance beside the possibility of a socialistic government in this. "The whole future of the Republic" can afford to wait till the destiny of California is decided. "The gravity, second only to that which confronted the nation in 1861," is nothing to the seriousness of the situation here; and "while the men who fought to destroy the Union stand triumphantly upon the steps of the national capitol and plot the reversal of the judgment which the swords of our patriots recorded," the rebels here have got beyond the steps and into the very citadel of our organic law, and threaten to reverse their socialistic and confederate thumbs on our business as well as our political life. This is a fight, not for party principle but for personal preservation, not a struggle for the glory of the republic but a tussle for the honor of the State. We have allowed the buzzards to make their opportunity and to gather blinking for the feast, to glory over the clean sweep of office-holders, and to gloat on the long list of places to be filled, and the good time coming. The day of lamentations and hand-foldings over this result is done, and all that remains for the Republican party is to step confidently into the arena and elect such men as have the intelligence and patriotism to stay all hurtful possibilities, and who will give an honest interpretation to that which is good in the new instrument. This is what is expected of the party under its declaration of principles, and this is what it will be helped to do by hundreds of sensible and conservative people outside of the strict party line, who, frightened at the dangerous drift in the other direction, will strain a point or two to vote with reason and respectability—that is, provided the Republican nominees represent reason and respectability. If old political tramps and corporation hacks, and party bummers are allowed to step to the front, they will be the heralds of a deserved defeat. The rank and file of the Republican party demand the nomination at the convention of honest names. It asks for a ticket that is not handicapped in every line by a fragrant political history. It desires an opportunity to bring out the conservative element, and demands that the manipulators and wire-pullers keep their hands from the party throat and not choke it to death at the primaries, as there is every reason to fear now that they will do. As we have said before, the exigencies of the times demand a deliberative convention, and the sacrifice of selfish and purely personal ends to the making of a ticket that will win. That it can be done there is not the shadow of a doubt; that it will be is purely a piece of hopeful speculation. When the quality of this State is aroused its suffrage rallies about the Republican standard, but when politicians test its temper it jumps in every direction. The Gorham defeat, and the Booth triumph, and the Irwin walk-over, all bear witness as to how severely alone the Republican voter can leave the obnoxious party nominee. There is no blind following, as with the Democracy, of the upraised idol; no general obedience to the crack of the party whip. But there is a sentiment abroad for a square Republican fight against the communistic cormorants, a ticket that will command respect and votes, and a keeping of the pledge that promises an honest and a healthy State and municipal government. Given these conditions and a thorough organization, and we will "respond with characteristic enthusiasm to the summons," and "will not cease until our efforts shall be crowned by a glorious success." But more business and less buncombe; more attention to local issues, and less concern—at least just now—for the distribution of national party bonbons.

PRATTLE.

Some time ago the legislature of Massachusetts was so wise as to pass a law making desertion for three years a cause of divorce. Since then the number of divorces in nearly all parts of the State has doubled. Opening his court at Barnstable, the other day, Judge Lord began the hearing of applications for divorce from no fewer than thirty young women, Puritanesses all (the population of Cape Cod is wholly Yankee, and entirely Orthodox), who filed in and sat in rows like school classes. Of these only two had wedded previously to 1870. The "revelations" were of the decenter and most godly character; there had, as a rule, been no infidelity nor marked infelicity. The couples had tired of marriage, and the husbands had "deserted," continuing, in most instances, neighborly relations with the wives, and living in the same village. There had been, apparently, from the first, no intention of always living together. On the whole, the Massachusetts "desertion" law appears to work smoothly and well; two hundred and fifty-odd years of Christian civilization having enabled that tireless commonwealth to get nearly abreast of California in the matter of domestic morals. This, no question, is discouraging, but considering for how short a time we have been in the race we may nourish a reasonable hope that long before Massachusetts shall have passed the limit of calculable depravity we shall have shot ahead and attained the goal of unspeakable nastiness.

That poor devil of a woman in Pocasset, who abetted her religion-mad husband in the murder of their little daughter, in order that God might raise her from the dead, is reported as being herself at the point of death from remorse at her horrible mistake. This ghastly affair, I observe, has profoundly stirred the entire country, with the probable result of inspiring many other wild beasts of heaven's combined menagerie and circus to crimson their paws in the heart's blood of their innocent whelpage. One foal makes many, and the chill blast of retribution disseminates the spores of crime. It needs now only to hang the he-filicide (we hear nothing, by the way, of his penitence), and we shall have abundant upgrowth of similar lunatics from the oils and talloes of his rancid carcass. Nevertheless, it is advisable to hang him, and hang him hard.

See, Lord, fanatics all arrayed
For revolution!
To foil their villain camisade
Unsheathe again the sacred blade
Of persecution.

What though through long disuse 'tis grown
A trifle rusty?
'Gainst modern heresy, whose bone
Is rotten, and the flesh fly-blown,
It still is trusty.

Of sterner stuff Thine ancient foes,
Unapprehensive,
Sprang forth to meet Thy biting blows;
Our zealots chiefly to the nose
Assume the offensive.

Then wield the blade their necks to hack,
Nor ever spare one;
Thy crowns of martyrdom unpack,
But see that every martyr lack
The head to wear one.

That convenient fiction of the bucolic press, "a friend at our elbow" (commonly, I fear, nothing but a hole in the coat editorial), is here supposed to ask me how much of all this I mean. A good deal, I blush to confess. With retrospective eye traveling rapidly along the less familiar paths of history, profane and sacred, I seem to discern a multitude of crumbling altars upon which the fires of new religions have been quenched with the blood of their devotees—many ash-colored spots along the path of human progress, where the speeding flames of some now-forgotten faith were trampled out by the feet of persecution. You can not get an important universal truth within the four corners of an epigram, and the familiar apothegm that "the blood of martyrs is the seed of the church" is of imperfect application. Picturesque that view of the matter clearly is, and hence its currency, along with the allied, but by no means identical, popular belief that "truth crushed to earth" will necessarily survive "wounded error." Such notions are blazed about the world, persisting through the ages, not because they satisfy the understanding, but because they captivate the fancy. They enslave the moral sense with chains of roses, but reason has nothing to say to them. Platitudes are mummies of the picturesque.

Not every "sacred fire" has the vitality of those of the Guebres in Moore's fable, which not only resisted the bigot's attempt to extinguish them, but set afire his extinguishers. Government—if we had a Government—could arrive at a solution of "the Mormon problem" in a quarter of the time that No Authority has already consumed in getting ready to prepare for taking thought whether to consider how to not act.

Call off your parsons, your editors, and your pedagogues, make me dictator, and I'll engage to make Mormonism a very dim and tenebrous tradition indeed, and that, too, without troubling myself to inquire whether my measures have given to popular sympathies this turn or that. Should secular measures, however, be thought too barbarous for this rose-water age, I would cheerfully consent to employ only spiritual—say four squadrons of Episcopalian horse, six regiments of Methodist foot, and a battery of Presbyterian artillery.

This by way of illustration; it is right to explain that I have a sincere respect for the Mormons. Surviving one of the most hateful and sneaking aggressions that ever disgraced the generally straightforward and forthright course of religious persecution—an aggression that lacked alike the sanction of authority and the lustre of success—they dragged the feeble remnant of their dispirited body into the horrible wilderness, where, a thousand miles beyond the reach of cupid's most extravagant claim, they made a garden of abundance. There they reared the edible beast and the succulent vegetable, and to the feast came Famine from over the seas to line his ribs with leaves of firm white tallow, box-plaited and scalloped. Following his dusty toes thither, Nakedness was fearfully and wonderfully clad, yet warmly withal. There the stomach of intemperance paled its ineffectual fires, and Immorality was fain to hide his diminished head. In short, Mormonism proved the greatest practical benefaction of the century. If it ruined any souls it had the right, for the starving carcasses of its converts had none until souls were created under their skeleton ribs by Mormon meats and herbs. And now we want to rout out the Mormons again, rapacity arming itself for the purpose with religion's exhausted mandates copied from the archives of Nauvoo and telegraphed out to Ogden.

When the Saints, a pauper few,
We the Gentiles once went through,
"All for Jesus!" cried the many—
Seeing there was naught for any.
Now, their coffers as we eye,
"All for Jesus!" still we cry.
But again when we have striven,
And the coup de grace have given,
We shall find, when all our gains
To count over it shall please us,
Not a Saint alive remains,
Not a cent has gone to Jesus.

According to the May returns to the department of Agriculture, California is one of six States and Territories in which the wages-rate for farm labor has increased during the past year, there having been a marked decline in all the others. Kearney's rabble gatherings on the city sand-lots have done some good, anyhow; they have benefited the farm laborers who did not remove to the city to attend them.

The news comes blazing and thundering under the sea that the Governor of a province tributary to Turkey (I am in doubt if it is not a city tributary to Russia), who had officially proclaimed his intention of wearing henceforth the Bulgarian hat, has been commanded by the Sultan to continue to top himself with the fez; the Porte in its wisdom regarding the Bulgarian hat as a shocking bad one politically. Public opinion (there is such a thing public opinion, it appears, even in the dominions of the Czaritan of Tursia) is greatly excited, though "no disturbance is apprehended." Why should there be a disturbance? It is a matter of trifling political importance whether he wear the hat on his neck at the bottom of the Bosphorus, or the fez on his head in the skull department of a St. Petersburg museum.

On the birthday of Queen Victoria that enlightened journal, the San Francisco Bulletin, drew attention to the circumstance that the Victorian age has surpassed in glory the Elizabethan, and among the particulars of superiority enumerated the development of the railroad system and the connection of "her island home" with the rest of the world by the telegraph. There spake the Philistine, for it is of the nature of the Philistine to consider civilization very largely a matter of railroads and telegraphs—not altogether, for it is partly, also, a thing of steamboats and coal gas; and it was an example of noble moderation in the Bulletin man to leave them out. Was it from charitable and magnanimous consideration for the memory of Shakspeare, Bacon, Spenser, Raleigh, and Drake that he contented himself with dimly sketching the overshadowing figures of Stephenson and Whatshisname (the telegraph person), forbearing to even outline the stupendous images of the other two immortals, Robert Fulton and the illustrious inventor of the gas bill?

If civilization consisted in these things it would be the most hateful and intolerable condition of existence that it is possible to imagine. Nothing earthly is so uninteresting as these vaunted material achievements of the mechanic—unless, indeed, it be their praises from the mouths and pens of their admirers. I do not deny that they are useful in a narrow sense; I protest that they are not advantageous in a broad one. They enable more human beings to subsist in a given area than could do so before; if they perform any other important function I am unable to discover what it is. Within the life-time of the present generation the population of Europe has enormously increased; the inventor and the engineer pat themselves and one another complacently on the stomach saying: "We did it." The boast is well founded; they indubitably did. And the man who compounded a new dog-soap that was a dead-shot for fleas intelligently assisted, according to his light. His service to humanity differs from theirs, not in kind but only in degree. Before his era a great deal of time and labor was wasted catching dog-fleas by hand.

It is urged that the railroad, the steamboat, and the telegraph (coal gas and the cotton gin meanly excluded) are servants of liberty and promoters of peace. This is true—when they are in liberal and peaceful hands; in the control of tyranny and turbulence they are powerful engines of oppression and war. The first act of the usurper is to seize them, the second to operate; I recall no instance where they have either resisted or disobeyed. The railroad enables "patriotism" to concentrate troops for defense, but equally for invasion and conquest. The steamship can succor the distant colony, if it beat another steamship. The telegraph sends its rain of important information upon the just and the unjust, disclosing alike the intrigues of oppressors and the plans of the oppressed. The newspaper press (I had forgotten the newspaper press) fills the world with a blaze of light—showing the enemies of mankind where to deliver the most telling blows. Whether these things have brought peace let us ask at Sebastopol, at Magenta, at Gettysburg, at Sadowa, at Gravelotte, and at Plevna—"fields of the dead" representing six gigantic wars in twenty years!

That war is not a very great evil is little to the purpose: the panegyrists of wheels, and poets laureate of machinery, hold that it is. They weep with one eye at the "horrors of war," while the other is holyrolled upward in thanksgiving for their supposed mitigation by devices which give to armies vast resources, immense facilities of aggression, novel powers of recuperation, amazing mobility, and formidable strength—the railroads, the steamers, the magnetic telegraph. (I must weaken my argument by omitting from this category the newspaper press, the cotton gin, and the gas bill; whose voice, generally speaking, is "still for war," however.) It is a pity that these shallow sentimentalists have not another eye each, in order that while with one they deplore "the horrors," and with another bless "the dawn of a new era," they might add the charm of insincerity to their performance by winking significantly with a third.

There was "opposition" to the celebration in New York of the centenary birthday of Thomas Moore, the poet, because he called the people of this country "barbarians."

"Barbarians all!" shouted Moore, and the cry
Has fluttered the simoleon crew,
Who signify now their contempt of the lie
By proving it partially true.

Happening, the other day, to attend a court of justice I was much impressed by what I saw and heard, and that night dreamed I was the Sultan of Turkey visiting the United States in search of knowledge. Visiting a grave looking person who said he was a Judge, "What," said I, "do you do when a man comes to you with a complaint against his neighbor?" "May it please your Majesty," he replied, "I send for the other man." "What! you permit both men to tell their stories?" "Yes, your Majesty, and the woman, too." "The woman?" "There is generally a woman." "Then you listen to three conflicting statements!" "To five, always, your Majesty, for there must be at least two lawyers." "May the grave of my aunt be defiled if I know what you mean!" "Lawyers, your Majesty, are men whom we compel the litigants to employ—people who must live." "Are there any others, you dog of darkness?" "The witnesses—friends of the litigants. Each tells a different story, but none the truth." "By the beard of the Prophet, this is inconceivable! How from this mass of contradiction can one know the truth?" "One can not, Sire, we have twelve. They know nothing when they begin, and recollect nothing before they have done." "Shaitan smite them! What is your function?" "Oh, I silence insulted witnesses, approve the verdict, and grant a new trial." "May the jackasses sing when you pray," I thundered, striking at him. He dodged under the couch upon which I was reclining. Springing to my feet I kicked him as he disappeared, and the pain of the collision, joined with the noise of his upsetting, awoke me.

Now Murphy lauds (with "views" he's rife,
And eager, too, to air them)
"The Beauties of a Sober Life."
With him I'll share them.

I love love's wine, and he the race
Of milk-and-wa'er duties;

Mr. Anderson, the gentleman who rendered important service to Mr. Troy Dye in performing the Tullis murder, is reported by his "spiritual adviser" as having given evidence of "deep religious conviction" just before "dying a triumphant Christian death" tangled in a rope. I venture with due and becoming deference to the Governor to submit that after a condemned murderer has repented, reformed, and become a good Christian, he might safely be turned to the use of hanging a pious and estimable

NURSERY RHYMES.

From a Recent Essay Read Before the Cbit-Chat Club.

BY JOHN C. HALL.

* * * But viewing the subject without humor, from the sober standpoint, and in the light of common sense, we shall find that these nursery rhymes are not the nonsensical and unimportant things they are frequently understood to be. They play a most distinguished part in a certain division of our education. Whence did we derive our ideas of rhythm, and where was the ear first practiced in perceiving the smooth flow of syllables, metrically arranged, and the pleasing similarity of the sound of final vowels? Certainly in the atting the same beauties in the standard poets, when our at-nursery. There were we prepared for detecting and appreciation was afterward turned to graver things. And so important a part of our education is this, and so receptive the infant mind of these early impressions, that many persons, having in charge the education of the young and standing eminent in authority, have advised that certain facts in philosophy be incorporated with these rhymes, and taught in connection with them—for instance, facts illustrating the law of gravitation, principles in astronomy, chemistry, the power of steam, the properties and astonishing uses of electricity and galvanism—thus imprinting early upon the infant mind many of the most important truths of natural philosophy.

And, despite all the nonsense which is embodied in these rhymes, they contain many grains of wisdom which can not be too early learned. One may be cited as a specimen, as it contains the quintessence of common sense, and a teaching which is occasionally derided:

"There was a little man,
And he wooed a little maid,
And he said: 'Little maid, will you wed, wed, wed?
I have little more to say
Than will you, yea or nay,
For least said is soonest mended—ded, ded, ded.'"
"The little maid replied,
Some say a little sighed:
'But what shall we have for to eat, eat, eat?
Will the love that you're so rich in
Make a fire in the kitchen,
Or the little god of love turn the spit, spit, spit?'"

Indeed, some of them, divested of their redundant nonsense, are far from destitute of literary merit. There is a striking resemblance between Mercutio's description of Queen Mab and Mother Goose's account of the apparel of "Master Tom Thumb." Mercutio says:

"She comes
In shape no bigger than an agate-stone
On the fore-finger of an Alderman,
Drawn with a team of little atomies
Athwart men's noses as they lie asleep:
Her wagon-spokes made of long spinners' legs;
The cover, of the wings of grasshoppers;
The traces, of the smallest spider's web;
The collars, of the moonshine's watery beams;
Her whip, of cricket's bone; the lash, of film;
Her wagoner, a small gray-coated gnat;
Not half so big as a round little worm
Prick'd from the lazy finger of a maid;
Her chariot is an empty hazel-nut,
Made by the joiner squirrel, or old grub,
Time out of mind the fairies' coachmaker."

Of Master Tom Thumb, Mother Goose says:

"Come listen, my boys, sit still and be mum,
I'll read the apparel of Master Tom Thumb.
An oaken leaf he wears for his crown;
His shirt it was by spiders spun;
His stockings of thistle-down, they tie
With eyelash picked from his mother's eye;
His bat was made of butterfly's wing;
His boots were wove of gossamer thin;
His coat and breeches were shaped with pride;
A needle mounted swung by his side;
A mouse he rode as his dappled steed;
His bridle curb an inch of thread;
His shoes were made of a squirrel's skin,
Nicely tanned, the hair within."

Although there is much uncertainty in regard to the bibliography of some of the popular nursery rhymes, yet the one just quoted is reliably ascribed to "Mother Goose." Another important circumstance relating to these melodies, and one which imparts to them a lively and ever increasing interest is the antiquity of some of them, a few examples will illustrate. The lines describing the disaster which befell

"Bryan O'Linn and his wife and wife's mother" are found slightly altered in a black-letter book by W. Wager, printed about 1560. The lines—

"I had a little nut tree, nothing would it bear,
But a silver nutmeg and a golden pear,
The King of Spain's daughter came to visit me,
And all was because of my little nut tree.
I shipped over water, I danced over sea,
And all the birds in the air couldn't catch me—"

are said to refer to Joanna of Castile, who visited the court of Henry VII. in 1506.

The rhyme of Jack Horner is a fragment of an extended chap-book tale in verse, entitled, "The Pleasant History of Jack Horner, containing his witty tricks and pleasant pranks, which he played from his youth to his ripper years." A copy of this history, embellished with frightful wood-cuts, is preserved in the Bodleian Library. The story is founded on that of "The Fryer and the Boy," printed in London in 1617, and both are taken from a still more ancient tale of "Jack and his Stepdame," which was published by Mr. Wright. The traditional lines read thus:

"When friends they did together meet
To pass away the time—
Why little Jack, be sure would eat
His Christmas pie in rhyme.
And said, 'Jack Horner, in the corner,
Eats good Christmas pie.
And with his thumbs pulls out the plums,
And said: Good boy am I.'"

These lines are very much in the style of what we call "old English poetry." The rhymes—

"Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John
Guard the bed that I lay on!

Four corners to my bed,
Four angels round my head;
One to watch, one to pray,
And two to bear my soul away—"

are indeed very beautiful. Ady, in his Candle in the Dark, published in 1650, affirms that the first two lines were used in the time of Queen Mary. Their origin is supposed to be found in the Euchiridion Leonis Papæ, first published at Rome in 1532, and early translated into French. This work consists of a collection of prayers, for the most part burlesqued or disfigured, and adopted as charms to avert or heal diseases.

Nearly every school boy has expressed his feelings in the well known lines:

"Multiplication is vexation,
Division's twice as bad;
The Rule of Three doth puzzle me,
And Practice drives me mad."

A few years since these veritable lines were found in a manuscript dated 1570. The list might be considerably extended, showing the quaint and curious origin of several of these melodies. But many of them have an archaeology still more remote, and even anterior to any authentic history. There is no exaggeration in attributing to them an immense age. We find, says Halliwell, that the same trifles which erewhile lulled or amused the English infant are current, in slightly varied forms, throughout the north of Europe; we know that they have been sung in the northern countries for centuries, and that there has been no modern outlet for their dissemination across the German Ocean. The most natural inference is to adopt the theory of a Teutonic origin, and thus give to every genuine child-rhyme found in England or Sweden an immense antiquity.

In speaking of the permanent character of the melodies of Mother Goose, who was not, as many suppose, a mythical being, but a veritable personage, an anonymous critic has said with both humor and truth:

"People may talk of Homer and Shakspeare, and whom they please of that class, but Mother Goose may hold up her head with the best of them. The Swan of Avon is not the only bird that has made melody for all time. See how Mother Goose has stood her ground, and survived whole generations of pretenders to poetical inspiration. How many great writers have sprung up from nothing, flourished away, and sunk back to nothing, while Mother Goose has sat calmly brooding over her golden eggs of wisdom! What revolutions and overturns we have had in literature, to the utter demolition of great names and great reputations in poetry! What fluctuations between the lake school, the metaphysical school, the romantic school, the transcendental school, the namby-pamby school, and the fiddle-de-dee school, sending thousands of sprouting and aspiring poets into everlasting oblivion! Amidst all these tossings and turnings, and ups and downs of popular opinion, Mother Goose has swum like a duck, and kept her glorious reputation above water."

Why, it may pertinently be asked, are these "unconsidered trifles" so durable? Why have they been handed down to us from the earliest dawn? It may be answered, and with strong persuasion, that the preservation of the relics of primitive literature often bears an inverse ratio to their importance. But a more satisfactory solution can be found in the identity of human nature—the principle that, in all ages, the human family has been endowed with the same ideas and sentiments, which extend, in unobliterated transmission, from its origin to its present state. The child of rude and barbaric surroundings feels in some degree the same sentiment of liberty which actuated Hampden or Washington, the same enthusiasm which fired the thoughts of Newton or Kepler, the same sense of the beautiful which thrilled the soul of a Titian or a Bellini. It is on this identity of human nature, in all ages, that every principle of action, every teaching of morals, every institute of art is founded. It is the affirmation that man everywhere is man, made of the same powers, passions, and affections; that the senses are the same in all, intelligence the same in all, affection the same in all, reason the same in all, conscience the same in all, faith the same in all; that they all have the same root in the same soil, the common nature of man. Whatsoever appeals to that human nature can never be outgrown or antiquated until human nature is itself outgrown. It was the enthusiastic conviction of the validity of this principle which caused an eminent divine of this city to remark that Old Mother Hubbard was as immortal as Paradise Lost.

But these nursery rhymes are destined to occupy a far more significant place in literature than has yet been hinted at. It is not a hazardous assertion to say that they will, in the near future, if they have not already, become a prominent revelation of the history of early nations whose primitive career is so shrouded in mist and uncertainty that the chronicler and the annalist can give us no more than vague and uncertain information. Within the past fifty years, a remarkable change has taken place in regard to literature. It has become the practice of many inquiring minds—those devoted to the study of the causes whose recondit processes have transformed the rude savage of primeval centuries into the enlightened and courtly European of to-day—to seek the history of the moral and intellectual growth of nations by the study of their literatures and other artistic memorials. They proceed upon the principle that such a community is in a state of constant development, and that, in every stage of that development, a spontaneous and ineffaceable impression of its physiological conditions is inscribed upon its canvas, its marble, and its literary monuments. This idea has taken a vigorous hold upon the thinking mind, and become one of the most important facts in modern philosophy. Literature is no longer regarded as the casual exhalation of an overwrought brain, the child of caprice, a mere creation of fancy, a "rhapsody of words." It is a structure, resting upon a foundation, and possessing substantial and symmetrical proportions. It has a philosophy whose proportions are co-extensive with the human soul.

One of the greatest philosophic works of the day, and one which has provoked admiration from some, denunciation from others, and wonder from all, expounds and applies this principle; and in the English literature the author traces, step by step, and point by point, the moral and intellectual growth of that singular people. With the greatest clearness the brilliant Frenchman pictures the character of the primitive English from the song of "Athelstan's victory at Brunan-burg." He discovers all the emotions, the joy, fury, and exaltation. We see not only the outward forms of the people whose history he unfolds, but we are made sensible of their inner life, their various habitudes, their features quivering with animation and glowing with excitement, as we now see the men of our day in the streets, in their homes, in their churches, and in their deliberative assemblies. Thus we find that the artist, with vision undimmed by the refracting media of centuries, can descend the long aisles of the past, scrutinize its memorials, and find in a legislation, a liturgy, in the song of the minstrel or the declamation of the orator, in the structure of a sentence, or the turn of a phrase, an indicium of a people's character.

By this process he gives us a history more accurate, richer, and more profound than that of the mere chronicler. And when the record which the ordinary historian searches and relies upon is wanting, obscure, or intermittent, the artist can trace the psychological development of a people by a process more subtle than the annalist is master of. No matter how remote the thing to be examined—be it a poem, a phrase, or a sentence—he can display the character of the man who wrote it, of the people who environed the man and made him what he was.

Now what are the components of a literature?—the pages of the historian, such as Gibbon and Tacitus, and a few classical dramas? Certainly, but not these alone. Every human utterance, however great or microscopic, from the generalization of the philosopher or the rapture of the poet, to the doggerel of the daily newspaper, is an essential part of literature, and indispensable to a just and comprehensive conception of it. And when we reflect that many of the melodies which thrilled our childish imaginations, and now seem the perfection of nonsense, have come down to us hoary with years; that they frequently contain the record of some notable historic fact, some heroic deed; that they are tinged with the prevailing sentiment of the age which produced them, in the same manner that the marble, the canvas, or the epic or lyric poetry of a given age are affected with contemporary thoughts and feelings; and when we reflect further, that in primitive times people expressed themselves more in the language of passion and poetry than in that of cold, arid prose, that the latter belongs to a mature age when rigorous analysis and exact expression are in requisition, and the former to an emotional age when men act from impulse and not from reflection; and that the more emotional a people may be, the more natural, simple, and unaffected their manner, the less their reserve, the less restraint they will encounter, the more they will pour forth their joys or their lamentations in song—we may safely predict that in the period which we are rapidly approaching, if we have not already entered upon it, when all history shall be rewritten, and the historian shall trace, not the march of armies, but the pressure and progress of principles; not the cunning of the diplomatist, but the conflict of truth and error for the mastery, and of truth with truth for adjustment, that even these child-rhymes shall, under the magic touch of modern criticism, light up the sombre ages of the past and become a further revelation of the mysterious and complex development of him who is "in action, how like an angel! in apprehension, how like a god!"

The New York Times, a patronizing paper, published in a pure and progressive city, has written a little tear-compelling article about San Francisco. Read: "San Francisco is in many respects the most American city on the continent, especially in its defects, there almost always carried to extremes. Statistics show that, last year, almost three hundred divorces were granted in the city, nearly one divorce for every working day. Suicides are so common, likewise, that the newspapers often chronicle six or seven a week. This shows at what high pressure people live. They have as a rule, no repose, no regular method, no wholesome self-discipline, no understanding of themselves. Their condition, like their wants and expectations, is artificial. They exist in a continual state of excitement; the days and nights are in a constant whirl. What they do to-day they wish to undo to-morrow. Marrying without reflection, without any guarantee for the future, they soon discover their mistake and seek release from the bonds they have so eagerly and unhesitatingly imposed upon themselves. Life is emotional, sensational, carnival-like. Nothing is, nothing has been, everything is to be. Life, property, the whole community, is speculative. There is no solid foundation anywhere of serious, recurring work. All the inhabitants, from the lowest to the highest, from the poorest to the most prosperous, look to some lucky venture for the golden reward of some spasmodic effort. When balked of their aims and hopes, they impulsively throw off the life which for the moment seems unendurable. The town is a mine of gold and gunpowder. It may yield yellow treasures, or explode with terrible effect; enrichment and ruin follow hard and continually one upon the other. The precious ores of California have benefited the world, but have injured its metropolis by making the real unreal, by making all material blessings contingent on uncontrollable circumstance. What San Francisco needs for healthful development is the acceptance of the idea of regular work with proportionate compensation, and the relinquishment of faith in convulsive and unearned success."

There was a singular incident lately in one of the Hartford churches. Wong Shing, in full Chinese dress—pig-tail, cork shoes, and mantilla—officiated as deacon at the communion service in the Asylum Hill Congregational Church. He was one of the first Chinese boys who went to New England to get an education. At Monson, Massachusetts, he was converted, and when he returned to China he became connected with a Christian mission.

LXXXI.—Sunday, June 1.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Potato Soup Maigre.
Fried Flounders, with Lime Juice.
Boiled Squabs on Toast.
Baked Tomatoes, String Beans.
Beef a la Mode, Mashed Potatoes.
Lettuce, Egg Dressing.
Apples a la Religieuse, with Whipped Cream.
Fruit-bowl of Apricots, Cherries, and Oranges.

APPLES A LA RELIGIEUSE are large baked apples with the cores taken out. Make an incision around with the point of a knife. Put a small pat of butter in the holes left by the cores; put them in a baking-pan with a glass of water, sprinkle fine sugar over them, bake slowly, and serve with their own syrup and more powdered sugar sprinkled over them. When carefully done the skin above the incision will rise and look like a veil set over the apple.

BLOUSES IN A BALL-ROOM.

How the One-Hundredth Night of "The Assommoir" was Celebrated in Paris.—A Tribute to Naturalism in Art, and to M. Zola, its Chief Apostle.

PARIS, May 2.—The Assommoir has reached its hundredth night. It is a dramatic event; but there are so many events just now that perhaps it may be as well to explain. It is the great naturalistic play of the period, as the book on which it is founded is the great naturalistic romance. What is naturalism? The art of being natural—a simple thing, you will say, but in the hands of a gifted Frenchman a theory admitting of wondrous developments. Thus, in The Assommoir, M. Emile Zola has painted low society to the life, or rather to the death. He has given us the most startlingly awful picture of the back slums of this great town ever done in black and white. It is uncreatable, and of course it is universally read. Zola is the man of the hour, and it will not be his fault if he is not the man of the epoch. He is trying to found a school. A naturalistic or nothing, he says to painter and actor, as well as to writer. Tell the very truth in all its horror, or you will never be sharp enough to see it in all its beauty. Classicism is dead, Romanticism is dying, Naturalism is the infant here. The painters have taken his advice, and we have the impressionist school; the dramatists have taken it, and the play of The Assommoir, which has now filled the coffers of the Ambigu for one hundred nights, is the result. It is a sensible play. I defy you to look on a certain scene of death from drunkard's softening of the brain without getting off your liquor for four and twenty hours. The hundredth night of a Parisian play is generally celebrated by a supper of the company. It was felt that something new should be done in this instance in honor of the new school. Let Classicism and Romanticism sup—Naturalism would give a costume ball, and a costume ball like no other—a travesty of low life. The card of invitation was in the form of an etching of a dirty wine cooper in patched apron and wooden shoes, who held a smaller card in his hand thus inscribed—of course in French:

"On the occasion of the centenary of The Assommoir, the authors of the piece and the management of the theatre of the Ambigu have the honor to invite — to the ball which will be given at the Elysée Montmartre on the 25th of April at midnight.

"One will crack a crust.
"Gentlemen as workmen.
"Ladies as washerwomen."

These cards were sent right and left to all the great theatres of Paris, to the studios, and to the salons. It was understood that for one night only a good part of the most polished society of the capital was to adopt the dress, speech, and manners of a barrier ball. The very scene of the revel was a low dancing hall on the exterior boulevards, in the Clichy quarter. It is described in the novel and represented in the play as the scene of the death of "Gervaise," the drunkard's wife. She perishes of cold and want in the snow before the door. The students and counter-jumpers who frequent the place danced there as usual up to 11.30 on Tuesday night, then the police hurried them out to make room for M. Zola's guests. A great refreshment counter was set up where you could have the very best things from Brebant's in the very roughest style. Everything was to be in keeping—you see it was a rough's ball. The wine was poured out of filthy looking pewter measures, just as in the small dram-shops. There was plenty of pate de foie gras, but it was in lumps like boulders and sandwiched between hunks of bread as thick as your fist. At 12 all was ready and the first sham workman arrived, while the real ones, who happened to be night wanderers on that part of the boulevard, formed a crowd at the door. Some of the invited had compromised the matter by putting a blouse over their evening dress, but the most of them were frankly and unmistakably voyou from top to toe. There was tremendous make-up in every characteristic of low-class debauchery, folly, and crime. Here was the rough of the outer boulevards, who steals behind you on tiptoe at night, whips a knife in between your shoulder blades, and then borrows your watch—short blue blouse, greasy black silk cap with a very high crown, "No. 6" curls plastered flat on the brow. The man with the rather longer blouse, coquettish cut about the pantaloons, highly polished boots, clean hands, white face, long, almond-like, cunning eyes, a flower-stalk between his clean-shaven lips, lives wholly without work, even without so much of it as is involved in doing murder—others work for him. Salute Infamy in Profundis and let him pass on. The white-bloused fellow is a bill-sticker—also, but this is only in real life, the most brilliant student of declamation the Conservatoire has turned out for ten years. The brawny fellow in shirt sleeves and a leather apron is a blacksmith—and a very distinguished counsel. The little man in the striped cotton night-cap and high pantaloons is his bellows-blower. Nothing near so perfect as this little fellow's make-up and nothing more hideous. He has stained his arms brown, and made himself as hairy as a badger or worse. He looks like some narrow-chested gorilla who has stolen some bather's clothes. By and by he will go up into the gallery and light electric matches, and look down on us through his thicket of locks, with eyes all afire with excitement, outglaring the glare. In private life he collects shells, coins, etc., and is generally found feeding the sparrows of mornings in the Tuileries. That first-rate house-painter, with cleanliness for his only fault, is the artist Clairin, who went up in the balloon with Sarah Bernhardt and is that lady's very good friend. The old, battered Invalidé is another painter, Jules Dupre. The zinc-smith is Rochard; his mate, Dick de Lonlay. One of the printers is Gervex the painter. The sewer man is Edouard Philippe, a bit of a dandy in real life. Place aux dames! Here come the washerwomen with René Luguet at their head, some of them carrying the short wooden bat with which they beat the linen. Angèle is, I suppose, a washerwoman bride. It is not a moment too soon to judge from her appearance. I must not say more. Her happy thought is the success of the evening: Oh! these French! By and by we shall have Blanche Pierson, Gabrielle Gauthier, Kalk, Léonide Leblanc, all trying to outdo one another as hours of the back slums. As yet it is a little too early for that; the theatres are closed, but their companies have hardly had time to effect the double change of costume and to drive here. Meanwhile we may continue our analysis of the crowd which, among the men, contains not a few well-known in the best French society. The tall white-haired man with the blouse thrown over his dress-suit is the Russian novelist, Tourgueniev. Prince Galitzin is hard by; Belot the novelist, Detaille the great military painter, swell the throng. The sentimental dandy in complete evening wear, without so much as the affectation of disguise, is François Coppee the poet. He is asked why he has not come in travesty. "So I have." "In what character?" "A tavern waiter." Many men have done the same thing, not taking the notice on the card au service. René de Pont Jest is in full court costume of the time of Louis XVI. There is a scream of derision when he comes in. But all eyes are soon turned to another figure—a burly bourgeois of middle height, with short scrubby beard, turn-up nose and large expanse of forehead crowned by spare locks, though he is still of middle age. It is Emile Zola, the founder of the school. And these 1,500 dancing zanies may be supposed to be his disciples—what a thought! He, too, is in plain evening wear. He hates this and almost all other amusements, and he soon slips away. Now the theatres pour in their large contingent. The greater the actor, as a rule, the meaner his travesty: Dupuis of the Varieties is a pork-butcher's boy. And here comes the guests of the evening. The Assommoir lot, not altogether, but in twos and threes. They wear the costumes of the piece. This middle-aged man with the intelligent face, who is trying to talk to half a dozen people at the same time—a fate even for a Frenchman—is Gil Naza, who plays "Coupéau," the leading part. Just one hour ago he was dying of delirium tremens at the Ambigu—a horrible death. (He walked the mad-house hospitals for three weeks during the rehearsals of the piece.) He had the fancy that black beetles were crawling all over him, and after a vain convulsive effort to keep them off his face with nervous twitching fingers emaciated into claws he bounded from the floor in terror and fell back a corpse. This pale woman with the delicate features and charming, refined expression is "Coupeau's" wife, "Gervaise," otherwise the famous actress, Helene Petit. At a still later period of the evening than her husband, "Gervaise" was pershing of cold and hunger, as I have already explained, before the Elysée Montmartre. Yet here she is at the Elysée Montmartre once more, and certainly in no risk of dying of hunger—for look at that pile of provisions on the sideboard; and as for dying of cold, a Hotentot would never have the coolness to do that in this atmosphere of a Turkish bath. A loving arm has lifted the poor frail form out of the gutter and is now encircling it in a very lively waltz. "Gervaise" wears the blue merino dress and cotton gloves in which she was married—at the Ambigu. Her rival, "Big Virginie," is just engaging herself for the quadrille—"Virginie" with whom she has that Homeric battle in the wash-house—the two drenching each other with buckets of real hot water on the stage, and tearing a real chemise a night off each other's backs, regardless of expense. Delessart wears the slop-made Sunday suit of working-class swifdom, which has helped to make him irresistible with the women as "Lautier," the villain of the play. "Mme. Boche," the concierge, is in her frightful frock of Scotch plaid. "Mme. Bottes" and "Bibi-la-Grillade," those animated sinks for the risings of all the wine-pots of their quarter, are there to the very life of the scene. It is two o'clock, and we are in the thick of it—dancing as only the French can dance, vilely as to the step, but with the energy of men possessed. It is not easy to imagine anything more grotesque. Grave men holding positions of honor in the professions and in society find the memory of their student days revived, and "fool it for one night only" as they fooled it five and seventy years ago at Bullier and la Reine Blanche. The women dance quite decently, all but a few who are the scourgings of the ballet and who soon show that they have little to assume to fit them for the parts of rag-pickers and blanchisseuses. The gathering is as select as possible, but there are some exceptions—persons whom it is quite superfluous to plate with vulgarity, as they are of that metal all through. By three the quieter people have had enough of it; by four the mere acting is all over, and it is a real rag-picker's ball. The refreshment counter has been twice cleared, and now they are frying potatoes in a huge pan to satisfy the still ravenous crowd. They sing and shout the accompaniment as the band plays popular airs. Every possible variety of travestied thief, loafer, laborer, and virtuous mechanic dances every possible variety of the can-can. The daylight peeps in reproachfully on the steaming, dusty crew, the little gorilla trying to stare it out of countenance by the light of his electric match. It is Pandemonium, with every devil doing what he d—pleases, and thus we celebrate the new literary work of nature according to the French rite.—RICHARD WHITEING in N. Y. World.

A commandant of cavalry, a good soldier but rather rough to his men, understood that there were many murmurings against him. The commandant is a man of quick action, so when next a grand manoeuvre was ordered, he addressed his soldiers as follows: "I hear that some of you have complaints against me; now, if any of you have anything serious to say, I would be glad to have you ride out from the ranks that it may be explained." At this the whole corps moved forward. The commandant looked a second, and then crying "Halt!" went on with the exercises without a word. A restaurant is full of sad suggestions and pathetic possibilities, and we are constantly reminded of the flight of time and the mutability of all things. A young man glowing with the fire of youth, and radiant with its alluring hopes, enters and sits down to a table; a waiter approaches, receives his order, and departs. Years roll by; the young man becomes careworn and middle-aged. He eats his soup and orders a roast. The pitiless years shower their snows upon his head; he grows querulous and feeble, and is carried away to his long home just as the waiter heaves in sight, and the proprietor steps up to ask if any one has taken his order.

It is asserted that one of the most shocking moments experienced by Byron in the course of his checkered and emotional career was that in which, when seated at a superb coign of vantage on the Alps, immersed in dreamy and unfathomable musings, he was recalled to earth by a something, which proved to be an empty bottle, labeled "London stout, Barclay, Perkins & Co., entire," rolling to his feet, while a female voice, unmistakably from the realms of Cockayne, said in deprecatory, yet not wholly displeased, accents: "Oh, now, 'Enry, don't."

Andrews' Bazar is responsible for this: "My darling," wrote a husband to his wife, "I shall not be home till very late this evening. Do not wait up for me. It's for thy dear sake I work by the light of the pale, effulgent moon, as if it were the bright, dazzling sunshine." She didn't wait; she went and got a detective and hunted him up.

GEYSERS SPRINGS.

Medicated Baths for the sick; Swimming Baths, Bowling Alleys, Shooting Gallery; pleasant Picnic Grounds for the well. In remodeling the Medicated NATURAL Steam Bath, due regard has been observed to give special privacy to ladies. This Bath removes TAN-FRECKLES, SALLOWNESS, BLOTCHES, and all IMPERFECTIONS from the skin, and is recommended by many physicians who have tested its value. A magnificent Swimming Bath has been constructed at a large outlay.

The house has been completely remodeled since last summer, and now is not surpassed by any in the State. The stage ride to this glorious mountain resort can not be surpassed in the world, while the very atmosphere, rarified and aromatic from the breath of fragrant pines, fir, and laurel, stimulates the senses like old wine.

For tickets and all information call at No. 2 New Montgomery Street, and 214 and 426 Montgomery Street. Rooms may be engaged by letter or telegraph. Special arrangements can be made by the week and for families. W. FORSYTH, Proprietor.

AN INTERCEPTED LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 29, 1879.

We have it at last, Pinafore, but what availeth it, as the catechism would say, to have Pinafore without the fever? We are neither humming its tunes nor quoting its jokes, although they are good tunes and good jokes. The independence of California judgment is all very well in its way, and perhaps it is right enough that we do not abide by the dramatic dictum either of Boston or New York, for upon my word they are both easily pleased, but it is high time we had something that somebody else has. We have had no grasshoppers, no pedestrian mania, no coaching clubs, but let us at least have the Pinafore fever. I think its partial non-success has been due to two causes: First, the vague manner in which it has been advertised, owing to the Pinafore Company having alternated with the Berger Family. One never knows till fairly seated whether the Bergers are going to blow their horns and ring their bells, or whether the Pinafore people are going to dally with sharps and flats in that utterly disinterested way they have. Of course, no sane person would deliberately go to hear the Bergers any more. There are more beautiful objects in life than a young woman half concealed by a silver cornet or a saxophone, and the music of those bells is simply appalling. They have, therefore, tacked Sol Smith Russell on to the bill to give it weight, and they have succeeded admirably. Mr. Russell has made several visits to San Francisco, and on each occasion has favored us with precisely the same songs, antics, and contortions. This time he gives a German song, in which he introduces a new expression in his legs—those long, solemn, thin, twin legs—an expression which is really funny; but then no one wants to spend an evening with the Bergers merely to see Sol Smith Russell's legs queerly twisted or pointed for five minutes or so. The other cause for the perfect equanimity with which people have undergone Pinafore is the simple atrocity of the performance. There is something very sad about a scratch company at best, but a scratch prima donna is surely the saddest thing in life. I do not remember ever to have suffered keener agony of a certain rasping, exasperating kind than while this prima donna was parting with a high note. People would drop in at the main door now and then while this feat was taking place, and I wondered what they wondered. But a strong calm seemed to be written in the faces of all concerned, players and audience, and nothing disturbed it. There was not the shadow of a smile, nor the ghost of an encore. This to Sullivan's easy tripping melodies; this to the Gilbertian wit! There is something really charming about Pinafore itself, a charm which has so captured that delightful old fellow the "Easy Chair" of Harper, that he has given it no less than two several rhapsodies in two several months, and advises everybody to go hear it again and again, for that the thirtieth hearing is more attractive than the third. This is warm praise, indeed, but as everybody has been doing no less during the last six months, it must be warranted. Do you remember Thomas Whiffin, a minor actor in vaudeville, who strutted his brief hour upon the boards of Bush Street Theatre with singularly bad luck? He had a soft English accent, and a humorous eye, together with a certain genius for making himself up well. He is the Pinafore admiral par excellence of all in New York, and there are many. I gather from reports that it is a most daintily drawn character, without the almost inevitable exaggeration, yet retaining the spirit of burlesque. Barrows, the young actor, who takes the part at the Bush Street Theatre, seems nervous and affrighted at the sound of his own voice, a circumstance not to be wondered at. He is ordinarily rather a clever actor, but, in this instance, the personation really means nothing in particular. He looks and acts very like Raymond, but he does not in any way make us understand the delight New York takes in "Sir Joseph Porter, K. C. B." As for the sisters and the cousins and the aunts, choruses have been so utilized latterly that the Bush Street people have been obliged to branch out and find a new set. This is by no means a disadvantage. One does not find so many studies from the antique as around the corner on Mission Street, but that is a pleasure which people give up, under such circumstances, very cheerfully. These girls and boys are so new to the business that they take quite a genuine interest in it. Harry Gates reappears as "Ralph Rackstraw," and has resurrected his one solitary opera gesture for the occasion. But he has a nice voice, and he shines like a new electric light by comparison with those around him. The boatswain, Carpenter I think is his name, has a fine uncultured voice and a most refreshing enthusiasm. I thought he would precipitate himself into the body of the house he came so perilously near to the edge of the stage in the fury of his new artistic ardor, but he had a good pair of sea legs on and stuck to Pinafore right manfully. Fortunately we are not to judge of Gilbert and Sullivan by the Bush Street performance. We are to have Pinafore and Pinafore again, and only the clairvoyants know where it will stop. Amy Sherwin, who made a successful (?) début after all in La Traviata the other night, is to sing "Josephine" shortly; and I see Emelie Melville's name on the bills as the "Josephine" at the Standard next week. I can not imagine the little sea-maiden of the English navée more prettily presented than by our own little fair-haired prima donna. Perhaps I shall yet find out the fascination of all this rollicking British nonsense. Meanwhile, we keep on going to the opera, where we now have the genus prima donna in groups like cherries on a tree, and to the theatre where Lawrence Barrett adheres to the legitimate with admirable perseverance and singularly bad judgment. Discreditable as it may be to own up to such a state of affairs, it is nevertheless true that people are more tired of Shakspeare than they are of Lawrence Barrett. At intervals it becomes necessary to lay the old man on the shelf, and one of those intervals has come. It is only as each generation discovers the beauties and the wealth of his text that he is periodically unearthed. Just now there seems to be no new generation on hand, and the old one knows Hamlet, Othello, Richelieu, by heart. The old French cardinal always falls in with the Shakspearian brotherhood and almost seems like one of them. When one knows the plays by heart, and Mr. Barrett with all his excellences, mannerisms, and idiosyncracies by heart as well, a performance does lose something of its attractiveness. What a pity we had not the Duke's Motto to begin with. There are hundreds of people to whom the "I am here" of Lawrence Barrett in his most sepulchral tone is the very height of histrionic power. They will cheer and applaud it to the echo when they will let "Othello's" farewell or "Hamlet's" advice to the players go by without a manifestation. If people like that sort of thing, why not give it to them by all means. And who will not confess to a liking for the ubiquitous little "Duke," especially when he is well set, as they promise he shall be next week. I suppose we shall not have any Rosendale during the present season. That is to be reserved for the great coming season, as it will probably be the pièce de résistance of Lester Wallack. What a really queer thing it would be if we should all abide by our first fancy after all, and choose Lawrence Barrett still for the only "Elliott Gray." What an effect he had upon the young men of the day in the height of his Rosendale time. How exceedingly Barrett they became. How measured were their accents, how straight their carriage, how brisk their walk. But they have all become so dreadfully blaté now that the energetic style has gone. If, as they say, players mark the times, they are drifting now rather to the Coghlan style, although Coghlan himself made a genuine fiasco in San Francisco. This, mainly, because he would try tragedy in which he was simply absurd. In elegant comedy, on the contrary, he is irreproachable. I wonder how we shall like his sister, Miss Rose Coghlan, who appears next Monday, together with Miss Nina Varian, in London Assurance. New Yorkers say she is rather a nice looking girl so far as her face is concerned, but with a short, bunched figure, and with an astonishing amount of genius in dressing dowdily. Per contra, they accredit with a delightful voice and that cultivated grace of manner, which, in an actress who is to be so constantly before us as a leading lady, is inexpressibly charming. I fancy she is the kind who will not be over well liked just at first, but will gradually win us. Perhaps that is the better way, if the process be not too slow and tedious. These visions which burst upon us in an electric manner do not always wear well. Erratic genius is to be admired, but, in these days, when the stage seems closer to every day life, because it pictures us more naturally than ever before, and because the theatre is more generally frequented than ever before, nothing will enchain us so long as the frequent temptation of a cultured lady. Will Miss Coghlan justify the encomiums that have crossed the continent? It will be such a new and refreshing sensation to have encomiums justified that in this hope I remain,

Yours, lovingly,

BETSY B.

The New York Herald says: "Mr. Lester Wallack writes from the West that he has met with gratifying success, notwithstanding the fact that he is a stranger in that locality. One of the St. Louis critics, writing of him, says, 'His style is almost as foreign to the West as would be that of an out and out foreigner, and it became necessary for the actor to create a school for his audience. Some acquaintance with his dramatic method and technique is required for a thorough understanding of his incisive and yet legitimate comedy.' A just remark, for Mr. Wallack has created a school of his own. Most artists are glad to get a lesson or two in it, and the public usually enjoy the progress of the pupils."

Chopin was once invited to a very swell London reception, was introduced and lionized, and shown marked attention by the hostess. After supper she asked him to play, but he excused himself on the plea that he had not come prepared. The lady was not a little annoyed, for she knew that her guests had counted upon hearing the great artist. Forgetting herself, she said, rather harshly: "Monsieur, I invite you to my house, I introduced you to my friends, I give you supper, and you refuse to play. How is this?" "Mais, Madame," answered the artist, meekly, "j'ai mangé si peu."

The murder of Porter and wounding of Barrymore in Texas might have reasonably been expected to prove a widespread advertisement of the Diplomacy theatrical company to which they belonged, insuring crowded houses wherever they went afterward. On the contrary, the party played to exceedingly small audiences on their way northward, and have finally broken up in Chicago, with salaries unpaid.

The amateur musical talent of the city is just frantic with curiosity regarding the Melville Pinafore crew début at the Standard. Everybody almost has "a sister, or a cousin, or an aunt," in the combination, and society blood is fairly boiling with expectation. If this attempt don't make the Pinafore business go, then all hope is lost.

Said Mr. Fitch, of the Bulletin, to Mr. MacCrellish, of the Alta: "I think that fat editor of yours is laboring under the delusion that he owns the paper." "He must, indeed, be under some such delusion," was the thoughtful reply, "if he is laboring."

When Miss Neilson was told by her London physician that she must rest from the stage for a season, she was told also that she could either do so or die.

John B. Gough may be an Englishman, but it was American whisky that gave him a start in life.

ARCHERY NOTES.

Rapid as was the progress of archery in the East when Maurice Thompson's articles first excited public interest in this charming sport, its popularity on this coast has been none the less remarkable. As an example Mr. Peters' large stock of Highfield bows and best arrows is now nearly exhausted. In fact, the "best arrows" as the archers call them, have all been sold; but the second grade of arrows, $2 cheaper by the dozen, can still be procured. The Highfield bow has proved itself an excellent article. It is durable, and loses but little of its strength after a season's work. Mr. Ward, of the Pacific Archery Club, has a Highfield which he purchased three years ago, and it seems to shoot quite as well now as the day it left the shop. Peters, on Montgomery street, has a good range in the cellar under his store, where those who want a half-hour's practice can hammer away to their heart's content. He has ordered a lot of the Horsman bows, and we will soon have an opportunity to compare them with the English wood.

Every archer is anxious to know something about the old weapons that did such execution at Cressy and Poitiers, and I have hunted up the following interesting facts about the bow in the days of its power on the battle-field, from an ancient book, a dozen copies of which do not in all probability exist on this continent. In the reign of Edward III. the government regulated the price of bows. A white bow was one shilling; a painted bow one shilling and sixpence; a sheaf (24 arrows) of sharp arrows one shilling and sixpence, and a sheaf of blunt arrows one shilling. Yew was the favorite wood for the manufacture of bows; but to prevent a too rapid consumption of yew, buyers were ordered to make four witch-hazel, ash, or elm bows to one of yew, and no person under seventeen years of age, except those possessed of portable property worth forty marks, or the sons of parents owning an estate of ten pounds sterling per annum, was allowed to shoot with a yew bow under penalty of a fine for each offense. Twenty-five cents for a good bow seems comfortably cheap, but the good old times are gone, and $25 nowadays does not seem extravagant for a really fine piece of wood. That $250 that Will Thompson carelessly mentions as the figure for a Spanish or Italian yew of extra workmanship is, however, rather alarming. In the reign of Henry IV., the highest price permitted for a yew bow was three shillings and four pence, and it was made a penal offense to use bad materials in the use of bows and arrows.

It will be a long time no doubt before American archery clubs begin to wear uniforms, but some distinctive color in a match adds a great deal to the picturesqueness of the gathering. The Royal Company of Archers, the oldest archery organization in Great Britain, turn out in grand style at their annual matches. The uniform has been much changed, but at present it consists of a dark green tunic with black braid facings, with narrow stripe of crimson velvet in the centre; shoulder wings and gauntleted cuffs similarly trimmed; dark green trousers with black and crimson stripe; a bow case worn as a sash of the same color as the coat, with a centre piece of two arrows crossed, surmounted by a crown; a black leather waist belt with richly chased gold clasp; a short sword, gilt hilted, made after the fashion of a Roman gladius; Balmoral bonnet, with thistle ornament and eagle's feather. The mess uniform consists of a dark green dress coat with velvet collar and gilt buttons, with a crown on them, white waistcoat, and black trousers. I should like to see the Bow Club, or Pacific Archery Club, rigged out in this costume, or the Merry Foresters in the mess uniform sitting down to clams, hard-boiled eggs, and bottled beer under the "trysting tree" at Adams' Point.

The prizes of the Royal Company are shot for at ranges of 180 yards, 200 yards, and 300 yards. It seems a difficult thing to make any sort of a respectable score at 200 yards, but I suppose practice will bring an archer up to the mark, and the enthusiastic toxophilite shoots late and early.

The Pacific Archery Club inaugurated a pleasant custom, last Saturday, of going off with bows, baskets, arrows, targets, prizes, and good company to some nice spot, and there measuring skill at the target. Mr. Welles carried off the prize for the forty-yard range, with a score of 154, with 30 arrows and 29 hits, and Miss Craig the ladies' prize at thirty yards, score 138. The second ladies' prize was won by Mrs. Hervey Darneal, score 112. The final arrangements for the tournament will be completed next week. It is probable that the shooting will be held on Friday and Saturday, June 13th and 14th, at the Oakland cricket ground. It will be open to all archers, and as all are beginners no man who can pull a bow should hesitate about swelling the throng. QUITTER.

We are glad to observe that Mr. Bradford, the artist, has accepted a commission to paint some views of Yosemite Valley. Mr. Bradford has lately painted nothing, we think, but the scenery of circumpolar regions, atoning for its poverty in forms by an opulence of colors that a dolphin dying on an opal slab from a surfeit of rainbows would be proud and happy to display. We do not question the accuracy of these representations of nature between two lucid intervals; it is useless to do so. Nobody can follow Mr. Bradford into the "thrilling regions of thick-ribbed ice" to see if the ribs are iridescent; he has it all his own hyperborean way, and pursues his advantage with the pitiless rigor of his most beloved winter. But in our famous valley he must more circumspectly paint. We all have been there and studied each of its three phases—drunk, sober, and indifferent; though how constitutions easily prostrated by a blast from Greenland's icy mountains can endure the fierce extortions of the lower latitude, only a surgeon of the Spanish Inquisition could rightly say. As for merely sentimental terrors, or portents and presages, we should prefer "the wolf's long howl from Oonalaska's shore" to the melody of the Valley 49er.

The bill before Congress, giving all religious denominations equal rights and privileges on Indian Reservations, ought to pass; the rum-seller, the cattle-stealer, and post-trader should each have the right to be scalped in the manner of the most favored denomination.

Dr. Carver, the champion shooter, goes about London in long hoots outside his pants, riding a Californian horse with a Mexican saddle, and astonishes the natives.

My Sacred Place.

Upon God's throne there is a seat for me.
My coming forth from Him hath left a space
Which none but I can fill. One sacred place
Is vacant till I come. Father! from Thee,
When descended here to run my race,
A void was left in Thy paternal heart,
Not to be filled while we are kept apart.
Yea, though a thousand worlds demand Thy care,
Though heaven's vast host Thy constant blessings own,
Thy quick love flies to meet my feeble prayer,
As if amid Thy worlds I lived alone
In endless space; but Thou and I were there,
And Thou embraced me with a love as wild
As the young mother bears toward her first-born child.

A BRIEF STORY ABOUT CHAMPAGNE.

Champagne, like everything which is nice, keeps improving, and each brand has its season in the world of fashion. The Russian soldiers in 1815, when marching on Paris, bivouacked in the vineyard of Mons. Cluquot, the husband of the afterward famous widow, and they liked the Champagne so well that it became the favorite brand among them for fifty years. New Yorkers, who are sixty years old, can recall the time when Schneider Champagne, Anchor brand, was all the rage; then came Heidsieck, then Moët, then Roederer, then Mumm, as the successive fashions—and, lastly, Pommery. One finds this brand, with its modest and scarcely discernable label, at all the swell banquets and receptions. It is dry, and has a nice bouquet. It is better than a Seidlitz Powder or a fresh Congress, and there is not a headache in ten bottles of it—New York World.

The "Binograph" is the name of the new pictures just introduced by the photographic firm of Dames & Hays, 715 Market Street. There is nothing supernatural about them, but by an ingenious device of the artist the same person is reproduced in the photograph. For instance, here you are in violent argument and dispute with your own political self; you sit comfortably in a chair and watch yourself sleeping on the lounge; you tickle the ear of your other self with a feather and laugh at your own frantic feelings. But take a look at the gallery display, and further explanation here will be unnecessary.

The following testimonial of a certain patent medicine speaks for itself: "Dear Sir—Two months ago my wife could scarcely speak. She has taken two bottles of your 'Life Renewer,' and now she can't speak at all. Please send me two more bottles. I wouldn't be without it."

CONSUMPTION CURED.—An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Nature's Revelations of Character, or Physiognomy Illustrated, is the title of a recent work giving a description of the mental, moral, and volitive dispositions of mankind as illustrated in the human form and countenance. Joseph Simms is the author, and his work is the fruit of nearly twenty years' diligent observations of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiological signs by which every faculty is disclosed. Published by D. M. Bennett, Liberal and Scientific Publishing House, 141 Eighth Street, New York.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE
Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
THE MASONIC SAVINGS AND LOAN BANK,
Plaintiff, vs. EDWARD MAGUIRE and ELIZA MA-
GUIRE, Defendants.
Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in
and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.
The People of the State of California send greeting to Edward Maguire and Eliza Maguire.
You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein (a copy of which accompanies this summons) within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; if served out of this county, but within this judicial district, within twenty days; or if served
out of said district, then within forty days—or judgment by default will taken against you.
The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court for the foreclosure of a certain mortgage described in the complaint and executed by the said Edward Maguire
and Eliza Maguire on the 4th day of June, A. D. 1877, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note made by said Edward Maguire at the same time for the sum of three thousand dollars gold, and interest, as provided in said note,
payable to plaintiff, or its order, and taxes, street assessments, and attorneys' fees at ten per cent. on the amount found due, and costs, all in gold coin; that the premises
conveyed by said mortgage may be sold, and the proceeds
applied to the payment of said promissory note, interest,
taxes, street assessments, and attorney's fees, and costs, all
in gold coin; and in case such proceeds are not sufficient to pay the same, then to obtain an execution against said Edward Maguire for the balance remaining due; and also that
the said defendants, and all persons claiming by, through,
or under them may be barred and foreclosed of all right,
title, claim, lien, equity of redemption, and interest to said
mortgaged premises, and for other and further relief.
And if you fail to appear and answer said complaint, as
above required, the plaintiff will take default against you and apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.
Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 13th
day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.
[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By J. H. PICKENS, Deputy Clerk.
L. E. PRATT, Attorney for Plaintiff, 230 Montgomery
Street.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
MALISSA KING, plaintiff, vs. MALISSA KING,
defendant.
Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth
Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.
The People of the State of California send greeting to
MALISSA KING, defendant.
You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days
(exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served
out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be
taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.
The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file hereto, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.
And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and
answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.
Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court
of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this twenty-fourth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

"THE LASS THAT LOVED A SAILOR."

A Typical Frisco Girl of a Startling Type.

BY CHARLES WARREN STOODARD.

"Well, hardly ever!" said the gallant Captain, with a vague gesture, as he slipped his cable and bowed himself into space. For half an hour I had basked in the reflected sunshine of gold lace tempered with navy blue. It was high noon, high tide, high time to be drifting down toward the Club, but I held him spell-bound by one button in high relief, and the substance of the interview was not unlike the following:

"I know her, my dear fellow," said I, with customary and pardonable fervor, "I have known her for ages. As a child she was pink and white, pretty and pert. In trundle-bed society she was posé to a degree she will never again approach until she is passé."

"And at school? At school she was one of those dormitory heroines who are always called Tom, Dick, or Harry, or possibly Jack, by the adolescent adorers of her class. She was the possible Jack who whistled like a magpie, who marched through wet marshes in fishing suits, who smoked in the seminary-tower, and could say 'dammit' without a shudder!"

"It was she alone who withstood the blast when a sectarian revival swept through the institution and mowed down the inmates by hundreds. There was weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth, and when the hysterical tribes united and implored Jack to surrender, that the clerical siege might be raised, the defiant girl was found locked in her chamber with licorice and a novel for rations and utter disgust seated upon her 'banged' brow."

"She strummed the inevitable piano-forte with superficial grace, sang with uninteresting correctness, could fill a chasm in any conversation with her narrow-gauge-French, and flirted—flirted like a hornet. Girls are liberal with their sting. But yet their sting is in no wise to be avoided; there is hardly more harm than honey in it."

"I have seen her blossom into society, coy, conscious, coquettish, and invite admiration with that negative magnetism which is, perhaps, twice as compelling as any other force. She has thrilled me on the street with a sudden recognition that was as paralyzing as it was unexpected, and I know that I dropped my cane audibly and doffed my hat with the wrong hand when I was fully three paces in the rear."

"At the opera I felt myself a happy convenience, a verbal directory for the élite in the boxes and the stalls. Her interest wasn't centred in me; but then, thank heaven! her interest was not centred—it radiated like the quills of the fretful porcupine. To be sure, she retained me between the acts with smiles and glances. Her glance was light, her smile a transfiguration; but, like the blind butterfly, it was impossible to capture her without probably fatal results."

"At the kettle-drum, 'queen rose of the rosebud garden of girls,' did ever queen receive homage with such chilling indifference? She had lived too long to be unconscious of her power, but not long enough to have learned its limit."

"She offended a coterie of admirers; and that night, standing by her mirror, clothed in white samite, loosening her Medusa-locks of writhing gold, this butterfly became a fury, and rocked between rage and repentance until the dawn betrayed her."

"After this, having loved and suffered as only a child can love and suffer, she was borne to Europe in the bosom of her highly respectable family."

"She developed an individuality, attributable to a change of climate and a constant change of scene. She adopted the manners and customs of the continental races, enlarging and improving on each. Her vocabulary is materially altered. It is no longer possible for her to express her emotions in the American dialect, but French, German, and Italian are as necessary to her as the black coffee and cigarettes of her adoption."

"Oh, that wisp of paper which she rolls at intervals, the small, flat, fumiferous cigarette, with a tropical twist at each end—charming enough in her lips, but a mere delusion in mine. It is her handiwork; she has wasted much good tobacco in the construction thereof, but she burns it with the operatic abandon of a parlor 'Carmen.'"

"Her name redounds in the tourist columns of Galvani and the American Register. She is scouring the North Sea coast, climbing Switzerland or the Dolomite country, or has gone to Spain for her health."

"When she at last settles in Rome, as every one does sooner or later; when she has outgrown an affected preference for Florence, though 'Ouida's' Winter City still thrills her with a joy which is half regret, she plunges into the social fury of the Roman season, and drives and dies daily, finding salvation at last in the first flush of the Italian spring."

"By this time she is surfeited with experiences, and finds life an easy bore. It is rumored that she is heiress to millions: a halo surrounds her. She is much sought in every circle, and with the tact of a woman—if indeed a woman have tact—she plays her sisters for all they are worth, and comes off at the close of the contest as unruined as a sucking dove."

"She knows everybody worth knowing, has interviewed crowned heads, has been complimented by princes and earls for clever horsemanship, or torchlight sketching in the frosty Bois de Boulogne."

"She rides well to hounds, and braves the treacherous fields of the Campagna, where, without moving, she and her cob might easily plunge headlong into a wild abyss, the stronghold of the defunct banditti."

"Remonstrate with her, and she takes the wall at a leap, calling back on the wind for you to follow; there is defiance in her eye, exultation in her laugh, and her bosom is shaken with the splendor of her triumph."

"Delicious contradiction! The right touch at the right moment would burst the flood-gates of Hysteria, and she is still the girl with the 'give-away' mouth."

"By this time she has danced demurely in the Carnival Masque at the Grand Opera; supped with an anonymous cavalier who sought in vain to discover her identity, and who, with a touch of mediæval chivalry, follows her carriage to the Palazzo, where she alighted in his very arms, and was fearfully happy because she barely escaped being wicked."

"Her stars begin to pale. Life palls upon her. She believes her fondest love is unrequited. She dreams of convents, and paces her apartments like a caged pantheress. It is a question whether she becomes reckless or religious. She is either at intervals, and equally charming in each rôle."

"I have seen her, with exhausted Europe at her feet, and Egypt and the East an affair of the last winter, cast herself upon a divan of tiger skins, and declare the two hemispheres a blank."

"She had been in spirit to the sources of the Nile; she had again dreamed her dream in moonlit Karnak, yearned for Osiris in the Sacred Isle, knelt at the Holy Sepulchre, and echoed the shrill scream of the sabre-dancers of Jericho."

"She was coiled like the Serpent-Queen on a couch of leopard skins; her plastic arms were laden with the barbaric jewels of the Orient; a mummy necklace from its Theban shore; at her girdle hung Nubian amulets of beaten silver; and these she toyed with as she babbled in Arabic. I know her armlets of Roman gold, her Neapolitan corals and carved tortoise shells; her Vesuvian lavas and Florentine mosaics, her silver flagreys of Genoa, and the numberless gew-gaws of Venetian glass."

"She cultivates elegant superstitions; she burns pastiles and incenses; her Bedouin Scripture bearing the name of Allah, her gods are the gods of Egypt. This she declares with the hope of dazzling me with brilliant heresy, and all the while she toys with an amber rosary, whose flashes of flame start through her white fingers and recall her to the slopes of Olivet, where a bearded Jew bartered this prize away—"the pearl of all his tribe."

"Meanwhile she is clad in garments that fit her like a seventeen-button glove. She poses from the antique with artistic care; every angle is a revelation. There is not too much caution in the disposal of her faultless limbs."

"We are old friends. She is a good fellow, with artistic instincts of the highest order. There is a physical luxury in a graceful pose which is not to be scorned in this tedious life."

"I know the lines of beauty; she knows that I love them and respect them like a man. She is too feminine not to do herself justice for my sake, when to do otherwise were to be false to truth. What woman is false under the circumstances?"

"I presume. Have I ever presumed? Possibly! For after a few sharp words, which were less biting than brilliant, if I withdrew and passed three days of respite in amusing and unrumored suspense, a brief line comes to me, a message that might have been discharged by order of a major-general, to wit: 'You are forgiven. Come up and dine as usual.'"

"If I ever get so treated, it is more than likely that I at least presumed."

"Of course, I dined as usual at my favorite Trattoria, and my emotion knew nought of her once faithful subject for days thereafter."

"But the winds change, and the season, and all things that survive us. There was a meeting, and a making up, such as is sweeter by far than the clam's eternal serenity; and beyond that hour there was no flaw; there were frequent reunions here and there, on the rail, on the diligences, in gondolas."

"There were partings again and again, followed by avalanches of letters, such as only women write—letters that read like pages from romantic histories, and that delight even the unbelievers, for who will not pardon a woman her cleverness, though he knows that she is for ever dramatizing to the last degree?"

"There was nothing left her now but to write her novel. She had pinned her hero—her heroine was, of course, herself. All that was bitter or sweet in life she drew from copiously. She had exhausted experience at twenty; she must now realize her part. 'So runs the world away.'"

"She writes with apt enthusiasm, a souvenir of her youth. Men and women are her playthings; she agonizes in violet ink; she murders while she smiles. There is but one drawback to her complete though momentary joy: it is the burden of manual labor. To write much is to weary much. She despairs a thousand times."

"At last she is in print, in the market, in the Review. Ah, joy! the pride of maiden authorship! Congratulations flow in upon her. Alas! she has achieved her triumph too easily, and within three moons she is sighing for new worlds to conquer."

The Captain swung uneasily at anchor, but I had not yet said my say. What I was heading for seemed to retreat as I approached it. With herculean persistency I resumed:

"This paragon, my dear fellow, returns to us at last a finished work of art. Again we meet at the opera, the kettle-drum, the soirée. With one accord we adore the past, and depreciate the bitter fate that entralls us upon the outskirts of civilization."

"She chats glibly on art; the galleries of Europe are at her tongue's end; she knows a Titian from a Tintoret, and the glimpse of a chromo throws her into a violent convulsion."

"She has reverted to the original faith by easy stages through graduated episcopacy. Her costumes are Worth's own, specially adapted to the society drama in which she figures largely."

"Even her English has an alien air, and she reads only French—a language in which she thinks with ease. There is nothing left to be desired but the one thing needful: she is interested in everything."

"She has brought back with her a touch of that Continental Bohemianism which is the key to secret gardens of delight."

"She agrees with me that the philosophy of life is to do unto yourself as others would have you do unto them! And this is not all: we mutually pity the man who has committed the stupid error of marrying his own wife!"

"Seeking, for her sake, some object of interest, in a luckless moment I introduce the Navy. Eccce! She hails the boys in blue with genuine enthusiasm; she is crazed with an intermittent nautical fever; she welcomes anything on sea legs, from an Admiral to the thrush-throated 'Ralph Rackstraw.'"

"Her ambition now is to sail her pleasure-yacht in undiscovered seas."

"Let charming landmen charm never so wisely, they may not hold her for a moment when the Navy heaves in sight. It is ever thus, my Captain; in one of your bright buttons there is metal more attractive than gleams from the coffers of the heir to the riches of Cræsus."

"Why is it? Is it because of all the sexes the feminine is the drollest? I do not say that the gender is inexcusable, though I must confess that it is altogether unaccountable—but let me not crib from my suppressed essay entitled 'What I know about girls.' Or is it your jaunty salt-sea air that heightens the pollenarius flush of her peach-blow cheek?"

"You quicken her imagination; you have summered in many a port, from the Spice Islands to the ice belt; you have fired your broadsides into the extensive camps of the élite, and have shaken the best society to its foundations; you have basked in the aquatic calm of the Venetian lagoon, revelled in the deep delights of Naples, luxuriated in the suburban charms of Villa France, that limbo lying betwixt the fashionable heaven of Nice, and the distracting hades of Monte Carlo; and as for Honolulu—there you were but little lower than the king."

"Is it the aroma of riotous living that attracts her? Is it your suspected virtue that trebles your market value? No answer?"

"Bastanza!"

I removed my clutch upon the Captain. I resumed with the next breath:

"This is no fable. She is not a myth; she is one of a startling type. You know her, my dear fellow; you have seen her a thousand times. Now, have you not?"

"Never!" cried my victim, with great violence. The concussion brought twenty pedestrians to a sudden halt."

"What! Never?" I shrieked, feeling that I had lived and labored in vain."

The Captain's eyes met mine. A deeper scarlet dyed his weather-beaten cheek. All hands breathlessly awaited a response. His face grew pale; he dipped his colors, as it were, and then in a voice trembling with emotion, he made answer—an answer that set us all afloat again, and the world wagged still, for the words he uttered may be found in the fore-top of this article triumphantly nailed to the mast!

When the waters of Niagara first flushed with delight in the smile of the Princess Louise, she said: "Don't speak; let me drink in the whole scene," and subsequently remarked, "I never have seen, and never shall see such a grand sight again. What I would have missed had I not seen it." If Princess Louise, when standing in view of the falls, had simply said "Don't speak," and kept silence herself, the effect would have been better. When Grant was gazing on the ruins of the Coliseum, he merely rolled his cigar over in his mouth, and remarked to his companion, in a tone full of feeling, "Let's take something to drink."

The true Bohemian never loses his head. When the landlady reduces the rations of the hungry Bohemian to a point that excites the side-glances of the snifty boarders; when the towels and part of the furniture vanish from his room and the key is demanded; when a crisis is rapidly coming on and taffy can no longer be given, then, behold, the young man maketh love to the landlady's daughter, takes her to the theatre, and greeteth her with smack oscorial. Humdiblah, what a smack! And after that he liveth on the fat of the land, and, sitting up with Julia, burneth the parlor gas till early dawn.

Never worry about trifles and soon all will

JACK REDE'S HEART.

A Sentimental Story of the South Seas.

In a well lighted, plainly furnished room in the old Marine Hospital in San Francisco sat the resident physician at his writing-desk, entering on his records the result of the examination of a man's heart, who had died with that important organ in a remarkably diseased condition.

On a couch in the centre of the room, and exposed to the full light, lay the figure of a middle-aged man. It was finely proportioned, although much emaciated, and the regular features and muscular development indicated he had possessed both beauty and strength in his youthful days. The pallid face, half concealed under a long beard, had upon it a stern expression of determination, which the firmly compressed lips still further increased. It would seem indeed this man must rather have died upon the field of battle than in peace upon his couch, if we were to judge from the expression of the features. His right arm stretched out from his side was tattooed in true sailor fashion with curious and mystical figures; among these was one drawn and worked with remarkable skill and patience. It was the head and bust of a young girl, and so well was it executed we might suppose it was the actual likeness of some one he had desired to keep in close and constant remembrance.

The doctor's writing was finished, and he sat musing on the case he had been describing. "I do not know," said he, while telling the story; "I do not know that I ever saw a human heart so entirely diseased and completely worn out as that of Jack Rede. It scarcely seems possible a person could live at all with an organ in such a condition. What could cause such a disorganization? What had been the life of the inanimate body that contained it?"

While engaged in such thoughts there came a tap on the door, and upon it being partly opened there was thrust in the weather-beaten face of an old sailor, who slowly entered when he perceived the doctor was alone. A rough, rugged man, yet his face had a general good humored expression, which inclined one in his favor at once. He was short and stout in figure, slightly bow-legged, and his rough hands as knotted at the joints as some of the ropes may have been he had pulled upon in the long course of years. He was known in the hospital by the name of Tom Marlin, and was also known to have been for many years the intimate friend of Jack Rede.

Tom was a strange character, and although uneducated, his keen powers of observation and good memory had stored up a great amount of curious information. He had spent his life among men of many nations, and had acquired some habits and notions from all, which made him what might be termed a conglomerate character of many men's peculiarities. One of the most strongly marked characteristics of the old sailor was his superstition and tendency to always explain the mysterious events of life by supernatural agencies.

"Would your honor have time to spare me a few words about that unfortunate corpse as lies there?" said Tom, pointing at the same time to the body with the end of his finger, with a solemn expression on his face.

"Certainly, and more particularly, as there was something curious about his disease—about his heart I mean—and I would like to ask you of his past life."

"I know'd your honor would like to hear of it. Mayhap your honor would allow me a whiff of the pipe in the meanwhile? There's no unpleasantness from Jack there, but you see, the room seems close like, and a whiff of a pipe might be agreeable. And then again, if Jack's speerit is cruising this way, he'll like it to a certainty. He always did in life, and why shouldn't he now?" Saying which, Tom gravely lit his pipe and seated himself squarely down beside the body, very much as if he were going to spin a yarn with it as he used to when in the life.

"Jack Rede was an old shipmate of yours, Tom?"

"Well, he was, your honor. Many years we sailed together through storms and calms, and many a jolly spree we had ashore; and then sometimes we used to cruise around the South Sea Islands, and settle down on one of 'em for a while, and sort of marry Injun fashion, and we'd stay there till it grow'd to be wearisome like, and then we'd slip our cables and put off, and take a voyage on the high seas. Jack, as he lies there," said Tom, giving a side look at the body, as though he thought he might be listening to all he said, "he could a kept better company than the likes of me, but he had no pride, and always said my natural gifts was considerable, if they'd been schooled. Your honor, he was the smartest sailor I ever saw step a plank—know a ship from truck to keelson—and had an uncommon heap of other learning. He had geography, astrology, and navigation at his fingers ends, knew the languages, and the fine arts, as music and botany, could talk Latin like a jurist, and dance like a Frenchman, more's the pity he lies there a cold corpse now." And Tom, wiping his eyes, sent forth a volume of smoke that covered him like a cloud. "But," continued he, "I know'd all along, and years ago, what he was coming to. What does your honor think he died of?" said he, turning suddenly to me.

"Hypertrophy and ossification of the heart."

"Hard names them, but saving your honor's pardon," said Tom, "it was something else killed Jack, and he know'd it. I heard him say it over and over, he know'd he'd die of it."

"Of what, Tom?"

"The curse, your honor. He was cursed by a woman that he deserted and treated wrong, more than fifteen years ago. I was with him and heard her, and there's her picture on his arm now," pointing to the dead man's arm.

"How was it, Tom?" said the doctor, as he was filling his pipe again. "Tell me the story. I never heard of a man's dying of a woman's curse before."

"Howsomever that may be," said Tom, "it's true as holy writ, and if your honor could find a bit of spirits to wet my whistle, I'd ransack my ideas and give the true history of it."

Tom sipped his grog and smacked his lips with a gusto that none but an old salt could appreciate, and then suddenly he seemed to recollect something, and getting up, went and took a piece of cotton cloth lying on a chair, and very carefully draped it around the body, after putting the outstretched arm to one side, leaving the face alone exposed; then, taking his pipe and lighting his pipe, he said with a satisfied air:

"Jack was uncommon decent about his body, and I'm sartin if his speerit is around, he'll feel better to have it kivered up, than otherwise."

"How long had you known him, Tom?"

"Ever since he run away from school for a cabin boy," replied he. "Jack Rede—which is his right name—was the son of an English parson as lived in a country town, it's name I can't overhaul just now. You see they took a deal of care with his education, to make a parson of him, too, but there wasn't a timber in him to build that kind of craft, and he turned out otherwise. We all has our gifts, and every human has his weakness; Jack's weakness was in his morals, he hadn't enough for ballast to keep him on an even keel, and what he had was uncommon loose. He had a strong idee, too, he must do just what pleased him, and have everything he wanted—if he could get it—and he was always jolly and social when he had his own way and nobody went contrarywise; if they did, then look out for squalls, for Jack was the devil all over. His religion was mixed and variable, and like weak ground tackle, as couldn't keep him off a lee-shore. When Jack was a boy he went a voyage, and was wrecked on the coast of Africa, and was taken by the Arabys."

"Don't you mean the Arabs?"

"It's all the same, only spelled different," said Tom, with a deprecatory look, at my interruption. "He was taken by the Arabys, made a slave, and kept three years till he grew to be Mahumedan and turned Turk. It was an awful setback on his morals, to say nothing of religion, and he never got over it; for he always said it was as good a religion as any, and he believed it just as much. According to which, if it is true, Jack may be flirting round in heaven with them Hoorays the Turk's believe in."

"Hoorays, Hoorays, Tom?"

"Sartain, sure," said Tom impatiently. "Hoorays, the Mahumedans call 'em. Turkish she-angels as wait and tend on good Turks in heaven, and it's comfortable doctrine for them as likes women. Jack could never be made to believe afterwards that women had any souls to speak of, unless they shared one with the man they was spliced to; and, your honor, the amount of wives that man had was terrible to think on. One time, I remember, he was king of a tribe of cannibal niggers 'on the west coast of Africa; he was married to their queen."

"But Tom, how about Jack's heart and the curse?—are you coming to it?"

"I'm overhauling it as quick as the course allows, your honor; and how can a man spin a true yarn, or build a ship, without laying the bottom timbers first. Ye see I must expatiate Jack's ways before you can understand his doings afterwards. Wasn't he a rum 'un, your honor?"

"A bad one, I should say, Tom. A man of violent, unrestrained passions, who let them run riot to his own detriment. I think I begin to understand now what might easily have caused his disease of the heart."

"Avast! avast there! if your honor pleases," said Tom, with an air of impatience at my supposition.

"We ain't come to that yet, nor the curse as eat his heart up. I'm just bearing up, beating to windward—as it might be—to reach that very pint, where Jack's heart was damaged, and we're close on it; let's weather that pint, and I can bear away with a flowing sheet."

Ye see, Jack and I, about fifteen years ago, was down in Tahiti, and he says to me, says he, "Tom, I'm tired of this cruising about, let us go somewhere and lay off in comfort a while, where there's nothing to do, and plenty of grog, grub, and gals, to make it sociable." Says I, "Where-a-way will it be?" Then he overhauled his memory, and slapping his hands together, suddenly sung out, "Let us go to Old King Sindbad's island, where we went five years ago; we're big men there, and even Sindbad himself is afraid of us." "Agreed," says I, "and we can get our outfit here, find a whaler as is going to cruise in them latitudes, and when near enough the island for a small boat to fetch it, we can quit the ship." Ye see, some years afore that time, Jack and I was making a trip in a small craft from island to island near the Kingsmill group, and was driv from our course a long way by a storm, but we was loaded down with stuff for a trading voyage, and didn't care where the wind come from. We had plenty of grog and grub, and some orange, lemon, and other plants in tubs, and some garden seeds, for an island, where them things was unknown, besides we had a lot of nicknacks very valuable in them parts. Well, as luck would have it, we made an island considerable out of the track of vessels, a perfect little garden of Eden; the people was handsome, and at peace, no ships or missionaries had been there to convert 'em or civilize 'em, consequently they was well off and happy, Jack said, and I opinionate he was half right. Those islanders thought we was good speerits sent down from the clouds, a sort of little gods like, to bring blessings to 'em, and when those trees grew and bore fruit, with the garden seeds likewise, the king of that island was a friend to us; he just offered Jack all his daughters and younger sisters for wives; tabooed our bodies and goods, so as if any one should dare raise their hands agin us, they would be killed out of hand, and most likely cooked and eaten next day by the nobility, who had that special right exclusive. What we ever left that island for is more'n I can tell, but sailors and some other folks never does know when they're well off. Well, your honor, we spent half our cash in Tahiti, buying our outfit to go back there. As we wanted to please Old Sindbad and his royal family, we bought a small barrel of rum, plenty of tobacco, and a little ship-bread, and some old tower muskets, besides a lot of nicknacks of all sorts, for we wanted to make a good many presents to the islanders. They were amazing fond of music, and of almost anything to make pleasant sounds, and they had the habit of using a sort of flute they invented out of reeds, and when the young men is courting the gals, they go piping round the bushes like sick quails; 'cordingly I took a large lot of jews-harps for 'em, as being the least noisy.

After we was ready, by good luck, a whaler come in, that was going to cruise in the seas where our island was, and the master agreed to take us as passengers to the Kingsmill group, but Jack never let out where we was really going, or where King Sindbad's island lay. I forgot to say that Sindbad was a name that Jack in his devilry give the king, and the natives took to it at once, but in course it wasn't his true name. We had fair winds all our passage out, and in a few weeks come in sight of a small island not a day's sail from ours. Well, at night, we, unbeknown to any but the middle watch, slipped quietly off in our boat, which they helped us to do for some bottles of rum we giv 'em.

Jack had his instruments, and know'd how to navigate anywhere; so on we sailed with a fair wind, and by the morning—twenty-four hours after—was in close by the island. It was pretty early, and about the time the natives went out in the surf to swim, so I ran up to the masthead a little white flag with a blue star on it, and it was just like one I had made for the king's war canoe. When they saw it, they scattered ashore to tell the news, for they know'd who we was. Such a tooting of shells and running about as there was on that island; you would have thought they was crazy. Soon we could see the king's Panama hat and red feather (which Jack had give him years afore) waving about among the trees, and coming down to the shore with all his chiefs and hundreds of natives.

Them people are just like big children in their doings, and give themselves up to their feelings in a manner as seems to us ridiculous. They tied a long rope to our boat and towed us ashore to the king in quick time, and that jolly old cuss caught Jack and I, and rubbed noses with us till, what with his rubbing and that of the chiefs, our noses was red as cherries for a week's time. They took us with our goods up to their big council-house, and the people made a great circle round us with their king, priests, and chiefs. They was as glad to have us back again as if we'd made 'em and their island, too; and when we got out some trinkets for them all—some bright colored calico for the women, and a bottle of French brandy, which the king's eyes snapped at when he tasted it—they was ripe and ready for such a jollification as church-going folks would roll their eyes up at.

They are the best built and comeliest people I ever seen in the South Seas, and the women, when they ain't tattooed, the handsomest. They all bathe three or more times a day, and, as for their clothes, they're always clean, for they don't wear enough to make much note of. As for their color, it varies from that of a new saddle to an old one, according as they expose themselves in the sun. Their eyes and hair is black, of course, as it always is in them islands where ships don't frequent.

Old King Sindbad was about the most easy-natured and jolly old pagan I ever run across; but he had his weaknesses like all of us. He never could quit rum when he had it to drink, and when he was drunk he wanted to kill somebody, and when he killed any one—as in course he did sometimes—he was bound to take 'em off into the bush, have a feast, and eat 'em; and otherwise he was the peaceablest man in the world. He was so come over with joy at our return, he just made Jack a sort of Prince of Wales, to take the throne after him, and me a kind of prime minister. Then he ordered a house built for us, the best they knew how to make, and give us as many slaves as we wanted. Their houses are built of a kind of fine basket work, with a strong sort of leaves woven in the roof to keep the sun out, and they're better than ours are for their country.

The king has it mostly his own way in everything; next come the chiefs and their families, as a nobility, and then the common people; but the lowest down are the slaves, who are natives from other places, that have been taken prisoners in war. Howsomever, they'd had no wars to speak of for many years, and their slaves was about as well off as the common people. There was no earthly thing they really wanted to make 'em happy as couldn't be found on the island, saving, perhaps, rum and tobacco; and I opinionate they was too weak minded to have them comforts without injuring themselves.

When the natives all stood round us in the council-house, after we come ashore, there was a young woman stood apart from the crowd with a slave waving a big feather fan over her. The king made signs for her to come inside the circle to us, but she was shy, or modest like, and wouldn't do it; this made Jack and I notice her. She was about the handsomest female human I ever set eyes on, and that's saying something, when a man has been over the world and in many great cities. Jack was taken all aback when he saw such a beauty in such an out of the way place. She was taller than the women of the island, for they was rather short, but she was perfect every way in her shape. Her color was something like we see inside of those big sea-shells, pinkish and white, and her features clean cut and regular, with great brown eyes like some kind of deer—gazel, I think Jack called 'em; her hair was brown black, and thicker and finer than I ever saw on a woman afore, and she had it braided round her head like a turban, with a single white flower stuck in front. Her dress was made of some kind of white bark that was cut in fine threads and worked over till it was most as soft as silk. It was woven into a sort of long fringe, tied about her little waist with a narrow belt covered with small black and white shells, and it hung down below her knees; round her neck was another of the same kind of fringes that fell down over her bosom and shoulders. They fitted close to her, like feathers on a bird, wavy and smooth. Her arms was bare, with bracelets of black and white beads round each, and her little feet was part covered in sandals wove out of bark. There she stood in all her nat'ral beauty, and no fol de rols or gimcracks stuck round her to spile natur's crownin' glory, a perfect woman.

They told us that she was old Sindbad's daughter, and that her name was Loota. It might have been that she was daughter of one of his wives, for one was 'most white; but she looked no more like the old pagan than I did, and I always opinionated there'd been furriers round that island afore we ever see it. Jack tried very hard to find some presents to take her fancy, but she received 'em proud and distant, like a queen, and handed 'em over to her waiting maid. Everybody seemed to love and obey her, and she seemed a different creature from the natives.

Time passed smooth and easy with Jack and me on the island, and well it might, for we had everything our own way, except with Jack, who somehow couldn't make much headway with Loota. She was always shy with him, and if he attempted any fooling, as he might with the other gals, she pouted her lips, tapped her little foot on the ground, and, walking off, he would see no more of her that day. He didn't take it very easy, but swore to me the little witch took him more aback than any woman he had met, and that he thought more of her than any one he had ever seen afore. The fact was, I didn't believe Jack would settle down happy with any woman for a length of time, if he could find an gel with the garden of Eden for her homestead. He was restless and variable by nature, and his temper too stormy for a loving gal; but if he went after a thing and wanted it bad, he didn't care what it cost or how he got it.

Loota passed her time mostly flitting around the pleasant parts of the island like a happy bird, or singing, laughing, and making pretty ornaments for women's use out of flowers, shells, and such things. Jack, in general, was round about near to her, but sometimes she scolded him off in such a pretty way. It was a pleasant thing to be scolded by her. Wherever she was, everything seemed brighter and more happy—ever the birds sang louder. In course, I wasn't in love with her, for she looked higher than any poor ugly looking sailor like me, but I loved the ground she trod on. Them was the pleasantest days I ever had, cruising round that island with Loota and her friends, and it seems pleasant to think of them now, for I did nothing there I have ever been sorry for since. About every day we used to go down to the shore, and lying under the shady trees among the sweet flowers, watch the smooth waters rolling in on the white sand beach in little ripples, the wind just stirring the leaves; and down in the clear waters we could see the fishes darting about among the coral like flashes, and overhead the sea-birds sweeping round, while the little birds in the trees were chattering like crazy things. If that wasn't poetry, your honor, I'd like to know what is.

As the weeks passed by, and Loota kept up her offishness to Jack all the same, he began to grow cross and restless as a bear; and sartin sure it was a curious thing, for he was one of the best looking fellows in those days you ever saw, and he had the ways of a gentleman when he saw fit. He used to wear a white linen suit, with a blue and white turban on his head to protect it from the sun, and a red silk sash round his waist, and the awful liar told Loota that that was the dress of the great chiefs in his country.

Well, after a while Jack found out that the old women bad warned her, and told her the white men always came to the islands and took wives for a while, and then went off across the seas and never came back again, and that there was no truth in them or their words. This made Jack awful mad, and all he could say or promise didn't seem to alter her opinion for some time; but I noticed when she met him sudden and unexpected like she used to turn red as a rose. Women has such uncommon contrary ways, I never could understand if she was taken with him then, or otherwise.

Like all humans, Loota had her weakness, of course, and that was a love of music; even a jewsharp well played would make her eyes flash in a minute; and as for singing, her voice was sweeter than any bird's, and if she heard a tune once she could sing it right away.

Jack, one day, in hunting for something in the bottom of his big sea chest he had packed up in Tahiti, found a kind of Spanish mandolin he had forgotten all about, and he could play it like a master, and sing the prettiest songs and dances (as the Spaniards and Italians do) I ever heard. When he tuned it up that evening and went out under the cocoanut trees, and commenced a Spanish song and dance, it was just amazing the effect it had on them natives, for it seemed to make 'em wild with pleasure. After a time Loota, who had caught the strange, sweet sounds at a distance, came toward them, as a bird might be lured by the sounds of a flute.

She had her long black hair that evening flowing loose around her like a cloak, and it reached down to her ankles; on her head she wore a beautiful wreath of white flowers. Without a word she came straight up to where Jack was playing and singing, and, seating herself at his feet, sat looking up in his face and listening to the strange, sweet sounds that seemed floating through the air and coming back in echoes round the shores. What they said to each other that night I don't know, but afterward she seemed different toward him, and couldn't keep away from him long. 'Twas something like when a good thaw comes in spring and takes away all the ice and signs of winter—at least it seemed that way with Loota and Jack; but he, with his pride and self-conceit, took it all as a matter of course, and sometimes I thought he meant to punish her for keeping him off so long a time.

It wasn't many days before the feasts and junketing for Loota's wedding was getting ready by the natives. Jack and Sindbad were busy as the devil in a gale of wind making a kind of grog from the juice of cocoanut trees, so that the king and all the high chiefs could go off by themselves and have a jolly time. Then there was lots of secret sort of meetings between the priests and Loota, and sometimes Jack was with 'em. When I asked him about it and what it meant, he would curse, laugh, and say it was witchcraft, and cussed paganism, but he wasn't afraid of man, beast, or the devil, to say nothing of woman.

Ye see, your honor, them natives is amazing superstitious. I can't rightly explain their religion, but they believe in all kind of spirits, and think there's a good or bad one in every living thing, even in flowers and trees. Then every high chief has a priest for his family, who they keep busy most of the time praying to bad spirits and driving 'em off by burning herbs, gums, and sich like. The good spirits they don't pray to much, for they say they won't harm 'em anyhow, and it's time thrown away. Howsomever, there's one most curious thing they believe in, and that is praying folks to death as their enemies, or ones that have harmed them. They do it by making a clay image of the heart, brain, stomach, or some of the vitals; then they build an altar in some out-of-the-way place of white stones, and, putting this image on top, fire away prayers and smoke at it for weeks and months, till the person takes sick and dies, and if they won't die, why they goes over it again.

Well [continued he], there's sartin sure something in it, for I have seen it; and what I sees I sees, and what I hears I hears, and if I knows a thing I believes it. What would your honor have a poor, uneducated man believe anyhow, among such a heap of different religions all over the face of the earth, and each one somebody swears is true? What sort of work would there be if there was as many kind of books and teachings in navigation, and each different? How would we find our course over the great seas? The fact is, I opioniate there's a little good in all of 'em, and when I finds it I lays it by for use.

Well, in course of time I found out what they did to Jack, and what he had to do before Loota would consent to marry him. The priests took him and Loota to a hidden kind of place away in the woods, and, placing both inside a circle of black and white stones, set fire to some strong gums in shells around them, and made Jack take a solemn oath he never would quit the island, or, if he did, he would take Loota with him; and, if he broke his oath, his heart should belong to Loota forever, and she could do what she pleased with it, and kill it any way she had a mind to. Then they went to work and made, out of red earth and gum, an image of a human heart (meant for Jack's), and put in it drops of blood from Jack's arm and from Loota's arm. Then, in that place in the woods, they built up an altar of white coral stones, and in two shells, put together on the top, they put the heart. Of course Jack swore to anything they asked him, rather than lose Loota, and cared just as much about it as he did for the whistling of the wind. "Swearing didn't cost anything," he said, "and he was ready to swear till blue blazes came, if it would please 'em."

It was a jolly wedding they had, and old King Sindbad nearly drank himself to death, which I believe was just what Jack wanted, so he could come into the throne. Well, Jack behaved as near like an angel as he know'd how for some months, but it got to be an old story with him—having one of the sweetest creature's in the world for a wife, and ruling the natives almost as a king—and then his evil natur began to show itself. I don't know as if he exactly ever struck Loota (when he was sober), but he grew to be cross with her and didn't seem to care to please her. He had learned her to speak English, which she did in the prettiest broken way ever was heard, but he took advantage of her understanding it to curse her in it sometimes.

He and old Sindbad soon began drinking hard together, and would go off into the woods, and sometimes stay for weeks, on a spree; then, when he come back, he was so ugly nobody dared go near him, and even Loota shut herself up with her women. Well, things went on in this fashion for months, from bad to worse. Loota never complained or said a cross word to him, but I could see she grew pale, and sometimes I caught her with the tears in her great, mournful looking eyes.

One day, after Jack had returned from one of his sprees in the woods, we was sitting down by the beach, smoking together. Loota had been shut up with her women some days and I hadn't seen her. Jack was cross as usual and cursing things in general; just then we heard a rustling behind us, and, turning round, there stood Loota, looking pale as a ghost and dressed in a loose robe of white. She didn't say a word, but took a little bundle, rolled up in a sort of white mantle made of birds' feathers, from her bosom, and opening it, laid it on Jack's lap; there it was—the prettiest and loveliest little baby ever was seen. I thought it wasn't in human natur not to be shaken up by such a sight, specially its father, but Jack only looked at it curious like, as if it had been some strange creature and not his own flesh and blood, and then got up and quietly put it in Loota's arms. She never said a word, but turned round and walked away with her head down and her hands pressing her child against her bosom.

There are some kind of men in this 'ere world that never can be happy unless they can busy themselves in deviltry or mischief; they want to be fighting against something or somebody all the time; living quiet and respectable in their families is just a sort of slow hell for such, and Jack Rede was one of the kind. If he could have gone off to the coast of Africa, fighting and stealing niggers, and then shipping 'em across to Brazil for slaves, or taken his part in some good hard fighting going on somewhere, he would have become as amiable as anybody, and as contented as a tiger with a full stomach; but his nature wouldn't take to goodness or peaceableness for a continuance, and I knew from his silence and glum looks something was in the wind, and that he meant to quit the island the first chance.

The natives was such a childish, kindly sort of people, I never thought they would take notice of Jack's bad treatment of Loota, but I made a mistake in them, and found out they had a quiet way of righting themselves in pagan fashion that wasn't comfortable to think of. It happened one day I was walking in the woods, near the place where the priests carried Loota and Jack for their pagan ceremonies, and built an altar, and put the clay image of Jack's heart atop of it in the shell; when I heard a strange kind of music like a dead march, and a tapping, hollow sound, like a drum. Well, your honor, I crept up carefully through the bushes, till I saw the most curious sight I ever heard of.

You see, the natives were very jealous, and careful no white man should ever see their pagan ceremonies, and wouldn't often even talk about them, so I kept still out of sight and watched.

There was about a dozen of the priests around the altar, making the strange, solemn music, and one beating the drum; and seated on the ground near by was old Sindbad himself, with a bottle of rum between his legs, and he smoking his pipe, looking as solemn as an old owl. They was all painted as black as soot and cocoanut oil could make 'em; and they each one had a crown of red feathers around his head, and a bright red spot painted over the heart. I suspicioned at once they was cussing or praying Jack's heart to death. After a few minutes more singing, each cut a piece from the heart of some creature they had killed, and threw it in a fire that was burning in the centre of the circle, and then each went marching off, one behind the other, without saying a word. I waited a little while in order to be sure they wasn't coming back, then I went up and looked in the shell on top the altar to see the clay heart; and sure as I am telling of it, they had run a long fishbone through it that Jack's heart might be affected likewise, and that by slow degrees, and constant cursing and praying, it might be killed.

Now, perhaps, your honor will only laugh at such things I am telling I saw; but, nevertheless, curses ain't pleasant things to have sent after one, and where there's so many sent in that fashion, there must be some good reason for it. They ain't comfortable things to have flying round a fellow's head, or to sleep under, I opioniate. According to my ideas, all religions has some truth in 'em, and why ain't the honest prayers and cusses of those poor heathens just as strong in the Lord's eyes as the Pope of Rome's?

Not long after these things happened, Jack and I was standing down by the shore one morning, when he turned to me suddenly and said in a short crusty way, "Well, Tom, are you about ready to slip your cable, and quit this cursed island?"

"Well, Jack, I don't exactly know," says I. "It's a pleasant sort of place for a contented man." But I did know I'd long been expecting he'd say something of the kind, I knew him so well.

"Tom," says he, "you can go or stay; but I hope I may be cussed, if I stay an hour here longer than I can help it. It is killing me by inches, and if I stay here two months longer, I shall drink myself to death in company with Old Sindbad."

"And Loota, Jack?" said I, but I couldn't get out a word more, my throat felt dry and choky like.

"Loota is a woman, and like the wind changeable. A week's time will dry her eyes," said he, in a savage sort of way, as though he didn't want to talk about it.

Then he went on and told me he kept his canoe hid away, some distance out of sight of the village, always ready; and the first vessel he saw off the island, with the wind so we could fetch up with her, he would come for me, and we would slip away. Although my heart was sore for Loota, I knew there was no use saying a word to a man with a heart like Jack Rede's. Then, again, I knew if he went away and deserted Loota, it wouldn't be safe for any white man among the natives, aggravated as they would be, by his leaving her, for they thought more of her tears than of the lives of many white men, 'cordingly I knew I must go.

Not many days after, just at the first peep of dawn, Jack shook me by the shoulder, and said in my ear, there was a vessel in the offing we could come up with, and we must start. Well, like Indians stealing on their enemies, we stole away from the place, where they had been so kind and loving to us.

We had got almost clear from the island, and had only one headland to pass, that loomed up perhaps twenty feet above the sea, and was covered with cocoanut trees. I began to breathe easy and think we should get off without a soul knowing of it, when looking up at the bank above us, there stood Loota, pale and upright, and her eyes were flaming. At first I thought she meant to kill Jack or herself, but she didn't. She looked like some queen who was passing judgment on her slave when she turned to Jack and said:

"Man with the lying heart, you creep away like a thief that goes in the night. You swore before the priests your heart should be theirs, if you did as you are doing now; but Loota gives it back to you; it is too bad, and she gives it back with a curse, not her curse, but the curse of her people in their prayers. It must die with you, little by little till the lies and the heart are all dead."

Hearing a smothered sort of groan I looked round at Jack, who was white in the face, and had his hand clutched over his heart. In a minute he came to, and, swearing an oath, said that a sharp pain had taken him in his heart, like the stab of a knife; that it was owing to his hard drinking, and would go off.

When I turned to look at Loota she was gone, and we never caught sight of a native again. We soon came up with the vessel, for she lay becalmed, but quick as the sun came up, the wind came up too, and we were soon out of sight of the island.

From that time till he died, Jack Rede had spells on him of pain his heart; many a night have I set up with him when the big drops of sweat would stand on his forehead, and he crying out, in the numbness of his senses, the names of women; or, when the pain was at the worst, always for Loota to take her hand from his heart. The night he died the last word on his lips was Loota.

Now, your honor, as a medical man, can call it hypertrophy, or ossification that killed him, or what you like, but nothing on this earth can satisfy Tom Marlin it wasn't that curse put upon him for his bad treatment of Loota, and, likewise, he deserv'd it.

"Still out of luck?" queries a friend, on seeing him walking the boulevards on his uppers.

"Out of luck?—why, sir, if I were to turn shoemaker everybody would instantaneously be born without legs—that's the sort of luck I have."

"Well, how is poor So-and-so?" said some one to So-and-so's friend, a broker.

"So-and-so? Why, he's dead; died last night."

"Last night? At what hour?"

"10½."

"Ma, lend me a pencil; I want to draw some ladies."

"Draw some ladies! Why, Johnny, this is Sunday."

"Well, I'll draw them in their Sunday clothes."

Proposition declined with spans.

"Then, doctor, the symptoms of my malady are grave?"

"Without a doubt."

"Are they alarming for you?"

"No; but they are for you."

LXXXII.—Sunday, June 8.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Soup Purée à la Conde.
Fried Clams.
Beefsteak à la Bordelaise (See Vol. LV, No. 5).
Spinach. Stewed Tomatoes.
Roast Ducks, Current Jelly. Baked Potatoes.
Cress Salad.
Cherry Pudding, Cream Sauce.
Fruit-bowl of Apricots, Cherries, Oranges, and Peaches.

PURÉE À LA CONDE.—Wash pint and a half of red beans; put them in a stew-pot with one-third of a pound of raw ham, a bunch of garnished parsley, two small leeks, and a half head of celery. Use no salt. Pour on one quart of water and one quart of stock, or broth; set on the fire, heat slowly, and after boiling, skim well; then add a very little salt, pepper, and ounce of butter. Clear and simmer slowly for about three hours. When done remove the ham and vegetables, pass through a sieve, using a wooden spoon; put the purée back in the stew-pot, dilute with stock if not thin enough, boil and skim again; finish with one large spoon of butter and a small teaspoonful of sugar. Serve in a tureen with small square croutons fried in butter.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

On the new and most excellent steamer, The State of California, we made a trip to Oregon. Let us first dispose of this splendid vessel by saying that she is one of the best and fastest ocean steamers that we have ever seen. Commodious, elegant, staunch, steady, well commanded by Captain Debney; well engineered by James A. Jones; well officered, well provisioned, well appointed, and well administered by its owners, the Pacific Coast Navigation Company. The following statement of the engineer will interest steamboat men who will look to the accomplishment of a first voyage as an indication of a ship's powers, and will give authentic information to travelers of the time required to go to and from our sister State of Oregon.

J. A. JONES, Chief Engineer.

On our down trip from Portland to Astoria the ship made twenty-four miles an hour, which is the fastest sailing we ever experienced. Of our trip we can only say it was ten days of uninterrupted enjoyment. Oregon was to us a revelation. We knew that California was bounded on the north by Oregon; we knew that Portland was situated on the Wallamet; that the Wallamet emptied into the Columbia; that the Columbia emptied into the sea, dividing Washington Territory from the State of Oregon. We had heard that the country was rich in forests of timber; that it was of agricultural value; that fish abounded in its streams. We had a school-boy's idea of its geography of coast range, rivers, Cascade Mountains, broad prairies and rich valleys; but we had no realizing sense of its splendid domain, and the inexhaustible fertility of soil, its expansive primal forests; its River Wallamet, more beautiful than the Sacramento, draining a valley more productive than the Sacramento and San Joaquin combined. We had no idea, till we saw it, that the Columbia was the grandest and most picturesque of all the great rivers of the world; that it had scenery upon its banks in comparison with which the Hudson and the Rhine sink into utter insignificance, and that it and its tributaries penetrate a land which for food producing capacity has no equal on all God's five broad continents. Oregon is a wonderful State, and tried by what seems to us to be the true test of a land's real wealth and ultimate greatness—viz., its power to produce food—it has no superior in the world.

As we neared the mouth of the Columbia we saw a great fleet of boats, and nearer we saw their nets dragging the river for salmon. We will not particularize their description nor go into a detail of Oregon's most interesting industry—viz., the canning of salmon—stopping only to submit the figures of last year's production to indicate how important this trade has become. Upon the Columbia, and mostly at Astoria, are thirty-two great canneries, employing upon an average of over one hundred persons each (four thousand in all), of which three thousand are Chinese. In 1878, the Columbia river alone produced 475,000 cases of salmon each, containing forty-eight one-pound cans to a case. This salmon catch has continued for fifteen years, with no apparent diminution of the run. The law now confines the catch to certain summer months, from April to August, and gives to the salmon a Sunday free from the fisherman's toils. Continuing these statistics we observe that an equal number of canneries are established elsewhere upon our coast. The Sacramento, Eel, Bear, Rogue, Umpqua, and Tillamook rivers, Gray's Harbor, Frazer River, and the great northern river, the Ukon, all abound in salmon, the catch of which is only limited by the labor and capital expended upon it. One hundred millions of pounds of salmon may be annually contributed from our coast to the world's hungry mouths; and while we are upon the fish question, we may observe that far away into the interior, where the Columbia and its tributaries extend, the great three-hundred pound sturgeon noses his way, and that in all the smaller streams and brooks are found plentiful trout.

Astoria is the Venice of the north built into the waters of the Columbia, standing upon piles—wooden houses on wooden sticks—so constructed, for no other reason that we could observe, than that it is cheaper to drive piles and build upon them than to grade a somewhat uncomfortable and hilly background. Astoria is a city of patient hopes and great expectations; located on the banks of this great river it expects to await the good time coming when it shall realize its geographical advantages and reap the harvest of an expanding commerce. For half a hundred years its owners have looked out upon the great waters of the Columbia and wondered for half that time why the ships went sailing by to that inferior and interior town of Portland. Still they do, and Astoria sits and smiles, confident of its ultimate greatness, when it will be crowned queen of the Columbia, and all its tributaries shall bring gifts and pour them into its willing lap. We would not dampen the ardor of its friends by suggesting that it is just possible that an interior railroad system may concentrate the trade of Western Oregon at Portland on the Wallamet, and that the great trade of Eastern Oregon and Idaho may seek the shores of Puget Sound and pass out to the great ocean over that broad highway of commerce, the Straits of Fuca.

Portland is one hundred and fifteen miles from the sea, situated upon the beautiful Wallamet, some six miles above where it empties into the Columbia; a city of twenty thousand inhabitants—good inhabitants, that go to church, don't gamble in stocks, are a little slow and puffy, but always sure and content with a steady, healthful, honest progress. There are more commercial buildings now in process of erection at Portland than San Francisco. We visited Albany, sixty-one miles up the valley of the Wallamet, by rail—a rich and productive valley of farms and orchards, forests, and partial clearings and natural prairies; a valley from thirty to sixty miles in width, containing 5,000,000 of acres covered with groves, grasses, wood, and copse, and every acre of it is fertile and productive. The Wallamet is navigable an hundred miles or more, except at Oregon City, where locks are provided around a waterfall—a fall which gives power to make a great manufacturing city.

An old farmer whose acquaintance we made, and who was born, as he informed us, in "old Kaintuck," raised in "Illinoi," and came to "Californy" in 1849, and to Oregon in 1852, assured us that he had raised seven hundred pounds of potatoes to the acre, had a neighbor with a beaver meadow upon which he "grew" six hundred bushels of onions, and that upon one field which he had successively cultivated to wheat for twenty-two years without fertilization he had raised last year thirty-six bushels of wheat to the acre; that Oregon "was sure of a crop;" that every bulb, plant, seed, and shrub put into the earth was sure to grow; that the rains were not so uncomfortable as the snows of "Illinoi;" that the summers always afforded abundant opportunity to mature the "crops;" that any man who had health, and was willing to work, could make himself independent anywhere in Oregon; that the best lands, with good improvements, houses, barns, fences, and orchards, and near the town, were worth $50 an acre; that good farms could be bought at from $20 to $40; that desirable lands, unimproved, could be purchased for $10 an acre; that the Chinese would cut, burn, grub, and clean wild land at from $7 50 to $10 per acre; that wood on the navigable streams was worth $2 50 a cord; that all kinds of living was cheap; that anybody who was too lazy to fish could buy salmon for two cents a pound; that all fruits of the temperate zone grow luxuriously, and could be had for the picking, and that it was an "infernal Californy lie" that the people were webfooted, and if they were it was better than to be hoof-bound and quarter cracked, as they were down the coast.

Back from Portland, and at early hour in the morning, we took the Oregon Steam Navigation Company's beautiful steamer, The Wide West, for the Cascades, down the Wallamet, up the Columbia, past Vancouver (an old Hudson Bay trading post, now a government military post), up the broad Columbia with its full banks and its grandly picturesque scenery, great basaltic columns cleanly carved from the Cascade hills; basalt above basalt, and above the basalt great towering, forest-clad mountains, over which leaped great water-falls, and down the sides of which came trickling streamlets, some clinging to the fern-clad, shrub-covered sides, some leaping over from the rocky parapets—sheer falls from a hundred to a thousand feet in perpendicular, forming rainbows, sparkling in the sun, drifting their waters in wide trails of foaming spray, playing fantastic tricks with sun and wind, dodging in and out from sun to shadow, hiding behind leafy groves, resting in pools their own force had dug, then dancing away in streamlets to swell the great waters on their way to the great ocean.

It was a beautiful sight. We shall never recover from the indignation we felt when we reflected how we had been imposed upon by the Rhine; that we had gone abroad, traversed oceans, spent our money, and all these years since our return from Europe been impressed with the nasty little Rhine, its trumpery, ruined castles, and its terraced vineyards, as something picturesque and beautiful, while all these years this splendid river of the Columbia has been rolling its waters so grandly to the sea, bearing out through riven mountain ranges, through deep rocky gorges, a volume of water, in comparison with which the Rhine is but a tiny streamlet.

We stop at the Lower Cascades, and take train six miles up the left bank of the stream. At this place the Columbia has broken through the great rock-ribbed mountain chain of the Cascade range. This was in the prehistoric time a great waterfall, where the discharge of the great inland sea leaped its rocky barrier two thousand feet in height over its battlements of basalt. Then the waters of the inland sea formed a crevice at the base of the hills, trickling under for a few thousand years, and then bursting through, leaving a great natural bridge over and across which the Titans and mountain gods of St. Helen's and Hood had friendly passage. The mountains quarreled, and in their great struggle the bridge fell down, and the waters passed unchallenged to the sea.

Here General Sheridan had his first battle with the Indians. The log-house, pierced with balls and arrow-heads of chalcidony, still stands frowning over the foaming waters. Then, again, we take steamer sailing upward and inward; then again at The Dalles (the trough), through the narrow chasm of which the great stream dashes in mad fury, we take another train upon the Oregon bank, passing again basalt columns, towering mountains, primeval forests, incoming mountain streams, till we reach the calm broad upper waters, where the steamer Harvest Queen takes the passenger to Lewiston in Idaho, a thousand miles from the sea.

The Columbia and its tributaries furnish fifteen hundred miles of navigable water, three thousand miles of river coast, every foot of which is capable of agricultural improvement—not a marsh, nor desert, nor barren spot along its line. The Walla Walla country, and the region beyond, all unite in pronouncing the great granary of the continent. Rolling lands, soil-clad to their highest summits, and capable of raising wheat for millions of people; a land for sheep and cattle; a land abounding in plenty; a land of minerals, gold and silver, of grain and wool; a great inland empire, abounding in everything necessary for the sustenance and support of a great people.

Oregon is a better State than California. It has a better and more promising future; and unless this city of San Francisco looks to itself, there will spring up somewhere upon Puget Sound a great commercial emporium that shall challenge with us the commercial supremacy of the coast. Oregon will, in no distant time, outnumber us in population. Washington Territory is an empire in and of itself, and both State and Territory have as yet millions of unappropriated lands. There is now a large immigration pouring into the country; and while Jim McShafter, Colonel Beale, Lux & Miller, Throckmorton, and other land cormorants are holding their broad acres beyond the reach of purchase at $40 per acre, better lands and nearer to a better market may be bought for $5, or appropriated for nothing, or secured at government price. Oregon has escaped the greedy, black, speculative spider that stretches his web over the soil to steal and hold prisoner the industrious fool that comes to plow. This is telling now in favor of our sister State. It is getting ten immigrants to our one. It is taking industrious and working men away from California.

Jay Gould is projecting a railroad to the Columbia, another transcontinental highway that shall leave us to enjoy our charming climate, our land thieves, and our stock gamblers. He is in negotiation for the purchase of the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, its magnificent boats, its railroads, and all the paraphernalia of its equipment. Gould has demanded of the Company a selling price, and the Company has submitted its figure, which is a large one, for his consideration. Gould evidently means business, and unless California and Oregon, the valley of the Sacramento and the Wallamette, the cities of San Francisco and Portland, have sufficient energy to complete the railroad gap of 270 miles between the termini of the California and Oregon and the Oregon and California Railroads, both States, valleys, and cities will have occasion to lament their want of enterprise. Oregon, with its 95,274 square miles, and its 60,000,000 of rich acres of agricultural lands, its 3,000 miles of navigable shore, its unlimited forests, its splendid fisheries, is a prize too magnificent for California to miss; and California with its mines, its wine, its fruits, its commercial facilities, its transcontinental railroads, is too splendid a prize for Oregon to forego. These two young people ought to join hands in the holy bonds of matrimony. United by the steel rail in commercial wedlock, they would be dowered with a princely inheritance, and together might found an imperial dynasty, and together compose an empire of population.

European Sand-Lots.

It has become tiresome to one, who admits that he has only an indistinct idea of the subject, to hear Socialism, Nihilism, and Kearneyism ruthlessly thrown together and spoken of as analogous evils. When one has been eccentric enough and unfashionable enough to read all the available news concerning the growth of these great political cancers on the body national—when one has done this, it seems strange to him that thoughtful minds can class them together as similar excrescences. They are as unlike as chalk and cheese. No one will deny that, of all the ways to do a thing, the lazy way is the most likely to be chosen. The lazy mind will always jump at a conclusion, rather than struggle through the underbrush of reason, through the tangled labyrinth of facts, to crawl to it by the only honest path. Because a thing is not blue, a great many people immediately think it must be yellow, forgetting that the rainbow contains a variety of other colors. The word "Kearneyism" should never have been invented. It means nothing. If it is intended to express hoodlumism, rowdyism, or lawlessness, then we have a new and a useless name for an old disease. Kearney has developed no new phase of any of our old complaints.

Even a dunghill has to be made. Kearney has made nothing—excepting, perhaps, some money and a rather bad odor. Since he has been let loose upon us he has changed nothing, perchance not even his linen. An attempt at anything like the latter would be a signal to his comrades that he was "going back on them." For a man who has talked fight on each and every occasion, he has taken more whippings, with less retaliation, than any man of equal stamp and notoriety the world ever heard of. As a class, there are no Kearneyites; as a class, there are millions of Socialists. The Socialist seeks to accomplish with his brains what Kearney would attempt with his brogans. An Irishman playing a violin was once asked whether he played by note or by ear. "Nayther," said he; "I play by main stringth." And that is the way Kearney would revolutionize this country. To use his own vernacular, he is off, considerably off, his nut. Why does Bismarck grow pale? Why does the Czar tremble? Is it because an idiot rises among the other vermin of a sand-lot and calls them "lecherous hell-hounds," "bloated thieves," etc.?

No; the cause of their anxiety lies in the fact that every day and hour they are being made to feel that brains are at work against them. The Nihilist, especially, is no nobody. He is the somest kind of a somebody. He is the professor of a university; he is a student; he is a high official; he locks arms with the nobility—he is the nobility. The very secret police can not be trusted by the Czar. The feeling of discontent and rebellion is a deep-seated and a quiet one—it permeates the very air that he breathes. Nihilistic publications are scattered by the tens of thousands, yet no trace can be found of the printers. A Nihilist turns informer, earns the gratitude of the Government, and thinks himself safe. Do his comrades call him traitor on the Russian sand-lot, and make the air blue with their bluster? No; when next the sun rises, it shines upon the cold corpse of the informer, a knife sunk to the hilt in his bosom. While having not the slightest sympathy with either, who can help but prefer the silent and determined Nihilist to the braying and cowardly Kearney? Until that faculty which, among the lowly, is called "low cunning," and among the high-born is designated "diplomacy"—until that faculty falls into the ranks of Kearney, we have nothing to fear from him. The "main strength" idea is a failure; the Safety Committee proved that fact once, and can do so again. If every Nihilist and Socialist were of the Kearney stamp, neither the Czar nor Bismarck would ever have another wakeful hour.

The difference between brains and brogans is exactly the difference between the European cancer and the Californian pimple.

JOHN C. CHALMERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, May, 1879.

The first Nihilist societies were formed by Russian students about the year 1859, and the doctrines they adopted were chiefly derived from a book which is not generally supposed to have any Nihilist tendencies, Büchner's Force and Matter. The circulation of this work in Russia was forbidden by the Government, but it was secretly introduced into the country, and read with avidity by the Russian youth, together with another German work, by Max Stirner, called Property and the Individual, which had also fallen under the ban of the Russian censors. Out of these two books, the former of which preached materialism and the latter socialism, the Russians evolved the doctrine of Nihilism, which they also professed to find in other popular works, notably Buckle's History of Civilization.

THE SPRING VALLEY WATER COMPANY.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—You did dare some months ago to print my hastily written and somewhat passionate communication in defense of the Spring Valley Water Company. The ARGONAUT is a bold paper, and I thank you. It requires some courage nowadays to concede to property its just rights. As a rule newspapers illustrate their independence by toadying to the mob and pandering to all the vicious prejudices of the ignorant. The Bulletin and Call have waged and are waging a most unjust war upon twelve millions of property, and endeavoring to wrest it for an inadequate price from private hands that it may become the property of the municipal government. The argument is, that as water is a necessity the city should steal it for the use of the citizens, and appeals to the citizens to uphold them in the endeavor to take from me my 500 shares of Spring Valley water stock for less than it is worth. Bread is a necessity, but this does not justify the city authorities in breaking into a grain warehouse or stealing from a bread wagon. Meat is a necessity, but Mayor Bryant would not be authorized to send his police and drive a band of Lux & Miller's beeves to the slaughter-house. If San Francisco needs Spring Valley, let it purchase the property in an honest way, and not endeavor to confiscate it by the strong arm of municipal violence. The Bulletin would "condemn" our property for the public use, and its measure of valuation is what it cost us. This is a shameful and dishonest piece of reasoning to hide a crime. The cost of a thing is not the measure of its value; has nothing to do with it. Mr. Pickering's 50-share lot on Pine street cost in 1849 only sixteen dollars. Would it be honest for the city to condemn it for its cost. Time and the growth of the city has given value to Mr. Pickering's lot. The same considerations have given value to my shares, and it would be dishonorable for the city to get them at less than their present market value, as it would be to eject Mr. Pickering from his homestead by paying him for it sixteen dollars, accumulated interest, and value of improvements.

If the city needed the Bulletin newspaper for publishing official announcements, would it be deemed honest to seize it, paying Mr. Fitch only what it has cost him, viz: the price of type, presses, and printing material. The idea is not only absurd, but it is criminal. My five hundred shares of Spring Valley Water Company's stock is worth what I can get for it. It is properly capitalized upon the interest it earns me. It has a recognized market value, and to take it from me and my co-owners for less than its worth is robbery and pillage. If San Francisco desires water let her go to Tahoe, Blue Lakes, or Russian River for it; let her try the experiment of damming streams, building reservoirs, piping valleys, tunneling mountains, and distributing water through the streets of a city; let her buy iron, make contracts, advertise and build a water system. It would cost her not twelve but twenty millions of dollars.

Let her dig artesian wells and distribute in four-inch pipes, till Spring Valley is driven to close her mains. The town would burn to ashes in one windy season. It would be decimated by contagious diseases coming from the malaria of its filthy streets and the foul gases from its unflushed sewers. Its sand dunes would overwhelm its houses; its streets would be filled with dust; its parks and public places would be brown and unsightly with barren desolation.

Spring Valley for now more than twenty years has been lied about, misrepresented, vilified, and decried till public opinion has been poisoned to its very core concerning it. The last ragged remnant of Bulletin-Call virtue seems to hang upon their continued and continuing lies about this property. They have let up on the railroads; all is serene in that direction. The gas company is all right. The butchers' monopoly does not afflict them. Stock gambling meets with but an occasional and feeble suggestion of being an immoral and dangerous business. But the Spring Valley Water Company is the bloody head and bare bones which the good Mr. Pickering and the good Mr. Fitch hold up to the community as the most oppressive and grasping and dangerous of monopolies.

There is a cause for this, and I think I know what it is. I am not a disinterested writer. I own five hundred shares of its stock, and as I said in my last communication, it is honestly mine, honestly come by, and the same code of morals that justifies an editor in depreciating the value of this property, which is mine under the law, justifies the burglar in stealing my spoons, or the thief in stealing my cow to feed his children milk.

The Spring Valley Water Company is shamefully misrepresented in reference to its history, its legal rights, its management, and the purposes it accomplishes. It is the legitimate growth of an early enterprise that was started and carried on by the very best and most enterprising men of San Francisco. To give the names of its officers, directors, and prominent stockholders would be to give a list of the most honorable and prominent gentlemen that have ever resided upon this coast. It has grown to its present dimensions by a slow process. It has developed with the growth of the city, and more than kept pace with it, and every step of its progress has been honorable and creditable. It has supplemented the mules and water-carts of the earlier time, and through a quarter of a generation protected the most windy city of the continent from any great conflagration. It has reduced the rates of insurance to the minimum, and saves the citizens of San Francisco $3,000,000 in the rate of interest alone. It is served to every house, home, store, factory, and shop on this peninsula where it is needed, and in advance of the line of street improvements and suburban dwellings; and when the character of the seasons is considered, I declare that no other city in America is more generously or cheaply provided with water.

The water is the best that God provides. It comes clear and sweet from the heavens; it flows over grassy hills, untrod by flocks; it is stored in great, deep, clean reservoirs. The only living thing that swims its waters is the sparkling trout. It is brought in iron mains, and distributed as pure as any spring or catchment water can be. It is soft, sweet, pure water. The best evidence of its value is that no epidemic or diseases has ever come from it; nor can any chemical analysis find in it any deleterious substance.

There is no city in civilization where so small a fraction of water-rater payers are compelled, and that most unjustly, to bear the whole burden of supplying a great city with water.

Only seventeen thousand water consumers. Upon this fraction of the population is devolved the whole expense and burden of protecting the property, the wealth, the comfort of three hundred thousand people and $300,000,000 of property. The thing is an anomaly in municipal government, and the moment it is proposed to devolve a part of this burden upon all the people and all the property these two twin idiots of journalism cry out like a pig under the gate.

The indisputable fact is that there is no just cause of complaint against Spring Valley or its management. It is honorable, it is honest, and it is generous. The property has never paid more than eight per cent. per annum on the investment. In the early time money at interest paid three per cent. per month. The rate of interest to-day at the banks upon commercial paper is twelve per cent. per annum, while all these years Spring Valley has not averaged an interest of six per cent. per annum. It has not been watered any more than real estate has been watered by the growth of the town. It has not increased in value beyond a legitimate and healthful increase. All this uproar and complaint is not by consumers, but by these twin villains of the press and a few miserable politicians who would go to the Legislature, or to the Board of Supervisors, or to Congress, upon the swelling cry of this false clamor against monopolies.

A few dishonest people who do not drink much water themselves, who seldom wash, and never intend to promote the public good by drowning themselves, think to conciliate public favor by endeavoring to steal the Spring Valley Water Company's property. This can not be done; its tenure is protected by law. No one wants to do it except a set of selfish, dishonest demagogues, who hope to obtain popular favor by seeming to endeavor to accomplish an impossible result. I thank the ARGONAUT for this opportunity to ventilate an indignation I most honestly feel against a dishonest press and demagogue politicians, who are endeavoring, by all sorts of misrepresentations, to so vitiate and debase public sentiment that through legislation and courts it may steal my property and the property of other stockholders in this water company.

GINGO.

So far the Republicans present an united and smiling front to the enemy. They wrangle a little at the primaries, but this is a good sign and augurs success. A united Republican party, with independent, able, and honest candidates, resolutions accepting the new Constitution, and a non-partisan judicial ticket of learned and honest lawyers, will be invincible against any opposition that can be brought before it.

Kearney's address to his associate idiots is a fanfaronade of nonsense. It shows to what abuse language may be put. It is the lying indictment of an ignorant and unprincipled Irishman against the country that has given him an asylum, the laws that have given him protection, and the society that has endured him. Out of his entire Convention we notice less than twenty native-born citizens, and of the twenty ten are of Irish parentage.

Pinafore has got into the churches. They seem to be gently paving the way for the introduction of the music by accustoming the congregations to the points in the text, and we have no doubt that before many weeks we shall have the tunes done in slow time as voluntaries, offertories, etc. The greatest progress, thus far, seems to be made by Dr. Stone's congregation, under the musical leadership of its own original "Dick Deadeye." At the vesper services last Sunday the printed programme closed with the hymn beginning—

"How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord;"

The last verse running as follows:

"The soul that on Jesus hath leaned for repose,
I will not—I will not desert to his foes;
That soul—though all hell should endeavor to shake,
I'll never—no, never—no, never forsake!"

Congregation—"What, never?"

Response—"Well, hardly ever!"

Song of the Bumble-Bee.

Come where the clover is kissed by the sun;
Come where the honey-bees drowsily hum;
Come where the bumble-bee, happy old thing,
Brings up the boys with a sting-a-ling-ling!

Precious old bumble-bee, bird of my youth,
Sharper thy tail than the arrows of truth;
How oft when the school boy steps into your realm,
You knock him stone blind with a touch of your helm.

How oft, when the picnicking children of men
Sit down at the door of your grass covered den,
You will kick a big man 'cross a ten-acre lot
By the lift of your foot when it's heated red hot!

Far worse than the candidate's buzzing to me
Was the petulant buzz of a boy-hating bee;
Appalling to men and to gods was the sight
When a barefooted boy got a bumble-bee bite.

Bee of the bumble, like memory's chimera,
The notes of your bagpipe call up the old times;
And still boyish hearts, light as birds on the wing,
Will howl when you tinkle your sting-a-ling-ting.

Man at C. P. Ticket Office—Please give me an upper berth.

Ticket Agent—My dear sir, here it is—no charge; and please accept this pass, good for life, all over the road and its branches. It has been waiting here for five years for the man who first asked for an upper berth. What name?

Man—It is for my wife. She is going across the continent alone, and I am afraid—

ARCHERY.

When evening's banner, fringed with gold,
Droops wide and cool its shadowy fold,
Young men and maidens fair to see
Come trooping round the gray beech-tree.
The sun's last arrows, vainly spent,
Are lost beneath this leafy tent;
The pale young moon hangs dim and low
Her fading gleam of silver bow;
And slowly up the southern skies
The hunter rides, whose starry eyes
Have watched love roses come and go
Many a thousand years ago—
His glittering shaft drawn keen and bright
Against the gloomy wall of night.

The true cord holds the bow it lends,
And graceful yields to the strength it lends,
And hums a soft æolian air.
The orange bough, though sapless, bare,
Yet thrills to thoughts of bridal booms,
And loving eyes in festal rooms,
And wedding bells heard high and free
Above the slow song of the sea.
O happy feet, that lightly came
Within the magic of this game.
The tender glance, the glowing cheek,
Are signs of hopes he dares not speak,
And knotted tresses, backward flung,
Are tangling nets when hearts are young.

O maiden! sighting shining rings,
About thee flits, on airy wings,
An unseen archer, crowned with flowers
That hold the dew of morning hours!
Take care, take care! his dimpled hands
Hide fletters strong as brazen bands;
And the shining rings he holds up to thee
Are the golden links of thy destiny.

Archery Notes.

The executive committee who have been managing the details of the first Pacific Coast Archery Tournament, have decided to hold the contest at the Oakland Cricket Grounds on the third Friday and Saturday in June, which will be on the 20th and 21st. The tournament will be open to all comers, and every one who can pull a bow and hit a four-foot target at twenty yards should not hesitate about entering, for even should he not carry off a prize he will have "lots of fun," which, after all, is one of the main things in life. The committee have secured several handsome tents, which will be pitched on the grounds in a line at right angles to the targets. These will be six in number for the greater convenience and expedition of the shooters and the better view of the spectators. Each club will wear some distinguishing badge or uniform—green, blue, or white—and on each tent will float the flag of the club, whatever the taste of the members of the various organizations may decide that to be. The first day's shooting will be for the club cup, a handsome piece of silver, and will be shot for at three ranges—30, 40, and 50 yards. There is a good deal of interest felt in the contest, as so far as can be learned from the practice scores, the records of the clubs do not differ much. The teams will consist of five, each club being allowed that number to shoot at the different ranges. Now, in a team of five, one or two may be able in nearly every case to run up a handsome score, but the remaining three may shoot but indifferently well. In another team, though no one member may shoot as well as the captain of the preceding team, yet the average of all five may be so good as to overcome that advantage. This will make the balance so even that the destination of the club cup is beyond the ken of the most sagacious.

The shooting on the second day will probably open with the contest for the gold arrow, or champion prize. This will be shot for at 60 yards. After this will follow shooting at other ranges for prizes, and to all these contests every archer will be welcome.

In order to allow the committee time to calculate on the number of contestants, each archer who wishes to participate should leave his name at F. M. L. Peters' bow shop on Montgomery Street, or address the secretary, Dan O'Connell, Oakland.

The first installment of the Horsman arrows, of which we have heard so much, and which Will Thompson has declared fully equal to the imported arrow, has arrived. They are much inferior in finish to the Highfield old dead arrow, but as the lot which Peters received has none heavier than 3 shillings, it will be difficult to say how they will fly, until some 4 or 5 shilling arrows are sent along.

A good bow string is, as every archer knows, an indispensable portion of the bowman's tackle, as the safety of his bow very much depends on the firmness of his string. The English strings, of which there are many, are mostly made of hemp, and the material which comes from Italy answers the best. The catgut string, while being very strong, is too much influenced by heat and moisture to prove at all times of a proper tension. The Flemish strings have a superior excellence over the other strings, first by the reason of the substance, and, secondly, by the care taken in twisting and winding the threads forming the body of the string. The waterproof silk string is made of the best twisted oiled silk, and is generally laid and twisted in two colors, forming as it does a handsome trimming for a fine bow. Every archer should know how to put a string on his bow. It will be noticed that on one end of the string an eye is already made, the eye for the other end as bows vary in length is left for the archer himself to make. It is nothing more than a timber hitch, but the best plan to follow is to ask a practical archer to show you the right way of making it. I should recommend every archer who can obtain a quiver for the safe keeping of his arrows not to be without this valuable portion of a bowman's outfit. It preserves the arrows, and protects them from the damp.

The archers' ranks are swelling every day on the Pacific Coast, and the claims of archery as a fascinating and health-giving exercise are fully allowed. Roger Ascham, Queen Elizabeth's tutor, says of archery: "It is an exercise most wholesome for the ladye, a pastime most honeste for the minde, and, as I am able to prove myself, of all others most fitte and agreeable with learynge and learned men. Therefore I not only love shootynge, exhorte all to shootynge, but I also use shootynge."

DIVORCED IN THE DESERT.

Andrew Jackson Hathaway, in 1849, was a well to do young farmer of Iowa, with a wife precisely such as a thriving young farmer should possess; a bright boy of twelve and a sweet-tempered daughter of between ten and eleven years of age constituted the two domestic idols of the Hathaway altar. Their names were, respectively, William Henry Harrison Hathaway and Janet Dalrymple Hathaway. The father of the elder Hathaway had served as a lieutenant under Jackson at New Orleans, and belonged to a prime family of Davidson County, Tennessee, which had formerly lived in Virginia, and had good revolutionary blood in its veins. Andrew Jackson Hathaway's father's helpmeet came from a representative Rhode Island family, and, according to the archives of Providence Plantations, a family renowned for its deeds of valor during the "times that tried men's souls." This little bit of pedigree has nothing much to do with the sketch that follows, although pedigree sometimes helps a man as it almost always does a horse. And, again, it is as well to show that our Hathaway family had a pedigree that any American might be proud of, for Mrs. Hathaway, too, came from good revolutionary stock, with an even divide of Massachusetts and South Carolina in the make-up. Her name was Vashti, she having been christened after an old maiden aunt of Fall River, Massachusetts. Andrew and Vashti grew up on neighboring farms in Ohio, where both William Henry and Janet Dalrymple were born. It may not be uninteresting right here to state that the young love that existed between Andrew and Vashti was not entirely uninterrupted—on account of the youth of the parties, however; nothing else—and, whether they cared or not whether the "Man in the Moon was Looking," they each kept an eye upon the nocturnal movements of "the old Stormer" (as Andrew felicitously nicknamed his sweetheart's suspecting sire), as night after night they exchanged sentiment, and something else, over the front yard gate.

It was upon one of these delightful occasions that Andrew and Vashti had plighted their troth, as had Lucy and Lord Rutherford almost two centuries before, by breaking a silver coin between them, and had mutually invoked malediction on whichever of the two should be false to the compact.

The reader will perceive, now, why the Hathaways named their daughter Janet Dalrymple. And it may not be out of place—indeed, it isn't—to state that, of all Scott's heroines, the "Bride of Lammermoor" is perhaps the most widely known. Her sad story, you know, is, in the main, true. The maiden's name was not Lucy, as Sir Walter has it, but Janet—Janet Dalrymple—who was a daughter of Lord Stair. She and Lord Rutherford had plighted their troth, had broken a silver coin between them, and had invoked malediction on whichever of the two should be false to the compact. The parents of Lady Janet vehemently insisted on her marrying Dunbar of Baldoon. The mother acted in the most cruel manner in forcing her daughter to this match. Janet, broken-hearted and helpless, managed to perfect an interview with her lover, and sobbed out a text from Numbers, xxx., 2-5, as an excuse for her obedience to her imperious and unrelenting parents' commands. The lovers parted in sorrow—Rutherford in great anger, and Janet overwhelmed with grief. The former had not in him the spirit of Young Lochinvar, nor the latter the wit to run away with him. The poor thing was, in fact, badly frightened. She was carried to church to be wed in a semi-crazed and more than half dead state. At night a hurricane of shrieks came from her bridal chamber, where the bridegroom was found on the floor, profusely bleeding from a stab; and the bride sat near, in her night clothes, bidding those who had rushed to the scene, "Take up your bonny bridegroom!" Janet died in three weeks, insane. Duobar of Baldoon recovered, but never opened his lips on the causes which led to the tragedy. Lord Rutherford, the lover, died childless in 1685. It was a queer fancy of the Hathaways: this naming of Janet. Calling the boy after Harrison was entirely proper, and extremely American. It is as well to state, to keep up the connection, that Andrew and Vashti were married at the home of the latter in Ohio, in 1835; Andrew's father and mother both died in 1840, and Andrew inherited the Hathaway farm. In 1846 he and his family moved to Iowa, and here Hathaway farmed it until the winter of 1849-50.

It was a bitter cold day in December, 1849. The snow was piled six feet deep, on a level, and the mercury marked 24° below zero. That day Deacon Hathaway—for Andrew had joined the village church and had been made a pillar thereof—had two logging chains snapped into pieces by the intense cold, and the realization of some other mishaps made him red hot, although the atmosphere was unmistakably Siberian. Deacon as he was, Hathaway expectorated a multiplicity of Flanders oaths that day, and his arrival home was marked by no distinguishing exhibitions of serenity. Indeed, so exercised was Hathaway that, while in the act of pulling off his boots, he got enraged and kicked one of them clean through the window. This little episode elicited a broad grin from William Henry, and the remark that he thought that Jackson—a white mule, not the head of the family—had kicked over the corn crib; Janet glanced sympathetically at her mother—who had burst into tears simultaneously with the flight of the boot aforesaid—and then joined that good woman in her demonstration of grief. Andrew took in the domestic tableau at once; and, dispatching William Henry for the boot, patted Vashti upon the forehead, and said:

"I'm not mad at you, dear, so don't cry."

"I know you're not mad at me, Andrew," responded Mrs. Hathaway; "but you lose control of yourself so much, lately, that you make things very unpleasant at times. You ought to be ashamed of yourself—I say this very feelingly, Andrew, for I love you, oh, so very, very much—but here are Billy and Janny growing up so fast; and, my dear, you ought to at least set them no bad examples. Only a week ago you came home in just another such a fit, and ripped off both your back suspender buttons in your anger."

"But, Vashti—"

"Oh, you always have some excuse. I know things don't go always as you would like to have them; but there's no use in your getting mad—and especially before the children. It nearly breaks Jaony's heart to see you in a passion, and Billy, as you must have noticed, has already commenced to make fun of you. Another thing, now that we are on the subject, let me tell you, Andrew, that you are not only vic-lent, and very violent, too, in your temper, at times, but you are very obstinately set in your ways. You never consult me, either, in any of your movements, and when you make up your mind to do a thing, nothing except disappointment or disaster can change you. Don't you think it would be better, first, to make me acquainted with your projects, or some of them, and let me put my little stock of wisdom and womanly plans together with your hopes and undertakings? Two heads, you know, Andrew, are said to be better than one, and it strikes me that husband and wife should be full partners; and it would be so pleasant, too. I want to share with you, as you ought to know, in all your pleasures and griefs, in all your prosperities and adversities. I want to be a part of you in all things, and at all times and places. I know you love me, and I know we get along pretty well, generally. And, were it not for your quick temper and obstinacy, we would be the happiest couple in the world. Now, I say this from the most loving standpoint, Andrew, and I say it for your own good, and for the happiness and future prosperity of you, my dear husband, myself, and our dear, loving children."

During this speech Mrs. Hathaway and Janet had prepared the evening meal; William had plugged up the hole in the window with some cast-off garment, and the family sat down to supper.

The silence which followed Mrs. Hathaway's speech was broken by Janet, who inquired:

"Papa, mamma says we are going to start for California in the spring. Is that really so?"

"That is really so," responded Mr. Hathaway.

"Yes, dear girl, we start for California in the spring," interrupted Mrs. Hathaway. "Your father apprized me of his intention a few days ago, and that settles it. Neither of us knows anything about that far-off country, although the St. Louis papers are full of glowing descriptions of the beautiful land of flowers and gold. Lots of Iowa folks are going though in the spring, and I don't mind breaking up and going West once more."

"They tell me that you can pick up gold in the rivers and on the roads out there in California," said William. "I don't believe that, but I do believe it's a better place than Iowa; it is too cold here; I don't like the winters here at all."

"You are right, William," remarked Mr. Hathaway, "the winters in California are as mild as they are in Florida, so Fremont says, and that is one reason why I want to go there. It is an old saying that a rolling stone gathers no moss, I know, and it may be a true one; but I have rolled so long, and so often, that I am going to try it once more. From the little I can glean from the newspapers, and from other sources of information, I am of the opinion that it is just the country for us to go to."

Spring came, and May found the Hathaways, with two good teams and wagons, half a dozen steers, two or three cows, two saddle horses, and a good stock of provisions, on their way to California.

The little party had good luck, losing none of their stock except the cows, and meeting neither hostile Indians nor thieving white men.

From the moment the party crossed the Missouri river, however, Hathaway's mode of action was never interfered with with any degree of success. He consulted neither Mrs. Hathaway nor any other living person. He made and broke camps when and wherever he pleased; watered his stock whenever he saw fit, and sought advice of no one or no thing except a map and a dial.

Upon leaving Salt Lake, Mrs. Hathaway hazarded a suggestion touching a choice of roads, and William Henry rallied to the support of his mother; Janet, however, stood by her father, and the mother and son yielded. But Mrs. Hathaway said:

"As we are evenly divided in our opinion as to which is the best road, Andrew, I will yield, as I always do; but I would like to ask you one question: Suppose I had not yielded my preference, and suppose both Billy and Janny had preferred my word, what would you have done under the circumstances?"

"What would I have done? Why, my good woman, I would have gone right on just as I am—just as if no one were here but myself. I am at the head of this expedition, and it must go my way. I don't propose to take advice from an old woman and a couple of children in this section of the wilderness—not as the roads are. I don't consider your judgment good in the premises, however much you may consult authorities. I have got a map and a general description of the country through which we are traveling, and I am going to stick to that compass if I never reach California."

"Why, Andrew!"

"No, there's no why, Andrew! about it. It is common sense decision, and there can't be any appeal. I'll say this, though: whenever, in your wisdom, you deem my course of pilgrimage uncertain or unsatisfactory, you can go some other way—or take the back track altogether; and you may take the whole outfit with you, except the poorest saddle-horse you can pick out. Now, I want you to remember, once for all, Vashti, that I am infernally tired of your fault-finding and suggestions. I am determined to have my own way. Whenever you want to go contrary to my way, let us separate."

"Why, Andrew Hathaway, what a speech!" ejaculated the wife. "Why, the children themselves are amazed at you." And all sobbed betterly except that obstinate man, Andrew Jackson Hathaway.

It was several days before perfect harmony again prevailed in the Hathaway camp, which, however, when it did set in, lasted until the party arrived at a point on the Humboldt desert, where the Lassen trail intersects that of the Carson.

At this point had congregated some forty odd persons, all of whom but Hathaway had concluded to take the Lassen trail. Mrs. Hathaway was aware that her husband's map pointed out the Carson road as the one to be followed. She, however, preferred the Lassen trail for the reason that a good crowd was going that way; and, further, because both William and Janet had besought her to prevail upon their father to change his mind. Thus fortified, Mrs. Hathaway approached her husband, who was seated upon a pile of blankets repairing a bridle.

It was a lovely morning in September, and all things in nature seemed to smile. The imperial orb rode up the eastern sky and flung its splendors upon the majestic Sierra which rose like battlements before it. There was inspiration in the scene and sublimity in the solitude of that vast landscape untouched by hand of art.

Mrs. Hathaway opened the conversation by saying, in dulcet tones:

"Andrew, I was just thinking, as I gazed upon those magnificent elevations before us, of the greatness of God. I have been in the most perfect state of enchantment for an hour, not only in surveying the mountains before us and the desert behind us, but meditating upon the conspicuous creations of our heavenly Father. I never felt my littleness so much before, and, in the contemplation of the mysteries which transcend the scope of earthly penetration, I recall an anecdote of your father's, the effect of which has for many years been engraved upon the tablets of my heart—I mean the one he used to tell of old John Randolph of Virginia. Randolph was walking, one evening, accompanied by a favorite boy, you remember. All at once, arrested by a magnificent sunset in that incomparable section of Virginia known as the Shenandoah Valley, he violently seized the nigger and said: 'Sam, if any man ever tells you there is no God, tell him that John Randolph says he lies.' The same sentiment seems to take possession of me as I gaze upon the Sierra Nevada Mountains. By the by, Andrew, there is a man in the party here who has made the trip over the Sierra several times. He calls the mountains before us the rim of the golden valley, but says there is no time to be lost in getting over them, as the snow generally commences to descend in October, and sometimes fall to a depth of twenty odd feet. I wish you would have a little chat with him after you have mended that bridle, as he is greatly opposed to the Carson road. He says it is all dust and alkali."

"He does, eh? Well, you just tell Mr. Knows-It-All that I like dust and alkali, and for that very reason, if for no other, I am going to take the Carson road. I half thought your John Randolph story and other utterances were a blind to get at the softer part of me, but you can't do it," replied Hathaway, roughly.

"But," said Vashti, feelingly. "Billy and Janet both want to go by the Lassen trail. The whole party, in fact, start off in that direction in an hour."

"All right, let them start, that don't interfere with my plans in the least. My map directs me to go by the Carson road, and I am going that way if I go alone."

"Then you may go alone, Andrew Hathaway!" said Vashti, with unmistakable force and composure.

"What! you take the Lassen trail and me the Carson?"

"That is precisely the situation, unless you consent to yield for once in your life, Mr. Hathaway," rejoined Vashti.

"And William and Janet, they—?"

"Go with their mother by the Lassen trail," added Mrs. Hathaway.

"But you will become the laughing-stock of the whole party."

"You are the laughing-stock of the whole party, and I am heartily ashamed of you."

"But this is a serious turn affairs have taken, and you may regret it," said Andrew.

"It is most serious, Mr. Hathaway, and I regret that circumstances force me to act as I do," replied his wife.

"Then do as I want you to. I would rather stay right here all winter than take the Lassen trail."

"And I would remain right here all winter and the summer following before I would go one foot by the Carson road. My mind is made up; I propose to start in an hour. What do you say?"

"I say you go your way and I will go mine."

In less than an hour Mrs. Hathaway and her two children were on the Lassen road, and Andrew, astride of an old saddle horse, moved off sorrowfully in another direction.

Neither party looked back until a gap of many miles had been opened, each expecting that the other would yield. At last, Andrew turned his animal about, and, to his utter astonishment, no living object met his gaze in that vast expanse. His heart sank within him; great, scalding tears chased each other down his rugged cheeks; despair took possession of his soul, and the miserable man cried in agonizing accents:

"Divorced in the desert! My God! what have I done?"

Then he wheeled about and pursued his course, the very incarnation of misery. Once he turned and rode a mile or two on a canter the other way. But the mountain breezes blew the dust before him, and he at times became completely enveloped in clouds of alkali sand and other sedimentary matter. With nerves and reason almost shattered he went into camp weary and alone the first night of the separation. In the meantime, Mrs. Hathaway and her children had joined the party that had started in advance of them, and had got along as pleasantly as could have been expected under the circumstances. William firmly believed that his father would join them during the night, and when morning came and found him not, he burst into tears and wept bitterly. The mother was overwhelmed with grief, but only once did she give way to her feelings, and that was when Janet, at breakfast, said:

"I dreamed all night of my papa, last night. Oh, my poor, dear papa; I wonder where he is?"

These words went like daggers to the wife's heart, and then she wished to God that she had taken the Carson trail. She even went so far as to consult with her son upon the feasibility of returning; but William opposed such a course as adding folly to folly.

In about a month Mrs. Hathaway and her children arrived at Sacramento in good health, and without the loss of an animal. She sold her entire outfit for several hundred dollars; which amount, added to the thousand odd that she had safely tucked away in the lining of her dress, she invested in furniture, etc., and at once set up business as a hotel keeper. By dint of industry and perseverance, coupled with flush times in and about Sacramento, Mrs. Hathaway not only made lots of money but really amassed a fortune. Up to 1852 both William and Janet assisted her in her household duties; then she put them both to school, where Janet remained until she graduated with honor. In 1857 William, who had clerked it with success at Marysville, went to San Francisco and engaged in the hardware business for himself, and married a Boston lady the following year. Janet, in 1858, married a rich farmer of Santa Clara County, and has lived to see children and grand children grow up around her. Mrs. Hathaway still lives, residing with her daughter at San José.

Andrew met with hard luck from the start. The third day after his separation his horse fell down and died, and he footed it into the mines of Northern California, taking out his first dust on the Feather River. Once he accumulated over $5,000, and built a saw mill, which was in a few months after destroyed by a storm. Then he got together a couple of thousand of dollars and commenced merchandizing in Grass Valley, but a fire soon swept all of his property away. Then he went down into Southern California, and from there he drifted into New Mexico. At the commencement of hostilities between the North and the South, Hathaway was criving a stage coach in Texas. He at once joined the Confederate army, and was severely wounded at Pea Ridge while cannonading a regiment under Ben McCullough. He was again wounded at Chickamauga under Longstreet, and was subsequently taken prisoner in Virginia and sent to Columbus, Ohio. In 1866, although fifty-one years of age, he joined the Fourteenth United States Infantry as a private, and came to the Pacific Coast again in 1867. For twelve years had Hathaway again drifted about on the Pacific Coast, never learning or hearing a word of his family—William having retired from business and gone to Europe a long time before—until one day in September, 1878, when he saw some mention of his wife's name in a San José paper.

The old man lost no time in ascertaining the whereabouts of his long-lost beloved; and on the 19th of September, 1878, just twenty-eight years from the day he was "divorced in the desert," his feeble steps carried him to the house that contained his wife. He rung the bell, and old Mrs. Hathaway answered the summons herself. Mutual recognition was instantaneous, and, without explanations, the old couple hugged and kissed and blessed each other.

Then each rehearsed their histories from the time they broke camp in the Humboldt desert twenty-eight years before. Andrew told in detail the stories of his unfortunate career, and Mrs. Hathaway briefly recited her successes, not forgetting to inform him how she had never retired at night without praying God to return him to her once more.

"And, now that we are reunited," said Mrs. Hathaway, with an affected air of earnestness, "I want to ask you one question."

"What is it, my darling, what is it?" cried the old man, in accents of tenderness and love.

"How did you find the Carson road?"

"Miserable, Vashti, miserable—all sand and alkali."

Then they embraced each other again, and were again united, after having been, twenty-eight years before, "Divorced in the Desert."

The Legend of the Mist.

We stood in the Mission garden, burly Padre Joaquin and I, After the singing of Vespers, when sunlight was leaving the sky. The fresh winds, freed from the ocean, dispersed the dull heat of the day, And the languor that overspread Nature seemed lifted and driven away.

Over the near rising hilltops the white vapors rolled in a cloud That drifted down into the valleys, enwrapping the fields in its shroud, And coolness blew from the mountains like freshness that followeth rain.

Raising the down drooping vineyard, reviving the life of the grain. Then pointed the Padre to eastward, where the winds had tangled the mist

And rifted a cleft, whose rough edges the sun bent forward and kissed. "Listen," he said "to the story—the legend that sometimes is told Concerning the birth of these vapors that wrap hill and vale in their fold:

It chanced, in the earlier ages, a famine seized on the land; The rivers were dried from their sources, drunk up by the thirsty sand.

All life died out of the rivers as slowly the pools decreased, Till the breath of the stagnant waters grew poisonous to man and beast.

The grass died out of the pastures, the cattle grew faint and failed, And, all through the stricken country, town, city, and village wailed. Then wailing passed, and the people moved dumbly in their despair, Or, looking up to the heavens, spoke an unheeded prayer; For still the heavens were cloudless—in an arch of brazen beat Never a fog or a vapor stayed the unspitting heat; Even the falling of darkness brought no relief in its train, Neither dews, nor breath from the ocean, nor cooling foretoken of rain;

And daily, in every temple, with wailing arose the cry, The moan of a stricken people, a nation in agony, Till at length there came an answer: 'Lo! we have heard your cry: The nation has sinned, and a victim is needed—for one must die.' Then each man looked at the other—dumbly then bowed the head, Turning to silence homeward, filled with unspoken dread, For no man throughout the country, from valley to mountain high, Dared offer himself as a victim, and say, 'I am ready to die'— Till at length the chief of the people awakened from his despair, And cried, 'Here am I—a victim. The good gods gave me a care. This people is mine to cherish, and now, when I hear their cry, It is but just I should answer. Take me—I am ready to die.' Then answered the priests, 'Make ready! That which the gods require

Is just, and the life of a victim will fully assuage their ire.' Then, at the head of the people, who gathered from far and nigh, And blessed him with broken voices, he climbed up the hill—to die. And then on the highest hilltop he knelt in the sun's full blaze, And round his bare head a halo seemed cast by the scorching rays. Then, bending, he looked to westward, and waited the coming death, While down in the valley the people prayed in an under breath; And as they prayed, on a sudden, in a moment, when no man wist, There rolled on the hills from westward a cloud of refreshing mist, Reviving the famishing country, o'erspreading it all with its wings, Blessing the air with its coolness, refilling the dried up springs; And when the first mist had vanished, and the noon sun once more shone,

The people looked up to the hilltop, but the martyr-chief was gone, And never, so saith the legend, shall the sea mists fade or fall, For the death of the martyr-chieftain shall ever and aye prevail."

DUBLIN, IRELAND.

HAMILTON DRUMMOND.

It is all wrong to let your church choir go off singing in the opera of Pinafore between Sundays. A dreadful thing recently happened on this account at a Marysville funeral. The pastor, a tall, white-haired man, much resembling an admiral, arose in the pulpit and had no sooner finished, in a sing-song tone, the remark, "We miss his presence in his usual haunts," than the choir sprang to its feet and shouted in return, "And so do his sisters, and his cousins, and his aunts."

There is something curious about a keyhole. A man can always find it in the dark, when he is going out, and never can discover it by moonlight when he is going in.

COUNTRY BRIC-À-BRAC AND ART.

Bucolic bric-à-brac is peculiar. Any one who has enjoyed the pleasure of an hour in a country parlor must have pondered then and there over the curious theory of ornamentation displayed. The taste of country people in the matter of house-decorating is uniform, melancholy, and unique. There is always the same rigidity and solemnity, the same air of funereal fuss and feather, and the same harmony of unharmoniousness. Country people and virtuosos have the common trait of valuing things more or less highly according to the associations connected with them. There is, nevertheless, a variation of ideas as to what associations may be considered valuable. Plato's pocket-handkerchief, or a lock of Cleopatra's hair, would not possess half such charm for honest country folk as a sampler worked by Jane Maria with the entire alphabet in four different styles. These happy people know nothing of Plato's dangerous doctrines, and think of Cleopatra only as a disreputable woman who has been much written up in the ARGONAUT, but Jane Maria is the idol of their hearts and the pride of the county. There was rejoicing and critical appreciation when she finished Moses in the bulrushes in colored worsted, and when she completed George Washington in Berlin wool, borne to glory by two angels in floss, the whole county felt that Jane Maria had a future! A student in tone and color might have suggested that the angels were a shade too pink, or that George Washington, for a spirit, lacked transparency, but he would have been laughed at. This deliciously conservative preference for home art is the secret of much, in country bric-à-brac, that is unfathomable. It seems strange that people who are face to face with nature every day should not learn to despise, or at least detect, the absurdly artificial. But Dame Nature has a way of her own. She is never communicative to those who interview her through the medium of the plowshare and with mercenary intentions, but fills with treasures the minds and imaginations of those who seek her with no ulterior motives. Let us imagine ourselves in the "best room" of the typical country farm-house. The tout ensemble is bewildering and difficult to describe. Each ornament is aggressive, rampant, and detached—stands on its merits and speaks for itself. One pauses involuntarily in their midst to wonder at the originality of invention displayed. It is not true that there is nothing original under the sun. No year goes by but something is evolved from the bucolic brain and rag-bag that stands alone and unrivaled in the heavens above, or the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth. In this country parlor the idea of arrangement is pastoral, and the grouping of the articles of virtu suggests a flock of sheep scattered at random. There is an evident partiality for flowers (artificial flowers) made of worsted, shells, wax, feathers (chicken feathers), and everything and anything. The pièce de résistance, and kept under glass, is a bouquet of hair-work, each flower made of a sample of hair from some member of the family—a fair proportion of the prismatic colors being represented. Pendent from a picture is a large garland of faded artificial flowers, dear to the female heart as souvenirs of generation after generation of bonnets. On the centre table in a china vase, with roses in relief, bloom flowers of bright-hued carpet-ravelings, flaunting imitations of impossibility. If there were only such a thing as a decorative conscience! How it would smite the head of the house whose portrait, painted in China from a photograph, glares in a heathenish manner from the deepest recesses of a pine-cone monstrosity. This latter, an alleged frame, is a precious relic of what is now, alas! almost a lost art. The value of its obtrusiveness cannot be overestimated. Its wonderful proportions quite distract the eye from the picture within. As an offset to this, over the door and worked in perforated card-board is the motto, "No cross no crown" in the form of a rebus. On the wall the ubiquitous Chronicle gift map recalls the time when the whole family went to Europe, in their minds, with Charles Warren Stoddard. The omnipresent chromos betray the taking of one or more cheap periodicals, and a colored lithograph of a horse-race reveals that the head of the house is a little "horsey." It is, perhaps, as well that city bric-à-brac is not quite so transparent. A whole corner of this room is filled by a high-backed horsehair sofa decorated with tidies. On one tidy stiff-legged squirrels roam the dizzy heights of an improbable peavine, and on another a war-horse with arched neck and plethoric tail, and curious as to anatomy, paws the ground in crocheted fury. Mysteries in spatterwork and curiosities in card-board decorate the wall at irregular intervals; and a wonderfully tall cornstalk, reaching away above the picture of Grant and his family, attests the nearly overlooked agricultural element. Meaningless bunches of dried grass, brown with dust, and some large candy hearts, elaborate in detail, and grimy with age, add to the variety. In this list, taken from nature, there are some things amusing, some absurd, and some exasperating. This last adjective refers to the already mentioned wax-flowers. There is nothing in the whole range of imitation that fills one with such a shivery sensation of horror as these stale, cold, clammy, odorless parodies on nature. One ought to have confidence in nature; but it is hard to understand why she did not in the very beginning get out a copyright on vegetation, and stop the wax-flower business. There is one thing more in connection with this apartment worth noticing, and that is the air of complacent gratification and of grandeur attained that surrounds the possession of these treasures, and radiates from the treasuries themselves. These simple, sensible folk do not do as Michael Angelo and other Bohemians have done. They do not set up a hopelessly lofty ideal as a standard, and wear out a restless, feverish life in pursuit of it. They know better, too, than to wait on fickle inspiration. When they want a work of art they go to work and construct it by rule, and when they have followed all the printed instructions they feel that perfection is attained—that it is according to Hoyle and above reproach. A sense of rest and satisfaction is their sweet reward of artistic labor. There is something pathetic as well as ludicrous in this childlike simplicity, and one may very well wonder whether we should not all be better and happier if we could give up this unholy hankering after fine French bronzes, rare old china, and the unattainable, and relapse into the chromo stage of cultivation.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAIRIES.

Serenade in the Tropics.

When the nights are heavy with musk,
And the stars are ripe in the gloaming,
The low moon breaks like an apple of dusk
Through the shadowy leaves like a pomegranate husk,
And I know that my lady is coming.

By the primrose's javelin plume,
And the cereus open, as though
An April frost, in its delicate loom,
Had woven the snow-flakes into a bloom
Of capricious and odorous snow:

By the shadow that, like a glove,
The passion flower's leaf has thrown
In the lists where the laurels breathe and move,
By the sweet syringa's piping of love,
And the jessamine's bugle blown.

But the lisp and the laugh of the leaves
In the bushes are low and sweet,
At bo-peep, hid in the tamarind sheaves,
For the hour of blossom on midsummer eves,
And the sounds of her coming feet.

Like the sudden bloom through the husk
Of the primrose at eventide,
She comes by eddies and pools of musk,
That flower to shape in the fragrant dusk,
And follow her open eyed.

And the blush and the bloom afford
Such a harmony, hour by hour,
My soul confesses a fond accord
To the sweet responsive word for word
Of the night in its perfect flower. WILL HARNEY.

Asleep at the Switch.

The first thing I remember was Carlo tugging away,
With the sleeve of my coat fast in his teeth, pulling as much as to say,
"Come, master, awake, tend to the switch; lives now depend upon you."

Think of the souls in the coming train and the graves you are sending them to;
Think of the mother and babe at her breast, thick of the father and son,

Think of the lover and loved one, too—think of them doomed every one
To fall, as it were by your very hand, into yon fathomless ditch.

Murdered by one who should guard them from harm, who now lies asleep at the switch."

I sprang up amazed—scarce knew where I stood, sleep had o'ermastered me so;
I could hear the wind hollowly howling and the deep river dashing below.

I could hear the forest leaves rustling as the trees by the tempest were fanned;
But what was that noise in the distance? That—I could not understand!

I heard it first indistinctly, like the rolling of some muffled drum;
Then clearer and nearer it came to me, till it made my very ears hum;

What is this light that surrounds me, and seems to set fire to my brain?
What whistle's that yelling so shrilly? O God! I know now—it's the train!

We often stand facing some danger, and seem to take root to the place;
So I stood with this demon before me, its heated breath scorching my face;

Its headlight made day of the darkness, and glared like the eyes of some witch;
The train was almost upon me before I remembered the switch.

I sprang to it, seizing it wildly, the train dashing fast down the track;
The switch resisted my efforts, some devil seemed holding it back.

On, on came the fiery-eyed monster, and shot by my face like a flash;
I swooned to the earth the next moment, and knew nothing after the crash.

How long I lay there unconscious was impossible for me to tell.
My stupor was almost a heaven, my waking almost a hell—

For I then heard the piteous moaning and shrieking of husbands and wives,
And I thought of the day we all shrink from, when I must account for their lives.

Mothers rushed by me like maniacs, their eyes staring madly and wild;
Fathers, losing their courage, gave way to their grief like a child;

Children searching for parents, I noticed as by me they sped,
And lips that could form naught but "Mamma" were calling for one perhaps dead.

My mind was made up in a second, the river should hide me away,
When, under the still burning rafters, I suddenly noticed there lay
A little white hand. She who owned it was doubtless an object of love

To one whom her loss would drive frantic, though she guarded him now from above.

I tenderly lifted the rafters and quietly laid them one side—
How little she thought of her journey when she left for this dark fatal ride!

I lifted the last log from off her, and while searching for some spark of life,
Turned her little face up in the starlight, and recognized—Maggie, my wife!

O Lord! Thy scourge is a hard one—at a blow thou hast shattered my pride;
My life would be one endless night-time with Maggie away from my side.

How oft we've sat down and pictured the scenes of our long happy life;
How I'd strive through all my life-time to build up a home for my wife;

How people would envy us always in our cosy and neat little nest,
When I would do all of the labor, and Maggie should all the day rest;

How one of God's blessings might cheer us, how some day I p'raps should be rich—
But all my dreams have been shattered while I lay there asleep at the switch.

I fancied I stood on my trial, the jury and judge I could see,
And every eye in the court-room was steadfastly fixed upon me;
And fingers were pointed in scorn, till I felt my face blushing blood-red.

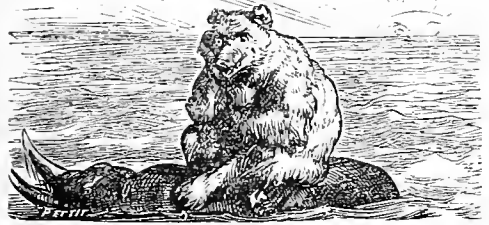

And the next thing I heard were the words, "hanged by the neck until dead,"
Then I felt myself pulled once again, and my hand caught tight hold of a dress,

And I heard, "What's the matter, dear Jim? You've had a bad nightmare, I guess,"
And there stood Maggie, my wife, with never a scar from the ditch

I'd been taking a nap in my bed, and had not been "asleep at the switch." GEORGE HOEV.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 7, 1879.

The ARGONAUT is somehow and almost unconsciously drifting into native Americanism. It is not with premeditated design, for its writers have no feeling against men of foreign nationalities, no prejudice for or against any particular religious belief; do not believe that any church is going to destroy American freedom, or that any nationality is going to overturn republican government. But we see, as every intelligent person can but observe, that there is crowding in upon us a most objectionable foreign immigration, and that, of this class, by far too large a number are pushing themselves into objectionable prominence in our political affairs. There are two distinct nationalities growing up in our land—German and Irish—and the more ignorant and cheeky of these people have begun to arrogate to themselves the election of our law-makers and the choice of our officers. These two nationalities combined control the balance of political power in all our large cities. None but a German or whom the Germans may desire can get an office in St. Louis or Cincinnati. Socialistic Germans are organizing and arming to wrench the political management of Chicago from the native-born, with the avowed purpose of dividing the property by arbitrary taxation, that beer and bread, and sausage and blood pudding, and sauerkraut and Schweitzer-case, and music and tobacco, may be free. This political ascendancy is being acquired through the indifference of the American born and the unconscious and perhaps natural sympathy of foreigners for their compatriots and co-religionists. When a respectable German or Irishman sees one of his countrymen proposed for office, it is not unnatural that he should vote for him. A Catholic or a Jew sees one of his faith asking votes; it is perhaps not unnatural that he should accord it. But when it comes to an organization of nationalities and a combination of co-religionists to direct and control the politics of our country, then we have a right to be annoyed, to be alarmed, to be indignant; and, being annoyed, alarmed, and indignant, we have a right to say so; and, undertaking to say anything, we must be permitted to call Germans Germans, Irish Irish, Catholics Catholics, and Jews Jews. Our readers will reserve to themselves the privilege of neglecting to read or patronize our paper, and, unless we discuss these questions in a dignified and courteous manner, they will exercise this privilege by discontinuing the ARGONAUT. Those intelligent persons who attentively read our writings will observe how carefully we endeavor to discriminate between those of foreign birth who come among us for business purposes and those whose sole and only occupation is political agitation and official loot. We have many nationalities who do not thrust themselves into political prominence. The most noticeable are the Englishmen and the Frenchmen. We have no especial annoyance from any except the Irish and Germans, and God knows that their politicians are simply and awfully dreadful. They are worse than the lice or locusts of Egypt, the grasshoppers of Kansas, the potato bug of Colorado; they are worse than the curculio among vines or smut in wheat; they are more annoying than the Scotch itch, tetter, or poison oak. Jews, as a rule, are most excellent citizens, and rarely become candidates for office; but when a gentleman from Jerusalem does go in for a place, he invokes the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; he despoils the political Egyptians; he parts the waters of the party sea; he traverses the desert of importunity; he smites the rock of cheek and the waters gush out; he reaches the promised land of office, and, O Moses! how he does fatten on the milk and honey of official perquisites.

Our issue of May 24th contained a tabulated statement of the defalcations, swindles, and tangled accounts of our criminal city officials for a few years past. We left the manuscript and went to Oregon. It was printed. It contained the names of eight of Irish, four of German, four of English, one of Scotch, one of Dutch, and one of American birth. Eight were of the Catholic faith, seven of Jewish, and four Protestant. There was only one American, and no Republican among them. Our object was to show first, that a large preponderance of our city officials are of foreign birth, and that of the thieves in office none have been of the Republican party. Upon our return, after eleven days' absence, we found our desk piled with communications, some vilely and personally offensive, some over well-known signatures, many anonymous, and all from Jews. We are convinced that the table contained two errors. Conrad Helriegel and Emil Niemeier are not of the Jewish but of the Lutheran faith. In all other particulars our statement was correct. The Jewish Observer gives us an editorial notice intended to be personally offensive, and it is, we believe, not the second, nor third, or fourth time that this neither very talented nor very respectable newspaper has thus noticed one of the editors of the ARGONAUT. We accept it, however, as the organ of a religious class, and we shall not be expected to apologize to our respectable Jewish fellow-citizens so long as this sheet, sustained by them, is permitted the license of premeditated misrepresentation and offensive personalities. We understand, of course, that there are Jews and Jews. We understand the wide gulf that separates the cultivated and well-born gentleman from the ignorant and dirty of that religion. We understand and fully appreciate the fact that Jews, as a rule, do not seek office, do not thrust themselves offensively forward into our political affairs, and are good citizens; but we also know that there is a class of meddlesome and most unprincipled individuals who are pleased to call themselves "Israelites," but whom we are pleased to style "vulgar Jews," who are the most obnoxious, persistent, and clamorous of all our foreign-born adventurers for place. We say that, as a rule, they are not to be trusted in office; that they are dishonest, incompetent, discourteous, and unreliable in public positions, and that the history of our municipality justifies us in this assertion. We speak of "Jews" using the term for want of any other. We do not desire to use an unkind nor a discourteous word, but we know of no other mode of designating their nationality than by writing "English Jews," "German Jews," "Polish Jews," and, after diligent inquiry, we find none of the faith, but the ignorant, who object to the term. We desire to make an end of this Jewish business, by saying now, and for the last time, by way of explanation, that we have a multitude of friends (social and business) of the Jewish faith. We respect them, and believe they appreciate us in this endeavor to drive a set of their vulgar co-religionists out of our American politics—a class that is utterly despised by respectable men, and forever dragging their good name into disrepute by their questionable proceedings. Those business men, bankers, and professional gentlemen, who are justly proud of their religion, and who are justly ashamed of the adventurers who are endeavoring to slip into office through the doors of a synagogue they never visit, are in full accord and sympathy with us in this endeavor to Americanize American politics.

And now we come to another and kindred topic, and having printed from the associated news dispatches the following, we demand to know what it means. Mr. Eugene Kelly mentioned therein is a wealthy Catholic Irish banker, formerly from San Francisco, and of the firm of Donohoe, Kelly & Co. But read: "The Catholic archbishops and bishops 'in a large number of wealthy laymen of the city and county, last night, at the rooms of Xavier Union. Eugene Kelly introduced John E. Devlin, who read an address of 'welcome to the reverend visitors. Representative Catholics were present from many States, including California 'among them, and discussed plans of the Catholic Colonization Association of the United States. A meeting was 'held on Friday of the bishops and laity interested. The 'object of the association is to promote and assist the colonization on the prairies of the West of sober, thrifty, and industrious Catholics. A preliminary meeting of the Board of Directors was held yesterday at the residence of Rev. Dr. McGlynn, of St. Stephen's. Bishop Spaulding, the chairman, made an address. The association did not propose to relieve pauperism except by preventing it; but it 'proposed to aid the industrious workman to find a home 'for himself and family in the West under Catholic auspices, 'which would secure for him and his children all security 'sought by Catholics.' This meeting was recently held in the city of New York. It means, we presume, that the Catholic archbishop, the bishop, and the wealthy laymen of Catholic faith and Irish birth are importing to America Irish Catholics. We ask: why is it more desirable to 'promote 'and assist' Catholics to a home on our Western prairies than Protestants? If this is a national and American movement, why discriminate in aiding a Catholic Irishman to find for himself and family a home rather than a Protestant Irishman? If it is charitable, why confine it to Catholics? To us it seems narrow, bigoted, and unpatriotic—neither liberal nor consistent; neither generous to Ireland or America. The industrious, working Irishman who is a Protestant needs a home in America just as much as one who professes the Romish faith, and America welcomes those of all religions, and finds in the foreign Protestant quite as good a citizen as it does in the Catholic. What a howl would go up if the Episcopalian clergy and wealthy laymen of the English Church should combine to import their professing members and exclude from the benefit of their funds the Dissenter.

Why not have immigration associations in aid of Dunkers, hardshell Baptists, Methodists, or Swedenborgians? When this Catholic colony is established upon our prairies of the West, will its members exercise an intelligent political freedom independent of the archbishops, bishops, and wealthy Catholic laymen? Will its schools be free common schools in the American sense, and will its children be educated in them without sectarian teaching? We know, and every intelligent American knows, that this movement is intended to promote the interests of Catholics and the Catholic Church, and has not the welfare of the government or of American in view. It looks to us as though it had some sinister purpose not at all in accordance with the spirit of American nationality, nor in accordance with the spirit of the Divine Master, who taught a wider philanthropy and a broader generosity than confine themselves to the profession of any one religion or the members of any one church. We trust we shall not wound the sensibilities of any one of our Irish Catholic fellow-citizens in discussing this question, nor offend them by asking what the movement portends.

And while we are upon this subject of foreign nationalities, we beg to pay our compliments to our German fellow-citizens, and demand of them what we Americans are to think of the following resolutions passed by a German club in San Francisco at a recent meeting:

WHEREAS, The Mayor, Auditor and District Attorney have expressed openly that they would condemn the Spring Valley Water Works, and sell them to the city of San Francisco for $12,000,000; and whereas, said $12,000,000 would plunge into debt not only the present, but the unborn generation; therefore, be it
 Resolved, That we warn these officials against so doing.
 Resolved, That if they will not heed this warning, that the Working-men's party of California shall rise en masse and hang them.

In the names of the great King Gambrinus and all the belly gods of Germany what does this mean? Upon what unhappy times have we fallen that a band of illiterate Germans, possessing neither property nor sense, can convene and deliberately proclaim their threats against the officers of an American municipality, and threaten to hang American citizens if they shall purchase water for the consumption of an American city? We demand to know whether this is the insane raving of a band of political fools and idiots, or is it the German way of exercising political influence in an American republic? Does this German workingmen's club represent the average German workman's mind in its endeavor to work out the problem of republican government, or is it the expression of a band of socialistic criminals who think to frighten American citizens by mouthing the empty threats of an ignorant and unprincipled Irish drayman? We ask the German Democrat to give us the solution of this phenomenon. What does it portend? To what is it leading? We ask for advice. What shall we do with these naturalized and unnaturalized Germans who meet, form military organizations, arm and drill themselves, and threaten to hang us and our officials? We seek counsel. We can not read these resolutions printed in German; we can not understand these threats pronounced in German. We see this German invasion of our country. We hear that in Germany there is a great dangerous party that assassinates kings, and proclaims its deliberate intention to subvert all laws and confiscate all property. We see it coming to our country, growing in numbers, increasing in audacity and insolent boldness, forming clubs and military organizations, and threatening our lives. We ask the better class of Germans what we are to do? We are uneasy. We fear our institutions are imperiled. We hope we are not unnecessarily alarmed, and that with the assistance of intelligent, respectable, property-owning, and law-abiding foreign citizens, we may be able to avert this threatened evil. But the danger that causes anxiety to Bismarck must not be underrated by us. The movement that disturbs a great military power like the German Empire may reasonably create anxiety in a Republic like ours. In this connection we would suggest to the German editors that it would be more satisfactory if they would discuss this question upon its merits and have less personal abuse for a writer for the ARGONAUT. We see our name and that of our journal looking out from the hieroglyphics of an unknown type, and though we guess the comments are not complimentary to us, we are undisturbed as to what we can not read.

We see but one political remedy for this great evil that is growing up in our land, and that is the formation of an American party; a party that shall embrace all native-born and all intelligent foreign-born, who are willing that American politics should be controlled by Americans and American offices held by Americans. A foreign citizen, duly naturalized, who has been in the country twenty-one years, should be regarded as native-born and should be eligible to any position of honor or profit. Let the laws be so changed that none should be naturalized till they had been upon the soil as long as the native-born, and none should hold office that are not intelligently competent. We have made a mistake in the liberality of our election laws. We should have had an intelligence, property, and moral test as a qualification for the exercise of the elective privilege, and the sooner we correct this mistake the better it will be for all. A continuance in the direction where we are now drifting will wreck our republican government, and we shall fall into anarchy and chaos, to be succeeded by a strong military government after perhaps a bloody and disastrous struggle. It is altogether illogical and absurd that this vicious and foreign element should exercise such dangerous political power as it does in our nation. It is not creditable to the sense of the American people, nor to the better element of foreigners that seek asylum among us. We divide upon political questions, separate into party organizations—Republicans and Democrats—while all the propertyless and vicious combine. Our position is illustrated to-day by stating the proposition as presented by California politics. We are just now forming party lines to choose a judiciary to interpret a new organic law, a Legislature to give legal vitality to its provisions, an administration to supervise its workings in State, municipal, and county governments. There are no political questions involved; there are no proper party issues. It is a simple question of good laws, good courts, and good government, against bad legislation, corrupt tribunals, and ultimate hell. Yet good society lacks the intelligence to unite for the protection of property and for the preservation of order. Our journalists, our politicians, and our property-owners can not agree upon the best way of bringing about a result that all desire. The kind of party we propose would enable all patriotic persons to unite—Republicans and Democrats, Northern and Southern men, foreign and native-born—in the formation of an American party, and this party should embrace all the intelligent, property-owning, order-loving, decent people of the State of California, and having for its underlying idea the Americanization of American politics, and the placing of all offices in the keeping of adult male citizens who have been twenty-one years upon American soil. This is the kind of party we should desire to see firmly planted upon our soil. We are quite sure it would attain a healthy and national growth. But it will never be. We are all torn to pieces by ambitious party demagogues. We are under the shadow of a coming Presidential election. We are rent by factions, disturbed by sectional jealousies; and our impending State election is to be contested by four parties, struggling to destroy each other, with a possibility that a combination of ignorance with crime, and vice with idleness, may give us the government, the courts, and the Legislature, that shall make, interpret, and enforce our laws.

In the absence of any such organization as we suggest, and in view of the fact that of the two great distinctive national parties, one—the Democracy—is temporarily demoralized by the sloughing off of its head (the chivalry), and its tail (the workingmen); in view of the fact that parties, like snakes, can not successfully wriggle forward without either head or tail, and in view of the fact that the Republican party has an organization, and has a respectable following; that it is the party of organized intelligence, property, good morals, and respectability; in view of the fact that this is an off year in Federal politics; that there are no questions in this State dividing Southern from Northern men, and no antagonisms of interest between respectable foreigners and native-born citizens, we recommend and cordially invite all gentlemen and good citizens to unite with the Republicans in giving to this State and city good government, a good judiciary, and a good legislature. The Republican State Convention will nominate a non-partisan judicial ticket, embracing the best learning and the highest integrity of the bar of the State. We see no reason why we should not also unite upon the Legislative and municipal ticket, always providing that the Democracy honestly and unreservedly foregoes the making of nominations. In this way we can harmonize all political jealousies, forego all party conflicts, and for once, like honest and intelligent men, work together for the public good. This would dispose of all these vexatious questions that are now distracting us. It would lay the Kearney ghost. It would dispose of the Chronicle's attempt to hybridize politics by an unnatural cross between the chivalry and the Irish. It would drive back into its den this hungry communistic German wolf with its gleaming teeth and its angry howl. It would rebuke the sectarian Catholic, and the class clamorous Jew, and, better than all, it would give us political repose, and permit us to go to work in a direction and for the accomplishment of ends from which this most unprofitable political contest, this never-ending party struggle, is now diverting us.

If there is any conflict that seems to us unnatural and unprofitable, it is that between labor and capital. If there is any community in the world where this conflict should not exist, it is California. If there is any period of time when such a condition is altogether undesirable, it is now. There are communities in the old world where wealth has been accumulating for ages. By the operation of peculiar laws this aggregation of capital has been concentrating in the hands of the privileged few. Laws of primogeniture and entail working through long periods of time have concentrated the wealth of a nation into the ownership of the few, and left the great struggling mass of the industrious many to feel its oppression. Perhaps France is the best illustration of the terrible condition to which a people may be brought by the operation of a system that reduced the ownership of lands to the possession of privileged classes. England, in the feudal ages, was another illustration of the same unfortunate condition of affairs. When the crown, the nobles, and the church can monopolize the domain and reduce the people to that strait of poverty that they become vassals to the soil, are deprived of its ownership, have no participation in the profits of their labor, are too poor to acquire land of their own, and are unable to remove from the country, and are deprived of any participation or voice in its political affairs, then theirs is a deplorable condition. If this condition is only to be ameliorated by revolution, it is neither a matter of surprise nor of regret that they should make successful effort to effect governmental change. France made this change when Louis XIV. arrogantly proclaimed himself the state. The Napoleonic wars—the result of a great revolution—changed the condition of France, and the dynasty of Napoleon was compelled to declare itself Emperor of the French. The Government of France is to-day republican, and the French people are among the prosperous ones of Europe. This great change was produced by the enactment of laws that allowed the division of lands, and enabled the people who tilled the soil to own it. From France we took the first hints of our government. France was our school-master in republicanism, and we have, ever since the formation of our republic, enjoyed the same character of laws in reference to the acquisition, ownership, and distribution of lands as has proved so desirable to the French people, and has in so wonderful a degree contributed to their prosperity.

While we are contrasting the liberal laws of our own country with those of Europe, let us call the attention of all foreign-born citizens to this general fact: There is no reform demanded in France by Communists, in Germany by Social Democrats, or in Russia by Nihilists, or in England by the agricultural laborers, nor anywhere by the working classes, that is not possible under our existing laws. There is not upon the statute-book of California, nor in its code, civil, criminal, or political, a single law that the most advanced reformer of Europe has demanded, except those that guarantee to the owners of property its enjoyment. There are in Europe, especially in Germany, wild theorists who have in contemplation the division, distribution, and enjoyment of all property in common. Those men would not be content with our laws; but we have all the power, all the liberty, all the protection, all the political privileges, all the freedom of conscience, of education, of personal rights, of exemption from military service, that the most advanced of the intelligent reformers of Europe have ever demanded. It seems to us very marvelous and very absurd that in a government where every white male citizen over twenty-one years of age is clothed with full political power, and enjoys its absolute and unrestricted exercise, where all are born in perfect equality, where education is provided for every child at no cost to the parent, where there is a press free to the verge of license, where there are labor and large wages for every willing worker, where there are broad fertile lands to be taken as a gift, where there are vast ranges of metaliferous bearing mountains and no restriction against their working, where there are vast primeval forests bounding navigable streams free to the woodman's axe, where there are oceans, inland seas, and great rivers abounding in fish, and open to free fishing, that there should be an organized band of conspirators to agitate for political reforms. There is only one possible way for these demoralized and worthless Americans, and these criminal adventurers, lazy, whisky and beer guzzling foreigners to improve their conditions, and that is by going to the country and going to work. They will accomplish no good for themselves by howling upon the sand-lot. A new Constitution, a successful election, a judicial tribunal, a governor, a mayor can not give labor, nor bread, nor free drinks. There is no way of wrenching men's accumulations from them, except by overturning the government and inaugurating an armed insurrection; there can be brought about no change in land tenures or division of personal effects except by violence and war. In event of violence, strife, and contention, the poor must suffer and the destitute must starve. We commend these reflections to the consideration of those decent-minded men who have some little sense, and know what is for their best interest, and the best interest of the class to which they belong.

Kearney has so far won his fight with the Chronicle; has maintained his party organization, its name, and himself as its president, and has placed a ticket before the people with Mr. William F. White, a farmer of Santa Cruz County, for Governor. He has swung his shillalah in defiance of the honorable bilks. He has adopted the motto of Donnybrook, and wherever a head raises itself in opposition to himself as Dictator he hits it a bloody whack. Mr. White is an old and respectable resident of the State, whose life has hitherto been so obscure that nothing ill has ever been said of him. He comes now for the first time under the calcium light of a party investigation. If he has ever done anything worse than to put the largest potatoes at the top of the bag, and the best, largest, and ripest strawberries on the top layer of the box, it will be found out and proclaimed. His qualifications, his fitness, and his intelligence, will not become matters of investigation; such questions cut no figure in the party whose candidate he has become.

Wm. F. White, the Workingmen's candidate for Governor, comes within the ARGONAUT'S definition of "native-born" citizens. He has been an American twenty-one years. We are pained to observe the narrow and bigoted native American prejudices shown by the Chronicle in sneeringly alluding to the fact that he was born in Limerick, and came unwillingly to the country, at the age of eighteen months.

The Watsonville Transcript describes Mr. Wm. F. White as a "place-hunting, time-serving, unscrupulous, untrustworthy old trickster in politics, who has been hunting for 'office in every campaign for the last twenty years.' Verily a politician is not without honor save in his own county newspaper, and among those of his friends and neighbors who know him best.

At this writing we can not know whether Judge Morrison will accept the nomination of Kearney to be Chief Justice or not. We do not see how it would be possible. Morrison has two distinguishing characteristics: he is a devoted Roman Catholic, and he is an honest and honorable man. His religious opinions ought to make him despise Kearney as infidel to all beliefs and a renegade to a church in which he has been born and to which he owes a just allegiance. No self-respecting Roman Catholic can receive political favors at the hands of Denis Kearney. Judge Morrison knows also that he has neither the requisite law learning, nor the judicial experience, to be Chief Justice of California, and that his elevation to that position would be a matter of regret to the bar of San Francisco, all of whom would desire to have him continue in his present position of usefulness as a nisi prius judge.

Mr. McKee is also nominated by Kearney for the supreme bench. The remarks we have made in reference to Judge Morrison will apply with equal force to Judge McKee. Judge McKee is not esteemed as a jurist of sufficient ability to adorn the supreme bench. In justice to himself he ought to decline, and thus save himself the mortification of finding how few people there are in California who think him competent as a Supreme Judge.

Judge Morrison, when put in nomination by the Irish Convention over whom the Irish drayman presided, was complimented for "his zealous efforts to aid the business of naturalization;" and Judge McKinstry was not kindly received by reason of some decision he had rendered for or against the Hibernia Bank. The name of not one lawyer of eminent learning or judicial ability was mentioned for judge in the Kearney Convention.

There are now four political parties in the field: The Republican, the Democratic, the Honorable Bilks, and the Workingmen's piece party, or, as they delight to abbreviate themselves, the W. P. C. Party. Kearney leads the W. P. C.; the Chronicle leads the Honorable Bilks; the Democracy are keeping a lively lookout, and the Republicans are steadily minding their own business, and earnestly preparing for their State Convention. It looks now as though Mr. John F. Swift would be the Republican nominee for Governor, and would be easily elected.

The Chronicle is in the throes of a tremendous labor. It is making prodigious efforts to strangle the Workingmen's movement that it may be safely delivered of a successful party. It is too soon to prophesy what will be the result of the contest between the W. P. C. and the H. B. organizations. The Democracy occupy the position of the wife who witnessed the fight between the husband and the bear, or, perhaps, a better simile would be to compare that party to the she-tigress watching the conflict of two males of her species, resigned to become the mistress of the victor.

The devil rebuking sin is illustrated in the Chronicle's moral lecture to Kearney for associating by implication Mr. Delegate Dean with the thieves who oppose him. In the same column the Chronicle denounces Kearney as a "brainless liar," a "mean and mendacious coward," a "blatherskite and blackguard." The Chronicle should add to its boast of "enterprise and influence" that of "dignity and decency." If a prize could be offered to the champion blackguard, we should witness the struggle between the Chronicle and Kearney with great interest.

We are pained to observe that several of the Republican ward clubs have allowed Republican ward plug-uglies of audacious cheek to impose themselves by authority upon General and Mrs. Grant so soon as they shall arrive in our city. The nasty sweating palms and bad breath of ward politicians are not the welcome to which this distinguished American should be subjected. There should be a movement among gentlemen to give him a proper reception, and there should be no element of politics in it. As a military hero, it should only be remembered that he was brave and generous, and that he was the President of the whole nation.

The New Constitution party is now only three weeks old, and it has one hundred and forty clubs organized in forty counties. This looks like a healthy beginning, but it should be remembered that squabs are largest when

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

A visitor elegant, apperceiving the little girl of the house, her says: "How comest thou thyself, dear little?"
 "Very well, thank," responds the infant.
 Then the visitor adds: "And meanwhile it must demand of me how I myself carry."
 The infant, with candor—"I do not care how you do."

"For five days a group of shipwrecked voyagers have been tossing about on a raft, a prey to the tortures of hunger and thirst.

The fatal resolve is at last taken to cast lots and see which one shall die to save his comrades. The unfortunate man sees six knives presented at his throat by men with hard wolfish eyes.

"No, no," he mutters hoarsely; "your hands might tremble: give me a pistol and let me blow out my brains."

"Don't you do it," cries one of the party; "if there's anything I'm fond of it's brains en tortue."

Scene: At St. Petersburg.

Janitor.—I can't stand this any longer, sir; I don't mind doing the duties ordinarily expected of one in my position, but I can not be on watch all the twenty-four hours to see that the Nihilists don't stick revolutionary posters on the wall. I've gone eleven nights without sleep now.

Proprietor.—But, my poor Ivan Ivanovitch, I did not make the law which all owners of houses are obliged to obey, providing for a fine of 500 roubles if a placard is posted up on the premises, and imprisonment if the offense is repeated. Here, drink this coffee—it will keep you awake. To-night I will go on watch and you can get a good sleep.

Janitor.—Thanks, my good master, your nobly considerate conduct lends me renewed strength.

(An hour later the janitor comes into breakfast.)

Proprietor.—Great Todleben! * where have you been? why, man, there's a revolutionary placard pasted on your back!

Janitor.—Is there? I suppose I must have closed my eyes for a minute or two. They have a keen eye for business, those Nihilists. Let's tear it up.

Proprietor.—No; don't tear it up, because some of the fragments might be found and we might be sent to Siberia. Burn it up, coat and all—I'll give you a new one. Now, go back to your post, and for the love of heaven do not doze a wink.

(The Janitor returns. The proprietor watches him from a window, and whenever he nods shouts, "Now, then, Ivan Ivanovitch, keep awake!") In the course of the long, long, weary day the police arrive.)

Official.—We have come to search the premises.

Proprietor.—But, count, I belong to no association. I am merely a peaceful citizen who passes his days and nights watching to see that his watchman doesn't fall to sleep.

Official.—I have General Gourko's orders to enter your house and see that you have no concealed arms.

Proprietor.—All I have is an old shot-gun without lock, stock, or barrel.

Official.—The Nihilists could easily furnish you those. Your shot-gun is confiscated and you may thank your lucky stars that you get off so easily. What's in that drawer?

Proprietor.—Knives.

Official.—Knives! I confiscate them.

Proprietor.—But, Prince, they are table-knives, and to-night I give a dinner party—my daughter is engaged to be married, and this is to celebrate her betrothal.

Official.—You must eat with your fingers, that's all.

Proprietor.—But, Grand Duke, how are we to carve the fowls?

Official.—Tear 'em in pieces, or bite out chunks—it'll be in the family. Where's your bed-room?

Proprietor.—Here, your Imperial Excellency, and if you find any deadly weapon in it I want to be sent to Siberia.

Official.—I might send you there if it were worth the trouble, for here is a razor which in the practiced hands of a desperate man might be used to slay the whole imperial family. I will confiscate the razor.

(The family dinner takes place, though under disadvantages, and the unhappy man forgets all the trials and troubles of the day. At the dessert, just as he is about to propose the health of the soon-to-be wedded pair, he receives a note conched in these terms:)

"You are a traitor! You have to-day given up to the tyrants the arms in your possession. You have, therefore, been doomed to death. Yours respectfully,

"THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

"per Tomski Collinsovitch."

Proprietor (tearing his hair).—There! That's all that was lacking to make it complete. Read that!

His Future Son-in-Law.—You were wrong, sir; there is a good deal to be said on both sides.

Proprietor.—Wrong! was I? Perhaps you are a Nihilist? (with bitter sarcasm.)

His Future Son-in-Law.—I have the honor to be the Chief of Section 217, and I don't care who knows it.

His Daughter.—Yes, pa, and that is why I lo-ho-hove him. (Casts herself into her lover's arms.)

Proprietor.—Merciful heaven! are you a Nihilist, too, Paulovna?

His Daughter.—Yes, pa, and so are my sisters, and my cousins, and my aunts.

All the Guests.—And so are we—all of us.

Proprietor.—I will denounce you to the authorities—call the police.

His Future Son-in-Law.—If you utter one word I will fire this train and blow up the house, which we had mined as a precaution lest the police should make a descent on us while we were at dinner.

Proprietor.—And here I have been passing my days and nights keeping watch on my janitor.

Omnes.—Your janitor! Ho-ho! Look out of the window and see what your janitor is doing.

Proprietor.—May I be knouted and sent to Siberia if my janitor isn't covering the whole front of the house with four-sheet revolutionary posters! (Faints.)

* "Great Todleben" is a popular Russian exclamation, much like our "Great Scott."

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

The Archery Tournament.

"Ho, archers! on to-morrow's morn
 Twang the bow and blow the horn.

"Chivalry and beauty, blent,
 Will be at our tournament,

"Bold as bowman ever stood
 In the ranks of Robin Hood.

"Fail not one to cast his dart
 Straight into the target's heart,

"And thus win the sweet applause Justly due us—for our cause,"

* * * * *

Twang of bow and blare of horn
 Roused the echoes of the morn.

Rag and tag, and bobtail, all
 Hastened at the trumpet-call.

Half a dozen archers fleet
 Sallied down the muddy street,

And before him each one bore
 A target big as a cellar-door.

Bore it like an olden knight
 Bore his shield into the fight.

But instead of coats of mail
 Dressed they a la Spotted Tail.

At the very verge of town
 Each one cast his target down,

Called for pretzels and for beer—
 Danced a war-dance on his ear—

While the scorers marked the spot,
 And the distance to be shot.

Twenty paces—O ye gods!
 But they cried out, "What's the odds?"

"Were it less or were it more,
 We can hit a cellar door!"

Then each valiant archer stood,
 Posed himself like Robin Hood,

Pulled his bow-string to his ear,
 Shot, and missed the target, clear!

Then with wide-distended jaws
 Hoodlums yelled, and loud applause,

Mingled with uproarious fun,
 Snote each archer's tympanum.

Sadly back along the street,
 Like an army in defeat,

Trod the heroes who at morn
 Sallied forth with blare of horn;

And the daily papers told
 How each one had pierced the "gold,"

Fairly at a hundred paces,
 With an ill-wind in their faces!

The Garden.

"Come into the garden, Maud,"

For the black bat, Night, has flown,
 And the cats that danced on the onion bed

Have left it, at last, alone:
 But there isn't an onion in the patch

That I would care to own.

"For the breezes of morning move,"
 And the sun is climbing high.

And I look at the garden patch I love,
 And think I should like to die;

I could kick every cat in the neighborhood
 Clear up the azure sky.

All night the onions have heard
 Brindle and Tabby, and Tom;

And the truck patch looks as it had been stirred
 By an eight-inch Ericsson bomb;

If you mentioned the pansy bed in a word,
 You would have to call it a "glom."

They have made one long, wild tear,
 From the porch to the alley gate;

They are coming again, I swear,
 And I collar the shotgun and wait.

And bridle wails, "Is he here? Is he here?"
 And the gray cat yells on the gate;

And the black cat yowls at the other in fear,
 And the yellow cat wails in hate.

They are coming, I hear their feet,
 On the roof and the porch they tread;

They are coming to wrestle and beat
 Down the earth in my onion bed.

But I hurl them back in retreat
 With a handful of powder and lead,

And I laugh at their wails and scrambling feet
 On the roof of my neighbor's shed.

A Tale of Love (For Young Married People).

Sweet William went to court the lovely Nell,
 Sing ho! to Aphrodite and her dove,

And oh, he vowed to ever love her well,
 Sing ho! to gentle Cupid, god of Love.

So attentive, too, was he,
 It was very plain to see

That he cherished her all other maids above;
 So the neighbors all looked wise,

And the spinsters rolled their eyes,
 Singing ho! for gentle Cupid, god of Love.

In time the lovely Nellie married Will,
 Sing hey! for Aphrodite and her dove;

And though kind friends were prophesying ill,
 Sang hey! for gentle Cupid, god of Love.

Then, in all sincerity,
 Swore they deathless constancy,

And to cherish each all others else above;
 And quarrel would they never.

But they'd live in peace for ever.
 Sing ha! ha! the merry Cupid, god of Love.

Alas! for best laid plans of mice and men,
 Sing ah! for Aphrodite and her dove,

For oft they fail to carry out, and then
 Sing ab! for fickle Cupid, god of love.

So they talked it o'er one day
 And they thought the only way

That their happiness could possibly improve,
 Was to get them a divorce—

From their neighbors' though, of course—
 Sing ho! ho! to jolly Cupid, god of love.

ABOUT WOMEN.

Grecian ladies counted their age from their marriage, not from their birth.

A Steubenville woman calls her cow Wedge, because she always has to drive her in.

A fellow who fell in love with a schoolma'am called her "Experience," because to him she was a dear teacher.

Mrs. Partington says the only way to prevent steamboat explosions is to make the engineers bile the water on shore.

In Morocco the "swell society girls" live on the fat of the land, for obesity is there regarded as a mark of great beauty.

"Clara" writes that she hopes that the electric light will never be introduced for parlor use, "because it can't be turned down."

Don't grow old too fast, says the Christian Intelligencer. But the warning comes too late for Clara Louise Kellogg and Susan B. Anthony.

Vassar girl, eating her first gooseberries: "N'yum! N'yum! yum—m—m—m!" Wouldn't I like to see the goose that laid these berries!"

A pretty, wealthy, and accomplished Pittsburg girl has married an ignorant and ugly negro to spite her parents. Black ingratitude!

"I have got so in the habit of being married by an Episcopalian clergyman that I really don't feel satisfied with any other kind," said a Chicago widow.

A poetess sings: "Tho' I were dead my heart would beat for thee." This would certainly be a "dead beat" darling, and we don't want it and won't have it.

He caroled: "Now, my dear,
 Will you have a glass of beer?"
 And she answered: "George, I'd sooner
 Have a schooner."

When a Chinaman makes love to a girl he doesn't rave about his heart panting for her, etc. No, he simply tells her he loves her better than he does rats, and she believes him.

A young man in Nebraska sent an offer of marriage to a girl in Iowa whom he fancied, and in reply received this telegram: "Come on with your minister."

Emma Kelly, of Carson City, Nevada, fifteen years old, committed suicide because she was ashamed to beg any longer for her sisters and brothers; and in a note which she left she apologized for bad spelling because she was in a hurry.

Now, Lilla N. Cushman has gone and said it again, in the Yonkers Gazette. Her poem begins, Oh, rain upon my mouth thy kisses sweet." Lilla, you are the most covetous woman we ever knew. Don't you want a whole thunder shower?

A sweet little girl from Oquawkah
 Was an in-de-fat-iga-ble talkah.
 Her muscular lung
 And versatile tongue
 Were the wonder and pride of Oquawkah.

She helped him out of the difficulty by a suggestion. Her parents refusing to allow him to see her, he had himself arrested for breaking into a building, and then subpoenaed the girl as a witness. By this means he secured access to her long enough to accomplish marriage, by the friendly help of a minister.

The lady who married the coachman intended to keep the affair secret, and had some reason to think she could do so, as she had four lady confidants as bridesmaids to help keep her confidence. Nevertheless it got out, and at once the principal and four confidants naturally suspected the preacher of telling about it.

We hear of an excessively modest lady who can not talk to a gentleman (excepting, of course, her husband) without blushing, who turned scarlet red, as usual, when, on asking "Charles" through the telephone which connected home with the office what time he would be home to dinner, a strange male voice replied:

"While heiresses in the East were engaged in marrying coachmen and big buck niggers," says a Western paper, "Dakota has set the noble example of winning a rich merchant's daughter with a poor cavalryman," which is romantic and at the same time in good taste, while as a business transaction no one can deny that it beats the coachman and nigger marrying.

The kind of clock that Cincinnati girls receive for a wedding gift marks the quarter hour by a delicious chime so soft and low as to seem like the echo of music heard in a dream, music that softer falls than petals from blown roses on the grass or night dew on still waters—a clock to mark the "noiseless foot of time that only treads on flowers." Wow!

As some lady visitors were going through a penitentiary under the escort of a superintendent, they came to a room in which three women were sewing. "Dear me!" one of the visitors whispered, "what vicious-looking creatures? Pray, what are they here for?" "Because they have no other home; this is our sitting-room, and they are my wife and two daughters," blandly answered the superintendent.

Now is the season of love and light,
 When thoughts of a summer suit
 Follow by day and haunt by night
 The fashionable galeot.
 When the little maid, for a little love,
 Casts aside her infantile doll,
 And flouts in the face of heaven above
 A striped parasol.

Maria Antoinette is described in the Souvenirs of Madame Vigée Le Brun, just published in London: "She was tall, admirably proportioned, plump, without being too much so; her arms were lovely; she had small and perfectly shaped hands, and charming little feet. She walked better than any woman in France, holding her head very upright, with a majesty that denoted the sovereign in the midst of her court, without this majestic bearing detracting in the least from the sweetness and grace of her whole aspect. The most remarkable thing about her face was the brilliancy of her complexion. I never saw anything like it."

AN INTERCEPTED LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 5, 1879.

MY DEAR MADGE:—The annual hegira has begun. The horn of Flora McFlimsey has awakened all Fashiondom to the knowledge that the days have come when the best worshipped saint of these latter days, Appearances, demands of all the devout and faithful that they enter on that pilgrimage whose Holy Grail is a tin cup of sulphur water, and whose promised land is the wave-washed beach of Santa Cruz or the rock-ribbed glories of Yosemite. And the devout are no laggards, for the Paladins and Paladinesses of a hundred homes are already forth trooping to break economic launces against the steel of infidel stage-drivers and the polished brass of heretic hotel-keepers. Yet rather different from their prototypes in the dead centuries are these modern crusaders. For the rags of asceticism have given place to the summer ulsters of self-indulgence; the water flagon and the leathern pouch of maize are supplanted by the more seductive brandy flask and the more gratifying Poodle-Dog hamper; the Cœur de Lion casque has become a broad-brimmed sombrero, beneath which paterfamilias exudes plenty and perspiration; and in a score of vine-hung valleys, by a hundred brooks whose clear waters, down tumbling into crystal pools beneath the alders, gurgles an endless satire on the insipidity of the champagne of metropolitan existence, Fashion accepts gratefully the lax etiquette that permits a sybaritic and endless lounge in a wrapper, and turns eagerly from the wearying worship of ceremony to the indolent worship of self. The fading away of the fashionables is already apparent at the theatres, though the arrival of the summer season is more deeply impressed on me domestically. Madge, from the fact that Betsy B. has joined the wanderers and gone to breathe Yosemite air at a dollar a breath or thereabouts, while her promise to keep you au fait with events theatrical devolves on this queerer quill of mine. And so, allons voir. The Opera wound up with a floral apotheosis on Monday night at Marie Roze's benefit, and the landatory hand-concussions of hundreds, led as usual by the stentorian flapping of Mr. Mapleson Roze's palms, convinced the fair artist that they knew what they liked, and they liked her, whether she could sing or not being a question too trying to grapple with. The song-birds trimmed their plumes for a long flight eastward on Tuesday, to warble in concert at Virginia and Salt Lake City, and then seek summer roasts at Eastern watering-places. The season has been a success from one point of view, the Strakoschian, and the managerial pockets are thickly lined according to guarantee, but whether the $21,000 loss of Baldwin, and the disappointment of the critical, would induce a coincidence in the impresario's views, is as easy of answering as the popular Hibernian query as to the natatory accomplishments of a duck. There has been a duet of sensations this week—the début of Miss Rose Coghan, the new leading lady at Baldwin's, and the Emilie Melville Pinafore Company; and taking them in historical order, Miss Coghan first will interest you. The play was London Assurance, that bright, artistic little comedy whose myriad pleasantries create continual wonder and belief that the cute little Irishman did really originate it, since this love-child that came of his first intrigue with Thalia has some beautiful birth-marks that its half-sisters, born of French flirtations and unscrupulous amatory roving in Thespian realms, are barren of. Nina Varian "Grace Harkaway" came first, pretty as of old, sweet voiced and graceful, though not quite as prettily draped as ever, and altogether as attractive as one of Midon's pink and white creams with the flavor left out. Intellectuality is not a prerequisite to New York prestige nowadays, Madge, and the pabulum on which a dramatic constitution is built up consists mainly of a strawberry ice in place of soup, and a vanilla soufflé or a chocolate cream as a pièce de résistance, the printed menu being interspersed with valuable hints as to the best modistes and coiffeur constructors to affect. So it happened that Miss Nina had but a nerveless hold on the part, and failed to endow it with congruity or great vitality. The cynical lines were recited precisely as you may hear them from the lips of a Mills Seminary graduate, babbling cynicism as it had been revealed to her blasé discernment through Ouida's spectacles, and the rôle was not understood, and consequently weak, dramatically. We all waited anxiously for the new leading lady, however, and when she tripped on, wearing a sombre riding shroud and a beautiful smile, we smiled, too, and informed her with our hands and feet that we were glad she had come. She is pretty, Madge, unfortunately for her art; for her smile, which she continually wears, is the comedy smile of Neilson, Caveadish, Lewis, and all your pretty women who unconsciously dispense it continually, and narrow their facial expression into one cabinatory groove that prevents versatility of impressions. Her eyes are beautiful, and well handled, though the beautiful chromo of over-wondering astonishment and ultra-delighted surprise which she presented when overwhelmed with flowers caused a cynical female being behind me to remark that she must have bought them herself. Her voice is high-keyed and peculiar, and she is often inclined to too rapid enunciation, but physically she is charming in ensemble. I did not like her art, however. She depends unconsciously on her looks, and is not impersonal enough. Her "Lady Gay Spanker" lacked subtlety and sharp discrimination. The "horsy" flavor of the rollicking English lady all evaporated when filtered through the glass of the lady's refinement, and instead of being a foil to "Grace" she was enough like her to be her sister. Her scene with "Sir Harcourt" was rather superficially done, the double series of impressions which she is required to convey to the audience and to her senile lover not being made, and one unacquainted with the part would have imagined her accepting her proposal in very truth. The contrasts between her common sense and "Sir Harcourt's" idiocy, and between her adult shrewdness and "Dolly's" adolescent follies, were thereby lost, and though her performance was pretty and pleasing it did not argue great intellectuality or keen discrimination, or possess full dramatic strength. Her "Lady Teazle" in School for Scandal was not particularly charming, though calling into play her strongest attractions. We shall have to see her in the emotional before we can judge of her fairly, however, for tears are as tryptic to comedy reputations as they are to complexions, and a creature that dazzles in comedy silks may be lustreless in a personal serge. Speaking of silks, she wore a beautiful dress in the last acts, white satin and brocade, with cardinal trimmings, and the front wealthy in bead work. It was Worth, of course, since it appears nowadays that every Parisian dressmaker of note has that name; for though their signs may be inscribed "Marie Rubanrouge," or "Jeannette Soieblen" in their own pretty city, a trans-Atlantic voyage by some peculiar linguistic phenomenon invariably Anglicizes the name into the monosyllable just mentioned. London Assurance went very nicely. O'Neil and Morrison should have changed places, however, for there was a total lack of unctuousness about the former's "Dazzle" that betrayed a poverty in the oil bottle of his dramatic cruet. It is such a clearly limned part, though, that no one could do it badly, especially the finished James. Mr. Bradley, as "Sir Harcourt," was primarily clad in that beastly dressing-gown that looks like a map of Ireland with the snakes left in, and an impervious cloak of blanc ennui. Both the audience and himself were admirably bored at first, but he came out strongly and finely later on, only marring his work by finally dropping the coat of affectation, which had become nature with the character, in his apology to "Lady Gay." His "Sir Peter Teazle" was a very clever burlesque of the part. The other sensation has been Pinafore, and a most agreeable sensation it proved. I did not understand its charm before, Madge; but done as the Emilie Melville people did it at Oakland on Wednesday night, I can understand the furore and know that it will be chic directly here, as elsewhere. It is such a pretty, refined little stream of melodious romance, bubbling through two acts in a way that pleases as much as it surprises you, in a charming succession of fresh choruses in the eddies, and myriad melodies in the run. It is so bright, too, that one longs to be an Englishman, red neck-tie, conservatism, and bull-dog notwithstanding, to appreciate the sharp points that continually pierce the wind-bags of Albion's egotism and fuss and feathers. Flavored especially to suit an English palate, it is nevertheless a universally tempting dish, for it has a sauce piquante of satire and human nature in general and an originality and queerness in its melodies that all enjoy. And it was charmingly done; so much so that the apologetic statement that it was a first performance becomes entirely supererogatory, for there was a barrenness of flaws that would have done credit to a week's practice. Emilie Melville was the "Josephine," of course, and a charmingly dressed and acted "Josephine" she appeared. Her voice is peculiar, and not altogether satisfactory from a penchant for flattening in the upper register that becomes more than a suspicion at times, but this counted little against the sweet sympathy of her music in general and the piquancy and ease with which she carried her part. Ben Clark was a surprise. You know how purely and clearly he sings, Madge, but you do not know what a picture of the sturdy sailor he presented in addition. He made love to "Josephine" with the most perfect assurance and abandon, and nobody was a whit surprised that she preferred him. Frank Unger's "Admiral" was also a novelty. The gentleman discovered the secret that a burlesque character is not to be burlesqued itself, and singing it well, playing it high comedy instead of low, and making it refined and quiet, the "Admiral" proved a fine foil to the others and richly successful. Mr. Goodrich's "Corcoran" was well sung and acted, and the same applies to Clay Greene's "Deadeye" and Mr. Edward's "Boatswain." "Buttercup" and "Hebe" appeared in the persons of Misses Mattie and Alice Wheeler; the former being a naïve and pleasing piece of acting, augmented by a clear and powerful voice that made one wish she had more to sing; and the latter, good in all respects. But the choruses were the feature, singing and acting with a power and dash that made it at once apparent that they were not the stage fossils one ordinarily hears. Amateur enthusiasm, combined with careful drilling, produces wonderful results, and that they enjoyed the requisite training both their work and Stephen Leach, who led them, fully vouched for. The females were nearly all sisters and cousins, judging from appearances, though an aunt or two, keeping considerably in the background, was perceptible. Dietz Hall, a wretched place to sing in, was bad for the voices, and the Standard Theatre, where they are to open to-night, will exhibit the little operetta in a way that will enable our people to understand the mania and participate in it as well. Au reste, there is not much to tell. Lawrence Barrett has been doing some charming work as the "I am here" hero in The Duke's Motto. I don't know as the play will ever die, for it has a vitality that promises to resist being shrouded in the cere-clothes of dramatic oblivion for many a day to come. It is one of Barrett's most charming performances, since it is full of the strong effect which his admirable stage art enables him to improve to the fullest. Speaking of Larry, he is to give us what promises to be a rare treat next week. It is called A New Play. Its remote authorship is, of course, a mystery, since from sand-lot screeds to confessional compositions nowadays authorship is something to be guessed at. In its present form, however, it is entirely the work of W. D. Howells, the popular littérateur, and that its language is beautiful and its lines replete with delicacy goes without saying. It is very peculiar, the action being located in Shakespeare's time, and the dramatic personæ being a company of archers of the Globe Theatre, London, for whom the greatest of dramatists is making a play. The speaking parts are confined to a few characters, and said to be very strong. I shall go to see it primarily out of curiosity, though I have a sneaking idea that I shall be immensely pleased, judging from the reports of people who know. Otherwise, next week's news comprises the same double bill at the Bush Street Theatre, with Sol Smith Russell as the "Admiral" in the Pinafore party—a strong change for the better, though Barrows was not at all bad. Baldwin's will put on A Wolf in Sheep's Clothing, and Engaged, with Miss Coghan in both; and with two Pinafores running, Barrett's new piece, and the Market Street attraction, the conscientious amusement-seeker will have his hands full. Yours, nervously, AMELIA A., proxy of Betsy B.

Mrs. Judah's benefit on Wednesday afternoon was a success in every way, the volunteer performance containing nothing to cavil at under the circumstances, and receipts to the amount of $2,300 appearing to swell the worthy pocket of the most estimable beneficiary.

It is the ruggedest highway that calls out one's strength, not the valleys of sensuous ease.

PRELUDES—IN DIVERS KEYS.

The concerts of Mr. Edonard Remenyi, the Hungarian violinist, of which eight are announced as a series—six evening concerts and two matinées—will be given at Dashaway Hall, and commence on next Monday evening. The programme for the first evening presents Mr. Remenyi in what may be said to be his specialties—Sclavonic songs and dance tunes, his playing of which is said to possess a peculiar charm—and a transcription for violin of a Nocturne of Chopin. The fashion of playing Chopin on the violin has come very much in vogue of late; Sarasati, Wilhelmj, and other prominent virtuosi have been playing various of the Nocturnes, and, from their frequent recurrence on their programmes, I should say with a good deal of success. Remenyi, however, I believe is the only one who has gone beyond the Nocturnes; he has transcribed Valses and Mazurkas as well as one of the Polonaises, which I observe he played in Paris. Besides his Chopin, Remenyi will play Ernst's Otello Fantasia and two Caprices (Nos. 21 and 24) of Paganini. The residue of the programme will consist of Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccioso by Mr. Dulcken, who brings also a composition of his own, "Nuit de Mai," and the Gavotte of Martini, and songs by Mrs. Thurston, who is reported to be an exceedingly attractive soprano.

Although this sort of programme is sufficiently attractive for one or two concerts in which the virtuosity of Mr. Remenyi would be the feature, I cannot but think that it will prove rather light diet for a season of eight. Perhaps it is the intention of the management to present more variety than is at present announced, but if so it should be stated as early as possible in order to have any effect on the subscription. If, for instance, Mr. Boscovitz—whose recitals are waited for—would join forces with Remenyi, with, perhaps, the coöperation of a good violoncellist, there would at once be the possibility of a series of concerts, each of which might be made very interesting.

The opera season has gone out in a blaze of glory. There were the usual last nights, benefits, presents of diamonds, etc., etc., and customary interviews with the impresario, big talk about "most successful season," enormous receipts, and more of the same sort. Of course, there is not likely to be a syllable of truth in the whole batch of stuff; benefits, presents, and statements are undoubtedly shams alike, the first and greatest of them, prince of shams, Strakosch himself. I hope we have seen the last of him.

When Arthur Sullivan made his operatic beginning in London—about ten years ago—with Box and Cox, there was scarcely a newspaper in England that did not warn him that he was trifling with his beautiful talent and pursuing an unworthy and most reprehensible course in occupying himself with such light subjects. He was urged to stick to the legitimate thing, to write oratorios, symphonies, etc., to prepare his shoulders to receive the mantle of Sterndale Bennett, and become the English classicist—to remain a heavy weight. But Sullivan had his own idea of what he preferred to do, and perhaps, as well, of what he could do best. The humor in him needed an outlet, and as music is his language it was in music that he found himself best able to express it. I remember how at Leipzig, where—it is well-nigh twenty years ago—we were class-mates, he was usually so full of genuine fun that it not infrequently brimmed over into his work, and resulted in contrapuntal exercises of the drollest, or pretended serious compositions of the most extravagant character. His conversation was of the wittiest, his wit light, airy, graceful, so that I, for one, was not surprised when I found him devoting himself to a genre that seemed preëminently suited to him, and in which I was convinced that—as soon as he had acquired the necessary practice—he would be very successful. That he has been successful we have known for a long time, and now that we have heard his Pinafore I think it must be easy to see why he has been so. The thing is the very essence of musical wit; it is genuine melodic fun. It has the smoothness and flow to be expected from a musician of Sullivan's talent and experience, the consummate skill in formal construction that is to be found in his more serious work, the melodic quality that has made his songs so popular, along with an appreciation and grasping of Gilbert's humor that is positively delightful. Of a character so radically dissimilar to that of the French opéra bouffe that it can in no sense be considered an outgrowth of this school, it has nevertheless something in common with the best work of Offenbach, viz.: the occasional parody on grand opera that is accomplished through the skillful turn of a phrase or bit of tone-color or modulation. It is never quite a burlesque or a grimace—Sullivan, as well as Offenbach, is too refined for that; they leave this sort of business to Lecocq and Hervé. Pinafore is simply a bright, pretty musical farce, in which nothing but sweet, healthy music will be found, and which never could have been written by any other than a musician capable of much higher things.

In preparing his Pinafore performance for the Bush Street Theatre Mr. Gardiner has done one thing that I think we have cause to be grateful for. He has demonstrated that San Francisco can, on occasion, furnish a decent chorus of young, fresh voices, and that with a little intelligent training such a chorus can be made to act so well as to make it one of the most enjoyable features of an opera. This, in all our previous seasons of opera, serious or bouffe, had never been done before; the regular opera chorus is a thing without voice or animation. It has legs and moves not; ears, and sings not in tune; eyes, and keeps them mostly on the green box at the footlights or the conductor beyond them. It never knows its part, and—worst of all—it never has any voice left; it has usually sung it out in futile endeavors to become a prima donna or a church choir tenor. Mr. Gardiner has found a chorus of voices, and added to it—through careful training—a chorus of actors, and the result is a delightful performance.

Miss Amy Sherwin is the next Josephine, and it seems to me should be a very charming one at that. Her début is fixed for Monday night (I call it a début, since the appearance in Traviata was only a public execution, with Strakosch as headman) at the Grand Opera House, where I understand she will be well supported. Any more Pinafores? S. E.

Plaintiff, vs. EDWARD MAGUIRE and ELIZA MA-
GUIRE, Defendants.Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in
and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.The People of the State of California send greeting to Edward Maguire and Eliza Maguire.You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein (a copy of which accompanies this summons) within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; if served out of this county, but within this judicial district, within twenty days; or if served
out of said district, then within forty days—or judgment by default will taken against you.The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court for the foreclosure of a certain mortgage described in the complaint and executed by the said Edward Maguire
and Eliza Maguire on the 4th day of June, A. D. 1877, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note made by said Edward Maguire at the same time for the sum of three thousand dollars gold, and interest, as provided in said note,
payable to plaintiff, or its order, and taxes, street assessments, and attorneys' fees at ten per cent. on the amount found due, and costs, all in gold coin; that the premises
conveyed by said mortgage may be sold, and the proceeds
applied to the payment of said promissory note, interest,
taxes, street assessments, and attorneys' fees, and costs, all
in gold coin; and in case such proceeds are not sufficient to pay the same, then to obtain an execution against said Edward Maguire for the balance remaining due; and also that
the said defendants, and all persons claiming by, through,
or under them may be barred and foreclosed of all right,
title, claim, lien, equity of redemption, and interest to said
mortgaged premises, and for other and further relief.And if you fail to appear and answer said complaint, as above required, the plaintiff will take default against you
and apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in

VOL. IV. NO. 24.

SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 14, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

L'ASSOMMOIR—THE LOADED BLUDGEON.

Emile Zola's Famous French Novel.

TRANSLATED FOR THE ARGONAUT BY J. C. WARO.

"L'Assommoir" is one of the greatest novels ever printed, having attained a sale in France of over one hundred thousand copies. Zola, its author, has attained a measure of success that is unparalleled in this generation, and his style and method in forcing realism in literature is the talk of all Europe. His novels are the result of long study and careful observation and of notes not from the lips of his characters. In "L'Assommoir" he paints town society to the life. He gives the most startlingly awful picture of the slums of the great town ever done in black and white. The book is unreadable, and therefore it is universally read. As a specimen of the new school of realism, we present the first chapters as literally translated as has yet been attempted in English.]

Gervaise had waited for Lantier until two in the morning. When chilled by the cold draught from the window where she had been waiting in her thin gown, with aching head and face bathed in tears she threw herself completely worn out upon the bed. For a week past, as they left the Veau à deux têtes where they took their meals, he had sent her to bed with the children, and had returned to her only late at night, always saying that he had been out looking for work. On this night, while she was watching for him, she thought she saw him enter the ball-room at the Grand Balcon, from whose ten flaming windows the dark crowds circulating on the outer boulevards were brightened as though lighted by a conflagration. She thought she saw little Adèle, a burnisher, who dined at their restaurant, walking five or six steps behind him, her hands hanging as though she had just taken them from his arm, so that they might not appear to be together as they passed the bright light from the globes at the door. When Gervaise awoke at five o'clock quite stiff, and with pains in her back, she burst into tears, for Lantier had not come in. He had slept away from her for the first time. Seated on the edge of the bed under shreds of faded chintz which hung from an arrow fastened to the ceiling with a string, her eyes filled with tears as she looked around the miserable room. It was furnished with a walnut bureau with one drawer gone, with three flag-bottomed chairs, and a little greasy table, on which stood a broken water-pitcher. An iron bedstead for the children had been added to these, fencing off the bureau and filling up two-thirds of the room. Gervaise and Lantier's trunk stood open in one corner showing its emptiness, a man's hat much used was tucked away under a pile of dirty shirts and stockings, while along the walls or on the furniture hung a shawl with holes in it, and a pair of much-worn pants stiff with mud—the last rags such as the clothes merchants would not buy. On the mantelpiece between two odd zinc candlesticks there was a package of rose-tinted pawn tickets. And this was the best room of the hotel, the first floor room, looking out upon the boulevard.

Side by side on the pillow two children were asleep—Claude, eight years old, with his little hands thrown outside the coverlet, was breathing gently, while Etienne, who was only four, lay smiling, with one arm around his brother's neck. When the tearful eyes of the mother reached them another of spasms of sobs overcame her, and she stuffed a handkerchief in her mouth to stop the cries which escaped her; and in bare feet, not thinking of replacing her fallen slippers, she returned to place her elbows on the window-sill and resume her last night's watch, examining the pavements from afar.

The hotel was on the Boulevard de la Chapelle, at the left of the Barrière Poissonnière. It was an old two-story building, painted wine-red up to the second story, with blinds rotted by the rain. Between two windows, and over a ground-glass lantern, one might read, "Hôtel Boncœur, kept by Marsouillier," in large yellow letters, of which the mouldiness of the plaster had obliterated parts. Gervaise, interfered with by the lantern, raised herself, with the handkerchief still at her lips, and looked to the right toward the Boulevard de Rochechouart, where groups of butchers in bloody frocks stood before the shambles, the cool wind every now and then bringing a disagreeable smell, the odor of the slaughtered cattle. Then she looked to the left, along the ribbon-like avenue which stopped almost in front of her, at the hospital of Lariboisière, then building. Slowly from one side of the horizon to the other she followed the wall of l'Octroi (city toll-house), beyond which at night she had heard groans of people being assassinated; and she searched the distant angles, the dark corners black with filth and dampness, fearing to find there the body of Lantier pierced with dagger wounds. When she looked beyond this gray interminable wall, which encircled the city with a desert band, she perceived a great light, a sunny haze, already filling with the murmurs of a Paris morn. But it was always toward the Barrière Poissonnière that she turned with extended neck, bewildered at the uninterrupted flow of men, beasts, and carts, which came from the heights of Montmartre and La Chapelle, and passed between the two squat buildings of the Octroi. The noise from the hoofs of the cattle came to her, and she saw a crowd which, from sudden checks, would spread out upon the sidewalks—an unending defile of men going to their work with tools on their shoulders and bread under their arms, a crowd continually engulfing and drowning itself in Paris. As Gervaise thought she might find Lantier among them she leaned farther out, running the risk of falling, and then she would put the handkerchief tighter over her mouth, as though to repress her grief. A gay young voice made her leave the window:

"Is the master at home, Madame Lantier?"

"No, Monsieur Coupeau," replied she, trying to smile.

He was a zinc-worker, who occupied a ten-franc room at the top of the house. He was going by with his bag over his shoulder, and, seeing the key in the door, had entered in a friendly way.

"Do you know," continued he, "that I am at work at the hospital? Hey! what a month of May! It stings one this morning."

He noticed Gervaise's face all red with tears, and when he saw that the bed had not been slept in he shook his head quietly; then coming upon the little bedstead of the children, and seeing them still asleep with the rosy cheeks of cherubim, he continued, in a subdued voice:

"Well, well, the master is not very steady, is he? But don't be worried, Madame Lantier. The other day when they were voting for Eugène Sue, a good man it seems, he was just like a madman. It may be that he has passed the night with friends abusing that beast of a Bonaparte."

"No, no," murmured she, with some effort. "It is not as you think. I know where Lantier is. We have our troubles like all the rest of the world. Mon Dieu!"

Coupeau winked his eyes to show that he was not to be deceived by that story, and went off, after offering to go for milk for her in case she did not want to go herself. She was a good, brave woman; she might come to him whenever she was in trouble.

As soon as he left Gervaise went to the window again. From the barrière through the cold morning air still came the noise of stamping cattle. She could recognize the locksmiths by their blue frocks, the masons by their white overalls, the painters by coats from under which long blouses hung. This crowd from afar presented a neutral tint, in which faded blue and dirty gray predominated. At times a workman would stop suddenly to relight his pipe, while the rest pushed by without a word or a smile, their pale-cheeked faces turned Paris-ward—which one by one swallowed them through the yawning street of the Faubourg Poissonnière. But at each corner of the Rue des Poissonniers—at the doors of the shops of two wine-merchants, who were taking down their shutters—some of the men slackened their steps, and, before entering, stopped on the edge of the walk, still glancing at Paris; but their hanging arms showed they were already won over to an idle day. Before the bars groups were offering to treat, forgetting everything else; then standing around, filling the saloons, spitting, coughing, and clearing their throats with small glasses of liquor.

Gervaise was watching the left hand corner—the saloon of Père Colombe, where she thought she saw Lantier—when a large bareheaded woman in an apron called to her from the pavement:

"Say, Madame Lantier, you are up very early this morning!"

Gervaise leaned over. "Ah! it's you, Madame Boche. Yes, I have lots to do to-day."

"Yes, isn't that so? Things don't do themselves."

And a conversation was immediately engaged in between the window and the sidewalk. Madame Boche was the conciERGE of the house of which the restaurant of the Veau à deux têtes occupied the ground floor. Many a time had Gervaise waited for Lantier in her room, rather than remain alone with the men who were eating in the room near by. The conciERGE said she was going two steps to Rue de la Charbonnière to catch a clerk in bed from whom her husband had not been able to get pay for the mending of a coat. Then she talked about one of her lodgers, who had come in with a woman the night before and who had kept every one awake till three o'clock in the morning. But while she talked she was watching the young woman with intense curiosity, and she seemed to have placed herself under the window only for the purpose of finding something out.

"Is Monsieur Lantier still abed?" asked she, suddenly.

"Yes, he's asleep," replied Gervaise, who could not help blushing.

Madame Boche saw the tears come into her eyes, and doubtless satisfied, she was going away saying that men were miserable lazy fellows, when she returned to cry out:

"It is this morning that you go to the wash house, isn't it? I've something to wash; I will keep a place for you and we can talk." Then, as though suddenly overcome with pity, she said:

"My poor little one, you would do better not to remain there; you'll get sick; you are blue with cold now."

Gervaise kept by the window, however, for two mortal hours, until eight o'clock. The shops were all open. The stream of blouses had ceased coming down from the heights—only a few belated ones cleared the barrière with long strides. The same men were standing around the wine shops, continuing to drink, to cough, and to spit. To the workmen had succeeded the workwomen—the burnishers, the modistes, the florists—all wrapping themselves in their thin clothes, and all trotting along the outer boulevards. They were in groups of three or four, talking in a lively manner, laughing, and giving bright glances as they passed. Now and then there was one all alone, sad-looking, pale, and thin, skirting along the Octroi wall, and trying to avoid the filth of the gutters. Then the clerks passed, blowing their fingers and eating their sou's worth of bread as they walked. Emaciated young men, with coats too short, with eyelids heavy and clouded by sleep; little old men, who rolled along, pale-faced, used up by long office hours, looking at their watches to regulate their walk to a second. And the boulevards had assumed their morning quiet. The rich men of the neighborhood were sunning themselves; bareheaded mothers in dirty petticoats cradled swaddled children in their arms, or sat on the benches to adjust them; little brats, with running noses, unbuttoned, were pushing, crawling on the ground, in the midst of laughs, and cries, and caterwauls. Then Gervaise felt that she was suffocating, overcome by the frenzy of her anguish, and hopeless indeed. It seemed as though all were over, that the world was coming to an end, that Lantier would never come back again, never any more. Her gaze lost itself as it wandered over the old shambles, black with slaughter and stench; the new hospital, so bleak, showing through the still gaping hole of its rows of windows the naked halls where death was sure to mow. In front, behind the Octroi wall, the flashing sky, the sunrise spreading over the immense awakening of Paris, dazzled her.

The young wife was seated on a chair, her hands were hanging down, but she no longer wept, when Lantier quietly stole in.

"'Tis you! 'tis you!" cried she, wishing to throw her arms about his neck.

"Yes, 'tis me, and what of that?" answered he. "May be you're going to begin your nonsense again." And he pushed her away. Then, with an angry jerk, he threw his black felt hat at random on the bureau. He was a young fellow of twenty-six, small, of very dark complexion, handsome features, and delicate moustache, which he was always curling with a mechanical movement of his hand. He wore a workman's overalls, and an old frock coat buttoned tightly at the waist, and spoke with a decided provincial accent.

Gervaise, sinking again into her chair, complained quietly, in short sentences:

"I have not been able to close my eyes. I thought some one had given you a bad blow. Where have you been to? Where have you passed the night? Mon Dieu! Don't do it again, or I shall go crazy. Say, Auguste, where have you been?"

"Where! I had business, parbleu!" said he, with a shrug of his shoulders. "At eight I was at the Ice House, with the friend who is going to open a hat factory; I got belated; then I preferred to sleep there. Then, you know, I don't want any spies upon me. Shut up!"

The young woman again began to sob. The noise of voices, and the rough movements of Lantier, who upset the chairs, awakened the children, who sat up, half naked, brushing their hair with their little hands, and who, hearing their mother cry, began to scream, tears flowing from their half-opened eyes.

"Ah, there's music!" cried Lantier, furious. "I warn you that I take to the door again, and this time, for good. You won't hold your tongues? Good-night, then! I return to where I come from."

He had already got his hat from the bureau; but Gervaise threw herself in his way, crying:

"No! No!"

And she stopped the little ones' tears with her caresses. She kissed their hair, and laid them down with tender words. They soon quieted, and, laughing on their pillow, amused themselves by pinching each other. The father, however, without taking off his boots, had thrown himself upon the bed; he looked worn out, his face white and hard as marble from his badly spent night. He did not sleep, but, with wide-open eyes, looked around the room.

"It's nice and clean here," murmured he. Then, after looking at Gervaise a moment, he added, wickedly: "You don't clean up any more, then?"

Gervaise was only twenty-two. She was tall and slender, with delicate features already drawn by the hardness of her life. Uncombed, in slippers, shivering in her white gown, on which the furniture had left its dust and dirt, she seemed to have grown ten years older during the hours of agony and tears which she had just passed through. But the words of Lantier soon brought her out of her timidity and resignation. "What injustice!" said she, becoming bolder, "you know I do all I can. 'Tis not my fault we are here. I'd like to see you with two children in a room where there is not even a stove to heat hot water with. Instead of using up your money when you came to Paris, you ought to have settled us down somewhere as you promised."

"Halloo!" cried he. "You lived as well as I on the money, and it is not for you now to turn up your nose."

But she took no notice and went on:

"Well, we might still get out of trouble. Last night I saw Madame Fauconnier, the washerwoman of Rue Neuve. She will take me on Monday. If you will begin with your friend of the Ice House, we will be above water before six months are out—in time to hire and fit up some hole where we shall be at home. Ah! We must work, work!"

Lantier turned over as though he had heard enough, which made Gervaise angry.

"Yes, that's it. It's not work that will kill you. You are bursting with your ambition. You want to dress like a gentleman, and walk the streets with girls who can wear silk dresses, don't you? You don't find me good enough since you made me put my dresses in pawn. And now, Auguste, I wasn't going to speak of it. I wanted to wait till I saw you where you passed the night. I saw you go to the Ice House with that brazen Adèle. Ah, you choose nice one—she is. She put on airs of a princess. She who runs with every man in the restaurant."

With one bound Lantier threw himself from off the bed. His eyes of inky blackness started from his sallow face; his anger caused a perfect tempest in the little man.

"Yes, yes, the whole restaurant," repeated the young woman. "Madame Boche is going to turn her away, and her big gawky sister, too, because there is always a chain of fellows on the stairs."

Lantier doubled his fist, then resisting his longing to beat her, he seized her arms, shook her violently, and sent her falling on to the children's bed. They began to cry again, and he lay down growling with the ferocious look of a man who is making a resolution to do something about which he hesitates still.

"You don't realize what you have done, Gervaise. You are wrong, as you will soon find out."

For a moment the children sobbed, and the mother, bending over the edge of their bed and holding both in her arms in one embrace, repeated many times, monotonously:

"Ah, if you were not here, my little ones; if you were not here—if you were not here!"

Quietly stretched out, with eyes raised to the bits of faded chintz above him, Lantier no longer listened. He seemed absorbed by an idea. For more than an hour he remained so without giving up to the sleep which weighed so heavily upon his lids. When he did turn and lean his head, determined face upon his elbow, Gervaise was putting the room in order and making the children's bed. She had already taken them up and dressed them. He observed her as she swept and dusted the furniture. The room was dark and cheerless, with its smoke-stained ceiling, its paper which dampness had detached from the wall, its three chairs, its dilapidated bureau, the greasy dirt on which could not be removed but only spread by the duster. And while washing herself, after arranging her hair before the little round looking-glass which hung on the sash, and which he used in shaving, he seemed to examine her naked arms, her neck, and all else that was bare, as though he were making comparisons, and there was a contemptuous expression about his mouth. Gervaise limped slightly on her left leg, but it was scarcely perceived excepting on her tired days, when she gave up to it completely. On that morning, used up by her bad night, she dragged her leg along as she leaned against the wall.

Silence reigned. They did not exchange a word more. He seemed to be expecting them. She, while thinking over her wrongs, forced herself to appear indifferent, and hastened on with her work. As she made up a bundle of dirty clothes which had been thrown into a corner behind the trunk, he at last opened his lips and said:

"What are you doing? Where are you going?"

At first she did not answer. Then, when he repeated the question, she decided to do so impatiently.

"May be you can see. I'm going to wash all that. The children can't live in filth."

He let her pick up two or three handkerchiefs, and after a little asked:

"Have you any money?"

Upon that she arose, looked him straight in the face without dropping the dirty shirts of the children which she held in her hand:

"Money! Where do you think I could have stolen any? You well know that I had three francs day before yesterday on my black skirt. We breakfasted twice on that, and it goes mighty quick with the pork butcher. No, very certainly, I have no money. I have only four sous for the wash-house. I don't earn it as certain women do."

Not noticing the allusion, he rose from the bed and passed in review the few tattered things which hung around the room. He ended by taking down the pants and the shawl; then opened the draw of the bureau, added a frock and two chemises, and threw them all into Gervaise's arms, saying:

"Come, take that to the pawn."

"Don't you want me to take the children also?" asked she. "Ah, if they only lent on children what a comfort it would be."

She went nevertheless to the Mont de Piété. When she returned, at the end of a half hour, she put a five-franc piece on the mantelpiece, adding the ticket to those already lying between the candlesticks.

"There's what they gave me," said she. "I asked for six francs, but it could not be done. Oh, they'll take care of themselves. And what a lot of people always there!"

Lantier did not immediately take the five-franc piece. He might have wished her to change it, leaving him something; but he decided to slip it into his waistcoat pocket, after seeing on the bureau the remains of some ham in a paper with a bit of bread.

"I have not dared to go for milk, because we owe her for a week," explained Gervaise. "But I will come home early. You will go for some bread and cutlets while I am away, and then we will breakfast. Get a litre of wine, also."

He did not say that he wouldn't. Peace seemed made. The young woman was finishing her bundle of dirty clothes, but when she wanted to take Lantier's shirts and stockings from the bottom of the trunk, he told her to leave them alone.

"Don't touch my things. Do you hear? I don't want you to."

"What don't you want?" asked she, drawing herself up. "You certainly don't intend to put on those rotten things! They must be washed," and she looked at him uneasily, finding on his handsome face the same hard look as though nothing thereafter could soften it. He got angry, snatched the things from her hand, and threw them into the trunk again.

"Tonnerre de Dieu! Mind me for once, when I tell you I don't want you to."

"But why?" returned she, becoming quite pale as a terrible suspicion passed through her mind. "You don't want your shirts now—you are not going to leave. What difference does it make if I take them?"

He hesitated a moment, troubled by the ardent look which she fixed upon him.

"Why—why?" stammered he. "Parbleu! You will be telling all over that you keep me; that you wash, that you sew, that you mend. Well, I don't like it—there. Attend to your own business, and let me attend to mine. Washerwomen don't work for dogs!"

He besought him, saying she had never complained. He the trunk in a brutal manner and sat on it, as he screamed "No!" in her face. He was master of whatever belonged to him. Then, to avoid the looks with which she pursued him, he returned to the bed and stretched himself upon it, saying that he was sleepy and didn't want her to bother his head any more. And this time he really seemed to sleep.

Gervaise remained for one moment undecided. She was tempted to push away the bundle of clothes with her foot and sit down and sew, but the regular respirations of Lantier ended by reassuring her. She took her bag of bluing, and the bit of soap which remained from her last wash, and going up to the little ones, who were playing quietly with some old corks before the window, she kissed them, saying in a low tone: "Be good, make no noise, papa is asleep."

When she left the room the subdued voices of Claude and Etienne alone disturbed the silence under that dark ceiling. It was ten, and a ray of sunshine entered the partly open window.

On reaching the boulevard Gervaise turned to the left, and followed the Rue Neuve de la Goutte d'Or. Passing the shop of Madame Fauconnier she saluted her with a nod. The wash-house where she was going was about half way down the street, at the point where the pavement begins to ascend. Over a low building three enormous reservoirs for water—zinc cylinders, strongly bolted—showed their gray sides. Behind them the drying-room arose, in two very high stories, shut in on all sides by thin-bladed blinds, through which the cool air passed, and allowed the clothes, drying on cords of brass, to be easily seen. At the right of the reservoir the narrow pipe of the steam engine blew off, with rude and regular puffs, jets of white steam. Gervaise, without raising her dress, and like a woman used to puddles, entered the door, which was encumbered with eau-de-javelle jars. She already knew the mistress of the wash-house, a delicate little woman, with weak eyes, seated in a room with glass windows around it, with the register before her, and pieces of soap on shelves, bluing balls in bowls, and pounds of bicarbonate of soda in papers. In passing she asked for her board and brush, which she had left there after her last washing. Then, having got her number, she entered.

It was an immense garret of a place, with flat ceiling, in which the beams showed, mounted on cast-iron posts, and shut in by large, well-lighted windows. A bleak daylight passed freely through the hot wash-room, appearing like a milky fog; smoke came through certain chinks, spreading, drowning out the ends of the room with a bluish veil, and a thick humidity rained, charged with a soapy odor, a nauseous odor, damp, continued, with some moments of stronger puffs, in which eau-de-javelle predominated. Along the forms, on two sides of the central alley-way, there were rows of bare-armed women—bare to the shoulders. All their necks were bare, and their tucked-up petticoats showed colored stockings and strong laced shoes. They beat furiously, laughed, turned clear back to cry out a word in the uproar, and leaned over to reach the bottom of their buckets. They were nasty, brutal, ill-shaped, wet as though in a shower, their flesh reddened and smoking. About them, under them, flowed streams of water. Bucketsful were brought and emptied in a moment. Cocks of cold water squirting from above, the splash of those who beat, the dropping of rinsed linen, the puddles in which they walked going off in little streams on the sloping slabs; and in the midst of cries, of cadenced blows, of the murmuring noise of rain, of that storm-clamor choking under the dampened ceiling, the steam engine at the right, all white with the fine dew, panted and snorted without stop, with the dancing trepidation of its fly-wheel, which seemed to regulate the enormity of the racket.

"Eh! come here, little one," cried the loud voice of Madame Boche.

When the young woman had found her, down at the bottom on the left, the conciierge, who was rubbing a stocking furiously, began to talk right on without stopping her work for a moment:

"Go there. I kept the place for you. Oh, I have not much. Boche doesn't dirty his clothes a great deal. And you?—it will not be for long, hey? Your bundle is small enough. Before noon we shall be through, and can go to breakfast. I used to give mine to a washerwoman of the Rue Poulet. But she used up everything with her chloride and her brushes. Then I took to washing myself. It's all gain; the cost only for soap. Say, there are some shirts which you must let drip. Those beggarly children; my word for it, the soot comes out of them."

Gervaise opened her bundle and spread out the children's shirts. Madame Boche recommended her to get a pail of lye, but she shook her head, and answered:

"Oh, no; hot water will do I know."

She had picked out the linen and laid aside some colored pieces. Then, after filling her tub with four pails of cold water drawn from the faucet just back of her, she plunged in the lot of white things, and raising her petticoats and drawing them between her thighs, she entered into a box placed on end which came up to her stomach.

"Ah, you understand, hey?" said Madame Boche. "You were a washerwoman in your own country, weren't you, little one?"

Gervaise, with sleeves turned up, showing her beautiful pair of still young arms rather pinkish at the elbow, commenced to scour her linen. She had just spread a shirt upon the narrow board, which was worn and whitened by the water; she covered it with soap, turned it, rubbed it on the other side, and before answering she took her washerwoman's pounder and began to beat, crying out her phrases and punctuating them with rude but well cadenced blows.

"Yes, yes, washerwoman. When I was ten—twelve years since then—we went to the river. It smelt better than it does here. You ought to see—there was a corner under the trees—with clear running water. At Plassans, you know—you don't know Plassans?—near Marseilles?"

"That's work, that is!" cried Madame Boche, surprised at the force of her blows. "She's smart; she could flatten iron with her little lady arms."

The conversation continued very loud, the conciierge, sometimes obliged to lean clear over to hear; all the while clothes were beaten, and well beaten, too. Then Gervaise plunged all into the tub again, taking out piece after piece to rub it with soap a second time and scrub it. With one hand she held the piece on the plank; with the other, which held the short, dog-tooth brush, she pushed from the linen a dirty lather, which fell off in flakes. The slightest noise of the brush enabled them to get nearer and talk easier together.

"No, we were not married," said Gervaise. "I don't hide it. Lantier is not nice enough to make one wish to be his wife. If there were no children, you'd see. I was fourteen and he was eighteen when the first one came, and the other came four years after. It happened as it happens always, you know. I was not happy at home. Papa Macquart, for a yes or a no, gave me kicks in the back, and then, faith, I amused myself out of doors. They wanted to marry us, but our parents would not have it; and I can't see why." She shook off her hands, which reddened under the white lather. "This Paris water is very hard," said she.

Madame Boche did not hurry with her wash. She stopped and made her soaping last so as to remain and learn the history which had excited her curiosity for a fortnight past. Her mouth remained half-open in her big face, and her bulging eyes glistened. She thought with all the satisfaction of one who has divined:

"That's it. The little one talks too much. They've had a squabble." Then aloud: "He's not nice, then?"

"Don't talk to me about it," replied Gervaise; "he was good enough to me down there, but since we are in Paris I can't make him out. You must know that his mother died last year leaving him something—seventeen hundred francs about; then he wanted to go to Paris. As Papa Macquart always beat me, I consented to go with him, and we made the trip with the two children. He agreed to set me up as a washerwoman, and to work at his trade as hatmaker. We might have been so happy. But, you see, Lantier is proud, extravagant, and thinks only of his own amusement. He don't amount to much, that's a fact. Well, we got out at the Hôtel Montmartre, rue Montmartre. And it was all dinners, carriages, theatres, a watch for him, a silk dress for me, for his heart is not bad when he has money. You can understand the whole thing so well that at the end of two months we were all afloat. At that time we moved to the Hôtel Boncœur, and this infernal life began."

She stopped with choking throat, keeping down her tears. She had finished scrubbing her linen.

"I must go and get my warm water," said she.

But Madame Boche, very much put out by the sudden interruption to these confidences, called the wash-house boy as he passed by.

"My little Charles, you'll be good enough, I know, to get a bucket of warm water for madame. She has no time."

The boy took the pail and brought it back full. Gervaise paid for it—it cost one sou. She emptied the hot water into the tub and soaped the clothes for the last time, bending over the plank in the midst of vapor which wove threads of gray through her blonde hair.

"Stop; put some crystals in. I've some here," said the conciierge, obligingly.

And she emptied into Gervaise's tub what remained of a package of bicarbonate of soda, which she had brought with her. She also offered her eau-de-javelle; but the young woman refused. It was good for grease and wine spots.

"I think he runs around a little too much," said Madame Boche, coming back to Lantier, without mentioning his name.

Gervaise, her back in two, her hands shriveled up, and plunged in among the clothes, only nodded.

"Yes, yes," continued the other, "I've seen several little things."

But then she exclaimed, noticing the abrupt movement of Gervaise, who rose up all pale, and stared at her:

"Oh, no! I really don't know anything! He likes to amuse himself, I think, that's all. And the two girls who lodge at our house, Adèle and Virginie, you know. Well, he chats with them, and it goes no farther, I am sure."

The young woman stood up straight before her, her face sweating, her arms dripping, and continued to look at her with a profound, fixed gaze. Then the conciierge got angry, struck her chest with her fist, gave her word of honor, and cried out:

"I don't know anything—there! when I tell you so." Then she added, calming herself in a gentle voice, such as one uses to those to whom there is no use in telling the truth: "I think he has a good face. He will marry you, little one; I promise you that."

Gervaise wiped her forehead with her wet hand, and drew from the water another piece of linen, shaking her head again. For a moment both kept silent. Around them the wash house had become quiet. Eleven o'clock struck. One-half the women, seated on the edge of the tubs, with a litre of wine uncorked at their feet, were eating sausage sandwiched in bread. Only the housekeepers, who had come to wash their small lots of linen, were hurrying as they watched the bull's eye which hung over the desk. A few blows from the pounder was still heard, and now and then, in the midst of subdued laughter, conversation crept in through the glutinous sounds from the jaw bones, while the steam engine, going on without repose or intermission, seemed to raise its vibrating voice, snorting and filling the immense hall. But no one heard it; it was the breathing of the wash-house—a deep drawn breath, heaping up under the beams of the ceiling the never-ending steam which floated there. The heat was becoming intolerable. The sun's rays came in at the left through the high windows, giving the vapors of the opalized water rose-gray and blue-gray tints. And, as complaints arose, Charles went from window to window, drawing down the coarse cloth shades, and then passed along the shady side and opened the casements. They cheered him, they clapped their hands, their gaitery was frightful. At last the pounding ceased. The full mouthed women could only gesture with the long knives in their fists. The silence was so complete that the grating noise of the fireman's shovel taking coal and throwing it into the furnace could be heard regularly at the other end of the building.

Gervaise, however, went on washing her colored clothes in the warm water, thick with soap, which she had kept for them. When she had finished, she went to the trestle and threw them on it, dripping blue puddles on the ground. Then she commenced rinsing. Behind her the cold water spout ran just above a large tub fixed to the ground, over which two wooden bars passed to hold the clothes. In the air above two more bars passed, from which the clothes finished their dripping.

"There, it will soon be over; which is lucky," said Madame Boche. "I will stay and help you wring."

"Oh, it's not worth while, I thank you," said the young woman, who was kneading and dabbling the colored pieces in clean water. "If I had sheets I wouldn't say no."

Yet she accepted the concierger's offer, and they were working each at an end, squeezing out the yellowish water, when Madame Boche cried out:

"Look! There's that tall Virginie. What could she come here to wash—that one, with her four rags in a handkerchief?"

Gervaise had quickly raised her head. Virginie was a girl of her own age, taller, and a pretty brunette notwithstanding her rather long face. She wore an old black dress, with a red ribbon at the neck, and her hair was dressed with some care and drawn into a net of blue chenille. For one moment, as she stood in the central alley, she brought her lids together as though looking for something; then, when she saw Gervaise, she came toward her, passing by in a haughty, insolent manner, with a twist of her haunches, and installing herself in the same row, five tubs off.

"There's a whim for you," continued Boche, in a low tone. "She never soaps even a pair of cuffs. A famous lazy one, I'll answer for it. A dressmaker who doesn't even mend her bottines! She is like her sister, that scamp Adèle, who leaves her work two days out of three. They have no father or mother that any one knows of, and they live no one knows how; and if one chose to talk about them—"

Madame Boche evidently wished to give Gervaise pleasure. The truth was, she often accepted a cup of coffee from Adèle and Virginie when the little ones had money. Gervaise did not answer; she hurried with feverish hands and prepared her bluing in a little tub which stood on three feet. She dipped in the white pieces, stirred them about for a moment at the bottom of the tinted water, whose reflection took in a bit of lake, and after having wrung them lightly she stretched them on the wooden bars above her. While she was doing this she appeared to turn her back upon Virginie, but she heard her sneering and felt that her glances were upon her. Indeed, Virginie seemed to have come there to provoke her. When for one instant Gervaise turned they looked fixedly at each other.

"Let her be," said Madame Boche. "May be you won't pull each other's hair when I tell you that there was nothing, and it wasn't her—there!"

At this moment, as the young woman hung up her last piece of linen, laughing was heard at the door of the wash-house.

"It is two jokers who want mamma," cried Charles.

All the women stretched out their necks, but Gervaise recognized Claude and Etienne. As soon as they saw her they ran to her in the midst of the pools, stamping on the slabs with the heels of their untied shoes, Claude, the elder, taking his little brother by the hand. The women as they passed uttered low, tender cries on seeing them frightened, but smiling as well; and then they stopped, without halting, in front of their mother, raising their white heads.

"Did papa send you?" asked Gervaise. But as she stooped to tie Etienne's shoe strings she saw as he balanced it in the air the key of the room, with the brass number hanging to it. "What! you bring me the key!" said she, surprised. "Why, tell me?"

The child, on perceiving the key which he had forgotten on his finger, seemed to remember, and cried out, in a clear voice:

"Papa's gone."

"He has gone to buy breakfast, and told you to come here to me?"

Claude looked at his brother and hesitated, not knowing what more to say; then he replied quickly:

"Papa's gone. He jumped from the bed and put all the things in the trunk, and carried the trunk to a carriage. He's gone."

Gervaise sank down, then raised herself slowly, her face quite pale, and carrying her hands to her cheeks and her temples as though she felt her head breaking. She could find but one word, which she repeated twenty times in the same tone:

"Ah, mon Dieu! Ah, mon Dieu! Ah, mon Dieu!"

Madame Boche interrogated the child in her turn, delighted to find herself mixed up in the story:

"Let's see, little one. You must tell—he shut the door and told you to bring the key, didn't he?" And then lowering her voice, and in Claude's ear, she asked: "Was there a lady in the carriage?"

The child was again bothered, but began his story with a triumphant air:

"He jumped from the bed. He put all the things in the trunk. He's gone." When Madame Boche let him alone, he drew his brother before the spout, and both of them amused themselves in making the water run.

Gervaise could not cry. She was suffocating—her back supported by the tub, and her face always in her hands. She shivered every now and then; and at times a long sigh escaped her, while she pressed her fists harder to her eyes, as though trying to destroy herself in the utter darkness of her abandonment. It was like a hole filled with black shadows into which she seemed falling.

"Come, little one! What, the devil!" murmured Madame Boche.

"If you knew—if you only knew!" said she at last, in a low tone. "He sent me this morning to put my chemises and my shawl in pawn to pay for that carriage." And then she cried. The remembrance of the errand to the Mont de Piété, in fixing the fact of the morning, had drawn forth the sobs which were strangling her. That errand was an abomination, the great grief in her despair. Tears flowed over her chin, which her hands had already moistened, without her thinking of her handkerchief.

"Be reasonable, be quiet; they are looking," repeated Madame Boche, who kept officiously about her. "Is it possible to feel so badly about a man? You love him still, hey, my fauve chérie? A moment ago you were angry with him, and now you cry for him as though your heart would break. Mon Dieu! how stupid we are!"

Then she became motherly:

"A pretty little woman like you! Can it be? I may tell you all now, mayn't I? Well, you remember when I came under your window, I was already in doubt. I imagined this very night when Adèle came in that I heard a man's step with hers. Then I wanted to be sure, and I looked on to the stairs. He was already up to the second story, but I knew Monsieur Lantier's frock coat. Boche, who watched this morning, saw him coming quietly down, and he was with Adèle, you understand?"

She stopped a moment, turned around, and recommenced in her broad, hoarse voice:

"She laughs, that heartless creature there, to see you cry. I would put my hand in the fire that her washing is but a farce. She has packed off the other two, and has come here to tell how you took it."

Gervaise withdrew her hands and looked, when she perceived Virginie in the midst of three or four women, speaking in a low tone, and staring at her. She was completely overcome with passion. With arms in front of her, looking on the ground, turning, trembling in all her members, she walked a few steps, and seeing a full bucket, seized it with her two hands, and emptied it with one throw.

"You camel! clear!" cried the tall Virginie.

She had jumped back, and her bottines only were wet. But the wash-house party, whom the tears of the young woman revolutionized in a moment, elbowed each other to see the battle—those who were finishing their bread got up on the tubs; others ran with hands full of soap, and a ring was soon formed.

"Ah, the camel!" repeated the tall Virginie. "What's the matter with the crazy one?"

Gervaise stopped; her chin out, her face convulsed, she did not answer, not having learned Parisian slang. The other continued:

"Go along, then! She's tired of rolling about in the province; she left a leg there."

A laugh was returned. Virginie, seeing her success, came two steps nearer, drawing herself up to her full height, and crying louder:

"Hey! come a little nearer to see me settle your business! You mustn't come here to bother us. Do I know her—the carcass? If she had wet me I would have nicely shortened her petticoats. You'd have seen. Let her tell what I have done. Say, rouchie, what did I do?"

"Don't talk so much," stammered Gervaise. "You know well—you saw my husband last night. Now hold your tongue, because I will strangle you, sure."

"Her husband! Ah, that's good, that is! Madame's husband! As though one had husbands with that limp! It is not my fault that he left you. May he I didn't steal him. You may search me. Shall I tell you? He was poisoned with you, that man was! He was too nice for you. I hope he had a collar on, at least. Who has found madame's husband? There's a reward for him."

They began to laugh again. Gervaise only answered in a low tone of voice:

"You know well, you know well. It is your sister. I'd like to strangle your sister."

"Yes, you go and meddle with my sister," replied Virginie, titting. "Ah, it's my sister! It's possible! My sister has a different style from you. But what's that to me? Can't one wash her clothes quietly? Let's have peace, do you hear; because we've had enough of this!"

Yet she came back to it again, after having given five or six pounds, thinking of her wrongs, and quite carried away by them. She held her tongue for a moment, and then began again three different times in this same way:

"Ah, well, yes, it's my sister! There, are you satisfied? They adored each other, both of them. And he left you with your kids! Nice brats, with their faces full of scabs! It's your Lantier who told us so. Ah! he told us fine things. He had enough of you!"

Gervaise, perfectly beside herself and trembling with passion, turned round and looked for something on the ground. Finding only the little pail, she took it by its feet and threw the bluing water into Virginie's face.

"Jade! she has ruined my dress," cried she. All of her shoulder was wet, and her left hand was stained with blue. "Hold on!"

She seized a pail and emptied it on the young woman. Then a tremendous fight began. They both ran along the tubs, catching up the pails that were filled and throwing their contents upon each other's heads. And each deluge was accompanied by screams. Gervaise cried:

"There! you got that one full!"

"Ah, crooked one! Here's for your filth. Make yourself clean once in your life."

"Yes, yes; I'll clean you, you big codfish!"

"Here's another! Rinse your teeth and make your toilet for this evening."

They ended by filling the pails at the cocks, and continued their nasty talk while they waited. The first pails, badly thrown, barely reached them; but they got the hang of it at last. It was Virginie who first received one full in the face: the water entering at her neck, flowed into her back and breast, and ran down under her dress. She was still stunned by it when a second one caught her sideways, coming full on her left ear, soaking her chignon, which unraveled itself like a string. Gervaise was first splashed on her legs—one pail filled her shoes and spattered up to her legs; two others inundated her hips. And then it became impossible to judge where the blows struck. Both were dripping from head to foot, their waists sticking to their shoulders, their skirts clinging to their backs—gaunt, stiffened, shivering, and dripping on all sides like umbrellas in the rain.

"How queer they look!" said the hoarse voice of one of the washerwomen.

The wash-house was tremendously amused. They had drawn back, so as not to be splashed. Applause and jokes were heard in the midst of mill dam noises—the noises of buckets emptied in all directions—and on the ground ran streams—the two women wading up to their ankles in them. And here Virginie did a very mean thing in throwing a pail of boiling lye that one of her neighbors had left near by. Then there was a cry, for they thought Gervaise was scalded. But her left foot was only slightly burned; and then, exasperated by the pain, she threw an empty bucket with all her strength at Virginie's legs. Virginie fell. Then all the women cried out together:

"She's broken her foot!"

"Well, bless me! the other one wanted to boil her!"

"The blonde one is right, after all, if they took her man!"

Madame Boche raised her arms to heaven, filling the air with cries. She had prudently fortified herself between two tubs, and Claude and Etienne, crying, suffocating, alarmed, clung to her dress with the continued cries of "mamma! mamma!" bursting through their sobs. When she saw Vir-ginie down, she ran to Gervaise and drew her away by the skirts, repeating:

"Come, go away! Be reasonable. My blood is turned. Upon my word, I never saw such slaughter."

But she drew back, and returned to take refuge again between the tubs with the children, for Virginie had just taken Gervaise by the throat. She squeezed it hard, and tried to strangle her. Then the latter, with a violent jerk, cleared herself, hanging in her turn to the tail of the other's chignon as though she wanted to pull her head off. The fight recommenced without a cry, without a taunt. They did not take hold of each other's bodies, but attacked their faces with open, crooked-fingered hands, pinching and scratching what they got hold of. The red ribbon and the blue chenille of the tall one were torn off, her waist split at the neck, showing her bare shoulder; whilst the blonde, partly undressed, a sleeve of her white gown gone—she did not know how—had a rent in her chemise which showed parts of her naked body. Shreds of dresses were strewn around. The first blood was drawn from Gervaise, three long scratches appearing from her mouth to her chin. She shut her eyes as each blow came, for fear of having them put out. As Virginie was not yet bleeding, Gervaise watched her ears for a while, angry that she could not seize them; but at last she got hold of one of the yellow glass earrings and tore it away, and then the blood flowed indeed.

"They will kill each other! Separate the devils!" cried several voices.

The women drew near. They were of two parties: One excited the two women as they would fighting dogs; the other, more nervous, always trembling, turned away their heads—they had had enough of it, and repeated that they would be sick from it, very certainly. Then a general fight seemed likely to ensue; they called each other heartless, good for nothing; naked arms were now extended, and two or three slaps resounded.

Madame Boche went for the wash-house boy.

"Charles, Charles! Where is he?"

She found him in the front row, looking on with folded arms. He was a great tall fellow with an enormous neck. He laughed, and seemed to enjoy the women's nakedness.

"Ah! You are there!" cried Madame Boche, on seeing him. "Come, help us to separate them. You could easily do it if you would."

"Ah, yes! No, thank you. If there was only one," said he, quietly. "To have my eyes scratched out as on the other day? I am not here for that purpose; I should have too much to do. Don't you fear—there! It does them good; a little bleeding will make them more gentle."

Then the concierger spoke of calling in the police. But the mistress of the house, the delicate young woman with weak eyes opposed it very positively, saying, several times:

"No, no! I don't want to compromise the house."

So the fight continued on the floor. All at once Virginie got onto her knees, she had seized a pounder, and was brandishing it, her voice rattling in her throat:

"Here's something, wait! Get your dirty linen ready."

Gervaise quickly put forth her hand and reached for another pounder, holding it up like a club. Her voice was also hoarse:

"Ah! You want some lye, do you? Let me get hold of your skin. I'll make dish-cloths of it!"

For a moment they remained there, kneeling and threatening; hair over their eyes, breasts puffed out, muddy, swollen, watching each other while waiting for breath. Gervaise gave the first blow, her pounder glanced off Virginie's shoulder, and she threw herself aside to avoid the pounder of the latter, which just touched her hip. Then, when more in train, they hit each other as the washerwomen beat their clothes, rudely and in cadence. When they struck the blow was deadened like a blow in a bucket of water.

The women about them no longer laughed; many had gone away, saying that it made them sick. Those who remained stretched their necks, their eyes sparkling with cruel brightness, saying that they were game and bully.

Madame Boche had taken Claude and Etienne away to the other end of the room, where their cries we heard mingling with the sonorous knocks of the pounders.

Gervaise suddenly yelled. Virginia had struck her on the arm just above the elbow. A red spot appeared, and the flesh swelled up instantly. Then she hurled herself forward, as though she would brain the other.

"Enough! Enough!" cried they. Her expression was so fierce that no one dared approach her. With increasing strength, she seized Virginie by the waist, bent her over, brought her face to the slabs, with her back in the air, and, notwithstanding her twisting, she pulled her dress well up. Then, with the pounder raised, she began to beat as she had beaten formerly at Plassans, on the borders of the Vienne, when her mistress did the washing of the garrison, the wood softening in the flesh with a dampened noise. With each tap a red band marbled the white skin.

"Oh, oh!" murmured the boy, Charles, astonished, and with big eyes.

The laugh had gone round again; but soon came the cry of "enough, enough!" Gervaise neither heard nor relaxed. She attended to her business, stooping over, preoccupied with the thought of leaving no part untouched. She wanted to cover all that skin with blows and with confusion; and she sang with ferocious gayety:

"Pan! pan! Margot au lavoir;
Pan! pan! à coups de battoir;
Pan! pan! va laver son cœur;
Pan! pan! tout noir de douleur."

Then she began again: "There, that's for you, that's for your sister, that's for Lantier. When you see them give it to them. That's for Lantier, that's for your sister, that's for you."

"Pan! pan! Margot au lavoir;
Pan! pan! à coups de battoir."

They had to drag Virginie from her hands. The big brunette, her face dripping wet with tears, purple, and confused, took up her things and went away completely conquered. Gervaise, however, put on the sleeve of her gown and pinned up her skirts. As her arm pained her, and she begged Madame Boche to lift up her clothes on to her shoulder, the concierger recounted the fight, spilling emotions, and talked of looking her over to see what was done.

"You may have something broken, for I heard

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

Mr. Edouard Remenyi, solo violinist to his Imperial and Royal Majesty the Emperor of Austria, etc., is a great artist—from the showman's standpoint. That he does not attract large audiences is an accident (of mismanagement, I should say), and not at all his fault; he does every conceivable thing to draw them, is up to every trick of the trade, plays the farcour much better than the fiddle, and enraptures ninety-nine out of every hundred persons who go to hear him. The hundredth one—who generally has some little respect for music as an art, and who perhaps has some idea besides of what violin playing ought to be—he disgusts. I have heard Mr. Remenyi play two movements from the Mendelssohn Concerto, the Otello Fantasia, some transcriptions from Chopin, his own Hungarian specialties, etc., and if this is playing the violin, I, for one, would not be sorry if every violin, excepting those of the orchestra players, were broken up for kindling wood. The guts might remain unmolested inside their original possessors—who would put them to much better use—and the hairs of the bow continue to adorn the tails of the Arabian mares—the violin is sometimes male and sometimes female, but the bow hairs are supposed (perhaps because they make the tone) to be always from feminine tails—and continue in their former useful and delightful avocation of brushing the flies off the rounded haunches. As for Mr. Remenyi—he might get him to a nunnery; he looks as though it would console him somewhat for the loss of his fiddle.

Mr. Remenyi has considerable technique—of a certain undisciplined kind; quite enough to play most of the pieces of his repertoire much better than he does, and—setting aside his péchant for sawdust and spangles—will count as a violinist of about the fourth or fifth rank, of whom it is extremely doubtful whether—even with youth and industry in his favor—he would ever reach the first. He can make much noise on the violin, but has no tone; that is, none of the sustained tone that is the first requisite for a good player. He can make his noise only by constantly shifting his bow (doing this constantly—and disgustingly, even—in the cantabile of the Mendelssohn Concerto), and sawing his trills out of the fiddle very much as I have seen it done by country fiddlers. In his piano passages he is compelled to resort to the same trick of the incompetents; the change of direction is quick, light, and well managed; but it nevertheless disfigures the phrases. His left hand is at times excellent; certain passages—especially rapid scales—he does very well. But he is very uncertain with them, and evidently feels this himself; if a passage is in the least hazardous, he slides and slubbers up to it and down from it. Thirds, sixths, and octaves, are all managed in the same way; they are rarely cleverly or neatly given, and, in rapid tempi, very much mixed. His staccato is not bad, though in no way remarkable; his leggiere rather heavy; and his martellato excellent. His style—individual, genial, magnetic, whatever they may call it—is simply the most abominable caricature of music that ever came to my notice. It is as though he felt that he can not make the points that would be made by a real violinist, and substitutes a sensation of his own. In playing a melody, he howls and slides (like the attempt at portamento of a bad singer), expressing his emotion by a series of sudden stunning fortes and extreme pianos. This, again, even in the Andante of the Mendelssohn Concerto, and—still more offensively—in the introduction and Adagio of the Otello Fantasia. His Nocturne of Chopin is bathos with frills; his Mazurka a grimace similarly embellished. All of these things had to submit themselves to his one style of cadenza, which generally consists of some scale passages and a bit of arpeggio across the four strings, with a little tail of pianissimo with the bow well up on the finger-board. His martial introduction to the Rákoczy March is a stirring and a clever performance, and there were good things in his playing of Paganini's twenty-fourth Caprice. But, per contra, the twenty-first would not have counted as a creditable performance from a pupil.

Mr. Ferdinand Dulcken, who figures as musical director of the Remenyi Concerts—that is, has most of the work, playing all the accompaniments besides his solos—has proved himself an admirable accompanist as well as a very enjoyable pianist. His playing of the Beethoven Sonata (C sharp minor, so-called "Moonlight") on Wednesday, had many fine moments—the opening of the Allegretto was especially refined and artistic—and the Martini Gavotte—Monday—was delightful. Other things—the Rondo of Mendelssohn particularly—seemed to suffer from exaggeration. This is the more difficult to account for when we know that Mr. Dulcken is a son, and probably pupil, of the celebrated Madame Louise Dulcken of London, who was a friend of Mendelssohn, and certainly knew just how his compositions should be played. Perhaps he feels and sympathizes with his surroundings. I think he would be safer in taking his tone from Mrs. Thurston, who has a noble and beautiful style, and whose singing is—in spite of a weak place in her middle voice—fully satisfying. This lady is an artist. Her voice is beautiful in quality—though, I fancy, forced somewhat out of its original register—and has fine timbre, and behind her voice she has brains, soul, and artistic temperament. To the musician Mrs. Thurston must be the special point of attraction in these concerts; her share in them is genuine art work of beautiful and refined quality.

If Pinafore affects the general public at all as it does me the managers will make a mint of money out of it. The sparkling wit and charming music draw me to it night after night. At the Grand Opera House Miss Sherwin is making a real prima donna part of "Josephine," and singing it very well, too, while the ensembles, choruses, etc., are given with great verve and a much finer appreciation of the points than I have heard elsewhere. The stage setting is also beautiful and exceedingly effective.

OSCAR WEIL.

There is something attractive about the bruised, scratched, and scarred face of the little fellow who always gives as good as he receives, and comes out of the fight with a glistening eye and a bright row of laughing teeth; but the other boy, that sulks, and mutters, and picks up a big rock—bah! you always feel like taking him by the collar and dipping him off the dock.

ARCHERY NOTES.

The archers of the Eastern clubs have been making some good scores in their practice for the Grand National Archery Tournament to take place in Chicago in August, which I give for the benefit and imitation of our Pacific Coast bowmen. Mr. Gray, of the Highland Park archery team, at Highland Park, Illinois, made the following scores, in 90 arrows at 60 yards at a 45-inch target: Hits, 82; score, 368. Hits, 81; score, 370. Hits, 87; score, 399.

At Titusville, Pennsylvania, some excellent shooting was done the other day by the team from the principal club of that place. Distance 30 yards, 60 arrows each, target 48 inches, Mr. Webber scored 420; Mr. Marsh, 428; O. J. Marsh, 444.

At the Pequosette archery meeting, target 48 inches, ladies' range 20 yards, gentlemen's 30 yards, the best score in 30 arrows was 14 hits, 54 points, made by Miss Ingraham, and the best gentleman's 21 hits, 97 points, made by A. S. Brownelle.

The split bamboo bow of American manufacture is attracting much attention in the East. A correspondent of a New York sporting paper gives his experience of the instrument thus: "The bow I used was six feet and about forty-five pounds pull, yet it readily outshot my English bow, which is in itself a very strong shooter. The same results followed in comparison with a very powerful South Sea bow, and a Japanese war bow, both of which were strictly business bows. To try its endurance I first shot a number of Japanese 38-inch arrows, drawing them to the head, and then in the hardihood of experiment put my foot on the grip piece and drew the cord nearly five feet without damage to the bow. That was about as tough a test as one could well put a bow to. With anything like reasonable and proper use the bamboo bow seems to me to be practically indestructible. It is the only bow that I know of on which the archer can draw the good old-fashioned cloth-yard shaft. Its enduring qualities will be fully appreciated by any one who has experienced the annoyance of having a bow to which he is accustomed break on his hands. Its pull is so smooth and even that one is at first deceived as to its power." If this bow comes at all near the opinion of its eulogist, I should like to see a few of them on this coast.

Peters & Co. received a few days ago one dozen lance-wood, and one dozen ladies' lemonwood bows, which no doubt will be soon picked up. They are of Highfield make, and are the first lancewood bows that have ever been imported by dealers. With them are a good lot of the Highfield best arrows. There has been a great demand for arrows here, and it puzzles the dealers to keep the bowmen in shafts. The tournament will bring together, in all probability, a number of archers from Sacramento, San José, and Gilroy. The club cup, a large silver goblet, elegantly chased, bearing the scores of the different clubs, and open to all archery organizations, each team to consist of five members, will be shot for at distances of 30, 40, and 50 yards, 30 arrows at each range.

The gold arrow will be shot for at 60 yards, 30 arrows each day, and this contest is also open to all comers. The arrow is a handsome piece of workmanship, and will be a grand trophy for the successful archer to hand down to posterity. "The ARGONAUT arrow," a prize offered by the proprietors of this journal, to the lady making the best score at 20 yards, will be one of the trophies of the tournament. This jewel, now being manufactured by Geo. H. Shreve & Co., will be a handsome golden arrow in the form of a pin, with a pendant from centre representing a target with the colors: the white, and blue, and red, and gold, marked in enamel—the score and inscription and name of the victor to be engraved on the reverse in gold. Open to all lady archers.

There will also be prizes to be contended for by individual archers at ranges of from 30 to 80 yards, many consisting of the finest archery tackle, such as bows, best footed arrows, strings, targets, etc.

Perhaps a few of the general instructions to beginners in the art of bow shooting may be found useful to the novice in archery. In taking one's position, preparatory to shooting, observe that the only part of the body to be turned toward the target is the face. For instance, if the target is placed full west, the body should face directly to the north, and the face looking sideways on the left shoulder. The heels should be from four to six inches apart, the weight of the body being equal on both feet; the head inclining a little downward over the heart. In holding the bow the top of the hand must be level with the top of the handle; for as the resistance from each end is where the bow is held, so, if the hand is shifted, the centre of action is changed accordingly. The left arm, which holds the bow, must be held out straight. The bow must be held perpendicularly, and the archer must direct his eyes at the centre of the target, and then, bringing the right hand to the ear, loose sharply and quickly.

The two days for the tournament have been definitely settled—the 20th and 21st of June—and the Oakland Cricket Grounds chosen as the place for the contest. All archers who intend to enter for the individual prizes are requested to write their names on the list at Peters & Co.'s, or correspond with Daniel O'Connell, secretary of the executive committee, Oakland. The tournament is open to all archers, irrespective of race, color, or religious belief.

At a meeting of the executive committee, held on Friday, the following facts developed themselves: The tents, which are very handsome ones, shall be pitched on the Oakland Cricket Grounds Thursday morning, and a target will be set there for those archers who wish to accustom themselves to the range, etc. The targets will be set up in a line about thirty feet apart, each team shooting at its own target, and one from each team following the other down the line in the order of shooting. The scores will be ten points—that is two for the greatest aggregate score, two for the greatest number of hits, and two for each of the best scores at 30, 40, and 50 yards.

Feigenbaum, on Sansome Street, has received some English straw targets and easels, which of course are the perfect thing. Also, some Ayres bows and arrows and tackle of American manufacture.

QUIVER.

An exchange tells of an Alabama lady who cries nearly all the time, and yet grows fat. Her fat is laid on in tiers.

But the young woman wanted to go. She returned no answer to the pityings nor to the garrulous ovations of the women who stood around her in their aprons. When she had received her load she went to the door, where her children awaited her.

"It's two hours; that makes two sous," said the mistress, already reestablished behind her glass windows, as she stopped her.

"Why two sous?" She did not understand that she was asking the price of her place. Then she paid the two sous, and limping considerably under the weight of the damp linen on her shoulder, dripping, the elbow black and blue, and with bloody cheek, she went off, dragging along with her bare arms Etienne and Claude, who trotted along at her side still shaking and smutty with their tears.

Behind her the wash-house kept up its tremendous mill-dam racket. The women had eaten their bread, drank their wine, and they were tapping all the harder and with faces all the gayer and brighter for the fight between Gervaise and Virginie. All along the tubs again those furious movements of the arms, and of those angular profiles of marionettes with broken backs and distorted shoulders bending over suddenly as though on hinges, were going again. Conversation ran on from one end of the aisles to the other; voices, laughs, dirty words, mingled in with the gurgling of the waters. The cocks were spitting, the buckets dashing, and a river running under the forms. Then came the afternoon's great work, the pounding of the clothes. The steam became reddened in the large hall with round sun holes, balls of gold, which the holes of the curtains allowed to pass, and one breathed that tepid, suffocating smell of soapy odors. All at once the room was filled with white steam; the enormous copper lid over the boiling lye rose mechanically along the central stem of the hanger, and the yawning copper hole at the bottom of its brick masonry threw out whirlwinds of vapor, smelling of that sugared savor of potash; and yet beside it the drying boxes were working: bundles of linen in cast-iron cylinders gave up their dampness on a turn of the machine's wheel, panting, steaming, shaking rudely the wash-house with the continued working of its steel arms.

When Gervaise at last set feet in the alley way of the Hôtel Boncœur, her tears came again. It was a dark, narrow alley, with a gutter running along the wall for dirty water; and the smell which she perceived reminded her of the fortnight passed there with Lantier, a fortnight of misery and quarrels—whose remembrance nevertheless filled her with regret, for she seemed to be just realizing her abandonment.

Up stairs the room was bare, full of sunshine, the window being open. That gleam of sun, that sheen of dancing gold dust, made the black ceiling and the walls of damaged paper look sad indeed. There remained only hanging on a nail at the chimney a small silk handkerchief, twisted like a string. The bed of the children drawn into the middle of the room opened the way to the bureau, whose unclosed drawers showed their bare sides. Lantier had washed and used up the pomatum—two sous of pomatum on a playing-card—and the dirty water from his hands still filled the basin. He had forgotten nothing. The corner occupied until then by the trunk appeared to Gervaise like a large, dark hole. She did not even find the small round looking-glass banging up to the sash. Then came a presentiment; she looked to the chimney-piece. Lantier had even taken the pawn-tickets, for the delicate rose-tinted package was no longer there between the unmatched candlesticks.

She hung her clothes on the back of a chair and remained standing, turning around and looking at the furniture, so stupefied that her tears no longer ran. One sou remained out of the four kept for the washing. Then hearing Etienne and Claude already comforted and laughing at the window, she drew near them, took their heads under her arms, and forgot herself for the moment before the gray causeway where she had that morning seen the people and the giant works of Paris awaking from their slumbers. At this hour the pavement, used by the business-people of the day, reverberated over the city behind the Octroi wall. It was on to that pavement, in the furnace heat, that they were to turn her all alone with her little children. And as with a look she took in the outer boulevards right and left, stopping at the end, a dull kind of fear came over her that her life from that time forward might be passed between the shambles and the hospital.

LXXXIII.—Sunday, June 15.—Bill of Fare for Twelve Persons.

Eastern Oysters.
Cury Soup.
Stewed Terrapin. Hominy.
Crab, Mayonaisse Dressing.
Fillet of Beef, with Truffles and Mushrooms.
Peas.
Roman Punch.
Roast Lamb, Currant Jelly.
Potatoes Cut with Cutter and Baked Brown with Meat.
Lettuce and Nasturium French Dressing.
Cheese.
Charlotte Russe. Brandied Peaches.
Epergne of Appricots, Cherries, Plums, and Oranges in Sections.
White Wine, Claret, Madeira, and Champagne.

To COOK TERRAPIN.—Take four nice female terrapin, throw them into boiling water, boil until the toe-nails will remove easily. Take them up, and when cold enough to handle, remove the shells, sand-bag, the portion of the liver that contains the gall, etc. Cut them in quarters, or smaller pieces if desired; take half a pint of soup stock, melt it, and have ready the hard-boiled yolks of eight eggs, pound them fine, let them boil a few minutes in the stock, then strain over the terrapin and simmer fifteen minutes; add one salt-spoonful cayenne pepper, one of powdered mace, one of cinnamon, one of all-spice, and half a spoonful of cloves, half a pint of sherry, and one and a half pounes of butter; put about one tablespoonful of flour, if not thick enough add more, if too thick thin with sherry. Cook until sufficiently tender; add one pint more of sherry, and set away until next day. When wanted, heat in a bain-marie until ready to dish. Two things are necessary to good terrapin—first, good wine; second, good judgment as to taste and consistency. Some chop the white of the eggs which have been used in the sauce, and throw them lightly upon the top of the dish when ready for the table. Terrapin may be eaten with baked potatoes, rice, or hominy served in a separate dish. I think hominy the best.

LYONNAISE POTATOES.—Having been requested to give this receipt, we comply: Potatoes Lyonnaise are prepared according to taste, that is, as much onion as liked, either sliced or minced. The potatoes must be cold and sliced; for as much onion as you please, and fry until about half done; then add the potatoes and again two ounces of butter; salt and pepper, stir and toss quickly until the potatoes are all fried of a fine light brown color. It may require more butter to fry them, as potatoes absorb more than other vegetables. A little finely chopped parsley may be sprinkled on them when cooked. They may also be fried in oil if preferred.

Mr. Heep said to a drunken fellow, "If I were in your place, I would go out to the woods and hang myself." The answer was, "If yooz in my plaiish, you couldn't get there."

A SOUTH SEA IDYL'S SEQUEL.

BY CHARLES WARREN STODDARD.

Why does experience profit us nothing? I have asked myself this question a thousand times, and I repeat it now, as I hold in my hand a rare copy of an obsolete volume entitled South Sea Idyls. That book contains the chronicles of my emotional adolescence. It was written in the first flush of youth. It is too true not to be discredited, and it has invariably been discredited by the wrong readers in the wrong stages of the narrative. The volume contains experiences in three episodes, respectively entitled:

- "The House of the Sun."
- "The Chapel of the Palms."
- "Kahéle."

There is naked truth enough in these chapters to flood a well. I know this better than any one else, and in proof of it I triumphantly quote the valedictory, which was written in the day of my enthusiasm, while the almond tree flourished, ere the stars were darkened, and before the grasshopper had become a burden and all the daughters of music were brought low! After my third rhapsody, entitled "Kahéle," that soft-eyed savage discreetly took his leave. With the wisdom of an ancient I thus applauded his memory:

"Adieu, Kahéle! I might have upbraided thee for thy inconstancy, had I not been accused of it myself. I might have felt some modicum of contempt for thee, had thy skin been white; but under cover of thy darkness sin hid her ugliness, and thy rich blood leaped to many generous acts that a white-livered sycophant might not aspire to. I can but forgive all, and, sometimes, long a little to live over the two sides of you—extremes that met in your precious corporosity, and made me content with a changeable, and oftentimes cheerless, pilgrimage. For I knew, my boy, that if I went astray you would meet me upon the highest moral grounds; and though I could not rely upon you, somehow you came to time when least expected, and filled me with admiration and surprise—a sentiment which time and absence only threaten to perpetuate."

Time and absence did their work effectually. I returned to the metropolis of the Pacific. A letter followed me couched in appalling English. In it I detected the delicate aroma of the grape-blossoms of Lahaina. In spirit I walked again among pepper groves, and sunned my soul beside the palm-fringed sea. It was a message of love from my protégé, and my heart leaped within me as I recalled the fascinating, inconsistent past. I replied cordially, and set sail for other shores. The whole world lay between us. We stood feet to feet; and, had we ascended at that moment, our spirits could never have met in the wide universe. Fortunate fate! we both survive, and I have lived to prove myself a prophet in my own country, where, thank heaven! honors are easy. Once more I drifted back to the land of my adoption. Seven years stretched between me and the glimmering past. I thought of it as of a dream; I dreamed of it as of a thought—not a semblance of reality remained. Listen to the exordium! One morning I was summoned from my late breakfast by the postman, who, with the polite discretion which has distinguished him from the first hour of our acquaintance, begged me to open a letter which was inscribed to—

"Mr. Charles Stoddard, California."

It was subdirected to an innumerable lock-box which does not exist. I broke the seal and saw at a glance that the document was unmistakably mine. No one but a savage could have written it; no one but a boned savage stuffed with missionary teachings; one whose meat and drink, whose food and raiment, whose staff of life, whose First Reader, Second Reader, Third Reader, and Speller, and History, and Romance, has been the New Testament; one who has oiled the gospel according to St. John in the crown of his hat, and has rolled cigarettes with the Song of Songs; who has stormed the school-room ceiling with Scriptural wads; in brief, a native Hawaiian scripturist. Moreover, his name followed the scrip, which I copy verbatim et litteratim:

"PORT GAMBLE, Kitsap County, W. T."

"MR. CHARLES STODDARD, ESQ.—DEAR SIR:—I am very glad to see you my Dear Lord of Our Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen. This is the first letter I sent to you my Dear. I remember you for the year One thousand Eight hundred and seventy one—before we are to go Circuit the Island of Maui—and gone to Kaupo—from Kaupo to Hana and see the two Rev Father Priests. I am your young servant Kahéle. I live to [left] Honolulu on the last day of July and come here with my Both [which is Boss with a palpable lip!] and then my Both be dead. I had nothing to do here—no one to keep my life—if you please to give me some job then I stay with you for five year. If you see this letter you telegraph for me. This is our second letter to you—[mark with what royal condescension he recalls our former correspondence] because you write me one letter to Lahaina."

"Your young servant, KAHELE."

It was all his own; the tropical luxuriance of language, the impressive majesty of the opening paragraph, the indiscriminate use of the letters l and r—a characteristic of the Hawaiian tongue—the painful imitation of a difficult language, seldom spoken with much care, and in his case caught wholly by ear. What did I do? I telegraphed him within the hour to work his passage down to my arms by the first vessel that met his eye. All was forgiven on the instant; I pictured that starving prodigal skipping like the young unicorn on receipt of my reply.

I imagined the dusky fellow in the hour of his deliverance, and impatiently awaited his arrival. "No sail from day to day." By and by came a second letter, evidently from the same hand—a flesh-colored envelope, not without blemish, bearing this fragmentary address:

"Mr. Charles W. Stoddard."

By this time he had come to the edge of the envelope, and be stopped short in his tracks. Within, the unhappy scribe continued his heroic struggle with the perplexing intricacies of my name.

"MR. CHARLES WARREN STODDARD—Aloha nui oe:—I received your telegraph on thirteen of this month; when I open it and read my heart is very much of joyful. I wait for the steamer, when he come Seattle then I go to your home. Now, my Dear Both (still hissing) I have no news to tell you about the golden chain of love between you and me. Your young servant, KAHELE."

Again I awaited the arrival of my young servant, and thought of him a thousand times, storm-tossed upon the wintry seas, heart-sick, home-sick, sighing for the fragrant winds that visit so lightly the green seclusion of his native vales. Once more the faithful postman entered with a letter and a smile; the envelope smaller than usual, hence the following address:

"Mr. Charles Warren S.,
"S. F., Calif."

And within, the latest efforts of this tireless nomenclator:

"WASHINGTON TERRITORY."

"MESSIEURS CHAS. WARREN STOD:—"

['Time can not wither, nor custom stale, his infinite variety.']

"SIR:—This is the third letter I sent to you, my Dear Sir. I leave the Puget Sound on the eighteen of December, A. D. 1878. I go to Seat [Seattle] on the steamer Alida, and see the Captain of Dakota, the Mail steamer of San Francisco. I tell him I want to work my passage from Seat to S. F. He tell me no. I stay in Seat two days. On the twenty-two of Decem. I coming to Tacoma till this time I write this letter. If you please—in love for your servant—to send me ten dollars inside letter for me to pay my passage. If I stay with you I pay you my owe. Your servant, KAHELE."

He no longer called himself my "young servant;" he seemed to have grown old in the vain attempt to reach a haven of rest. This touched me to the quick. Ten dollars are but as a feather in the balance when there is a soul to save. In hot haste I purchased a ticket, and it was forwarded with a line of solace to the companion of my brighter days. Once more I watched and waited. From my window on the hill I signaled every passing sail. The hours lagged. What if the poor fellow, prematurely aged, had already dropped into the greedy grave that seemed yawning at his feet? What if the means of his deliverance never reached him, but fell by chance into the hands of some worthless straggler who might at any moment cross my threshold and attempt to palm upon me a forged identity? Seven years added to the infant, Kahéle might be equal to almost any one. How was I to detect a fraud unless it were of another color, which, please heaven, it was not to be?

With the dusk, one windy eve, shrouded in cold sea-fog, the picture of desolation, Kahéle stood in the doorway. He was changed. He was a strapping fellow of one and twenty, scantily clad as to his upper works, but bearing himself with an air of decayed elegance, and wearing conspicuously a pair of nobby boots, with tapering hoodlum heels. He had evidently been a swell. He blushed with reference to his flannel shirt, his overalls, his shockingly bad hat. There could be no doubt that this was the youngster who persuaded me in the barbarian days, who wooed me in the "House of the Sun," beguiled me in the "Chapel of the Palms," and distracted me in the third chapter of his career—a chapter that is dignified with his mellifluous name. The ambrosial locks distilling the faint fragrance of coconut oil; the mild eyes, with their ingenuous glance, the depressed nose, the proud, sensuous lip, now mantled with gosling-down—it was he without the shadow of a doubt. To put him at his ease I extended to him the freedom of the town, and he began the new life by immediately going through my wardrobe like a million moths. There was little for him to do but to look interesting. To be sure he surveyed the city, and gave me official returns each evening, after dinner. He drew maps of the streets; had names and numbers at his tongue's end; inspected the chief public buildings, and passed judgment upon them with the obtrusive confidence of a circumnavigator, though I am proud to state that the Palace Hotel staggered him, as he confessed to me that it was finer in some respects than anything in Honolulu. He revered Woodward's Garden, in common with the masses; enjoyed the drama; reveled in the church. He aspired night and day. In confidential moments he broke to me his plans for a future, that seemed to him boundless in its capability. After a fête at Woodward's he longed to enter the arena. The drama inspired him with dreams of the stage. As for the sacrifice of the mass, he more than once talked seriously of studying for the priesthood, and even asked me how much it would cost—he always counted the cost, an example too seldom followed by his betters. A delicious melancholy seized him whenever he inclined to the novitiate, but his ambition was boundless, and I think he preferred a roving commission—one that would admit of his aiding the propagation of the faith by easy stages in every quarter of the habitable globe.

It was about this time that life began to pall. The youth missed his kindred, and mourned for them. Our talks were all of the past. We lived over the riotous days, and renewed our pilgrimages until there was no valley left unvisited, no stone unturned. He chanted his legendary songs in mellow gutturals; sat in the sunshine of the deep bay-window; looked off upon the ships in the harbor, and asked the price of them. His wage was oftentimes spent in fruit stalls, though on one occasion he returned to me with a small casket of jewels, which he had purchased at the street corner, under a torch-light, for fifteen cents. Then it occurred to me that some of his people must be within reach, and I sent him forth to take the city census. Day after day he stood on Market Street, watching for Kanakas; night after night he returned again, empty-handed, plunged in black despair.

At last he caught one on the fly, a mariner, one of a "forec'sle" full of them. That night there was revelry on the water front, and the throb of the calabash quickened the feet of the Hula dancers until day-break; when they all ate of the national poi out of one trough and slept the sleep of the just. No trouble now, no languishing, no weariness of spirit. He went his way rejoicing, and returned like the prodigal when he had wasted his portion.

I found that he had, as it were, made his entrée into society. He sparkled with fifteen-cent jewelry, and wore his hat over one ear. He babbled in Spanish, and casually observed that the average señorita is as handsome as the ditto Waikine. He wallowed in verbs, regular and irregular. He once said, as in a dream, yo amo, and again, while his mind wandered, nostros amamos. The confusion that followed this involuntary confession was not that of a scholar. I asked him where he had been, and why he had sought to master a language which was little spoken save by its authors. He wilted, but without a stammer he told how his evenings were passed in sweet communion with a select few, who, like himself, admired the melodious speech of Spain. But where? With an innocence that threw me off my guard he gave me an address—Pacific Street, near Kearny.

Still harping on his Spanish, I showed him some papers long treasured as an heirloom in this homestead—certificates of stock in a fabulous Mexican mine, from whose undiscovered bourn no traveler returns; at all events, no living witness has gone farther than levying an assessment—and lived. With the deepest interest he studied the certificates; with the poetic fervor of his race he built his lordly castle and peopled it with the choicer spirits of our acquaintance. It was his wish that we might fly at once to this glittering realm and rest from our labors. I smiled sadly, bitterly; I always do when a bright manhood is painted for me by that youth in whose imperfect lexicon there is no such word as "fail." Kahéle soothed me with savage songs. Together we groped among the evening shadows of Kearney Street, than which no respectable thoroughfare in God's world is worse lighted. It was my wish to hear the guitar touched by the skilled fingers of his friends, who are to the manner born; but ere we reached the quarter he had idealized I turned, and he was gone! Like a shadow he came, like a shadow he departed.

I passed three silent, sensitive, sorrowful days. It is not well to make your idols and to find them clay, and to prosecute the unprofitable business year after year. He returned not. No more I heard his foot upon the stair; no more I listened to his chant—its soft cadenza is forever hushed within my chamber. I searched the journals for casualty returns. I haunted the Morgue like a press reporter. I grew morbid and morose. Then I chanced upon his commonplace book; with the lynx-eye of a detective I studied its pages, but gained no clue to the mystery. I discovered among his effects a copy of "Spanish Without a Master, on the Most Simple Principles, for Universal Self-Tuition. Price, Twenty-Five Cents," "The Letter Writer's Own Book," a broken cuff button, and some diamond studs with the glass out—the debris of his jewel case. Evidently, if he fled from me, his flight was premature. Why did I suspect aught, and look into the family archives to find proof of his guilt?

The mining stock was missing!

I visited the several boards with the vague fear that I would come suddenly upon the culprit bulling the market with his Mexico. But the Exchange was innocent of him; Pauper Alley knew him not; and his shadow never again darkened Kearny Street, to my knowledge. Then came another letter—the last of the series. It was a wild scrawl, penciled in haste. It ran as follows:

"CITY OF SANTA CRUZ."

"I am gone to Los Angel, and to Mexico—with my wife."

"Aloha. K."

"TO MR. CHARLES."

I might have known it, had I but listened to the lessons of experience; yet doubtless it was written in his horoscope, and I was but a means to an end. Now dawn upon me the significance of the portentous ides of May. Fool that I was! I might have cut the net that enthralled him, and perhaps have spared him for a costlier sacrifice. Insensible victim! Is he founding his fortune in the fastnesses of the mineral hills? Is it well with him in his mountain stronghold? Do the torrents that pour their silver beside his door muffle the tinkling music of guitars, the "click" of castanets, the boom of the hollow drum? Does he dream again of the loves of the Barbary Coast, chief of whom is his Circe?

Yet am I proud of this climax, for did I not write of him years ago, to wit: "He was Kahéle, the two-sided; Kahéle, the chameleon, whose character and disposition partook of the color of his surroundings; who was pious to the tune of the church-bell, yet agile as any dancer of the lascivious hula at the thump of the tom-tom. He was a representative worthy of some consideration; a typical Hawaiian, whose versatility was only excelled by the plausibility with which he developed new phases of his kaleidoscopic character. He was very charming, but as diverting in one rôle as another. He was, moreover, worthy of much praise for his skill in playing each part so perfectly that to this hour I am not sure which of his dispositions he excelled in, nor in which he was most at home."

He, therefore, went to the devil, that the words of the prophet might be fulfilled! But what does it matter to me so long as I 'a. a. my experiences over and over, and outlive them one or all! Come, daisies and buttercups—the more the merrier; spice my dull life with at least this variety, and let me ago 'ze or let me die:

"For I am of those Azras who, when they love, must perish!"

And I'm awfully used to it.

We hoped there might be a non-partisan judicial ticket. We were the more anxious because it is a fact that the Democracy has some of the best legal talent in its party. Chief Justice Wallace, Joseph Hoge, Samuel Wilson, Hall McAllister, Jackson Temple, William Wallace, John S. Hager, E. W. McKinstry, and others we might name, are excellently good judicial timber; but the political millennium is too far off for the judicial lions and lambs to lie down together. For Supreme Judges of the Republican party we hear named Mr. I. S. Belcher, of Yuba, for Chief Justice; for Associate Justices, Mr. A. P. Catlin of Sacramento, Mr. J. D. Lattimer of San Francisco, Mr. J. E. Hale of Placer, Mr. J. T. Richards of Santa Barbara, Mr. Freeman of Sacramento, Mr. Charles A. Tuttle of Alameda, Mr. O. C. Pratt of Butte, Mr. George Cadwallader of Sacramento, Mr. E. D. Wheeler and Mr. Samuel Dwinelle of San Francisco, Mr. A. Bronson of Los Angeles, Mr. J. W. North of San Bernardino.

We hear a great deal of complaint about the way things were done at the primaries. When a political party expects to succeed there is always a row at the primaries and a struggle in Convention. It is a good sign. It indicates that there is something worth fighting for. It was the Bulletin that used to vex its virtuous soul over the way the "boys" did things; now it is the virtuous and exemplary Chronicle. When Gilbert A. Grant heard that Republicans were beginning to get drunk and fight over nominations, he hailed it as an encouraging sign of party strength. When the Democracy has a "dead thing," it is sure to quarrel. That it does not do so now, indicates weakness. That the Republicans do row a bit is the best evidence that they intend to win.

Daniel Kenfield, of Tuolumne, is fairly entitled to the nomination of State Comptroller by the Republican Convention.

The dark horse for Governor on the Republican ticket is Mr. Justice A. L. Rhodes, of Santa Clara.

MISS BRACE'S DREAM.

"Truth," said Miss Brace oracularly, "lies at the bottom of a well, and the people of nowadays are too lazy even to go fishing for it. The deceit, and sham, and hypocrisy that one sees everywhere are enough to make him lose his faith in human nature—if he ever had any. Now, for instance, I overheard Fanny Blanchard, the other day, telling a gentleman how much work she did at home, how devoted she was to her 'dear mamma,' how she had made the pretty and elaborate dress she had on, etc., etc. I happened to know that 'dear mamma' and the Ashenputel sister had put every stitch into the pretty dress. So that was one lie. Then a little later old Mrs. Gatherum told me confidentially that little Kate Dalton was once an actress in a variety theatre. That was another lie, for I have known Kate Dalton all her life. But in the eyes of the world poverty and crime are boon companions. One falsehood was born of ambition, and the other of malice, and they were equally useless and stupid. If we could only live in the Palace of Truth, and stop trying to humbug our neighbors, we should be so much happier."

Miss Brace had been expounding some of her pet theories to the little circle of friends who had met this evening at the Major's, and this remarkably brilliant speech was the tag end of one of the "expoundments."

When she finished her sermon she was much disgusted to find that instead of making converts of these easy-going worldlings, she had only bored them. Bob was asleep on the lounge, the Major paced restlessly up and down the room, with his hands clasped behind him, and the ladies had their heads together over an embroidered chair-cover. As I have said before, Miss Brace was disgusted. She shrugged her shoulders and settled herself back in her chair as who should say, "How stupid they are!"

"My dear girl," said Froude, compassionately, "you're wasting your logic. It's very pretty; but they don't hear it, and they wouldn't heed it if they listened ever so long. You can't overturn the dicta of society any more than you can make a new world. We shall all tell white lies, and cheat each other, and be smiling villains to the end, I suppose."

"She doesn't object to man's dishonesty so much," said Bob lazily, roused by Froude's gruff voice; "it's woman, lovely woman. The truth is, Polly, you're a fanatic on the subject of feminine vices."

"It doesn't look well for a woman to have so little faith in her own sex," quoth the Major, pausing in his march. "The ladies are all agreeable, of course; we accept that as a self-evident proposition; and if you would use a little of the policy you condemn it would be better for you, eh?" raising his eyebrows interrogatively, to take the sting out of his words.

"Oh, she's getting too cynical for anything," chimed in the Major's wife. "You'll ruin all your prospects in life, Polly, if you keep on this way. Of course we can't all be as clever as you are," with mock humility, "but we give and take more pleasure. Now Miss Blanchard is really a very nice girl."

"A charming girl!" echoed Bob; "dances divinely, sings like a nightingale, is always good-tempered."

Miss Brace gulped down her rising indignation. She knew that the charming girl was a hypocritical, selfish little flirt, but as Froude had said, what was the use?

In truth Miss Polly was not fitted for a modern regenerator. She might have done nobly in the old Puritan days of zeal and intolerance, but in the nineteenth century she was out of place. At present she had tact enough to change the subject.

"Silenced, but not convinced," murmured Froude, as he bade her good-night a few moments later, and held her hand a little longer than was absolutely necessary.

"You understand, at any rate," she said, impetuously.

"Of course I do," with a tender intonation very soothing to her irritated feelings.

Froude had that manner with all women. It said so plainly "I sympathize with you, I know all your trials—trust me." It was better than a volume of compliments. In short, it made Froude rather dangerous; just now it served as a valve for Polly's lacerated self-love, and sent her to bed with a pathetic little smile on her lips. Pathetic to us, who knew that Froude wasn't a "marrying man" (to use a phrase which, to my thinking, brings matrimony and merchandise too near together). However, I don't know that Polly was falling, or even stepping ever so guardedly, in love. More likely Vanity was only masquerading in Love's dress. She does that sometimes.

Usually Miss Brace slept soundly, not because she had a clean conscience but because her digestion was good. To-night, however, either Froude or the chicken salad, or her lecture had disagreed with her, and she turned and tossed wearily until it became insupportable. So she arranged the drop-light above her head, got a prosy book, and settled herself to read. It was all in vain; Froude's face danced up and down the page, and her mind wandered off to the evening's conversation. Suddenly the book dropped from her hands, and she saw in its place a tiny figure perched daintily upon the foot-piece of the bed.

Of course it was the traditional fairy god-mother, but instead of being attired in the traditional fashion, with peaked cap and scarlet stocking, she wore a plain, straight, gray gown, finished with a white frill at the throat, her hair was banded closely to the queer little head, and almost concealed by—O shade of Parisian modistes!—a white sun-bonnet.

Polly gazed at her with silent awe and admiration.

"If I could only dress like that," she said at last.

"Well, why not?" and the fairy godmother smiled cynically.

"There's nothing to hinder you. Try it."

She pointed a tiny forefinger at Polly, and forthwith that damsel found herself arrayed in exact imitation of the severe simplicity before her.

"Now," said her mentor, "you have an opportunity of putting your theories into practice. You are always shouting at women for their extravagance, and longing for a millennium which shall strip them of the 'dear deceit of beauty.' You're always preaching against shams; suppose you practice a little. How do you like yourself as an emblem of truth?" she asked, as Miss Brace stepped in front of the long mirror.

Polly looked rather discomfited. Her thin hair (or very own) drawn back into a vicious little pug certainly was not becoming, and the straight, short dress, made her tall, slim figure look like a bean-pole.

"It doesn't look the same on me," she faltered. "If every one else would dress in the same I should not mind it, but people will stare so."

"Of course they will, and laugh, too, probably. I see you're not in earnest. These ardent reformers always recant at the last moment," and the morsel laughed wickedly.

"I'm not going to do anything of the sort," said Polly, irritated into defiance. "Only tell me what to do and I'll do it."

"That's good," said the fairy. "Here, take this," producing from a mysterious receptacle a slender, fantastic, ebony wand, inlaid with innumerable quaint characters in gold, and bearing for its handle a wicked little face with diamond eyes.

Miss Brace gave an ecstatic cry. "How pretty!" she said, and took it eagerly. A sharp shock passed through her as she touched it, but she only held it closer, and the tingling pain soon passed away.

Madame Godmother nodded approvingly. "You'll do," she said. "You want to live in the Palace of Truth? Very well. Just touch your friends or enemies with that, and, trust me, the masks will fall off quickly enough. I wouldn't advise you to put to the test any one that you love much. It's very risky;" and she shrugged her shoulders with an air of skepticism beautiful to behold.

"But if I should lose it?" gasped Polly, bewildered by a sudden accession of power, as many another has been before her.

"That's your lookout, of course," said madame, taking out something that looked like a tiny cigarette. "A match if you please, my dear. Thank you. I hope you'll be happy," and with a mocking little laugh she puffed a cloud of smoke in Miss Brace's bewildered eyes and vanished. But the smoke spread and thickened until Polly was surrounded by a blue mist, and as it slowly cleared away she found herself in an immense hall in the midst of a gayly dressed throng.

They were all our best people—so many familiar faces that Polly felt at home at once. It was Vanity Fair in full blast—the idle, careless crowd, the foolish, purposeless talk she knew so well; the vapid compliments and insincere badinage she hated so bitterly, were all there. But contrary to all expectations nobody noticed her, or if they did it was with a vacant stare which took her in as it would one of the decorations of the room, putting her outside the pale of animate objects, as it were. And Miss Brace, oddly enough, found this harder to bear than curiosity or contempt—so strongly does our vanity assert itself when we would put aside our individuality and curve our defiant I into an insignificant naught.

Polly remembered how Froude had said once of a mutual acquaintance, "I like her very well—that is," after a moment's thought, "I don't dislike her." It brought a pang to Polly. How very probable it was that he liked her in the same way—tossing her into the list of his friends as one tosses a paper into the waste basket.

She stood watching the crowd silently for a while, her magic wand forgotten in her hand. Unconsciously she has pushed her white sunbonnet back from her face to get a better view before her, thus making herself more liable to recognition. Pretty soon Froude passed her with a bonanza belle hanging on his arm—a pretty creature, gay and glad in her youth and fortune. Polly, with an envious pang, grasped her wand a trifle more closely, and as she felt its responsive thrill determined to try its power then and there. Instantly she stepped forward and touched Froude on the arm. He stopped as if he had been shot, and turned on her with a frown.

"Aren't you glad to see me?" said Polly, desperately, trying to think of some test question.

"No, I should think not. What a guy you've made of yourself! You had better go home as soon as possible. I'm ashamed to be seen speaking to you."

"Who is this young lady?" persisted Polly, trying to keep cool, but feeling very queer.

"Oh, it's a little fool I'm going to marry for her money," said Froude, with a kind of swagger in his tone. Just then Polly caught the horrified expression on the young lady's face, and included her in the magic circle by a tap of her ebony toy.

"Do you love this gentleman?" she said, abruptly.

"Love him?" and the stock-gilded nose "tip-tilted" directly. "That stupid old fog? I like to have him flatter me, and he's one more to put on my list of admirers, but he's an awful old bore. Of course I wouldn't marry such a creature!"

Then there were two angry faces, and Miss Brace laughed and left them. Turning a corner suddenly, she came upon a group of her friends just in time to hear the Major's wife say, in ecstatic staccato:

"I'm so glad to see you, Mrs. Banks! When did you get back? We've missed you so much. And you're going to be neighbors of ours, I hear, and eclipse us all with your loads of lovely foreign things. How I long to see them." But Polly's wand happening to touch her elbow just then, she added: "You're a miserable old piece of shoddy, and I hate the very sight of you. I envy you your money and your fine things, but I'd rather take a dose of medicine than call on you. I wouldn't do it if my husband did not have some dull axes for Mr. Banks to grind."

Polly stood aghast at the ruin she had wrought, and would fain have gone away unnoticed, but she was jostled against half a dozen of the group, and the witch-stick seemed possessed, for it resisted all efforts to hide it away and stuck out in half a dozen different directions at once, striking somebody at every turn. Poor Miss Brace turned dizzy at the babel of voices which followed. This was not at all what she had intended or wished. The Major's wife followed her quickly:

"How dare you disgrace us so?" she said, angrily; "you are ugly enough at best, but in that garb you are positively hideous. Try to get away before any one else sees you. You are always doing something disagreeable."

Polly thought of the compliments this lady had always showered upon her. Why, it was only yesterday she had praised her poor friend's beauty and exquisite taste. The Major's wife was celebrated for her amiability and delightful manners. Polly turned away without a word. How could she ever disentangle this dreadful snarl? She began to be a little frightened. The wicked little face at the end of her wand leered at her horribly and winked—yes, absolutely winked—its diamond eyes.

"I wish I could get away from here," sighed Polly; and, catching sight of Bob, who had always been so jolly and brotherly, she ran after him: "Oh, Bob, tell me how to get away from this dreadful place," she panted, clinging to his arm. But Bob shook her off impatiently. He had a pretty widow on the other side, to whom he was busily talking.

"Don't bother," he said, carelessly.

"But I don't know where to go," moaned Polly.

"I don't care if you go to the devil," replied this genial young man—not angrily, but as if that were a matter of course.

Miss Brace sat down on the nearest ottoman and sobbed aloud. She felt horribly. She had been riddled by shots of truth till she was like a dismantled target. She had given up her scheme of reformation and only wanted to get away. Half a dozen gentlemen came up and stood just before her, talking eagerly—all noted millionaires (on paper), sleek, well fed men with husky, apologetic voices.

"If it's properly developed," one was saying, "it will be the richest mine in America; yes, sir, the richest mine in America. Magnificent ore; only needs development. I know you want to take a hand in this deal, Vesey," turning to some one near.

"Of course I do, if you are dealer," said Vesey, good-naturedly. "Tell us something more about it," and the group hung breathlessly on the silver-king's words. He cleared his throat and began pompously: "Well, as I told you"—when Polly laid her wand on his arm softly, so softly that he did not feel it, and went on unconsciously, but with a totally different manner and tone—"it's a bilk, the biggest humbug of all the humbugs. No ore there—nothing but a shaft. Lord bless you, we don't care whether there was ever a mine or not if we can play our little game. It's a pitfall for stockholders. They put their money in and we take it out," and he glanced complacently round at the blank faces of his audience. They all looked shocked, not because they were shocked, but because it had become second nature to fresco their wholesale manipulations of the market with rose-colored lies.

"Oh, come," said Vesey, "you're joking."

Polly put her hands to her head and held it tight to keep it from flying apart. How had she ever thought she could ever regenerate this Paradise of story-tellers, when they were so unaccustomed to the truth that they did not recognize it when they saw it. The obese stock man went on talking:

"I'm in a pretty tight place now, myself, but I can pull through if I get my schemes carried out. Somebody has got to be beggared, and—"

But Polly did not wait to hear any more. She had caught sight of the fairy godmother in the crowd, and hurried away to give up the wand which had become hateful in her sight. When she reached the place the figure was gone, but Polly thought she saw the white sunbonnet just ahead, and on she flew, jostling ladies and gentlemen recklessly in her flight. Through one gorgeous labyrinth after another she ran, until, all breathless, she fell into the Major's arms and lay there unable to speak or explain. When she raised her head she saw the ebony rod resting against his coat. She snatched it away fiercely.

"Now, you will be like all the rest," she exclaimed, drawing away from him.

"Like all the rest, child? What do you mean? Come with me and tell me all about it. The whole truth, you know."

"I hate the truth," said Polly, emphatically. "I'm a great goose. I thought it would be so nice to have every one truthful, but I must have been mistaken. Now, this dress—"

"Well," interrupted the Major, "I don't think I'd like to introduce you to my friends done up in that fashion, but I like you just as well, and you're really a very clever girl, only a little self-willed, but we've all worse faults than yours."

Polly could not believe her ears. Was this the Major who was always snubbing and scolding her? Had the magic wand lost its power?

"You're very good," she faltered humbly; "won't you please take me home?"

The Major looked at the queer figure before him, hesitated a moment, and then, drawing her hand through his arm, quietly led the way back again through the gay crowd Polly had just left. As they were going out at the fine entrance gate somebody pulled her dress, and looking down she saw the author of all her misfortunes.

"I hope you've had a nice time," she chuckled. "I'd like my pretty toy, if you please."

Polly frowned at her angrily. "You're a wicked old woman," she said, leaning down to give the mite the full benefit of her indignation.

"You're a great fool," retorted the old lady, "and ungrateful besides. I only gave you what you asked for."

"The world's better just as it is," said Miss Brace, with the knowing air of a great discoverer.

"Of course it is. I could have told you that in the first place," and the small woman shrugged her tiny shoulders. "As it is, you've made mischief enough. You growled at Miss Blanchard's fibs, but they won her a husband, without whom the family would have gone to the dogs. When you made the Major's wife say those delightful things to Mrs. Banks you ruined the happiness of two young people, for everybody knows that young Banks and the Major's daughter are hopelessly in love, and they depended on mamma's winning ways to soften the heart of Banks' père and reconcile him to the lack of fortune. Now the whole thing is ruined. I hope you feel satisfied. I don't approve of deceit myself," the little creature added, with a sanctimonious air, "but we'll never be able to find the happy medium in that any more than other things. But I've opened your eyes, now I'll shut them again," and she gave Polly a rousing thwack with her stick just across her nose, whereat the latter groaned and awoke with a start to find the sunshine streaming into her face, and her three small nephews beating a devil's tattoo on her door. When she put her hand to her forehead she found a big lump there, so these adventures must all be true, or at least they were as near the truth as Miss Brace ever came again. But she never married Froude.

MORE FROM THE IRISHMAN:

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—Your kindness in publishing my last letter gives me courage once more to say a word to your countrymen about their relations with mine. I am not doing this for the purpose of seeing myself in print. I am honest. Like the present incumbent of the Presidency, I am not great, but I am honest. I dislike to see my countrymen misbehave themselves when away from home. I would like to see these children of a much-abused mother act decently before the "quality." I would like to see Irishmen eschew politics as a trade, and devote their energies to occupations that would reflect credit on themselves and the land that gave them birth. I would like Americans to have a better opinion of us. I would like Denis Kearney to be licked. In fact, I wish the millennium had arrived. You Americans are spoiling my countrymen. Your new fangled doctrines of liberty, equality, etc., are food too strong for their digestion. You know we were raised on sirabout, and roast beef three times a day is too much for us. Heaven forbid that I should advocate any measures that would tend to make civilization retrograde; but, to my thinking, the whole fabric of your Government seems built on the assumption that all men are good. You keep no standing army of any consequence, which I take as a tacit declaration that all your citizens are peaceable, and need not the presence of Gatling and Krupp to remind them of the strong arm of the law. You give all the franchise—unrestricted, unqualified. You educate all. In fact, theoretically, your form of government is all that the wildest advocate of the "Rights of Man" could wish for; but practically—well, I know what Lord Beaconsfield thinks. I am going to venture an opinion—something startling; something that great men think, but won't dare say. Obscurity, though an inglorious, is a secure cloak. The whole civilized world is at present agitated with great social upheavings. Angry men meet in secret and plot. Treason is in every land. Kings tremble for their safety, and statesmen stand appalled at the fearful storm that they know must inevitably break over them. And what is the dread agency that conjures this storm? What the necromancy that, like the witches in Macbeth, brews this horrid cauldron? I will tell you—I, Cornelius Cregan, gentlemen: It is education to the masses. Yes, my advanced American friends, it is education to the masses. The people have learned that they have rights. The millions of serfs that the Czar of Russia freed in 1863 (I owe you one, ARGONAUT; I said I was honest) have learned to read. They are now Nihilists, and make a target of their Emperor. The English workingman, that a few years ago was ignorant, smoked his pipe and drank his beer in peace, and was loyal to his Sovereign. What cared he whether Liberal or Tory occupied the wool-sack? He has since learned to read. He reads Lloyd's newspaper, and calls the queen a "royal beggar;" he attends labor protection meetings, and plots treason against the throne that his fathers died to save. Education is a strange alchemist. It elevates us until we almost touch the throne of the Deity, and yet it transmutes loyalty into treason. You will probably say: "Well, my Christian friend, what is the remedy for all this?" "There's the rub"—the murder's out—I leave the remedy for wiser heads to suggest. My Bobemian brains are already addled with the complexity of the problem. But my countrymen? Ah, yes! You Americans are spoiling us. You give us too many rights. We celebrate your national holidays; we attend primaries—I think that is what you call 'em (I hate politics, and am always getting Blaine and Conkling mixed); we nominate all your civil officers, and afterward elect them; we saved your country in the late unpleasantness. Of course, you paid us for it, but nevertheless we saved it. In fact, we are going to sit down on you Americans, if you don't get up and sit down on us. Take away some of our rights. Don't let us drag our blood-stained traditions through your streets every 17th of March. I celebrate St. Patrick's Day myself, but then I am not a citizen. I celebrate it at home; I eat turkey and drink wine. Irish wit is never so sparkling to me as when enthused by Veuve Clicquot; her traditions never so beautiful as when seen through the purple glasses of Chateau Lafitte. Don't let us vote for ten years; I think twenty-one is too long. It would make veritable Spartans of you, and reduce us to a species of helotism. Don't permit us to run all your political engines; don't let us, by our physical energies, run your whole country and disgrace ourselves in the effort. You Americans are lazy; proverbially so. It takes energy and tact to govern Irishmen. The English have never succeeded in pleasing us. The Tories hung and transported us; they hunted our priests, fired our cabins, and desolated our land. We hated them for their cruelty. The Liberals gave us what they called healing measures; they liberated Fenians, defined tenant rights, abolished the Established Church, gave us a land act, and yet we despised them. We thought them weak, their concessions but evidences of fear, their counsels imbecile. We sighed again for the stout old Tory with his hangman and pitch cap. You Americans are a great people, an advanced people, but you are lazy—devilish lazy. CON CREGAN.

SACRAMENTO, June 10, 1879.

A gloomy picture of domestic and social life in Russia is drawn by the Moscow Gazette. "Our children," it says, "are trained in the spirit of the West. They chatter in French, German and English, but the paternoster is unknown to them. Family life, what is its condition? A young wife thinks it her duty to possess, besides her husband, a 'friend of her heart;' she does not desire nor respect her husband, and her family she regards as a burden. Children only wait until they pass into the higher class at school to regard their parents as worn out, and to treat them with derision. A young girl of sixteen or seventeen seeks for employment in the world, and is over head and ears immersed in science and philosophy. Subjects that one would avoid even mentioning in the presence of a young woman are analyzed, discussed, and commented upon by her in a manner that few specialists are accustomed to do. The object of her existence, as designed by the Creator, is strange and unfamiliar to her. She seeks only for equality with man, without, however, inquiring or being able to indicate wherein these rights consist."

One smile for the living is worth a dozen tears for the dead.

INTAGLIOS.

The World.—An Analogy.

On the shore
The sea is breaking,
With the same impetuous passion,
Human, yet inhuman,
Cruel, crafty, overwhelming,
As in ages past.

And the tide
Along the beaches
Treacherously creeping, crawling,
Grasps in greedy clutches
Shells and stones, and shipwreck fragments;
Grasps, and then disdains.

Through the creeks
The tide comes rushing;
All the ocean is behind it,
Pushing and compelling;
Then withdraws, and leaves the marshes
Foul and desolate.

So the world—
The world of men and women—
Drives the weak, and low, and helpless
Into desperate action;
Drives them, helps them not, but leaves them
Ruined on the shore. N. H. DOLE.

Life.

Is life thinking, is life loving,
What remembers, what conceives,
Now but sorrow, now rejoicing,
Ever seeking what deceives?
Or is it breathing, is it feeling,
Every sense a pleased delight,
Or an aching void still craving
Ease from pain, for day the night?
No, not one, but all compounded
Constitute the perfect whole;
Body, mind, and conscience blended
Make of man the living soul.
So creation, stars that glimmer,
Every orb with life that seems,
Boundless space and laws controlling
All that substance has or seems;
Spirit world, whence wisdom, knowledge,
Love untiring guide and bless;
One sole aim for all created—
Happiness in righteousness.
Such, if not the great creator,
Whom no mortal thought may scan
Is the shadow of that brightness
Imaged in the soul of man.—Boston Transcript.

Rest.

My feet are wearied, and my hands are tired—
My soul oppressed:
And with desire have I long desired
Rest—only rest.

'Tis hard to toil, when toil is almost vain,
In barren ways;
'Tis hard to sow, and never garner grain
In harvest days.

The burden of my days is hard to bear,
But God knows best;
And I have prayed—but vain has been my prayer
For rest—sweet rest.

'Tis hard to plant in spring, and never reap
The autumn yield;
'Tis hard to till, and when 'tis tilled to weep
O'er fruitless field.

And so I cry, a weak and human cry,
So heart-oppressed;
And so I sigh, a weak and human sigh,
For rest—for rest.

My way has wound around the desert years,
And cares infest
My path; and through the flowing of hot tears
I pine for rest.

'Twas always so, when still a child I laid
On mother's breast
My wearied little head; e'en then I prayed,
As now, for rest.

And I am restless still; 'twill soon be o'er,
For down the West
Life's sun is setting, and I see the shore
Where I shall rest. FATHER RYAN.

Fate.

There were lamps and the odor of blossoms,
The whirl of the waltz, and the beat
Of instruments tuned to feet dancing;
There were vows and responses sweet;
And into the chaos of color

My heart went seeking a face
That floated amid the gay dancers
Like a rose blown free in its grace.

A glimpse of gold tresses uncoiling,
A glimpse of stars that were eyes;
A sigh from a rose mouth soft parted,
A smile sweet with mute melodies;
And my heart wild whirled with the waltzers,
And misty the lamps faded, and far
The music receded, like straining
Of wave o'er an ocean's gray bar.

"You are sad," laughed a voice. "Come, be merry.

Gay life is fleeting at best;
If you carry a heart in your bosom,
Get rid of it, friend, with a zest."
But ever the music moaned by me,
And ever the face floated fair,
And ever I knew that a siren
Had lured me to follow for e'er.

The lamps went out with the morning,
The warm odors drifted away;
The music was hushed, and the dancers
In dreams of its melody lay;
But e'er, like a beautiful phantom,
The face, in my path, moved in flight,
And ever I follow its circling
From dawn till the dusk of the night.

And subtly it 'scapes from my grasping,
Like a dream a soul woos to stay;
And ever I feel, in mad clasping,
A shadow thin, bloodless, and gray;
Till I cry, in despair: O face fairest,
Grown out, like a rose, from a glance,
Let me hold thee but once to my bosom,
And death may whirl wild in his dance! MARIE LE BARON.

DISTINGUISHED AND EXTINGUISHED.

She was an American and the wife of a clerk at Washington, from whom she separated without being divorced. Paris appeared to her a meet field for her energies and talents, and to Paris she came. She was small, sparkling, and an amusing chatterbox. Her manners were eccentric, and her transitions from mad gayety to tearful sentiment rapid and bewildering. She gave, in a maison meublée where she had rooms, card parties, at which she managed to win a deal of money. A chamberlain of the Empress attended them. This attractive niece of Uncle Sam, who was unique in her genre, fascinated the courtier, and she tormented him to obtain for her invitations to the Monday evening parties at the Tuileries and to Compiègne. Having ascertained that the police had been taking notes about her, he was embarrassed. But, in revolving in his mind how to please her without getting into a scrape himself, he asked if she thought she could wear gracefully the mask of devotion. The clever little woman jumped at the idea, and it started a train of projects in her fertile brain, one more brilliant than the other. Ere the courtier had taken leave it was agreed that this chamberlain was to attend the Advent sermons of the Abbé Baüer, at that time the coqueluche of Bonapartist ladyhood, to affect contrition, to demand a private interview, and to crave admission into the Church. The part traced out was admirably acted. Mere recantation did not suffice for the zeal of the fair catechumen. She insisted on being baptized, which enabled her to appear at the font of St. Thomas Aquinas in a white christening robe, in which she looked really angelic, and with, for sponsors, a lady of the De Merode family and a Princess connected with the house of Savoy. Eventually the "smart" woman was found out. She was for upward of six years a fountain through which official honors flowed. The curious thing was that she could hardly speak French, and that, with her imperfect knowledge of this tongue, she conducted to a successful issue divers political intrigues in which she was engaged by financial companies.

Nell Gwynne was a neglected waif, and as a child was sent to hawk oranges in the pit of Drury Lane, where her pretty ways and bright sayings always attracted a crowd. Her personal popularity among habitués of the play-house won the attention of the manager, and as a natural transition, by his aid, she passed from in front of the footlights to behind them. The old diarist Pepys has left clearer indications of her style of acting than any one else, and his testimony, as well as all criticism of her which I have been able to glean, points conclusively to the supposition that Nell Gwynne was an actress much of the Lotta type—a gay, lively little creature, full of dash and spirit in comic parts, but who failed altogether in sentiment, and in heroic tragedy was most abominable. Pepys notes that he "was most infinitely displeased with her * * * in a great and serious part, which she does most basely." Dryden took her measure well, probably, when he wrote the following lines for her to speak after the burlesque "business" of having stabbed herself and then come to life again:

"I am come, gentlemen, strange news to tell ye:
I am the ghost of poor departed Nell;
Sweet ladies, be not frightened; I'll be civil;
I'm what I was—a little harmless devil;
To tell you true, I walk because I die
Out of my calling in a tragedy."

But in farcical characters she must have been bewitching. Pepys writes, when speaking of Dryden's play called The Maiden Queen: "There is a comical part done by Nell, which is 'Florimel,' that I never can hope ever to see the like done again by man or woman. The King and the Duke of York were at the play. But so great a performance of a comical part was never, I believe, in the world before as Nell do this, both as a mad girl, then most and best of all when she comes like a young gallant, and hath the motions and carriage of a spark the most that ever I saw any man have. It makes me, I confess, admire her. * * * I kissed her, and so did my wife; and a mighty pretty soul she is."

Talent so decided and personal attraction so marked would win the admiration of any audience, ancient or modern, and Nell was always devising some new grotesqueness in costume to add to the fun. In one of her parts she came on the stage unexpectedly, wearing a hat as large round as a cart wheel, and which almost entirely hid her. This was done as a "take-off" on some pastoral play which was being performed at the rival theatre, exactly as in our theatres today Lotta burlesques Modjeska. Fatal or fortunate, as one looks at it from the moral or the worldly point of view, was Nell's famous hat assumption. Her success that night with her enraptured audience exceeded any she had hitherto achieved, yet this was her last appearance upon the stage. When the curtain fell the King went behind the scenes and asked for Nell. Her stage thereafter was at Windsor castle, her auditors the court.

London to-day is dotted with monuments in the shape of hospitals, relief rooms and other places of succor for the poor, which were founded by the munificence of Nell Gwynne. Naturally the poor people were fond of her, and from all the scorn and rage which were lavished on the licentious court of Charles the Second little Nell was ever exempt.

Herr Max Waldstein, of the Statistical Department at Vienna, says that the number of people in Europe who are upward of 90 years old is 102,831, of whom 60,303 are women. Of those who are over 100 years of age, there are 241 women and 161 men in Italy, 229 women and 183 men in Austria, and 526 women and 524 men in Hungary. There are in Austria 1,508,359 persons over 60 years of age, comprising 7.5 per cent. of the whole population. It is found that the percentage of old people is much higher among the Germans than among the Slavs. In the German provinces of Upper Austria and Salzburg it is 11.5; while in Galicia it is only 4. According to Herr Waldstein, there are in Austria 100 women and 86 men who are 100 years old, 41 women and 37 men who are 101, and 88 women and 60 men who are upward of 101 years of age.

The fellow who surreptitiously dropped a bottle of bees into the grab-bag at a church fair, and wiggled the cork out just before withdrawing his own hand, got his just deserts.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 14, 1879.

What has become of that traditional old fossil who has always been a Democrat?—"who has always voted the Democratic ticket, sir; whose father was a Democrat; who was born a Democrat, expects to die a Democrat, and who never voted for anybody but a Democrat"—around whose venerable old musty head hangs the halo of genuine Democracy, whose guide in politics was Thomas Jefferson, and whose political catechism has been the Kentucky resolutions? That old Bourbon who never learned anything new, and never forgot anything old, what has become of him in these degenerate days? We miss him from the busy haunts of politics. The old white hat, with its band of black crape, that seemed to be in mourning for General Jackson; that old crooked-headed hickory cane that hangs so mournfully over an arm attenuated from long holding forth an empty palm for official crumbs. We miss the "once a Democrat always a Democrat," the Democrat "who never scratched a ticket," the "straight out" Democrat, the "regular" Democrat, the "unterrified" Democrat, the "dyed in the wool" Democrat. We miss the Democratic yell at the polls. "Here is your regular Democratic ticket," no longer falls upon our startled ear with its brazen voice; the rich brogue of the Emerald patriot no longer proclaims the "rigular Dimycratic ticket." The great, black, sinewy arm of labor with iron grip no longer stares at us from Democratic tickets as the vignette of Democratic regularity. The last of the "old war horses" have gone trembling down to their narrow houses. Here and there may be seen the shivering anatomy of an old ring-boned and spavined party skeleton, who scents the battle from afar off, and whose plaintive whinny may be heard answering back its recognition of the clash of arms in some distant field of strife. Where is the California Democracy? It seems to have altogether disappeared. It is skulking or hiding. Its leaders are paralyzed, its rank and file are frightened. General Longstreet told us an incident that occurred to him at the firing of the mine at Petersburg. His regiment was in the immediate vicinity of the mine. He heard the "runder of the explosion, felt the lifting earth, saw the black smoke drifting in thick columns over his head, and as it lifted he saw no regiment, not a man visible. He knew they had not been killed. In a moment he realized the situation. Calmly leading his horse to a prominent position that overlooked the field, he calmly ungirthed his saddle, and slowly readjusted it. Soon he saw his regiment forming around him. Man by man they came from their hiding-places and planted themselves in battle line. They saw that General Longstreet was not frightened, and soon soldier after soldier came forth, and there grew up around him full companies, and finally his division stood in battle order, all calm, all serene, all subject to his command. The California Democracy have, we admit, been subjected to a terrible shock. Their constitutional petard has hoisted them. There is treason in their ranks; there is cowardice, confusion, fright. The foreign contingent from Ireland and Germany has weakened; the place-hunters have skeddaddled; but nobody is killed. All the party needs is courage, resolution, and some brave, level-headed leader who will come forward till the old army shall rally around him. As Petersburg was only a small position in a long battle line, so California is only a small space over which the conflict is now surging. The Democracy have every encouragement. Victory is within their grasp. A solid South gives them a masked battery of invincible States. The Senate is theirs; Congress is theirs. The Presidential position is the only place that has not yielded, and that is within their possible chance. New York may be set down as doubtful. Connecticut, New Jersey, Indiana, Oregon, and California are even battle grounds. This is only a skirmish fight for next year's Presidential election. Shame on the cowardly Democrats, not one of whom dare come forward at this time. If the Democracy had a leader, one blast upon his bugle horn were worth ten thousand men. This is only a fright. So we say to the demoralized, cowardly, run-away Democrats, come back and reorganize. Call your primaries, call your State convention, put out your straight, old, regular, dyed in the wool, unterrified Democratic ticket. Give Terry, Howard, the Chronicle, Kearney, the sand-lot, and the devil, a challenge for a fight. Let the two old enemies maintain their organizations, and the New Constitutional party, with its "Honorable Bilks," and the Kearney party, with its dishonorable blackguards, will be squeezed to death between the two great battle lines. It is a pitiful sight to see a national party, like that of the California Democracy, having the State Government, having the chance of a Presidential success, falling down before the brandished shillalah of this empty-headed, brazen-tongued, Irish drayman, or being driven from its propriety by the eloquent blather of two old rebels like Terry and Howard and the noisy clamor of the San Francisco Chronicle. It makes us almost wish we were a Democrat, so that we could rally this frightened band. We could make a splendid minority, at least; and if there is any position in politics more desirable than another, it is to champion a right principle at the head of a minority. It is our advice to the Democracy to reorganize, call the roll, and let the traitors step out. Sound the "whoop-up along the whole line." Make the fight. Better be vanquished by the Republicans than be successful with bilks and blackguards. Better an honest minority, and honorable defeat, than victory in alliance with the rabble horde of "chivs" and Irish. And then in event of a next year's Presidential election, there will be a nice little select band of "up and up" Democrats among whom to divide the spoils and loot of a Federal victory. A Custom House, and Mint, and Navy Yard, and all the other eleemosynary institutions for impecunious Democrats, will be open to the small band of unterrified who took the forlorn hope and dared to die.

The evidence furnished by the formation of the New Constitution party in the Tenth Ward and elsewhere tends to show that it is a chivalry movement. There are two kinds of Southern men—gentlemen and "chivs." The gentlemen—well, gentlemen are the same in all parts of the world; the same in the South, or in the North; the same in politics as in the other relations of life; the fact is, "gentlemen are gentlemen." But "chivs!" That's another thing. A "chiv" is a poor, proud white; has a false dignity, and an exaggerated deportment. His education is superficial, his clothes are over-brushed, his hat is over-ironed, he wears a crooked-headed hickory cane which he hangs upon his arm. This habit is acquired in taking drinks—it gives freedom to pour and lift. He is always well born, of good family, and is always either descended from, or related to, a governor or a senator or a member of Congress. His family is one of the "first"—usually first—of Virginia or South Carolina, but the area of genteel birth has extended of late years to embrace Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Georgia, and parts of other gulf States. The "chiv's" family was once rich, or, what is a better form of expression, "wealthy, sir." The "chiv" uses the word "sir" with frequency and emphasis. When very emphatic he says "By G—d, sir." The family is of course poor. Formerly the fortune was lost in the United States Bank; latterly impoverishment has been brought about by the war. "The damned Yankees stole our niggers, sir," remarked a "chiv" to us the other day. The pretension of the "chiv" puts himself among the blue blooded by birth and family. The fact usually is that he was a "poor white," of "no account," obscure origin, and never owned a "nigger" in his life, and, if slaves had been sixpence a dozen, would have sold the last one upon the auction block for a drink. The probability is that he descended from a Yankee school-master or tin peddler who drifted southward, became nigger driver, plantation overseer, or something of the kind. The "chiv" pays his gambling debts as "debts of honor." He cheats his boarding house, his tailor, his washerwoman. He borrows money that he never intends to pay. He sponges and begs with the audacity of a tramp. He is a born politician as he is a born mendicant. He is a fraud and a pretense. When the civil war raged he talked loud of "his people," "his country," and he accepted the boast as true that "one Southern gentleman could whip five Yankees," but he never tried it. He did not go to the war, but stayed here and blustered and swelled up with patriotic indignation, and turned red or pale in his face at the recital of Northern aggressions and Southern wrongs—red or pale according to whether he drank brandy or Bourbon. The "chiv" proper never misses a meal nor pays a cent. He never refuses a drink, and he thinks the country is going to the devil because men won't work. He hangs on to the tail of any party that will carry him, or let him ride and tie, or that will help tote his baggage. He is always the first to aid in the formation of a new party. A new pack and a new deal are always acceptable to the gambler when he holds neither ace, face, nor trump, and when luck runs "agin" him. The New Constitution party has proved a godsend to the "chiv." It gives him one last chance before he turns in his chips to the old croupier, whose rake and skeleton hand he sees now reaching out for him. The "chivs" are all old. Their boys are not "chivs." In fact, the last "chiv" is born; the race is running out, thank God! Now, about the Tenth Ward Club, and, here and now, we distinctly disavow any intention to reflect upon the high-toned Southern gentlemen who are so anxious to bring about a great political reformation under the leadership of the Honorable David S. Terry, and the Honorable Volney E. Howard, and the other "honorable bilks," who have with such honorable condescension, kindly volunteered to amend our laws and purify our Republican party. The Hon. John C. Burch was made temporary chairman; the Hon. H. E. McBride was made temporary secretary. On motion of the Hon. Thomas Talbert—the Hon. H. P. Irving, the Hon. C. W. Bryant, the Hon. Matt Clarken, the Hon. Thomas H. Talbert, and the Hon. A. C. Bradford were appointed a committee on permanent organization. The Hon. Thomas A. Stombs was made permanent President. The Hon. W. B. Norman of Calaveras addressed the meeting. These are not "chivs," but a set of most dignified and most highly respectable old fossils, who are ever on the lookout for some chance at office. They will mistake the trump of the Archangel Gabriel when it toots its final summons to resurrection as a call for them to wake up and take something in the way of political place, and they will march up to the eternal throne, with their crooked-head canes, in confidence that some new Constitution has been ordained for their benefit. If they should be checked by Saint Peter they would think him some infernally insolent Yankee, who "didn't know 'em" and it would be uncomfortable for St. Peter. If they should get in upon the golden pavement they would go for it. If they were asked to chant anthems to the Lamb they would begin by giving cheers for General Jackson, and end up by singing "Away down South, in Dixie." And yet there are some idiot-born northern donkeys who are willing to follow the call of this old rebel resurrection, for at this Tenth Ward meeting, it is recorded by the Chronicle that "the Hon. John Lord Love dwelt at length on the policy pursued by the Central Pacific Railroad magnates." If John Lord Love would dwell at length upon his own ears he would never exhaust the subject.

We venture the prophecy that the Kearney party will degenerate into a scrambling piece club before the election. It can not stand the insolence, tyranny, and blackguardism of its alien usurper. It has not two per cent. of Americans in its rank and file. It has lost all the honest native-born American farmers that were in seeming alliance with it when the question of adopting the new Constitution was before the people. Its candidate for Governor is at least but an illiterate Irish farmer. Its other candidates are respectable nobodies, unassailable because unknown. Its judicial ticket has but one able lawyer upon it, and we will not mention his name because he is our friend and we are ashamed of the scabby company he keeps. The New Constitution party is more formidable in numbers and more respectable in its make up. It has a rank and file of earnest, honest men. We are in sympathy with many of the reforms it demands. We opposed the new Constitution; we believed the old one was better. We believe the new one to-day demands more amendments than did the old one. We believe it will cost millions of dollars to interpret it and before we can adjust the machinery of government to it. But it is the law. We submit to it. We accept it. We bow to the majority. We would give it an honest legislative and judicial interpretation. The Democratic party and the Republican party will both stand pledged to do it. Then what the necessity of a party of "Honorable Bilks?" Why should old Democrats think to get a more honest constitutional interpretation from Senator Cole, Samuel Soule, Alexander Campbell, Estee, Lowe, and the other disinterested, played-out patriots of the Republican party? Why should Republican farmers think to be better served by Terry, Howard, Piper, Downey, and the other mixed ingredients of chivalry and Irish s're-heads? Why not trust the Republican party? It is true that the Republican party has been led and officered by a questionable lot, but we are just now cleaning out the Augean stables. The Democracy has run the river of party victory through the Federal stalls at Washington, and we are white-washing the party domicile in California, and disinfecting it from the stink of the ring that has so long roosted in and defiled it. Why now turn out of the old party to follow Terry and Howard and the Chronicle?

The course of the Chronicle surprises us. There was a time when we knew something of it, when we believed it had a fixed and definite principle. We regarded it, not as an organ of the Republican party, but as something higher and better than a party organ. We thought it a brilliant, fearless, independent newspaper, that had the boldness to assault wrong and the manliness to assert the right. We saw it in opposition to Sargent, Gorham, Carr, and other Republican politicians who were strongly entrenched in Federal power and party influence. We saw it with one bold, audacious blow cut the Republican party in twain and give the administration of Californian affairs into the hands of the Democracy. We watched its course as it combated Sargent, Page, and La Grange, and like Spartans on bended knees, fighting in courts and in the arena of public opinion, we saw it give and take trenchant blows. We admired its courage, its patience, its untiring energy. We saw it emerge from every unequal fight a victor. There was something to admire in the boldness of its assaults upon the entrenched position of corporate power. Its fight for the new Constitution was a gallant one, and one of fearful odds. It opposed money, power, patronage, and commercial advertising, and it has a right to claim the position of honor in the triumphal march. But the Chronicle has lost its head; victory has turned its brain. Caesar, in one of his triumphal entries into Rome, bearing the spoils and leading the captives of vanquished Gaul, had a slave chained to his chariot wheel charged with the duty of saying, "Remember, Caesar, thou art a man." The Chronicle thinks to found a party; thinks to overwhelm the Republican organization; having contributed so largely to reforming it, and having stood by it till it was altogether cleansed and purified, it now has the madness and the imbecility to think it can destroy it. The Chronicle thinks to fix up and fuse together honorable, patriotic, loyal Republicans with a lot of old Democratic rebel irreconcilables, because, for a moment and for the accomplishment of a single object, which was not a political one and had no party significance, certain honest Republicans and honest Democrats went together. The Chronicle is idiotic when it thinks the great, honest, sober rank and file of an intelligent, patriotic Republican party will follow David S. Terry and Volney E. Howard, and vote to give them the political supremacy which they forfeited by their base political conduct. Does the Chronicle think that any considerable number of Republicans have forgotten the time when Judge Terry came down from the bench and thrust his gleaming knife into the throat of Hopkins, or that he resigned to kill Broderick, or that he fought to destroy the American Union? Does the Chronicle think that any Northern man has forgotten the renegade Northern traitor, Howard, who voted against the admission of California because it was not a slave State? We have never favored the nursing of war memories, and have been the first and most willing to forget political offenses, thus bridging the bloody chasm, but our Christian spirit does not invite us to disband the Republican party in order that David Terry may become Chief Justice, John Downey Governor, and that Volney E. Howard may dishonor the Senate of the United States by his presence. Honest Republicans followed the Chronicle into a minority; saw its party dismembered, divided, and beaten rather than allow George Gorham and his associates to dishonor it with their leadership. Defeat with honor was better than triumph with Sargent, Page, and William B. Carr. It would accept defeat again, and will accept it and invite it, if the choice is given between such leadership and a victory that places the bays upon the old Federal frauds that so tarnished and so dishonored the otherwise popular administration of General Grant.

The Chronicle over-estimates its power and influence. It all the time forgets the character of those who compose the following of the Republican party. It underrates their intelligence, and it under-estimates their courage. It fails to observe their independence, manliness, and patriotism, and miserably deceives itself when it thinks the crack of the lash of its unknown writers carries any terror to a party that has withstood the shock of civil war, and looked with unflinching gaze upon a rebellion that threatened the dissolution of the American Union and the destruction of free government. The Chronicle makes another mistake when it thinks to impose its sounding phrases, and its passionate, denunciatory adjectives, upon intelligent men as argument. It has somehow, of late, fallen into a Chinese mode of warfare—of stinkpots and gongs, loud smells and reverberating brass. It seems impressed with the idea that somehow or other it is charged with the thunderbolts of Olympian Jove, and that it is sitting up aloft, among the gods, to rule the world; that its mission is to reform mankind, or at least that part of it that lives in California; and so we find it assailing with its shameless tirade of abuse everybody and everything that does not fall down and worship it. Except itself, all the press is vile. Country papers are "chickadees." Having been deserted by Kearney, he is the embodiment of everything that is contemptible. His followers are "poodle dogs" and "curs." Quarreling with the Bonanza kings and losing money at stocks, at once the Nevada banking and mining firm is denounced with vituperative vigor, and the Chronicle hails great, slanderous expletives on the members of the firm. Breaking with the railroad magnates—whose friend in Goat Island times it was—the journalistic atmosphere is blue with sulphurous invective and personal denunciation. It howls like a hungry wolf, and snaps its gleaming fangs at everything it does. The Republican party, under the leadership of men who are both intelligent and honorable, refuses to follow the Chronicle away from its national organization, and to take service under the generalship of a Confederate brigadier, duelist, and Northern secessionist, and the Chronicle rains down upon the party and its leaders a tempest of vituperative censure; forgetting all the time that abuse is not argument, and that slander is not persuasion. It forgets, also, that rich men and corporations, railroads and bonanza mines, stock brokers and merchants, those who favor and those who oppose constitutions, Democrats and Republicans, are neither altogether good nor altogether bad; that the Central Pacific Railroad is not an unmixed evil; that men who deal in stocks are not necessarily thieves; and that Republicans or Democrats may be good citizens, even if they refuse to be driven like dumb cattle under the thong of its abusive and denunciatory adjectives. The Chronicle is Sam-Seaboughized, and mistakes slander for argument. It over-estimates its power, and deceives itself as to its political influence. A newspaper has very little influence over the actions of intelligent and thinking men. It has none when it ceases to be honest, dignified, and argumentative. The journalistic proprietor, or newspaper writer, who mistakes epithets for arguments, and thinks to impose upon its readers passionate and angry words instead of well-considered opinions, is simply an unreasoning idiot. The Chronicle will not destroy the Republican party, nor induce it to swerve one hair's breadth from the line of its well-defined policy. The Republican organization will—with the exception of a non-partisan judicial ticket—move steadily forward, minding its own business. The Democracy will, if it is not debauched and demoralized by the defection of its alien and Hessian contingent, do the same thing; and let consequences take care of themselves.

The Republican State Convention will embrace the highest political intelligence of the party. The moral virtues will not be so largely represented. There is one peril to be avoided: the party is too strong, too confident of success. The probabilities of an election are so great that there is danger lest bad nominations shall be made. It looks now as though there would be entire harmony and perfect unanimity in the party action, and that the Republicans would go into the contest with all its old animosities forgotten and its old rivalries buried—buried, perhaps, with the hope of resurrection, but at all events buried for this campaign. There is one great fact that the Convention must keep distinctly in view, and that is: that there is no such thing as fealty, or allegiance, or discipline, that will hold the rank and file together against any tricks in Convention or in support of any questionable candidates. It must be remembered that every act of the candidate, his public and political record, his private life and personal habits, will be submitted to the most searching scrutiny of friends and the most unfriendly interpretation of enemies. It must be remembered, also, that the Republican party has no organ. In the city of San Francisco there is no leading daily, and no influential weekly journal, that will recognize any obligation to support a Republican candidate if there is a better man in opposition to him. It must be borne most distinctly in mind, that no person—however clever he may be in the American sense—can be Governor of the commonwealth of California this time who is under the suspicion of being the slave or the partner of the Central Pacific Railroad. No one should receive the nomination who is not honestly in accord with the majority in giving to the new Constitution all the friendly legislation that a fair and reasonable interpretation of the instrument demands. The candidate for Governor should be a gentleman of pronounced legal ability, of unstained honor, and of such a high standard of integrity, and of such habits, that none should question his executive ability or his personal honesty. The candidates for judges should be gentlemen of learning, integrity, and industry, whose past judicial service or whose professional standing gives assurance of fitness for the judicial position. They should each and every one of them be men of studious, temperate habits and legal learning. The railroad commissioners should possess the most eminent business qualifications; men who can not be bought, and men who have enough of character to resist the prejudices of the public; men of judicial impartiality, who will fully and intelligently investigate, and honestly decide, between the corporation and the public. If the ring—any ring—gives us a bad candidate for Governor; if a corporation—any corporation—gives us candidates; if, by any intrigue, or indirection, or conspiracy, or fraudulent manipulation of Convention, the party is imposed upon; if any hidden wires are pulled with any nefarious result—there will be music in the air. But if the Republican State nominating Convention shall be, in the highest and best sense, a deliberative body, and shall result in presenting to the party its representative men as candidates for office, it will have such a support as will surprise itself and surprise the people of California.

The Republican party is gaining ground hourly, both as a national party and in California. General Grant will not be nominated for President, and ought not to be. It was Grantism that came so near killing the organization—that virtue of General Grant's which was a vice; that devotion to friends that spared rascals; that trustfulness that did not suspect because it was so near to him. We hear of no stealing, no defalcations, no rings, no jobs, no dirty work, having the sanction of President Hayes. He is a small man, but perhaps the country needed a small man just at this time. A country, like an individual, has times when tea and lemonade are very acceptable. Tea and lemonade and seltzer water are always acceptable after a night of it with brandy or hot-schotch. There is a fitness in having a Sunday-school teacher succeed a hero. An army must rest after a battle; a man must have repose after a debauch; a fashionable woman must sleep after a swell ball. The Republican party has had a snooze, a nooning, a sort of breathing spell, and it is better for it. The South is being reconciled; the debt is being paid; the financial question is being adjusted. We are forgetting the war. The wounds are healing. All over the land Democrats are turning Republicans. It is so in California; and just to the extent that the Republican party can be a party of conservatism and repose, just to that extent will it strengthen. Discord, revolution, labor strikes, Molly Maguireism, socialism, nihilism, agrarianism, communism, Kearneyism, solid Southism, are all side issues, and offshoots of the Democratic party. National politics are coming to this complexion, and gentlemen, property, intelligence, patriotism, good morals, are all siding with the Republican party. Corporations, national banks, and rich men are a load to carry at present, but the time is not far distant when they will be brought under subjection of the laws, and then the political millennium will begin.

We are almost sorry that our personal popularity was so great that we were placed upon all the tickets and elected as delegate to the Republican Convention. Our party record is not a good one. In the early days, certainly, we were absurdly loyal. Then, having been tossed in a blanket by Gorham, Sargent, and Mr. Carr, we took the hint and retired. We became a Greeley elector. As between Hayes and Tilden we gave our vote for Hayes only because we thought him entitled to the benefit of the doubt. We are not orthodox for General Grant's third term; we are not as certain of Sherman's personal integrity as we would like to be. We do not think George Evans' political record or personal deportment entitles him to be the Republican candidate for Governor, and we are not altogether certain that if nominated he would not be defeated. His political record is that of a "clever fellow"—"a nice old man," the boys call him, only this is an off year for nice, old, clever fellows with an over friendly disposition to the other fellows who live by ground-slucing their neighbors' pockets. We like George Perkins amazingly, and think him very clever, but we are afraid somebody would find out that he is pooling steamship profits with the Central Pacific Railroad Company, expose the business, and give Perkins away. Some people have such a prejudice against corporations and monopolies that they will not vote for them. Mr. Jewett, of Marysville, is open to several most serious objections. He is a banker, and is rich and respectable. It is true that he is intelligent and honest, and if elected would be both competent and faithful, but he does not chew tobacco and spit on his shirt front, and so he is not presumably strong in the country. Mr. T. Guy Phelps would be available, both from his political antecedents and the size of his boots. In the absence of the second virtue, we may assume that he possesses the higher one of godliness. However, having been allowed the favor of readmission to the Republican party, we shall conduct ourselves modestly, reserving to ourselves the privilege of supporting all the men we vote for, and all who are in our judgment better, abler, more honorable, and more honest than we find on any opposition ticket.

We have an idiotic friend, one of those profoundly wise and impenetrably mysterious politicians who occasionally take us by the button-hole out to the centre of a ten-acre lot, and confidently inform us—on promise of secrecy—that the day is warm, and that it will rain to-morrow. This astute and profound politician advises us to select some new candidate for Governor, some man not named, some dark-horse who has no record; as this friend expresses it: "Some honest farmer, with hay-seed in his hair, who voted for the new Constitution." Now we have great respect for honest farmers; we have great respect for honest men; we do not utterly despise even an honest lawyer or an honest banker; but we are somewhat inclined to think this honest farmer, honest miner, honest mechanic business is overdone, played out, run in the ground. Indeed, we do not see why a farmer should be any more honest, because he is ignorant and does not comb his hair, than if he were intelligent and cleanly in his personal habits. We are unable to appreciate that kind of integrity that seems somehow inseparable from a dirty shirt and badly smelling socks, and we utterly repudiate the advice that suggests to us some profoundly obscure idiot, who has had neither sufficient sense nor opportunity to have arisen from that obscurity, because he is honest. If the Republican party has not strength enough to bear up its gubernatorial candidate because he is a man of intellect and culture; if it is afraid of him simply because he is prominent in position and pronounced in opinions; if it is too cowardly to give the sanction of its endorsement to able and active men, then we say let it go to the devil. We are quite sure that hay-seed, No. 12 boots, and badly smelling flannels will not save it. When we speak of "sweating toil," it is the toil and not the perspiration we respect.

As we understand it, there were two political machines run in San Francisco for Governor—one for Evans and one for Perkins; that the Evans machine ground out the most delegates; that of seventy-five delegates to the Republican Convention from the city, Evans has about, say, forty; Perkins, about twenty-five; and John F. Swift, who had no machine, gets five; and the balance are mysterious persons are unplugged.

ABOUT WOMEN.

Dr. Mary Walker waxes her moustache.

Blessed is the woman who never says to her husband, "I told you so."

"Mankind," said a preacher, "includes women; for a man embraces women."

Love is an intoxication. Yes, but a year of matrimony will sober you up.

English ladies' maids lend money to their employers at twenty-five per cent.

Woman's silence, although it is less frequent, signifies much more than man's.

A Boston belle, of Beacon Street, has two French snails for pets. They live in clover and lettuce.

It is the young man who asks for the young lady's hand and receives it that carries off the palm.

A lady always looks the prettiest when she is peeping over the top of her fan, especially if she has a large mouth.

Princess Louise occupies herself with wood inlaying, while many of her humbler sisters have to toil at laying in wood.

"Yes, Agnes, I'm going to have a cream-colored summer silk, provided pa doesn't veto the appropriation ma has passed."

Learning to read, under professors of elocution, is said to be more popular with Paris young ladies than learning to play on the piano.

He said but little, yet as he gazed on the mutilated edge of his best razor he mentally vowed never again to marry a woman with corns.

It is said that widows and widowers never have a honeymoon after a second marriage. They know what it is, and have found it unsatisfactory.

A skipping-rope was placed among the flowers on Kittie Boylan's coffin, in Clyde, Ohio. She had died from jumping it one hundred and twenty times without stopping.

A young ladies' sewing society in Ohio is named "The Silver Thimbles." They are always on hand, and the news they dispense is of the latest and most varied character.

The woman who put her tongue to a flat-iron to see if it was hot now sits calmly and sees her husband pull off his dirty boots on the parlor carpet without a word of dissent.

Florence—"Oh, grandma, isn't it terrible? There's a live dandelion out in the back yard!" Grandma—"Oh, gracious! how careless those circus people are! What shall we do?"

How much more bitter than wormwood and gall it is, when you attempt to kiss—that is, to press your girl's head close to your own, to be jabbed in the ear by the pin that holds her hat on.

"Major," said a lovely widow, "when does a woman stoop to conquer?" "I don't know," answered the major; "but when a man bows assent to one of your propositions, he stoops to concur."

A Wisconsin girl, wishing to prevent her lover going to California, stole all his shirts from the line on which they were hanging out to dry. He couldn't do a better thing than to bring that girl along. She will never let him starve.

A young wife remonstrated with her husband, a dissipated spendthrift, on his conduct. "Love," said he, "I am like the prodigal son; I shall reform by and by." "I will be like the prodigal son, too," she replied, "for I will arise and go to my father."

Margaret of Italy is fond of poetry, of novels, of government debates and squabbles. She is even interested in archaeology. She reads a little of everything, and when she is about to see literary celebrities is said to "cram" their writings in preparation for the interview.

A poor fellow was engaged to the lady of his choice for fourteen years, and at the end of the time she sued him for breach of promise. He pleaded in defense that his heart was in the right place, but he had not been able to get a day off in which to consummate the contract. He was acquitted upon the strength of this plea and the equally weighty one that he had no money and owed for six weeks' washing.

"Oh, I suppose he loves Sarah, and would be glad to marry her," she was saying to another woman in the post-office corridor yesterday, "but I dunno." "Isn't he a nice young man?" asked the other. "Well, he's nice enough, but very reckless with his money. At Christmas time he made us a present of a French clock for the parlor, and there's not one of us in the house can speak a word of French. He might just as well have presented us with a German thermometer or a Spanish umbrella. We had to trade it off for a barrel of molasses."

"The true girl has to be sought for," remarks a writer. Of course she does, and any mother will tell you the same thing. Look for her in the parlor, hammering a waltz out of the suffering piano; if she isn't there, she'll be in front of her bureau glass, admiring her hair; should she not be there, maybe she's swinging on the gate with a young man with a tender moustache; if not there, she is promenading the streets and flirting with a drummer. Oh, you'll have to seek for her; and, after you find her, just say that her mother is washing the dishes and needs her assistance.

Baron Huddleson, an eminent English judge, recently took occasion to say from the bench that it was an undoubted fact that a woman told a lie very much better than did a man, and with very much better effect. It was a remarkable circumstance that when a woman made up her mind to say what is untrue she said it in a much better manner than a man. Whether this was due to a man feeling that his dignity was to a certain extent offended by recourse to untruth he did not know; that was a metaphysical question into which he could not enter; but it was certain a woman told a story much more logically, and, if it was untrue, held it to be much more pertinaciously, and with much more the appearance of truth, than a man could. Most righteous judge!

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

The Procession of the Flowers.

That fragrant harbinger of Spring
The pink Arbutus trailing,
Its errand quick accomplishing,
Had died, sweet sighs exhaling;
The Cowslips and the Violets, too,
Were in their beds thought sleeping,
Though yellow caps and hoods of blue
Were here and there caught peeping—
When, bowing, came young Daffodil,
Arrayed in green and yellow;
Next came his cousin, sweet Jonquil,
A brighter, taller fellow;
Then Lilacs, arm in arm, you'll guess
How fresh and fascinating;
The younger, in her pure white dress,
Narcissus captivating;
Then Honeysuckle, sweet always,
And Woodbine decked in corals,
While Periwinkle, gliding, sways
Her court train green as laurels;
And Peony, with face all red;
Spirea's fair, in guipure laces;
When pert French Pansy turned his head,
And—would you think it?—made such faces.
Then Gossip Bess—you may suppose
Her haste small grace allowing—
She pressed the toes of Guelder Rose
Curled in a ball, in bowing.
The Hyacinths, those sweet Dutch belles,
With Tulips led the German,
When to the Wallflowers (poor ma'amzelles!)
Prim Phlox did preach a sermon.
Sweet Lily Vale wore her green cloak,
Her spray of pearls just showing,
While Ragged Robin's doubtful joke
Set Pyrus' cheeks a-glowing.
The Crown Imperial, Rose Japan,
Prince Feather, looked all orders,
While Daisies and Ambrosia ran,
With Ivy o'er the borders.
Sweet William was so empress
"Trim Pink turned pure Carnation,
When Candytuft did sweetly say
"To Mignonette, 'Flirtation!'
Convulvulus in her grip false
Held Sunflower tight as nippers;
And poor young Balsam could not waltz—
He'd come in Lady Shippers.
Here came, with Fleur-de-Lis from France,
The white and saintly Lilies;
Also, Tuberose, that looks askance
On sweet old time Stock Jillies.
Ah! Roses now in every dress,
Red, yellow, white, and blushing—
Though differing each in loveliness,
All fresh and sweet and blushing.
Rich Harrisonia, robed in gold,
In buff the Lady Banksia,
And then dear Daisy's Pink of old,
And fragrant Moss that rooks her;
Small Greville with the pompon red,
Lamarck with grace so savage,
And Rose Lorraine with such a head—
For all the world a Cabbage!
The finer Teas, in ecru sheaves,
Near Bourbons finds their places;
'Twould take the Rose of hundred leaves
To chronicle their graces.
The Jessamine, with starry veil,
And Fuchsias came together;
Gardenia, too, so calmly pale,
Breathed sweetly o'er Scotch Heather.
Near Star of Bethlehem appears
The Passion Flower's glory,
As on her glowing breast she bears
Of Jesus' cross the story.
Bignonia climbed upon the wall
And gave great blow of trumpets;
Wistaria blue touched at the call
Clematis sweet as crumpets.
Disheveled strayed Chrysanthemum,
In radiant crowns bright Aster,
While Canterbury Bell swung dumb
As Portulacca passed her.
Chapeau a bras, Larkspur, beside Gay Columbine, notes taking,
Declared that love to Mourning Bride
Old Marigold was making.
How Sweetbrier caught young French Pea's curls
(And didn't Scotch Rosebush scold her?)
And how his gauntlet Foxglove twirls
'Gainst Coxcomb's Button-holder!
Geraniums near the Roses flock;
Verbenas, too, depend upon it;
And ah! old foggy Hollyhock
Had two bees in his bonnet.
Tall Spanish Aloe broke a lance
With Prickly Pear, for wearing
His spurs, unknighly, in the dance,
Acacia's long hair tearing.
Snapdragon bit his lip, in rage,
And there seemed mischief growing
When Tiger Lily came in late,
His pocket pistols showing.
A drop was in Petunia's eye;
Had ne'er a scent, Syringa;
Nasturtium wore his wig awry,
The cue just tipped a finger.
Sweet Orange Flowers proved too much
For Citronella's fragrant,
While shy Mimosa shrank from touch
Of Quamoclit, the vagrant.
Hibiscus raised his ruby cup,
More rich than any Borgia's,
While Zinnia's sneered at the make up
Of Dahlia's, old though gorgeous.
And to the true Forget-me-not Devoted Heliotropium,
While some said brilliant Poppy'd got Suspicious smell of opium.
And brightly, all too swiftly, fled
The summer's bright, glad hours,
When to their duties Flora sped
These fairy, lightsome flowers,
To crown the bride, to deck the nave,
The prison-house to lighten,
To bless the poor, to strew the grave,
The sick to cheer and brighten.
Thus, bent on mission full of love,
Goes forth each tender blossom,
A seed of joy all heaven-wove
To sow in every bosom.

He had his girl at a fire, and had just said: "See the cornice waving, Annie dear," when an inscrutable Providence caused a hose to burst in his vicinity, and he moved away before we could find a brick.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

"Heaven," says a worthy gourmand, whose merit is the greater because he is dyspeptic, "heaven is where we eat, hell is where we digest."

Some one asked the master of a colored servant why the latter always wore an irreproachable white cravat: "So as to know where his head begins," replied the master.

Master Lucien has been taught the fable of "The Wolf and the Lamb," for the edification of his grandmother upon her birthday.

Having recited about half of this interesting apologue, the dear child stops short.

"What is the matter, my love?" asks his mother; "don't you know the rest of it?"

"Oh, yes, ma; but the rest is quite too awful."

"I say," said a bank cashier to a friend, "what do you think that bloated old bondholder, the president of our deposit trap, has had the impudence to do? He has told me to have my books and cash ready for examination to-morrow. Hanged if I haven't a good mind to call him out."

"Oh, never mind; it can't make any earthly difference to you if your books are all right."

"But that is the mischief of it—they ain't."

Sarah Bernhardt is by no means stout, still this does seem to be a little exaggerated:

"An empty carriage drove up to the door, and Sarah Bernhardt dismounted from it."

A remark by the painter Corot, when, at the outbreak of the war of 1870, he saw the first troops marching past his door bound for the Eastern Railway station:

"Poor fellows; how much better it would be for them to go out and sketch."

First Honest Villager—Well, how did Jean Pierre come out? Did they convict him of poaching?

Second Honest Villager—No; there was no evidence against him, and he swore solemnly that he was innocent.

First Honest Villager (with a fearful sneer)—Innocent? Oh, yes, he's innocent; just as innocent as I am, the confounded scoundrel.

A servant whose bachelor employer is dead seeks another situation.

"Can I call on your last master?" says the lady to whom he applies, "and obtain your character from him?"

"Not at present, madame—he is dead?"

"Nothing seems to me so ill-bred," says a young man, "as to smoke in the presence of ladies."

"Well," a friend asks, "how do you manage when there are ladies present and you want to smoke?"

"How do I manage? Why, I seem ill-bred."

In a sick-room:

"Ah, my dear friend, you are too kind to come and spend the evening with me, though of course it can be little pleasure to you."

"Oh, nonsense; you mustn't talk like that—mustn't think anything of the sort. Life isn't all pleasure. We can't always expect to do what would be most agreeable for us to do. Some one had to come and see you, you know."

A young gummy (un jeune gommeux) has offered himself a large dog of the mountain.

The other day, wishing to give the authority which he exercises upon his dog the gummy obliges him to mount in vehicle; some persons were observing him; he excites himself, and taking his most fat voice:

"Here, Caesar, shall they obey me when I speak?"

Caesar does not budge.

"Eh, well! is it that they hear me?"

And he lifts his cane and menaces to strike the dog.

This one returns himself toward the gummy, pushes a deaf growling, and shows him the teeth terrible.

As soon as that, the gummy, with sweetness:

"Wilt thou mount, my toutou; comes, my good dog, comes."

And he makes himself distant in caressing him in the most great deference.

"That Venus," said a critic, severely, "is a pretty poor piece of work."

"It is very easy for you to say so," says a friend of the artist; "still a man has got to have some acquaintance with art before he can sculp a statue like that."

"Oh, bosh, as M. Ruskin says. Sculpture, per se, is the simplest thing in the world. All you have to do is to take a big chunk of marble and a hammer and chisel, make up your mind what you are about to create and chip off all the marble you don't want."

Saturday night at the Cirque is the night. Everybody that is anybody goes there that night, and no one thinks of going on any other night unless he is nobody.

A young actress sends her man-servant to secure her two seats.

"I want them absolutely," she says, "and if you can't get them at the box office, go to the speculators—you've got to get them."

The faithful servant returns in about an hour, his face radiant with the complacent joy of one who has done a good action.

"You got the seats for the Cirque?"

"Yes, miss; only those ticket speculators are scoundrels. Just fancy, they had the boundless impudence to ask me twenty francs for a ticket!"

"Oh, never mind the cost—you got them?"

"Yes, miss, here they are; but as I thought the price was too steep I took seats for Monday night instead. I got them at the ordinary price, and it is the same play that is to be performed—I made sure of that before buying them."

And this opens the great question—what do people go to the theatre for?

THE SEVEN STAGES.

The field is but a diamond,
And all the men who occupy it mere players;
They have their outs and innings,
And each man in the game plays many parts—
His acts being nine innings. At first the batsman
Nervously eyeing the pitcher's arm,
Then the flying base runner, with spiked shoes,
And flashing eyes, running like fun
To light on first. Then the short stop,
In scramble for the ball, and with woeeful swiftness
Heading the runner off. Then the catcher,
With calloused hands and face in mask,
Jealous of called balls and quick for fouls,
Seeking to win record
Behind the dangerous bat. And then the pitcher,
With sturdy calves and muscle plumed,
With eyes severe upon the striker's bat,
Full of delusive feints and modern curves
And so he plays his part. The sixth change
Shifts to the outer field,
Where, thin and sleek, the player stands,
With hands on knees, watching for a fly.
His stockings shanks, and canvased feet,
Ready to turn again and chase the whizzing ball.
Then on first the player stands with hooped spine,
Crooked elbows and watchful eyes,
Alert at every crook of pitcher's arm,
And ever eager to put the striker out.
The second baseman deals in short flies
And humming grounders.
Affects an athletic's stride along the line,
Guards zealously his place,
And longs for double plays.
The last play of all in this eventful game
Is third man out; and some players
Leave the field with sprained shins,
Sans finger nails, sans teeth,
Sans—victory. —Cleveland Herald.

"Why," asked Ulysses, as he accompanied the swift-footed Achilles on his diurnal family marketing tour, "why do you call your butcher Ixion?"
The son of Peleus looked attentively at the flesher slicing off cutlets, to see that he didn't get in three times as much bone as calf, and then replied:
"Because he's the man at the veal."
The waster of cities sighed heavily, and shaking his head gloomily, said he never did understand politics very well, and so, without coming to a vote, the house adjourned.

A poultry speculator in Warren County, Pennsylvania, buys chickens in the country, and writes out a receipt for the farmers to sign. The point of his pencil invariably breaks off just before the signature is reached, and he produces a fountain pen from his pocket. The body of the receipt is written in pencil and the farmer's name in ink. When the speculator goes to town he erases all the pencil marks, and writes out in ink a promissory note for $100 or $150, and has it discounted by the bank.

The girls having altogether grown weary of young Cupid's partial darts have taken the bow into their own hands, and it behooves the young man to have a care how he makes a target of himself, lest the twang of the cord pulled by dainty fingers, and the speed of the arrow guided by eyes that are more piercing than itself, shall mark one more trophy of their skill, and perhaps—well, of course, if any girl wants to shoot this way, we'll move up so very near that she will have no trouble in hitting the target.

A Neat Evasion.

An hour passed on, the Turk awoke,
And to a blue-eyed minion spoke—
Between the whiffs of opium smoke:
"What, ho! thou Oriental bloke,
Repeat the latest circus joke!"
Shrewd answer made the catiff, for
He knew the fate that was in store
If he retailed an ancient jest;
So, deftly pulling down his vest,
He bent, with salacious low, and said:
"Great Pacha, all the fools are dead, Except the knave who bows his head."
ERRATIC ENRIQUE.

Now is the season of the year when the man who sees the sign, "Fresh Paint," will walk up to the door, leave the marks of his dirty fingers on it, and go away muttering to himself, "That's so." This proves that he is just about as "fresh" as the paint is.

A Jew, a horse, a gnu, and heifer met, when the following conversation took place: "Did Jew ever see such a punny four as we are?" "Gnu, never." "What, neigh-ver!" Well, hardly, heifer.

Boys seldom follow in the footsteps of their fathers. Jim Mace has two sons who are preachers. If he had been a minister his boys would have turned out prize-fighters.

"Mamie Myrtle," a sweet singer of Illinois, asks in a recent poem, "Where do the winter blossoms grow?" Well, you might look on Mr. Myrtle's nose, Mamie.

"Will the army starve? It could be turned loose in Democratic districts and live off the country. It has done that many a time, and understands the business."

A dignified Detroit judge, to oblige a little girl, recently wrote in an album: "My pen is poor, my ink is pale, my heart it trembles like a little dog's tail."

"I've something in my bosom, Sue,
That makes me feel quite sad,
I can't reveal it unto you—
(It was a liver pad.)"

THE SCIENTIST'S DAUGHTER.

The Dangers of Affection and Horrors of Matrimony.

MY DEAR DAUGHTER:—It is now some months since I wrote you a letter of advice, but, believe me, the delay has not been because I did not know that you needed instruction, for, like most other young people, you require little else, seeing that society imposes upon parents the duty of clothing and feeding their offspring. No matter to what straits a man may be reduced, no matter how hard it may be for him to procure books and necessary stimulants, society looks upon him as worthless if he fails to provide for his family and to satisfy even their factitious cravings. If it were possible for me to lead my own life, your mother had long ere now been sent like Hagar into the wilderness to take pot-luck with the raven and the crows; and I doubt not that, had she been equally free to lead her ideal existence, she would have abandoned you and the rest of my Ishmaels to the buzzard and the jackal before sunset of the day on which she set out on her wanderings. Society is based on the cruel doctrine that what a man loved in his youth that he must pretend to love when advancing years have mellowed his understanding and widened his views until he sees that all he had believed to be peculiar in the life of his youth is but commonplace, and shared with a thousand and one other women more beautiful and intelligent than she. Moreover, it does not take him many years to learn that intelligence and beauty are not of great importance, and are not perpetually attractive; he reaches a state of supreme apathy—the state which Emerson foreshadowed when he spoke of how love of a particular person at last becomes benevolence toward all mankind; "the individual," as Tennyson says, meaning the other individual,

"Withers, and the world is more and more."

But the truth is, rather, that in the supreme apathy the world withers along with the individual. Meantime a family has grown up around the man, toward which he is as indifferent as he is to the families of others, the only essential difference being that he can recognize their faces rather more readily at a distance or in a crowd. True, habit goes for something, and since he has become habituated to the care of his wife and children the pang of spending his money upon them is somewhat lessened. Nevertheless, the suffering is there, though the unhappy man is commonly so indurated that he hardly notices it. I have asked men whose families have been wholly removed in railway accidents how they felt when they reflected upon the affair, and though they acknowledged that at first they were startled and pained, yet when they turned the matter over with themselves when all again was quiet, they found that their first sensation was really and at bottom like that delight which is said to thrill men at the moment of their release from the rack. I wish you to get an inkling of these things before it shall be too late and the irretrievable mischief done, for, as I have observed women, the case with them is not essentially different from what it is with men. Still, I hardly know why I write thus to you, since by so doing I must seem in some degree to confute my own principles; but surely, you should see that if I had any real principles I could not be truly apathetic. But put it on what grounds you choose, it is enough that to write this letter jumps with my humor, and I care quite as much for you as for my time; brain power must be expended in some way, and why not in this? If my memory serves me you are now about six years old and before long you will be falling in love. Deeply as I regret the fact for your own sake, and through your sake for that of the man you will love, I can not shut my eyes to the fact that you will "fall in love"—a keen phrase that, and one showing that love is below you, for we do not rise, but fall into love. Looking into your clear, gray eyes, bright with light rather than color, I have sometimes hoped that you would escape this common fate; that your intellect would rise above it, for your intellect, both by inheritance and original motion, should surpass that of the herd. But, alas, the melancholy fact remains that with love the intellect has naught to do; I should say that it has its origin and realm in the moral nature, in the great sympathetic nervous system of the non-material nature of man, rather than in what might be termed its cerebral nervous system. In general it may be said that nothing but apathy can prevent or cure the pernicious affection called love; but there are instances in which early training on the moral side has been as effectual as on the intellectual side. It was, for example, in the case of the late John Stuart Mill. By a persistent course of nagging I might make you so hateful that nobody would love you, and so hasty-tempered and cross-grained that you could never love man, woman, or child. But think for a moment what trouble and annoyance this would cause me. I have tried it repeatedly, but when I saw that it was disturbing my apathy I at once stopped it. You may remember that at meals I have cried out, "Dorothy, why don't you use your napkin?" or "Why can't you sit properly in your chair?" or "There goes your fork again; if it drops on the floor another single time you shall go immediately to bed," and the like. You were in a fine way to become as impudent and snappish as I could wish you were, seeing that I am away from home most of the time; but even for your sake I could not persist in this method of training, judicious and for your own good though it was. I found out soon that I was really beginning to mean what I said and to feel angry with you. At any cost to you my temper must remain equable, and therefore I desisted and determined to write to you as a sensible being on an equal footing with myself. I will therefore give you the best advice at my command as to how you may discover the folly if not the wickedness of love; and, my dear, no one could have a better opportunity to discover it than is yours, because of your young and tender years. Look around you; circumspice, my child. You have many playmates whom you visit at their homes; their parents seem to the outer world the most loving of people and most willing to make sacrifices for each other, but because you are but a child they will not be over-circumspect when you are near apparently playing with their daughters. Now, mark how sarcastic they are to each other, how snappish the husband is when the wife asks him for money, or observe me under similar circumstances. See how the wife slyly hides the newspaper, and how for no better reason than that the father slams the door. Pry into all their secrets; listen under the windows and you will see what love results in. Then come and tell me all about it, that I may be fortified in my opinions and write them out in a great work which I shall dedicate to you, and which you may read with joy when you are a happy—or at least apathetic—old spinster, and "hie!—jaquet" shall be inscribed upon my tombstone.

Office

AN INTERCEPTED LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 12, 1879.

MY DEAR MADGE:—We had a treat on Monday night, and a rare one. The bits of glass in our theatrical kaleidoscope are commonplace enough at times, and admirably lustreless at best, whatever forms they take, to eyes that have grown strong in the glare of grand nights at Paris, or the glows of opera festivals at Milan; but now and then there is born of the changes a picture that is photographed in uddying colors on the memory, and will still be fondly lingered over when only a discarded play will remain to tell of the engagement that has become but a remembrance, and the simple grandeur that is a thing of the past. The rôle of panegyrist may seem to fit me, Madge, but if you had seen A New Play, by Howells, at the California, you would understand and sympathize. It is a chapter from the grandest memoirs of England, a story of the old, beautiful, chivalrous days of the English renaissance, or the days when Shakespeare wrote and Beaumont versified; when the princely Raleigh was the preux chevalier that all the gentlemen of the kingdom copied; when a wooden petticoat was accorded the knightly gallantry that only the gold and gossamer tissues of upper tenor can poorly command nowadays; when art was loved for art's sake; when titled men and ladies fair saw not the rags in which genius was clad, but only the richness of the mentality beyond, nor waited, after the blissful fashion of the present, for it to be crushed by poverty, until, like Lombardy grapes, its vitality was gone before the richness of its perfume was exhaled. It is not en regle now, perhaps, to rhapsodize over anything better than a prima-donna's face, a première's legs, or a modiste's marvels, but it surely seems that when the silver of the stage mirror sends back to us a picture of the days that have been, that makes us better love ourselves as beings, and respect our society for the glory of the past that still illumines it, one can be pardoned for not mutely turning from the commercial commonplaces and æsthetic degeneracy of the Victorian era to the grand glories of the Elizabethan. The play tells the sad story of "Yorick," jester at the Globe Theatre, London, whose wife, the "Lady Alice" is loved by and loves, all unknown to her trusting husband, her foster-son, "Edmund." "Master Woodford," a playwright, brings him a play exactly suiting the condition of the three characters. He obtains the rôle of the husband, thereby exciting the hate of the heavy man, "Master Walton," and in the third and last act has his growing suspicions of the faithlessness of "Lady Alice" verified, and learns of "Edmund's" guilt, slaying the son in reality, and by a self-inflicted blow following him out of the world that had grown so bitter. And the story is told so beautifully; the characters are so sympathetically conceived and so clearly limited; their hold on you is made so potent, and their circumstances are so strongly dramatic; the pathway of the plot, intricate as it is, so ornate with the wild flowers of sweet sentiment, so rich with the delicate perfume of poesy, that one could wander indefinitely through its alluring ways, nor ever grow impatient of the end. It is original, too. The motive is new, the jealousy of one player of another; and when one has fatigued of the mock rapture and hackneyed agony of love in its ordinary dramatic aspect of jealousy, of intrigue, or of maternal affections—the themes on which dramatists promise to ring changes through an eternity of play writing—a new and virile motive is not a little charming. The handling, too, is excellent. The few strong characters around whom the interest centres, the dependence on one quality—suspense, the striking unity of the plot, all indicate a clear acquaintanceship with modern dramatic art of the highest class, and claim for Howells, whether he got the original idea from the Spanish or not, high praise as a dramatist. But it was not done full justice to by the players, and one had to read between the lines to know all its beauty. As presented, it was a romanza played fortissimo, a reverie subjected to the measured malice of trumpets, a sweet idyl of a flower-grown countryside roared by a bull of Bashan, or anything else you like that is incongruous and unjustifiable. Everybody ranted and roared. The howling was at times tremendous, and forced the impression on one that if morals had been as strong as lungs in those days the play could never have been truthfully written. If the characters had been Shakespearean heroes they might have been properly endowed with the fortissimo voices and impressive strut that kings and roosters indulge in by right divine. But they were not. They were living, breathing, common people like ourselves, living in a grader age, but containing the same human nature that animates us.

My experience is that, from pigs to princes, the more noise that is made over a mauvais coup, whether of a butcher's knife or of pitiless fortune, the less sympathy the sufferer gets; and if one school of acting could appreciate this, it would increase as much in emotional power as it would decrease in aural agony. Mind you, I am quarreling now with Mr. Barrett's school, and not with Mr. Barrett, for his work as "Yorick" was strong, subtle, and finished of its class, and altogether the finest thing he has done, to my mind. But this gymnastic ranting is barbarous, and why theatre-goers stand it—except possibly from the fact that, from ear-drops to intoxicants, society clings rather fondly to the barbarities—I can not understand. Possibly, too, the actors are right, for a grand dramatic poem, read with dignity, would make but an ungainly showing beside the cheaper and more striking jingle of the nineteenth century verse; and, as long as the balcony encored Barrett over and over again, we dress circle people had better content ourselves with a curl of the lip and a shrug of the shoulders and keep quiet. Jeffreys-Lewis played "Lady Alice," appearing in blonde coiffure and the typical dress of Tennyson's "lily maid of Astolat." It was no anachronism, however, for fashions changed but rarely in those days, and the Elaines of the Arthurian and the Alices of a later era had only romance to occupy them instead of the ennobling, mad scramble after the car of fashion which busies their sisters of to-day. There may be thrown on the car perhaps a queen of Parisian infamy—whose discarded lord was a loafer of the Boulevards, and who studied governmental science in a milliner's work room or a Closerie de Lilas ball—but she is tasteful and dresses magnificently, and hence has a royal right to rule her devout worshippers. Miss Lewis did not play it well, though the sins were sins of omission and not of commission. The rendition was something akin to a love song interpreted on a zither from which the sympathetic chords were absent. There was an innocence and simplicity, a sinlessness in sin, and a plenitude of sympathy in the character which Miss Lewis did not make apparent, but rather transformed it into the guilty intrigue of a modern French drama. It is a noble part, one that makes us long for the artistic discrimination of an Eyttinge, without her matured corporeality, to delineate. Miss Lewis is not impersonal enough—no English actresses are—and has not the sympathetic power to adequately fill such a rôle. She is an instrument perfectly attuned to the strong passions of hate and jealousy; but when she is required to mould herself into the semblance of a softer love or a simpler sorrow, the melting of the obstinate substance takes place so ill that the ensemble is full of angles, instead of being smoothly complete, and can never be a perfect copy of its model. Mr. Keene played "Edmund," dawning on us like a winter sunrise in a white and crimson doublet, and violet tights—a bizarre combination that gave him the picturesque beauty of a porcelain painting half baked. His hair was light, and worn a la mousé, and he was altogether unlike Keene till he began on his saponaceous diet and indulgence in tympanic intensity. It was in his usual style, and very good of its bad kind before mentioned. His pose, however, was awkward in the sad confession scene—a beautiful idea, by the way—wherein he was bent forward with his hands in a position that made one sure either that he was not well or had become a convert to the physiological theory of the ancients, that the spleen is the seat of melancholy. Wilson, as "Walton," roared beautifully, and when the three—Barrett, and Keene, and Wilson—settled down to business they literally made Rome howl. But the play is lovely, Madge, and I should adore it if I could see it presented in an age that does not call Joe Murphy an actor, a tawdry burlesque a triumph of art, and rate that actor highest whose voice would insure him a standing engagement as foreman of a fire company, and whose peripatetic art gives a grand dramatic performance the flavor of a Platt's Hall pedestrian exhibition. Outside of A New Play there is not much else to record. Rose Coghlan has been doing some charming work at the Baldwin, as "Miss Annie Carew" in A Wolf in Sheep's Clothing, and "Suzanne" in A Scrap of Paper. Her style is not the commanding, but the insinuating. She has the golden gift of naturalness, and hers is a sort of canary-bird art, whose trills strike a responsive chord in your heart just as its woes over an obstinate seed induce a pathetic sympathy in you without moving you very deeply in either case; and still further pursuing the ornithological idea, her notes are uttered so fast at times that you can not distinguish them individually. The city has been seized with the Pinafore epidemic as I predicted, though the virns of the Emelie Melville Troupe is the only kind that appears to have much potency. They have had a grand success all through the week, and the last row of seats has been at a premium every night. Deservedly, too, for they have all fitted charmingly into their rôles, and with the exception of the "Captain," who is vocally weak compared to the others, and the "Buttercup," whose eighteen-year-old air is admirably unfitted for an old bumboat woman, and wholly destroys the unities, the performance is very pleasing. Mr. Unger's "Admiral" grows better every day as new ideas are brought to bear on it, as do "Josephine," and "Ralph Rackstraw" by the pretty prima and Mr. Clark. The other troupes have been but meagrely successful, in spite of some charming singing by Miss Sherwin and Walter Campbell at the Grand Opera House, and Sol Smith Russell's "Admiral" at the Bush Street. Next week comes Ours and Lester Wallack, the New York beau ideal and "an actor as is an actor," after a triumphal series of jams at Chicago. I am sincerely glad he has come, and if I mistake not the California on Monday night will express the same fashionable sentiment, for art of his kind is not often seen here. There is going to be strong opposition though, for the Baldwin will produce The Danichefs, the Bush Street is going to play a strong card in Josh Whitcomb, by Denman Thompson, and the Pinafores will continue at the other places. And amid it all I shall be,

Yours industriously,
ANELIA A., proxy for BETSY B.

The Return of Uncle Josh.

It is with a satisfaction entirely foreign to the usual dramatic announcement that we notice the return to us of "Uncle Joshua Whitcomb," the quaint old New Hampshire farmer, who, way out here on the fringe of the continent, made his first great success, and left us with mutual benedictions, to win the applause and the hearts of some of the largest audiences on the continent. What we said of him and his art the rest of the country has more than approved; what we prophesied has more than come to pass. And while welcoming back the homely and quaint old character we are also glad to shake the hand of, and extend our congratulation to, Mr. Hill, the business manager and prime mover in all these triumphs. For it was Hill that made the present "Uncle Josh" possible and popular. It was his industry, and business ability, and honorable dealing that forced the character on the public after having lifted it from the obscurity in which he found it; it was his good judgment and liberality that has made successful the way ever since, and though he has not said it, it is greatly to his credit, and he is a gentleman and a business genius. Next Monday night "Uncle Josh" makes his reappearance at the Bush Street Theatre, and this simple announcement is sufficient to secure a greeting that for quality and sincerity few actors in this country have ever been able to command.

To Mrs. Judah.

"The sweet shall not depart from Judah."
Because thy sweet rendition of the ways
In which our mothers only do excel
Have wrought within our hearts a potent spell
Do we vouchsafe to thee this meed of praise.
Thy mother-motions innocently lavs
Thy pure heart bare; there is no need to tell
The strange observer why we love so well
One who so naturally the Mother plays.
Thy winsome manner, so replete with grace,
Seems like a holy garment draped about
The ripened fullness of thy after days;
So may sweet memories of thy simple face
Clothe the bare boards that knew thee, while the shout
Sinks, at the mention of thy name, in praise.
SAN FRANCISCO, June, 1879. PERCY VERE.

Lester Wallack is being followed very closely by the newspapers of New York, and the amount of John the Baptist work they are doing is something refreshing and interesting. The New York Herald of a recent date says: "The Mapleson Opera Company attracted thousands, but the pleasure given by our New York favorite seems to excel, if we may believe journalistic description, even that attraction. When he reaches California Mr. Wallack will probably receive from the large-hearted people of that section tokens of regard that will make him feel like the boss brilliant in the coronet of stars who preceded him. Few gentlemen among our dramatic artists have so quietly entered what to them was a professional terra incognita and so promptly won success. It serves to show that true art will always own its admirers and pay just tribute to the winner."

During a performance at the Boston Theatre lately, a reckless individual in the family circle allowed his programme to slip through his fingers, which fell suddenly on the head of a society man. The effect of the concussion upon an object so tender may well be imagined. Smelling bottles were called for, but before they could be brought into requisition, a young lady at his side, whose glove had recently been cleaned with naphtha, applied her hand to the sufferer's nose, which immediately brought him to.

Woodward's Garden would certainly lose its attraction if Barrett, and Keene, and Wilson were permitted to figure in A New Play another week. It is seldom that one encounters three such sublime roars in one cage. The noise when they were in full cry was simply, and dreadfully, and damnably awful.

The pedestrian mania shows no sign of diminution. On the contrary, the interest in the saw-dust track at Platt's Hall is rather on the increase, as the days wear on and the steppers still hold out.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 12, 1879.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—My attention was called to an article which appeared in a late number of the ARGONAUT, in which the name of the late Jasper O'Farrell appeared in a list of defaulters in office. The only office (except State Senator) ever held by Jasper O'Farrell was that of State Harbor Commissioner. During O'Farrell's term of office one of the commissioners, of whom there were three, was indicted, tried, and convicted of embezzlement. At that time a thorough examination was had by the Grand Jury of the affairs of the Commission, and Jasper O'Farrell was not in any manner criminally implicated in the acts for which his co-commissioner was convicted.

Respectfully,
JOHN J. ROCHE.

SALT-WATER BATHING.

To those who now spend time, money, and patience to cross the bay and dip in the debilitating slack and shallow waters of the Alameda shores, we hereby convey the information that there is a better and more healthful place to bathe than these heated mud flats, and that is at North Beach, where the clear, crisp water of the ocean courses through the Golden Gate. With the present accommodations at the Neptune and Mermaid baths, under the new management, there is little to be desired by the swimmer. There are wharves running to deep water, long distance rafts, elastic diving boards, and a recently erected aquatic gymnasium on the deep water pier. There is a safe beach and graduated depth of water for those who do not swim, and a competent and experienced swimming teacher to give instruction and see to the safety of all. The dressing accommodations are good. Private apartments have recently been fitted up for families and ladies, and every attention given to the comfort of those who desire to be as retired as possible. These accommodations having been provided the patronage of ladies is now large and increasing every day. The water is somewhat colder than at Alameda, but this is its great recommendation. To bathe in the warm salt water of the muddy flats is to be debilitated and experience a clammy, sticky feeling that is disgusting; to take a fresh water shower as an antidote destroys the whole purpose of the bath. The charm of sea-bathing is to let the salt water dry, if possible, on the skin, thus bringing out a healthful glow. This tonic effect can not be secured except from the clear, cold, ocean water. It can not be experienced in a tank, where hundreds of bathers stir up the fine precipitated mud from the bottom, and wallow and spit from daylight till dark. Again, the time and price to the North Beach bath is a consideration. It costs thirty cents and a full half day to go across the bay, and then twenty-five cents for bathing accommodations. The charge at the Neptune and Mermaid baths is two tickets for twenty-five cents, for first-class accommodations, and three tickets for twenty-five cents on the men and boys' side. The car fare is but five cents each way, and to those who need a little exercise the walk is not a long one, going straight out Montgomery Avenue, and then a few short blocks over the hill. The bath can be taken after four o'clock in abundant time for dinner, or the early morning plunge at any hour after daylight that suits the bather's convenience. Try the ocean water once, and you will soon be convinced that it is the only element for an invigorating and healthful bath.

TWO LETTERS FROM RICHARD WAGNER.

During the Grand Operatic Festival in 1876, a number of new Grand Pianos of the most celebrated European as well as of several American makers had been placed at Mr. Richard Wagner's disposal; among them a new Centennial Concert Grand Piano made by "Steinway & Sons," of New York, which from its wonderful power, beauty, and sympathetic quality of tone far outshone all rival instruments, and which Mr. Richard Wagner at once chose for his own private use.

In the beginning of 1879, Mr. Wagner was requested by Mr. Theo. Steinway to send this Grand Piano to the Steinway Central European Depot, in order to receive the latest invention, the "Tone Pulsator," patented in July, 1878. On sending the Grand, Mr. Wagner writes as follows:

"BAYREUTH, March 11th, 1879.

"MY DEAR MR. STEINWAY:—I miss my Steinway Grand as one misses a beloved wife; it is wanting constantly, wanting everywhere. I no longer indulge in music since that Grand is gone, and trust that its absence will not be too long protracted.

"Very truly yours,
RICHARD WAGNER."

The following letter was written to Mr. Theodore Steinway by the great master shortly after the return of the Steinway Grand (now containing the Tone Pulsator) to his home:

"BAYREUTH, April 11th, 1879.

"MY DEAR MR. STEINWAY:—Really you ought personally to have witnessed the gratification which I experienced upon receiving back your magnificent Grand Piano; you certainly would not have asked me to add another word.

"I do indeed deem it humiliating for so many other branches of art, that this art of building pianofortes alone should so closely approach such undeniable ideal perfection. I know of nothing in Painting, Sculpture, Architecture, Literature, and unfortunately also Music, which—since I have comprehension of same—could compare with the masterly perfection reached in pianoforte building.

"From your communication, however, I readily perceive with what enthusiastic love you seek to attain the incorporation of the most 'spirituelle' tone into the piano which heretofore had only served as the exponent of actual musical sound. Our great Tone Masters, when writing the grandest of their creations for the pianoforte, seem to have had a presentiment of the ideal Grand Piano as now attained by yourselves. A Beethoven Sonata, a Bach Chromatic Phantasie, can only be fully appreciated when rendered upon one of your pianofortes.

"Although I do not possess the slightest dexterity in pianoforte playing, I delight in being able to do justice to your assumption of my inborn and cultivated sense of tone. For sounds of such beauty as those coming from my Steinway Grand flatter and coax the most agreeable tone-pictures from my harmonic melodic senses.

"In a word, I find your Grand Piano of wondrous beauty. It is a noble work of art. And with a thousand thanks for this new attention, I delight in being able to call myself Your friend,

"RICHARD WAGNER."

CONSUMPTION CURED.—An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. The Eminent Character Actor,

DENMAN THOMPSON

—AS—

JOSHUA WHITCOMB,

Supported by

HIS COMPLETE DRAMATIC COMPANY.

[From the New York Herald of Nov. 28, 1878.]

The success of "Joshua Whitcomb" at the Lyceum Theatre has been so remarkable that it deserves to be frequently commented upon as an example of excellent business tact and patient waiting. During the past two weeks the audiences have been the largest that have gathered in any New York theatre. It is a play that wins with every performance, makes friends for the actors, and money for the management. DEN THOMPSON, as a representative of a New England Farmer, with the least of stage effects, never fails to bring both tears and laughter. Little Tot (Miss Julia Wilson), with her sweet voice; Roundy, the handsome boy, also vocal, heroic, and good; Uncle Si, with his old-time humor, and Aunt Matilda, make a picture that never has been duplicated on the American stage.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE
Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
DWIGHT C. KING, plaintiff, vs. MALISSA KING,
defendant.
Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth
Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.
The People of the State of California send greeting to
MALISSA KING, defendant:
You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days
(exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served
out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be
taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.
The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds
set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference
is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.
And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and
answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.
Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court
of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this twenty-fourth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

VOL. IV. NO. 25.

SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 21, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

CAPRICE AT CAPRI.

BY CHARLES WARREN STOOOARD.

The Saturnian days are over! They began in the edge of Naples, where the market boat shook out its sails the moment I came on board, and with the chorus, "Addio, bella Napoli," we drifted into the stream—fishermen, and maidens, lovers, landsmen, and lazy lazzaroni, the inevitable padre inclusive—as merry and as wise a crew as ever went to sea in a bowl. For five hours we floated in the blue bay at the mercy of the wind and tide; sometimes a passing cloud threw a shadow or a shower upon us, and each was equally welcome. A furnace heat danced upon the still water; the air was light and fitful; the flapping canvas seemed more for ornament than use. Strong men fell upon the oars and beat solemn time to the shrill falsetto of one chanting cherub whose song was full of sadness. What could he know of love and death that he grieved for them in midsummer, in mid sea? His elders laughed, and slept, and woke again, to drink of the sharp wine of their own dear island; they had lived and loved; death could not rob them of the past. Faint voices were in the air; voices that bore down to us upon the freshening breeze. We drew in the oars, trimmed sail, composed our souls in peace, and when the sun was low and our full prow breast high in golden foam, with a shout of triumph we rushed into the deep shadows that hung from the island cliffs, and exchanged greetings with the happy islanders—a twilight litany that ended only in the warm embraces of our friends on shore. It was thus I came to Capri, with the one hope of lying fallow through St. Martin's summer. My intents were honorable; I was not wholly selfish in my flight from the work-a-day world. Fatima had touched me, through the post, with mild complainings. Were we not friends? Doubtless. Old friends? Aye. The age of our friendship wasn't to be mentioned above a whisper. Strangers in a strange land? By Jove! the strangest land under the sun; strangely sweet, strangely sad, strangely poetical. Why would I not visit Fatima in her Capri castle, rather than turn tramp in Switzerland, or whistle to the dawn over the crowded trails of the Tyrol? I would; a thousand times I would. So I rushed headlong down through Italy, and paid two francs for a bench and a broil in the market boat, rather than give ten and join the rabble on the semi-weekly steamer, with a glimpse of Sorrento thrown in. You know Capri Marina, with its brown strip of beach, its stranded fleet of fishing boats, under gauzy canopies of drying nets, and the single row of flat-roofed oriental houses that back into the hill and defy the elements? Well, I refused the donkeys that were offered me tail foremost, and repulsed the donkey girls—who reviled me from that hour—preferring to foot it, like a pilgrim, up the steep stone stairs to Capri on the cliff. Was ever thousand feet of wall so clad with verdure! Terrace upon terrace, like giant steps, climb to the saddle of the island; on each side is the sea, and at the two ends two mountains that carry the gray olive groves into the very sky. Under these peaks, on the narrow strip of highland that hangs like a hammock between them, is little Capri, with the Hotel Tiberio, and there dwelt Fatima with her royal welcome. It was a royal welcome; it began at the beach; it was renewed at every turn of the steep and thorny way that wound up the hill between high walls cushioned with fern and lichen; it culminated in the small piazza in front of the hotel, where the hall of justice, post-office, Scopar's Osteria, and the cathedral face one another in rival dignity. There was an anti-climax in the court of the Tiberio, where the buxom landlady fairly embraced me, and said with some emotion that I was considerably overdue; the fact was indisputable. Then Fatima led me in triumph to the great dining-hall where new faces smiled upon me, as we sat down to sup. "Little Jay," from Connecticut, pursuing art in her Capri studio, and T., with his grizzled beard, her tutor, the concluding half of our quartet, prepared the figs. Pepino, the young Neapolitan attendant, set wine before us, a full flagon at each right hand; Mrs. Ross buzzed like a queen bee about the room, doing the landlady to the letter. Five centuries ago Queen Johannes of Naples feasted in that chamber—the Tiberio was one of her summer palaces; in that hall she took her rouse and kept wassail, but happily for the giddy queen all this is numbered among the unwritten histories of its past. Then it was a convent of nuns, then a priestly college, and at last it is a hospice of no little fame, a strange, rambling tenement, haunted of ghostly memories, and certainly occupying the finest site on the island. My room, like the prophet-chamber, was on the wall at the top of the house, the one apartment in the tower that overlooked the dome of the cathedral, a square room, with groined ceiling, and a tiled floor, and pale frescoes on the walls—a little chapel without a saint, though there was a niche for one in the corner. That night I looked out from my window upon a moon-lit valley sloping to the sea. Beyond the far horizon, in the white wake of the moon, lay the African coast. I heard the waves beating upon the abrupt shore far below me—the waves that were blown over from the hot sands by the hot desert-winds. The village was wrapped in sleep; the flat roofs, which are promenades at twilight, were all deserted. Close at hand towered one stately palm. I seemed to recognize it on the instant, for at that moment the text of the Howadji came to me, word for word, and I greeted the exile of the Orient in his name. Has he not said: "I knew a palm tree upon Capri. It stood in select society of shining fig-leaves and lustrous oleanders; it overhung a balcony, and so looked, far overleaning, down upon the blue Mediterranean. Through the dream mists of southern Italian noons, it looked upon the broad bay of Naples, and saw vague Vesuvius melting away; or at sunset the isles of the Syrens, whereon they singing sat and wooed Ulysses as he went; or in the full May moonlight the oranges of Sorrento shone across it, great and golden—permanent planets of that delicious dark. And from Sorrento, where Tasso was born, it looked across to pleasant Pasilipo, where Virgil is buried, and to stately Ischia. The palm of Capri saw all that was fairest and most famous in the Bay of Naples." And I slept that night with my hand almost buried in its silver plumes.

In the gray dawn the bells of the Ave Maria recalled me from my dreams; I heard those winged choristers—the larks—chirp their matins and the quail piping the first canonical hour; I arose and looked out upon the world to realize that we were in it, but not of it, for the sapphire sea flowed all about us touched with heavenly light. It is the chief charm of Capri that one feels quite at home in it; I returned to my pillow and began where I had left off, though it was sunrise and the great figs, chilled with dew, were bursting on the boughs. When next I woke Pepino stood beside me; he was one of those lads who swell their garments to repletion; whose bulging buttons threaten to fly hither and thither on the slightest provocation, yet somehow manage to hold the poor fellow together in a state of suspended dissolution. Pepino dared not smile, for he had awakened me, and some people are savages before breakfast. I smiled for him, and we rehearsed a page or two of "Italian for Beginners," those easy idiomatic sentences which, fortunately, are never used and never can be used in real life. Pepino melted and became as pliable as wax. He seemed to take it as an unmerited favor that I had not slain him on the spot. He bore a message from Fatima and morning greetings from the artists; they were even then reveling in figs and cream, and missed me horribly. Would I join them, or would I breakfast in bed, or would I remain undisturbed until the second breakfast at 1 P. M.? In any case, would I please have my own way under all circumstances, and kindly allow them to go on spoiling me to the bitter end? Of course I would! Who wouldn't? Pepino prepared my bath with joy unspeakable. I arrayed myself in purple and fine linen; I was just as fresh and sweet as I could possibly be; I felt like a strong man to run a race, and I dove down the long stone stairs into the breakfast hall, making the best time on record. Saturnian days indeed! We devoured great stacks of figs and cried for more. Never was such a delighted soul as Pepino on that celebrated occasion; he adored a pig. Then we smoked, and leaned out from the west balcony, and gazed upon the shining sea, the shimmering shore, the happy island at our feet. What fun! "Little Jay" forgot to be prudish—I am told that all the "little Jay" sort of girls in New England are particularly prudish. Big old T. seemed to have achieved the odic capture of the little woman, and the very idea rejuvenated him. I observed that in all our expeditions, on land or sea, on foot or in the saddle, the towering T. invariably led the charge, supported by Connecticut Jay in all her war paint; but let me swoop down the cliff into one of those eagle-nests that abound, especially on the African side of the island, and surprise Miss Propriety in a revery and a red shawl, all under a painter's parasol, and no sucking dove might coo more softly. What a lark to poke fun at the grizzly, and see her burn scarlet and hate me through and through!

Have I digressed, I wonder? Sufficient unto the day was the excursion thereof; every sunset found us somewhere; every moon-rise, somewhere else. We went up into the housetop to pray, and forgot to pray because all Capri was on the roofs at that moment, and we were dumb with delight—and then we didn't want them to see us at prayers anyhow! We could walk over half the town on the roofs, that lapped one upon another. Some of the streets of that quaint village are tunnels under and through the houses; some that are wider, and open to the light, are bridged over at intervals—airy arches on which the populace pose in fine relief. All this we saw from a housetop in Capri, and marked how love's young dream could stem floods of mellow moonlight, and was not ashamed nor affeared of staring stars. One day, when I had gone forth from my chamber, burdened with the exasperating monotony of the hour, I discovered upon the roof our landlady, seated, like Patience, upon a chimney pot, with a spy-glass pressed to her bosom. Sea and sky were pink; the distant shore like a memory of shores enchanted; the rippling waves were soft as silk; the wind blew scarcely above a whisper. I asked Patience to reveal to me her mission. She did so in a spirit of calm and steadfast faith that touched me deeply. She was looking for water-spouts! I gathered from her revelation that water-spouts grew near us; that it was their custom to drop their crystal pipes from the bellying clouds directly in front of the hotel, that they writhed in mid air like swan's throats, that they swung to and fro like pendant serpents, while from their compressed lips stole deadly music, such as turns to stone the ear of the most ancient mariner; and so they lay in wait for passing sails, and these they stealthily approach, and on a sudden lick up like flame, or as the pendulous serpent darts upon the insect with his forked tongue! There sailed the queenly ships unmindful of the fell prophesies. One bearing toward the vexed waters that boil between Scylla and Charybdis, this to Spain or the Antilles, this to Egyptian sands, and that—she scours the southern seas, where the fiery cross burns nightly, and the sails are filled with musk. Ah, me! I pointed to the sky, as naked as a sea-shell, and asked if the silver chains of her water-spout might spin themselves out of space? She answered not wisely, but too well, this old improbabilities. Her speech was broken, her lips were bedewed with wine, and the unnatural light of her countenance shone not upon us again for three whole days. Strange that an island but a span long, beloved of the Emperor Augustus, wherein Tiberius built twelve villas, in honor of the twelve gods, should grow to seed! Did I not in vain search singly and in groups for the golden eggs of that imperial goose? The nests are there, belittled and befooled, but hardly as much as a broken shell remains to our late day. Did I not walk in the dark chambers of the College of Crime, whose novitiates were fattened to satiate the appetite of Tiberius? How could a sumptuous sin flourish in such mean quarters? What did I find there? Drifts of dismantling dust, and a snail that spat froth when I took it in hand, and that squeaked and slobbered in the slimy mouth of its shell.

Was it for this reason we followed one another about the house, and about the hills in the pursuit of pleasure? The hands of the clock made their tread-mill round. Figs began to pall upon the appetite; we sought consolation in dominoes at Scopar's, where the game ran high and culminated in copious draughts of coffee or hot-scutch at 9 P. M.—which is a late hour for Capri. We invited the song and dance. At night we sought our pillows to the metallic tinkling of mandolins and guitars, mingled with occasional spurts of accordion music—sawed off in lengths to suit—and the voices of men and women resounding in rustic discord. The boisterous melodies in the wine shop were more than once rendered too forcibly, and the theme of island gossipry was those nocturnes in black and blue. For the sake of variety we were bidden to the bridal of the chaste Lucia, who had waited seven years for the return of her innamorata; and not in vain, for he brought with him ten thousand hard-earned francs, and came home to claim his sposa, lapped in provincial ease. It was then that the handsome barber danced the tarantella with the blushing bride, and the hunchback postman, like a caricature, ambled in their steps. We screamed with laughter. We fed on stale cakes and bad marsala; an orchestra from Sorrento thrumming the while, and dashing Federigo of the Quississana, breaking the hearts of the Capriotes on the terrace in the moonlight. We all paired off that evening, and, as for me, I accepted the smiles of one of those smooth-faced, big waisted, flat-footed donkey girls—such as artists rave upon, and who lie in wait for husbands, playing for high stakes in every case. Anon fresh arrivals disturbed the serenity of our life; we were no longer sole masters of all we surveyed. The galled T. winced at this seeming intrusion, and increased the temperature of the house. In despair I turned to Fatima, and suggested instant flight. We packed our saddle-bags, to the comic despair of Pepino. New raiment, which I had ordered from Naples—the fig leaf is the only garment of domestic manufacture in that isle of innocence—came at last. Fortunate hour! Twenty minutes later I would have dropped to pieces. Farewell! but not forever. The whole village followed us to the sea, where we entered into a ship and did Sicily, from the heart of Etna to the island's edge. A thousand plans were shelved for the time: private theatricals under the patronage of the Prince of Capri, another voyage to the Azure Grotto, and the circumnavigation of the island when the moon was round and full. Pepino dried his eyes with a ten-franc note; a salute of three guns was fired from the roof of the Tiberio, and we sailed into the South for a season. All that time I dreamed of Capri. I lived over again the deliciously monotonous life; I recalled events that had not impressed me until now, but now grew and magnified. Then with Palermo at our back we turned to Capri; in hot haste we sought again the familiar haunts. Fraternal greetings awaited us—alas! and disappointment also. The Tiberio was in mourning; the lady of the spyglass was no more; the brothers of the Misericordia had borne her to her long home—a home which, in her case, was about as broad as it was long. Pepino was banished; even then he strutted his brief hour in brilliant Naples looking for a job. "Little Jay" was broken in health; the transmigrating T. had changed his spots and lorded it in Rome. Vesuvius was frosted to the knees; the wind was nipping and eager; I felt the approach of winter in my bones. Was it any wonder that we all hardened our hearts, settled our bills, and departed?

From Naples we looked back and saw a glory upon the cliffs beyond the sea, but depreciated it with one accord; for the light of other days was fairer, and there was the shadow of new graves in this afterglow. We looked again; a great cloud was moving upon the face of the waters; the island had been spirited away, and too late I remembered that we had neglected to ring in Buchanan Reid's never to be avoided couplets, beginning:

"My soul to-day
Is far away,
Sailing the Vesuvian Bay.

With dreamful eyes
My spirit hies—"

But not to-day, pretty Versicles; come again to you, when we are less sad.

L'ASSOMMOIR--THE LOADED BLUDGEON.

Emile Zola's Famous French Novel.

TRANSLATED FOR THE ARGONAUT BY J. C. WARD.

Three weeks afterward, at about half-past eleven, on a fine day, Gervaise and Coupeau, the zinc-worker, were eating brandy-plums together at "L'Assommoir" of Père Colombe. Coupeau, who was smoking a cigarette on the sidewalk, had forced her to enter as she was crossing the street on returning from carrying home her clothes; and her great square clothes-basket was on the floor near her, and just behind the little zinc-covered table.

"L'Assommoir" of Père Colombe was at the corner of the Rue des Poissonniers and the Boulevard of Rochechouart. The sign bore, in long blue letters, the single word: DISTILLATION. At each side of the door, in half barrels, were two dusty rose laurels. The enormous counter, with its rows of glasses, its fountain, and its tin measures, stretched out to the left as one entered; and the large room was ornamented on all sides with big casks, painted bright yellow, and shining with their brass hoops and grooves and varnish. On the shelves above them bottles of liqueurs, jars of fruit, and all sorts of vials in good order, hid the walls, and reflected in the glass their bright tints of apple-green, pale gold, or tender lake colors. But the great curiosity of the house was at the end, on the other side of an oak railing, and shut in by glass: the distilling apparatus that the consumers could see working—the still with its long, serpentine neck descending below—a devil's kitchen, before which drunken workmen came to dream.

At this hour in the morning "L'Assommoir" was generally empty. A large man of about forty, Père Colombe, in a waistcoat with sleeves, was waiting upon a child of ten, who waited ten sous worth of spirits in a cup. A ray of sunshine entered through the door and dried the room, always damp from the spitting of the smokers. And from the counter the casks in the room sent forth a liquorish odor, an alcoholic fume, which seemed to thicken and intoxicate the very dust flying in the sun.

Coupeau was rolling up another cigarette. He was cleanly dressed in a frock and a little cap of blue linen, and showed his white teeth when he smiled. His under jaw protruded a little, and his nose was rather flat, but he had fine chestnut eyes, and the face of a happy dog, and a very good fellow. His thick curly hair stood right up, and he still retained the delicate skin which belonged to his twenty-six years. Before him was Gervaise, in waist of black orleans, with her head bare, just finishing her plum, which she held by the stem. They were near the street, at the first of four tables ranged along the casks before the counter. When the zinc-worker had lighted his cigarette, he placed his elbows on the table, pushed forward his face, and looked for an instant at, without speaking to, the young woman, whose pretty blonde face on that morning certainly had the creamy transparency of fine porcelain. Then alluding to something known only to themselves, and already discussed, he asked simply in a half tone:

"So it's no? You say no?"

"Oh, very surely no, Monsieur Coupeau," replied Gervaise, smiling quietly. "May be you will not speak to me about it here. You promised, too, to be reasonable. If I had known I should have refused your treat."

He did not reply, but continued to look at her closely, with great tenderness, which seemed even passionate to judge by the corners of his lips—little corners of a pale rose color, somewhat moist, and which allowed the rich red of the mouth to appear whenever he smiled. She did not draw back, however, but remained placid and affectionate. After a little pause she said again:

"You don't think of it, really. I am an old woman, I am. I have a big boy eight years old. What should we do together?"

"Pardi!" whispered Coupeau, winking his eyes, "what others do."

She looked annoyed.

"Ah! if you think it is amusing? One sees you've never kept house. No, Monsieur Coupeau, I must think of more serious things. La rigolade leads to nothing, do you hear! I have two mouths to be filled at the house, and they eat a great deal, you may depend! And then, too, my misfortune has been a famous lesson to me. You know, as for the men, I don't care for them now. They won't catch me again for a long while."

She spoke without anger, and with intelligence, and as coolly as though, in talking about work, she was giving the reasons which prevented her from putting starch on a neckerchief. One could see that she had come to her conclusion after mature reflection.

Coupeau, affected by what she said, repeated: "You give me a great deal of pain, a great deal of pain."

"Yes, so I see," returned she, "and I am sorry for you, Monsieur Coupeau. You must not feel hurt. If I wanted to amuse myself, it would be rather with you than another. You look like a good fellow, and you are kind. I don't put on the air of a princess, and I don't say it might not have happened. Only what's the use when I don't want to? I have been at Madame Fanconier's since a fortnight. The little ones go to school, I work, and I am content. Hey? the best thing to do is to remain as one is." And she stooped to take up her basket. "You make me talk; they are waiting for me at mistress's. You'll find another, you will, Monsieur Coupeau, prettier than I, and who'll not have two brats to drag around after her."

He looked at the bull's-eye framed in the mirror, and made her sit down again, saying:

"Wait a moment; it's only twenty-five minutes past eleven; I have still thirty-five minutes. You are not afraid of me—the table is between us. Ah, you detest me so that you can't have a little talk with me."

She put down her basket again, not to disoblige him, and they talked like friends. She had breakfasted before she had gone with the clothes; and he had eaten his soup quickly so as to come and watch for her. Gervaise, while she answered, suddenly looked out of the window between the jars of fruit to see the passing in the street, where the breakfast had made an extraordinarily pressing crowd. On the sidewalks, where the houses were crowded together, there was a hurrying of feet, a swinging of arms, and a jolting of bodies. The late ones among the workmen who had been kept at work, with disagreeable expressions of hunger, shot across the pavements with great strides and entered the baker's together, and when they reappeared with a pound of bread under their arms, they went three doors above to the Veau à deux têtes to eat their six sous' allowance. Besides the baker's there was also a fruiterer's, who sold fried potatoes and muscles with parsley; and there was a contional denife of workwomen in long aprons carrying cornets of potatoes and muscles in cups; others—pretty, bare-headed girls of delicate appearance—bought bundles of radishes. When Gervaise leaned over she perceived the shop of a pork butcher full of people, from whence children came holding in their hands a breaded cutlet, a sausage, or a bit of hot black pudding, enveloped in greasy papers. The whole length of the walk was sticky with black mud, even in fine weather, from the tramping of the marching crowd. Some of the workmen already left the eating houses and descended in bands, talking, with their hands beating their thighs. They were heavy with food, and went on quietly and slowly in the midst of the joltings of the crowd. A group of them was standing at the door of "L'Assommoir."

"Say, Bibi-la-Grillade," asked a thick voice, "do you pay a treat of rot-gut?"

And five workmen entered and stood around.

"Ah, thief of a Père Colombe!" said the same voice, "we want some of the old kind, and not in nut-shells; fair glasses, you know."

Père Colombe quietly served them. And then three more arrived. Little by little the blouses concentrated at the angle of the sidewalk, but ended by pushing into the room between the rose laurels gray with dust.

"You are stupid!" said Gervaise to Coupeau. "Certainly I loved him. Only, after the disgusting manner in which he left me—"

They were talking of Lantier. Gervaise had not seen him again. She thought he was living with Virginie's sister at the Ice House, and with the friend who was to get up a hat factory. But she did not intend to run after him. It had at first given her so much pain that she even wanted to drown herself, but now she had reasoned with herself, and all had seemed better. May he with Lantier she might never have been able to bring up the little ones, for he spent so much. He might call and kiss Claude and Etienne, and she wouldn't show him the door. Only for herself she would be cut to pieces before she allowed him to touch the ends of her fingers. And she said it like a resolute woman having her plan of life well marked out. While as to Coupeau, he joked and asked broad questions about Lantier so pleasantly with his white teeth that she did not think of feeling hurt.

"Ah, you beat him," said he, finally. "Oh, you are not good. You whip people."

She interrupted him with a loud laugh. It was true, yes, that she had whipped Virginie's great carcass. That day she could have strangled some one with a good heart, and she laughed louder because Coupeau told her that Virginie, mortified by what had happened, had left that quarter—her face, however, preserving an infantile sweetness all the time. She put forth her plump hands, saying she would not hurt a fly; she only knew about blows from having received lots of them in her life. Then she began to talk of her youth in Plassans. She was not a gad-about at all; the men bothered her. When Lantier took her at fourteen she thought it nice, because he called himself her husband, and she thought she was playing housekeeping. Her only fault, she assured him, was being too sensitive, loving all the world, and going distracted over people who gave her afterward so much trouble. So when she loved a man, she did not think of nonsense; she dreamed only of living always very happily with him. And as Coupeau giggled and talked of her two children, whom she certainly had not placed to hatch under the coop, she stretched forth her hand and slapped his fingers, and added that very surely she was built on the same pattern as other women. Women thought of their homes and worked like everything in the house. She took after her mother, who was a great worker, and who died in harness, after serving Papa Macquart like a pack-horse for more than twenty years. She was more delicate, for her mother had shoulders big enough to burst the doors as she passed through, but that did not hinder. She resembled her in her strong love for people. And if she was a little lame, she received that, too, from the poor woman whom Père Macquart beat unmercifully.

"Oh, that's hardly anything; it's hardly seen," said Coupeau, gallantly.

She shook her head; she knew that it did show, and that at forty she would break up completely. Then gently, with a slight laugh, "You've queer taste to love a lame woman."

Then he, with his elbows on the table, pushed his face further forward, complimenting her, risking words which might turn her head, but she only shook it, without being tempted, and yet seemed pleased with that wheedling voice. She listened while looking out of doors, and appeared to be interested anew in the increasing crowd. Now they began to sweep the empty stores; the fruiterer withdrew his last frying-pan of potatoes, while the pork merchant put in order the upset plates on his counter. From all the eating shops bands of workmen went forth. The great bearded fellows pushed and slapped each other—playing like boys, the blows from their heavy nailed shoes crushing the pavement as they slid along; some, with both hands in the bottoms of their pockets, were smoking with reflective air—their eyes winking in the sun. The sidewalks and the pavements were covered, and streams of them came from the open doors, stopping in the midst of the carriages, making a sight of blouses, frocks, and old overcoats, all faded and discolored in the bright light which filled the street.

The factory bells began to ring, but the workmen did not hurry. They relit their pipes, and with stooping backs, after going from one wine-store to the other, decided to take the road to the factory. And now Gervaise noticed three—one tall and two short ones—who turned around at every few paces, and ended by coming down the street straight to "L'Assommoir" of Père Colombe.

"Ah, well," said she, "I am sure there are three do-nothings."

Coupeau answered. "I know the tall one. He is an acquaintance. It's Mes-Bottes."

"L'Assommoir" was full now, and the talking was louder. Blows on the counter at times made the windows shake, and standing up, with hands crossed upon their bellies or behind their backs, the drinkers pressed one against the other in little groups. Some near the casks had to wait a quarter of an hour before Père Colombe could serve them.

"How! There's that aristo Cadet-cassis!" cried Mes-Bottes on applying a rude tap to Coupeau's shoulder. "A pretty gentleman, who smokes paper and wears linen! We want to make his acquaintance, and will pay for the sweet-meats."

"Hey? Don't trouble me," replied Coupeau, much put out.

But the other tittered: "Enough! He's on his high horse—the good man."

"Muffs will be muffs—there!"

The man turned his back, after having squinted terribly at Gervaise. She drew back a little frightened. The smoke of the pipes, the strong odor of all these men, circulating in that air charged with alcohol, suffocated her, and she was taken with a slight cough.

"Oh! it's wretched to drink," said she, in a low tone.

And she told how formerly with her mother she drank anisette at Plassans, but she nearly died one day, and that had disgusted her; she could not look at liquor now.

"Look," added she, showing her glass, "I have eaten my plum but I leave the juice because it would make me sick to drink it."

Coupeau said he also could not understand how they could drink full glasses of brandy. A plum here and there, that was not so bad. As for the brandy, and absinthe, and the other trash, good-bye to them. He did not want them. His comrades might talk, he remained at the door when those cheulards entered the pepper-mine. Papa Coupeau, who was a zinc-worker like himself, had fallen from the gutter of No. 25 and broken his head on the pavement of Rue Coquenard, when he was on a spree, and that reminder had made them wiser in their family. Whenever he passed through Rue Coquenard and saw that spot, he would sooner drink gutter-water than take a dram for nothing at the wine merchant's. Concluding with: "In our trade one wants solid legs."

Gervaise had taken her basket again. She did not rise, however, but held it on her knees. Her looks seemed lost and dreamy, as though the words of the young workman had awakened in her the far-off thoughts of a new existence, and she said again, slowly and without apparent transition:

"Mon Dieu! I am not ambitious; I don't ask much. My idea would be to work quietly, to eat bread every day, to have a room neat enough to sleep in, you know; a bed, a table, and two chairs—not more. Ah! I would also bring up my children so as to make good subjects of them, if possible. There is yet one other thing in my ideal, which would be not to be beaten if I ever kept house again—no, I shouldn't like to be beaten. And that's all; you see, that's all."

She seemed to question herself, and could find nothing serious to add, but continued after some hesitation:

"Yes, one may also wish to die in one's bed. After having worked all my life, I would much like to die in my bed, and in my home."

She arose. Coupeau, who well approved of all she had said, was standing up, a little troubled about the time. But they did not go out immediately; she was curious to go and see back of the oaken railing, the great still of red copper which worked under the clear glass in the little yard; and the zinc-worker, who had examined it, explained how it went, indicating with his finger the different pieces of the machine, and showing the enormous horn from whence fell a limpid stream of alcohol. The still, with its recipients of strange form, its serpentines without end of pipe, had a sombre look. No smoke escaped; hardly could one hear an internal blow, or a subterranean rumble. It was like a work of the night, made in full day by a sad, mute, but powerful workman.

Mes-Bottes, accompanied by his two companions, came up and leaned on the railing, waiting until a corner of the counter was free. With the look of a starved chicken he shook his head, and, gazing on the intoxicating machine, he said: "Tonnerre de Dieu! It is very nice! There is in that big copper drum enough to keep the throat cool for a week." He wished they would solder the end of the serpentine to his teeth, so that he could feel the brandy filling him while hot, going down, down to his heels—always, like a little spring. Dame! he would never more be troubled; that would nicely take the place of the dice of that old horse Père Colombe. And the comrades tittered, saying that "that animal of a Mes-Bottes had sense enough, after all."

The still, deafly, without flame, without anything cheering in the extinct reflections of its coppers, continued to let its sweat of alcohol drip, like a slow, stubborn spring, which in the long run would invade the hall, spread out over the outer boulevards, and in time inundate even that immense hole, Paris itself.

Then Gervaise shuddered and drew back, and tried to smile as she said in low tones:

"It's stupid but that machine makes me cold; drink makes me cold." Then recalling the idea of perfect happiness, which she had been thinking over, she said: "Hey? Isn't it? It's better to work, work; eat bread, and have a room belonging to one, to bring up one's children, and die in one's bed."

"And not be beaten," added Coupeau gayly. "But I wouldn't beat you. If you only would, Madame Gervaise; there's no danger, I never drink; and then I love you too much."

He had lowered his voice and spoke in her ear, while she, with basket before her, opened her way through the men. But again she shook her head no, and at several different times—and yet she would smile and seem happy to know that he did not drink. At last they gained the door and went out. L'Assommoir remained full behind them. The noise of hoarse voices came even to the street, as did the liquorish odor of the treats of brandy. Mes-Bottes could be heard treating Père Colombe as though he were a bundle of old clothes, accusing him of only half filling his glass. He was a good fellow, a chouette, a bully boy. Ah, tut! the monkey might scrape, he wouldn't return to the shop he had flemme; and he proposed to his comrades to go to the Petit bonhomme qui tousse, a pepper mine of the Barrière Saint Denis, where one drank du chien pure.

"Ah, now one can breathe again," said Gervaise, once on the sidewalk. "Eh, well! good-bye. Thank you, Monsieur Coupeau. I'm going home as quick as I can." She was going to follow the boulevard, but he had taken her hand, and did not let go, saying:

"Come with me. Pass through the Rue de la Goutte d'Or; that's not much out of your way. I must go to my sister's before I return to the scaffolding. We'll go together."

She ended by accepting his proposal, and they went slowly up the Rue des Poissonniers side by side without taking hold of arms. He spoke to her of his family. His mother, Mamma Coupeau, an old waistcoat-maker, kept house because her eyes failed her. She was sixty-two years old the third of the last month. He was the youngest child. One of his sisters, Madame Lerat, a widow of thirty-six years, worked in flowers and lived in Rue des Moins aux Batignolles; the other, aged thirty, had married a chain maker, that pince-sans-rire of a Lorilleux. It was there that he was going, Rue de la Goutte d'Or. She lodged in the big house at the left. Every night he ate his pot-bouille at the Lorilleux's; it was an economy for all three. He was going there to tell them not to expect him, as he was invited out by a friend that evening.

Gervaise, who listened to him, cut him short by asking him, smiling: "So they call you Cadet-cassis, Monsieur Coupeau?"

"Oh!" answered he, "that's a nickname that the boys have given me because I generally take black currant (cassis) when they force me to go to the wine merchant's. It's as well to be called Cadet-cassis as Mes-Bottes, isn't it?"

"Very certain. Cadet-cassis isn't ugly," declared the young woman.

And she interrogated him about his work. He was always working there, behind the Octroi wall, at the new hospital. Oh, work was never wanting. He wouldn't certainly quit that staging for a year. There were metres and metres of gutters to be put up.

"You know," said he, "I see the Hôtel Boncœur when I am over there. Yesterday you were at the window. I made my arms go, but you didn't see me."

They had gone one hundred steps in the Rue de la Coutte d'Or before he stopped, when, raising his eyes, he said:

"There! that's the house. I was born farther along at No. 22. But that house there makes a pile of mason work. It's as big as a barrack inside."

Gervaise looked up and examined the façade. On the street the house had five stories, and each story fifteen windows, whose dark blinds with broken slats gave an air of ruin to the immense face of the wall. Four shops occupied the basement; at the right of the door was the vast hall of a greasy eating-house, and at the left a charcoal merchant's, a haberdashery, and an umbrella store. The house seemed all the more colossal from rising between two small and shabby constructions which were stuck against it; and square as a block of mortar, coarsely botched, rotting and crumbling under the rain, its enormous rough cube was profiled on the blue sky above the neighboring roofs. Its rough cast mud-colored sides were of an interminable nakedness like the walls of a prison, and its ranges of stepping-stones seemed decaying jaws gaping into the void. But Gervaise looked most at the door, an immense one stretching up to the second story, cutting a deep porch in the wall, beyond which she saw the pale light of a large yard, and in the middle of it, paved as it was like the street, ran a stream of rose-tinted water.

"Come in," said Coupeau; "they won't eat you."

But Gervaise said that she would wait for him in the street. And yet she could not help going under the porch up to the concergerie's lodge, which was on the right; and there at the sill she again raised her eyes. On the interior the façades had six stories, shutting in the vast square of the yard. The gray walls were eaten by a yellow mould, striped with seams by the dripping from the water-pipes which went up straight from the pavement to the slates without a break; the waste water-pipes alone were elbowed at the stories where the open boxes left the stains of their rusty iron. Windows without blinds showed the naked glass, of a high green color. From some open ones, blue check mattresses were hanging and airing, and before others clothes were drying on stretched cords: all the wash of a family—men's shirts, women's frocks, boys' drawers. From high to low the too small lodgings were emptied outside, letting bits of their misery appear at every chink. Below, clearing each façade, was a high, narrow door without wood-work cut into the plaster or dug out of it, a creviced vestibule, at the bottom of which turned the muddy steps of stairs with iron railings. And one counted thus four flights, indicated by the four first letters of the alphabet painted on the wall. The basements were arranged in immense rooms, closed in by glass black with dust. The forge of a locksmith was flaming there, and one heard farther on the planing of a carpenter, while near the lodge the laboratory of a dyer threw out that stream of tender rose color, which passed through the porch. The yard, dirty with pools of colored water, with shavings, with coal cinders, with grass between its disjointed pavements, was lighted by a light so dim that it seemed to be divided by the line where the sun stopped. On the shady side near by the fountain, whose spout made it always damp, three little chickens scratched the ground, seeking worms with their muddy feet. Gervaise, slowly looking from the sixth story to the pavement and back again, was surprised at its immensity. She felt herself in the midst of a living organ, like the heart of a great city, and became as interested in the house as though a giant were before her.

"Does madame want any one," cried the puzzled concergerie, as she appeared at the door of the lodge.

But the young woman explained that she was only waiting for some one. She turned toward the street; then, as Coupeau didn't come, she returned to look again. The house did not seem ugly to her. There were gay spots smiling among the rags which hung at the windows. A gillyflower was blooming in a pot, and there was a cage of canaries from which sweet warblings came, and shaving glasses were casting bright, round stars into the shadows. Below a carpenter was singing, accompanied by the regular whistling of his plane; while in the workshop of the locksmith there was the silvery ring of hammers, all beating in time. At nearly all the open windows in the midst of the miserable surroundings, children showed their dirty but smiling faces, and women were sewing with their calm profiles leaning over their work. These were the after breakfast duties, and in the midst of the empty rooms of the workmen, the house was entering into its great peace, disturbed only by the noise of the trades, and of their continued refrain, which was repeated for hours. The yard was a little damp. If Gervaise had lived there she would have liked a lodging at the back, near the sun. She had taken five or six steps within and had breathed that insipid smell of the houses of the poor—the smell of old dust and rancid filth; but, as the sharper odor of the dye waters prevailed, she thought it smelt better there than at Hôtel Boncœur. And she already chose her window at the left hand corner, where there was a little box planted with Spanish beans, whose thin sprigs were already beginning to creep around a trellis work of strings.

"I kept you waiting, hey?" said Coupeau, whom she suddenly heard near her. "There's always a time when I don't dine with them; and more to-day, as my sister had bought some veal for dinner."

As she still had her surprised look, he continued, casting his eyes over the building:

"You were looking at the house. It's always rented from top to bottom. I think there must be three hundred lodgers in it. If I had had furniture I should have looked for a little room, for one could be well here, couldn't he?"

"Yes, one could be very well here!" said Gervaise; "at Plassans it was not so thickly settled in our whole street. Look, isn't it nice at that window in the fifth story where the beans are?"

Then, with his obstinacy, he asked her if they shouldn't rent there. But away she went, hurrying under the porch, and begging him not to begin his nonsense again. But Coupeau, in leaving her before Madame Fanconner's shop, was able to retain her hand in his, after she had offered it to him in a friendly way.

The good terms between the young woman and the zinc-worker continued for a month. He thought her so courageous when he saw her killing herself with work, looking after the children, and still finding time at night to sew on all sorts of things. Some women were untidy; but, sacré matin! she did not resemble them; she took life seriously. Then she laughed and defended herself modestly. Unfortunately, she had not always been so wise. Experience had corrected her a little, that was all. They were wrong to think that she had a strong will; she was very weak, on the contrary; she allowed herself to go wherever she was pushed, for fear of giving some one pain. Her dream was to live in company with honest people, because bad society, said she, was like the blow of a club, which broke one's head, and laid a woman out in less than no time. She felt that a cold sweat came over her when she thought of the future, and she compared herself to a sou thrown in the air, and falling head or tail, according to the unevenness of the pavement. All she had yet seen—the bad examples spread out before her eyes as a child—had given her a good lesson. But Coupeau joked her about her gloomy ideas, and restored her spirits by trying to pinch her sides. She pushed him away and slapped his hands, while he cried out, laughing, that for a weak woman she was not so easily overcome. He, rigoleur, did not trouble himself about the future. The days came and went, parti! One could always have a nest and a crust. That quarter seemed very nice to him, excepting the drunkards, of whom they might relieve the gutters of at least one half. He wasn't a bad devil, and sometimes could talk sense. He had a speck of gallantry, parted his hair carefully, and had handsome cravats and a pair of patent leather shoes for Sundays. With that, and with the address and impudence of a monkey, and the deep-throated drollery of a Parisian workman, full of bajoue, he was charming—take his word for it. Both had finished by offer of services at the Hôtel Boncœur. Coupeau was going to get her milk for her. He charged himself with all her errands, and carried her bundle of clothes. Often of an evening, as he came first from work, he took the children to walk on the outer boulevards. Gervaise, to return his kindness, went up to the narrow room where he lodged and looked after his clothes, putting but tons on his overalls and mending his linen jackets. A great intimacy was established between them. She was not annoyed to have him there; was amused with the songs he brought, and with his continual faubourg talk so new to her. He, from always being at her heels, became more deeply interested in and more taken with her. Though he continued to laugh, he was so uneasy, so constrained, that it ceased at last to be amusing.

Toward the end of June Coupeau lost his spirits. He felt upside down. Gervaise, troubled by his looks, barricaded herself at night. Then, after a pouting spell, which lasted from Sunday to Tuesday, all at once, on Tuesday night, he came and knocked at her door. It was about eleven o'clock, and she didn't want to open it, but his voice was so soft and so trembling that she ended by removing the bureau which she had pushed against the door. When he entered she thought he was unwell, so pale did he look, with his red eyes and marble face. He remained standing, stammering and shaking his head. No, no, he was not sick, but had been crying for two hours up in his room; he cried like a child, biting his pillow-case so that his neighbors might not hear him. For three nights he had not slept. He could not continue in that way.

"Listen, Madame Gervaise," said he, his throat choking so that his tears almost came again; "this must finish, mustn't it? We will marry. I want to; I am decided."

Gervaise showed great surprise, and said, very seriously: "Oh, Monsieur Coupeau, what are you talking of! I never asked that, you know it well. That wouldn't do, that's all. Oh, no, no! it is serious now; reflect, I beg of you."

But he continued shaking his head with an air of determined resolution. He had reflected. He came down because he wanted to pass a good night. She couldn't let him go up to cry again, may be. As soon as she said yes, he would torment her no longer. She could go to sleep quietly. He only wanted simply to hear her say yes, and then they could talk it all over the next day.

"Very certainly I shan't say yes in that way," replied Gervaise. "I don't want you to say afterward that I made you do a stupid thing. Do you see, Monsieur Coupeau, you are wrong in being so obstinate. You don't yourself know what you feel for me. If you would stop seeing me for a week it would pass, I bet. Men often marry, and then the days get longer for all one's life, and then they get annoyed. Sit down, I want to talk to you now."

There, until one o'clock in the morning, in the dark room, by the smoky light of a candle which they forgot to snuff, they discussed their marriage, lowering their voices so as not to awaken the children, Claude and Etienne, who were sleeping, gently breathing on the same pillow. And Gervaise went to them often, to show them to Coupeau. That was a funny dowry she brought him; she could not really encumber him with the two brats. Then she was taken with shame on his account. What would they say in that quarter? They knew her history; it would hardly be proper for them to see them marry before two months had passed. To all these good reasons, Coupeau replied by shrugging his shoulders. He didn't care for the quarter! He didn't put his nose in other people's affairs. Eh, well! yes, she had had Lantier before him. But she didn't live fast. As for the children, they would grow, and they would bring them up, parbleu! He would never find so smart a woman, so good a one, one more full of good qualities. Besides, that was not all, she might have rolled on the sidewalk, have been ugly, lazy, disgusting—have had a lot of dirty children, that wouldn't have counted in his eyes. He wanted her. "Yes," I want you, repeated he, striking his fist on his knee with repeated blows. "You understand, I want you. There's nothing to be said to that, I think."

Gervaise was yielding little by little. A weakening of heart and senses was coming over her in the midst of the desire with which she felt that she was being enveloped. She hazarded only timid objections, while her hands fell on her skirts and her face seemed bathed in sweetness. Out of doors, through the half opened window, the beautiful June night sent in its warm breath and blew the candle whose red wick was burning high. In the great silence of the sleeping quarter was heard only the child-like cries of a drunkard lying on his back in the middle of the boulevard; while from afar, at the bottom of some restaurant, a violin was playing a lively quadrille at some belated ball—a little crystalline music, neat and clear as the tones of a harmonica. Coupeau, finding that the young woman was at the end of her arguments, silent, and smiling vaguely, seized her hands and drew her toward him. She was in one of those moments of weakness in which she so much mistrusted herself, and was really too much affected to refuse anything. But the zinc worker did not understand that she was giving herself away; he was content to squeeze her hands so as to hurt them, when taking possession; and both gave forth sighs at the gentle pain in which their tenderness was hardly satisfied.

"You say yes—don't you?" asked he.

"How you torment me!" murmured she. "You wish it? Well, yes. Mon Dieu! it may be that we are committing a great folly."

He got up and took her by the waist, giving her haphazard a rude kiss on her face. Then, as the kiss made a loud noise, he became uneasy, looked at Claude and Etienne, walked on tip toe, and, lowering his voice, said:

"Chut! Let us be wise. We mustn't wake the little ones, but will talk to-morrow, then."

And he went up to his chamber. Gervaise, all trembling, remained for an hour seated on the side of her bed, without thinking of undressing, and was touched when considering how honest Coupeau was. The drunkard under the window below now gave forth the harsh plaint of an animal who was lost, and the violin at the far off ball became silent.

The preparation of the new Bible, which is to be inspired by sweet reasonableness, has not made much advance yet. We lay before our readers the improved version of the first chapter of the book of Genesis:

1. There never was a beginning. The Eternal, without us that maketh for righteousness, took no notice whatever of anything.
2. And Cosmos was homogeneous and undifferentiated, and somehow another evolution began and molecules appeared.
3. And molecules evolved protoplasm, and rhythmic thrills arose, and then there was light.
4. And the spirit of energy was developed and formed the plastic cell whence arose the primordial germ.
5. And the primordial germ became protogene, and the protogene somehow shaped eozone; then was the dawn of life.
6. And the herb yielding seed and the fruit tree yielding fruit after its own kind, whose seed is in itself, developed according to its own fancy. And the Eternal, without us that maketh for righteousness, neither knew nor cared anything about it.
7. The cattle after his kind, the beast of the earth after his kind, and every creeping thing became involved by heterogeneous segregation and concomitant dissipation of motion.
8. So that by the survival of the fittest there evolved the simiads from the jelly fish, and the simiads differentiated themselves into the anthropomorphic primordial types.
9. And in due time one lost his tail and became man, and behold he was the most cunning of all animals; and lo, the fast men killed the slow men, and it was ordained to be so in every age.
10. And in process of time, by natural selection and survival of the fittest, Matthew Arnold, Herbert Spencer, and Charles Darwin appeared, and behold it was very good.

Nobody except the people in the front pews last Sunday, and only the few there who listened very intently, could hear the tenor when the choir started out on "When I can read my title clear," singing very distinctly, with his face turned toward the leader at the other end of the organ:

"I've lost my place; I'm in a fix;
What ever shall I do?"

And then the leader in his profoundest bass replied in faultless tune and meter:

"The tune is on page ninety-six,
The words on forty-two."

At the close of the sermon the minister began. Raising his voice, he said: "Judgment, judgment, small boy near the vestibule shouted: 'Out on

CHEERFUL HARRY.

And How He Imposed Upon a Very Bad Man.

BY E. H. CLOUGH.

Whenever Eel River Dan went on a "tear" consternation reigned in Pilot City. As soon as his strident whoop began to resound through the redwoods surrounding the village the citizens hushed their murmurings at lesser evils and silently skulked to their cabins, there to listen, with bated breath, for the first sounds of warfare sure to follow Dan's arrival in the town. Oftentimes the guileless stranger, unacquainted with the truculent ruffian's "record," was the victim; but as a general rule it was some obstinate lumberman, who sacrificed himself for more timid men. It was a singular fact, that no matter how peaceably inclined Pilot City might be, at the moment Eel River Dan came down from his mountain home, "on a time," somebody had to suffer. He was "bad" in the most literal sense of the word, and there were but few who dared approach him after he had "declared" himself and "turned himself loose." But on this particular occasion—this bleak, windy day in February, when the principal inhabitants of Pilot City had gathered around the glowing stove that warmed the somewhat contracted limits of the Raftsmen's Home—the gayly chattering congregation had received no intimation of the approach of the mountain desperado. Not a single whoop had he uttered as he strode through the sighing pines, not a yell announcing his coming had been heard by the peaceful residents of Pilot City, and when the gigantic frame of the "terror" darkened the door of the Home a thunderbolt would not have produced as much genuine surprise, not to call it astonished apprehension, in the breasts of those present as did the appearance of Eel River Dan. For an instant the assemblage sat petrified. Then there was a fluttering movement, and Big Mike, the boom band, made a break for the rear door. The others only waited to satisfy themselves that Dan was "on it." This important doubt having been dissipated, and the conclusion arrived at that the mountaineer was in an unusually disagreeable frame of mind, the remainder of the company withdrew—rather precipitately it must be confessed, but with sufficient order and regularity to escape injury in the crush at the side door.

As soon as the last boot heel had passed over the threshold Dan smiled—it was not a very sardonic smile, to be sure, but notwithstanding its sardonic character there could be no mistaking it for a frown or a scowl of displeasure. With the grimace still irradiating his bloated features the desperado passed behind the bar, and with a freedom peculiar to his loose habits, grasped the demijohn containing an unusually ardent article of lumberman's solace. Throwing the jug deftly into the hollow of his right arm, he poured the yellow distillment into a glass which he held in his left hand, allowing the liquid to mark four fingers before he threw the muzzle up and returned the demijohn to its shelf beneath the bar. He contemplated the contents of the glass for a moment, held it up to the light, smacked his lips in anticipation of the joy it was about to confer upon him, and then placed the edge of the tumbler gingerly to his mouth as if he would prolong the delight of feeling it trickle down his copper-plated throat into his sheet-iron stomach. Inch by inch his ruby nose went upward, drop by drop the whisky flowed downward. The last globule had just passed between his teeth, when his fiery red eyes, glancing through the bottom of the glass, fell upon an object, the sight of which seemed to paralyze him. He could not believe his senses. He imagined that some defect in the glass through which he was taking his observations must have produced the vision that greeted his gaze. It could not possibly be the form of a man standing there beside the stove! What an idea! What mortal individual would have the hardihood to remain when he, Eel River Dan, the terror of the entire lumber region from Mendocino to Trinity, saw fit to enter a place of resort! Ah! no, it certainly could not be a real, living, flesh and blood, human being; it was probably a straw dummy set up by those d—d hulks that had just left, and the insult thus offered would afford an excuse for a general cleaning out of the whole d—d town. So he placed the glass on the bar, and, leaning upon his elbows, leveled his gaze still more intently upon that "dummy." Great Cæsar's ghost! it moved. Was it the wind swaying a bundle of clothes stuffed with straw? Or was it—By the great boom that swings over the river Jordan! it rubs its hands. It is a man! Never before, during a career checkered by almost daily surprises, had Eel River Dan ever experienced such a sudden shock of astonishment. For ten seconds by the bar-room clock he was powerless, speechless, well nigh lifeless. Then he raised his hands to his face, and leaned his cheeks upon them while he studied the apparition beside the stove. It was a little man, a hollow-chested, cavern-cheeked, mild-eyed, meek looking man. Pity had never been a distinguishing trait in the composition of Dan's nature, but as he gazed upon this ragged, tormented looking being a feeling akin to sympathy began to usurp the place of surprise in his breast, and it was in a tone almost tinged with kindness that he addressed the sickly vagrant.

"Bin var long?"
"Eh?"
The reply sounded like the gurgling of blood through the sink pipes of a dissecting room.

"Aint bin loafin' 'round thet yar stove more'n a minute or two, hev ye?"

Dan's tone was so insinuating, and his intention to avoid hurting the poor fellow's feelings so evident, that a man with perceptive faculties developed to any degree whatever would have understood the kindly motive. But the rash man at the stove must have been abnormally obtuse, for he gurgled forth the exasperating reply:

"Ever sence those other roosters lit out."
"What!" Dan's eyes were dilated with the intensity of his emotion. Wrath was taking the place of pity.

The little man made no reply, but rubbed his hands and beld them, palms outward, in front of the warm stove.

"Mebbe ye wasn't payin' pertickler 'tention to w'at made me git up an' dust." It was a forced calmness that permeated Dan's manner as he made this last remark.

"Didn't know but w'at ther was a dog fight or somethin' on the street."

"Dog fight or somethin'," sneered Dan, reaching a glass; "mebbe yer not acquainted 'ith me."
"Who're ye?" The man at the stove did not make this inquiry as if he had any particular desire to ascertain the identity of his interlocutor, but gurgled it in a mechanical way, like a phonograph or an automatic talking machine.

"I'm Eel River Dan, stranger, an' I'm bad."
If Dan imagined that this announcement would discompose the vagrant he was mistaken. It had no more effect than so much wind, and the stranger did not even appear to notice the remark.

"D'y'e hear, you cadaverous galoot? I'm Eel River Dan, an' I'm on it bigger'n a wolf."

"Ther's all right—I ain't objectin'."

"You ain't, eh? Well, I don't s'pose ye be, an' w'at's more I ain't intendin' ye shell. Now look yar, stranger, ye say ye think it was a dog fight or somethin' thet clared this yar bar-room a bit ago?"

"Somethin' o' thet kind—I wasn't perticklerly anxious to hustle 'round an' find out, anyhow."

"I b'lieve yer lyin', stranger; but afore I perceed any futh'er 'ith your case, I'll give ye the true bizness: them huskies slid out o' this yar place a 'cause they saw me a comin' in thet yar door over ther—see the door?"

"It's thar I reckon," answered the little man, who had turned his back to the stove, but who did not take the trouble to resume his former position for the purpose of verifying the bad man's assertion that a door absolutely existed in that particular side of the apartment.

"Well, my consumptive friend, 'taint too late fur you to use thet same hole in the wall—you'll be in time to hear how thet dog fight you was speakin' about come out, mebbe, ef yer uncommonly lively."

"Don't keer how it come out," answered the hollow-cheeked individual, in his most woe-begone tone of voice.

"Don't, eh? Yer sure ye don't want to know w'ich dog licked?"

"Ain't bettin' a continental red on nary dog fight jest now, an' ain't a goin' to, nuther." There was a ghost of emphasis in the latter portion of this speech, but it was almost wholly choked by the gloomy sadness of the tone in which it was uttered.

"It's purty rough, blamed ef it ain't," soliloquized Dan, edging around toward the end of the bar. "I'd ez soon tackle a raft o' measley babies, but it's got down to a ground hog case, an' ef I don't do somethin' purty soon the boys 'll be kickin' me from one end o' the county to the other. It's got to be did. Ther's no help for it. I say, sickly, mebbe ye'd like to say a word or two afore it happens."

"W'at happens?"

"Why, w'at's goin' to happen w'en I turn loose."

"Ain't got nuthin' to say."

"Any place, pertickler, ye'd like ter be hauled to arter the matinee?"

"W'at matinee?"

"W'at matinee! The matinee thet's goin' to open up in about one minute by thet yar clock."

"Don't know nuthin' 'bout it."

"You'll know more'n you want to afore I git through 'ith you. Ain't got no friends thet 'd plant ye decently in case the Coroner hed to sit on ye?"

"Nary friend."

"No money?"

"Nary dime."

"Got a name, I s'pose—write it down an' I'll see thet it's spelled right in the papers."

"Cheerful Harry."

"Age?"

"Forty-four."

"Born anywhar?"

"Massouri."

"Bizness?"

"Herdin' sheep."

"Cheerful Harry—forty-four—born in Massouri—sheep herder. Is thet kerrect?"

"Kerrect."

"Mebbe you'd like ter hev a verse or two o' po'try tacked on?"

"W'at fur?"

"Fur a send-off in case ye don't survive. Some folks is ruther pertickler 'bout sich things; didn't know but you was one o' thet kind."

"Nary verse."

"Don't feel like lightin' out, I s'pose?"

"I'm comf'table."

"Are, are ye?"

"Never felt more comf'table in m'life."

By this time Dan had approached very close to the little man, and he appeared to be attempting to stir up latent wrath sufficient to "open the matinee." He hesitated for the last time as he remarked:

"Say, Cheerful, you'd feel a mighty sight cheerfuller ef you was out huntin' up the perticklers o' thet dog fight."

The reply came laden with the very quintessence of contempt:

"You be —!"

There was a sudden outreaching of Eel River Dan's long arm—a ringing crash as the stove pipe came down—a gleam of steel—a blending of two forms—a hoarse bowl of rage and pain—another crash as the blended forms reeled over upon the card table, and through that frail piece of furniture to the floor—more gleaming steel—more hoarse howls of despair and pain—and Cheerful Harry quietly returned to his position beside the stove, unconcernedly wiping a frightful looking knife on his coat sleeve.

Dr. Squills was of the opinion that if Dan could survive the wound under the fourth rib he might, in the course of four or five months, be able to leave his room. Dan did survive the wound under his fourth rib, but nobody saw him leave his room. Dr. Squills was again appealed to, and gave it as his opinion that Eel River Dan, no longer the redoubtable Eel River Dan of yore, had left in the night.

Be that as it may, he never troubled Pilot City again, although he must have been aware of the fact that Cheerful Harry had returned to his pastoral pursuits in the mountains of Trinity.

OAKLAND, June 15, 1879.

The most treacherous memory in the world belongs to the young man with a new watch.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

Sentiment from a lady's album:
"A woman looks upon her husband as a charming being during two months of her life—the month before she marries him, and the month after she buries him."

Three good definitions:
Conviction—An opinion grown stout.
Imprudence—The mother-in-law of safety.
Guignon—Fatality in a dressing gown.

"Zelie, why do you serve up salad without dressing it?"
"Because madame is in mourning for her husband, and I did not think it proper to ornament madame's repast with nasturtiums."

A poetical American concludes a letter addressed to a fashionable young lady with the following brilliant simile:
"I have just returned from a drive in the Bois, where I saw you in your calèche among other fair promenaders. Compared with them you looked like a gas jet surrounded by candles."

These Americans certainly have a peculiar way of expressing themselves.

No dilly-dallying in business:
A street vender was pursuing on the boulevard a gentleman who appeared to be in a great hurry.

"Buy a cane, sir?"
"How much?"
"Twenty francs."
"Twenty sous."
"Take it."

Monsieur Prudhomme to his son, with an air of gravity:
"Allow me to tell you that I consider you to be very cold, exceedingly cold, toward your betrothed."

"How can I help it? She does not speak to me. Besides she is so little."

Monsieur Prudhomme, sententiously:
"You might at least love her in proportion to her size."

An old lawyer meets one of his clients, who is his debtor to a large amount, and who is younger than himself by at least twenty years:

"Give me a call one of these days," he says to him, "so that we may square our little account. I have no wish whatever to settle it with yours heirs."

A pale young thief, who, notwithstanding his boyish appearance, had already arrived at his fiftieth sentence, was again brought up before the Tribunal of Correctional Police.

"Accused," said the President, "you ought to be ashamed to find yourself again here. You would do better to work than to keep such bad company."

"Bad company!" replied the accused in an incredulous tone. "How can you say so? I pass my life among the magistrates."

Certain dietary precautions are imposed on the conductors of omnibuses, owing to their close relations with passengers. It is known, also, that, owing to the nature of their services, the conductor may be called upon at any time to replace a driver who happens to be sick or who has obtained leave of absence.

The other day a conductor was apprised that instead of keeping his usual place behind he would be obliged to take the reins.

"Ah!" he exclaimed, raising his eyes to heaven, with an expression of profound gratitude, "I shall again be able to eat a little garlic!"

During the period of the nocturnal attacks in Paris, Cham, returning home after midnight, was accosted by an individual of rather sinister aspect, who asked alms from him.

"Don't you think that we can postpone all this until tomorrow?" mildly inquired Cham.

"You don't seem to understand me," said the individual, in a threatening tone.

Cham put his hand in his breast pocket.

"I will try to make the matter clear to you," replied Cham.

"This is what I can do for you. I have with me a revolver with six balls. I must keep a few of them for further emergencies. But if you like I will give you three of them."

A mot of Thomas Couture, who died the other day:

Close to his studio was a large room for the use of his pupils. On one occasion the door of communication was thrown open, and one of the pupils ran to him with a scared look—

"Monsieur Couture, what a sad misfortune!"

"What is the matter?"

"The model has had a sudden stroke of apoplexy. We ran to his assistance and found him dead. Come at once!"

"Dead!" exclaimed Couture, while looking at his pupil.

"Dead, you say? I hope you took a sketch of him."

Colino was reading, the other day, the statistics of suicide.

"The means of suppressing, or at least of diminishing, the results of this malady—for suicide is a malady—is of Biblical simplicity," he observed.

"Really?" observed one of the persons present.

"Certainly," he replied. "Let the National Assembly vote a law thus worded: 'Every individual who commits suicide shall be condemned to a year's imprisonment and a thousand francs' fine,' and you will see that before facing death he will look at it twice."

A profession little known:

The director of a charitable society is visited in his office by a well dressed gentleman.

"May I ask," he inquired, "to what I am indebted for the honor of your visit?"

"I have come to offer my services to you. I have raw material (matière première) to propose to you."

"Raw material?"

"Yes, sir. You're the director of a charitable society. I procure subjects to be operated upon. It happens at times that they are not to be found. Je suis courtier en pauvres."

BACHELOR BRIC-À-BRAC.

Have you ever looked into a bachelor's room
In the gloaming 'twixt dinner and pipe,
While he lies on the lounge in a poetic gloom,
And the fruit of his fancy is ripe?

The Angelus-bells, with their musical clang,
Are appealing in vain to his ear;
'Tis the summons to prayer, but he don't care a hang—
The gods that he worships are here.

In his chamber the trophies of battle are stored;
He reckons his scars by the score;
The mammas he enraptured, the daughters he bored,
The mittens, and heartaches galore.

There are cushions of satin, and filigreed mats,
With monograms, ever his own;
There are mouchoir-cases, embroidered cravats,
And frills for his jars of cologne;

There's a tiny slipper he captured by chance
From the queen of the ballet stars;
Its triumphs are over, a truce to romance—
It is sacred to Club House Cigars.

Love-letters are lashed to a broken fan
With a ribbon of faded blue,
From Marie, who married the wrong, wrong man,
And is now a mother—or two.

Some tresses of hair, from raven to gold;
Handfuls of nameless curls;
He may have forgotten the sweethearts of old,
But they're warranted, all of them, girls!

There's a perfumed glove, a fragment of lace,
And the fringe of a silken sash;
Six photographs of a sad, sweet face—
The spoils of his latest masb;

There's a flowing girdle of cardinal red,
That is coiled like the cunning asp—
O sonnet unwritten! O poem unsaid!
It is clasped with a golden clasp.

Of such is the bachelor's bric-à-brac;
Need I tell you what it is for?
It's his pride as he lies with his heart on the rack,
Lazily waiting for war.

From the waters beneath to the heavens above,
My bachelor hero has found
In the wide, wide world there is nothing but love,
And there's more than enough to go round.

SAN FRANCISCO, June, 1879. CHAS. WARREN STODOLAR.

Cleopatra's Protest.

Come nearer, my spotted leopard, and cool with your tongue my hand,
I am faint with a fitful fever, and filled with a fancy grand;
Lie close to my side, and lend me your passion that poison taints,
While I ponder the perjured picture the world of your mistress paints;
The curious life it has painted, and chiseled, and moulded, and sung,
Of Egypt's Cleopatra, in every land and tongue.
On canvas, crystal, china, in bronze, and brass, and gold;
In malachite and marble, on coins and metal old;
In mosaic and murrhine, in coral, copper, clay,
On ivory, and in ebony, in Scotia's granite gray,
In opal, ophtite, onyx, in sapphire, chrysolite,
In topaz, turquoise, jasper, in alabaster white;
In verse, and prose, and ballad, in history manifold,
The face and life of Egypt's queen is drawn, and carved, and told.
In this galaxy of artists, in this gallery of art,
Where chisel, brush, and pen have done their perjured part,
I see nor shade nor shadow, nor sign nor semblance see,
Of her who stood at Actium with Roman Antony;
I fail to find the features, the force, or spirit bold,
Of her who sailed the Cydnus in her galley wrought in gold;
In the character they give me I trace no sign nor mood
Of hers who chose destruction to life of servitude,
Who bared her bosom proudly, and perished like a queen,
Preferring death to Cæsar, and the grave to Roman spleen;
But I see the spiteful venom that guided steel and hand,
And tarnished as it tinted, and poisoned as it planned.
I see the jealous envy that shaped each curve and turn,
Of chisel, brush, and pencil, but naught of truth discern;
And I see what they have made me—I can not help but see—
For what the senseless stone omits is found in history.
The seal they set upon me of sumptuous sin and shame,
They stole from frail Aspasias' brow and Grecian Phryne's name.
I see the perjured picture; I see the wanton vile
They show for Cleopatra—"the Serpent of old Nile;"
And the eager world in earnest the counterfeit accepts,
And down through coming ages the truthful type rejects;
But I scorn to see the semblance in the picture that they draw
Of her who held Rome captive, whose wish was Egypt's law.
I would bid them go, remember that she whom they revile
Spurned the love of laureled Cæsar, when he sought her by the Nile
And offered name, and station, and the sovereignty of Rome,
If she would yield the conquest and say she was his own;
That she sent him back, with others, in their regal robes unmann'd,
Who had come as hopeful suitors for Cleopatra's hand,
And bade them lay their treasures at the feet of one more free
Than the spouse of Rome's Triumvir—the god-like Antony.
I would tell them that the pious prude, Octavia, whom they raise
Upon the highest pinnacle of purity and praise,
Is not worthy of the worship they offer at her shrine,
For she was never Antony's—she always had been mine.
He took her from her regal home to carry out his part,
But never to his bosom, and never to his heart;
And all, all, all of Antony this haughty dame can claim
Is the sacrifice he offered when he gave to her his name;
And he was sworn to me by Eros, beneath the Libyan moon
That he never held her nearer than vial peerless plenitude;
He has sworn it o'er and o'er that their hands had never met,
And that his star in Egypt rose when hers in Rome had set.
I would tell them that Octavia knew his spirit and his heart,
His life, his soul, his destiny, his mind, his every part,
Was moored upon the Nilus together with mine own
Before he ever sought her—by Cæsar's wish alone;
And she knew the gods of Egypt had smiled serenely down
On the union of Rome's consul with Egypt's starry crown.
I would tell them she they blighted with the brand of sin and shame
Would have scorned to call him husband who gave alone his name,
And had that haughty Roman dame the spirit of a dove,
She'd have sent him back to Egypt, to her who owned his love.

I am weary; leave me, leopard; you can not change your skin,
Nor I the haughty spirit I show to all save him;
And I thank the gods of Egypt for the mercy they have shown
In giving me Mark Antony for all, all, all mine own;
And I thank the god of waters for yielding me the tide
That floods the old Nile's bosom where we are side by side,
And to those who call me "Succress," and "Serpent of old Nile,"
And to those who paint me "tigress," and everything that's vile,
I will say, your shafts fall harmless, for we're so wholly one
That when the pulse of one shall cease the other's life is run.
So I banish bitter feelings for all who did malign,
For 'tis but human nature to envy bliss like mine;
And I rain forgiveness on them in pearly perfumed showers,
And tell them that the western world knows naught of love like ours.
—Capital.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

It is not without considerable surprise that I find in the Nation of the 5th inst. a suggestion so entirely at variance with either the musical or general æsthetic standpoint affected by that paper, that I am inclined to suspect its musical editor of having left his work in very incompetent hands while he is having his summer vacation. The writer, in canvassing "the best means of gradually raising ourselves to the rank of a musical nation," suggests that "young men and women should be urged to bestow their time and leisure on the bowed instruments," "with a view to the formation of string-quartet clubs, and the cultivation and study of the purer forms of chamber music," and after adducing several arguments in favor this certainly praiseworthy suggestion proceeds to champion the cause of the now (fortunately) almost forgotten form of operatic potpourri as "a means of elevating the taste of those to whom the highest forms of composition are as yet unintelligible." His argument is as follows: "Amateurs are apt to be discouraged by the inherent difficulties of most chamber music, especially that of Beethoven, Schumann, and Rubinstein. In such cases it is best to leave classic music alone for the time being, and get some of the operatic potpourri for one, two, or three string instruments and piano, published, e. g., in the Edition Peters in a comfortable and very cheap form. Operatic potpourri do not belong to the highest class of music, we grant, but neither do they deserve the supreme contempt which many pedantic music-teachers affect for them." Now, setting aside the suspicion that the critical columns of the Nation are being used to advertise the Peters edition of operatic alla-podrida as unworthy a paper of such excellent general tone, it seems to me that there is here put forward a suggestion utterly pernicious, and based very largely on the most culpable ignorance, not only of the immense repertoire of lighter and easier chamber music, but also of the end to be attained in the cultivation of all music as well as the means to be wisely employed toward attaining it. What this writer may mean by the statement that such arrangements "will serve as a means of elevating the taste of those to whom the highest forms of composition are as yet unintelligible" is something not altogether easy to understand. Surely not that the cultivation of a style of music which is in its very nature utterly devoid of sound logical form, or even æsthetic coherence, is in any way to prepare the student for the study of the legitimate forms or of such compositions as are based upon a sound and natural development of their thematic material? Surely it can not be intended to imply that the study of operatic melodies aimlessly strung together has any, even the remotest, relation to the cultivation of a sound, healthy musical taste? The melodies may be excellent and beautiful in themselves and in their proper place and setting, but so is also a chapter out of Les Misérables or a speech in Egmont. A chromo-lithograph reproduction of a single figure from some dramatic picture may have its interest to one who is familiar with the picture itself, or even a certain attractiveness of its own, but is it on these grounds to be recommended as fit material for study by a young art student? The writer speaks of "the inherent difficulties of most chamber music," and seems to forget—or know nothing of—the mass of such music by Reissiger, Fesca, Meyer, Krause, and other excellent composers, that is neither very difficult to execute or comprehend. The older school, in which the formal construction lies nearer the surface, and is, consequently, easier to analyze and study, has its Dussek, Pleyel, Kuhlau, and others, who have left us much that for the purpose of amateurs is beautiful and interesting, not to mention Haydn himself, many of whose works—especially the earlier ones—present no technical difficulties that amateurs can not overcome, or that they should not be encouraged to grapple with for the sake of the sound musical regimen that will be found in them. The operatic potpourri is a monstrosity, the outgrowth of a depraved, vulgar taste. I say depraved, since I regard it as a feeling founded not at all upon the cultivation or love for music in itself—i. e., the music of the home, properly all chamber music—but a reflected light from the glare and excitement of the music of the theatre, mingled—the lover of it scarcely knows how little or how much—with the remembered spell of this or that voice or personnel, the effect upon the emotions of the situation, the scene, the surroundings. With true music it has nothing in common. Nor can it ever "serve as a means of elevating" any taste, but, accurately the reverse of this, it must necessarily vitiate and utterly deprave the feeling for true art of the impressionable music-maker who to any extent indulges in it. This has always been recognized by the better musicians of every country; none—not one—of the better composers has ever written an operatic potpourri. The arrangement of a single air from an opera will occasionally be found from a master hand, and—to show the extent to which their necessities forced them to yield to vulgar fashion—a few variations on operatic themes by the greatest. But never a potpourri, excepting by those who courted the public for its money, and who at the same time held that public in contempt for an appetite which they were willing to gratify. When the writer in the Nation says that "arranged in an artistic manner they will give pleasure to the most refined musician," I am at a loss to know where or how he has obtained his idea of a "refined musician," and can assure him, as well as my readers, that the diet which he prescribes would be apt to suit the taste of an ignorant musical sensualist or average Italian amateur, rather than a musician of any kind. The taste for potpourri has gone the way of the furore for "brilliant variations" and "descriptive songs"; we have buried it with the souvenirs of our salad days. There, in the name of respectable art, let it rest.

I am sorry to find that I have caused another tempest in a teapot by what I said in last week's issue of the ARGONAUT about the violin playing of Mr. Edouard Remenyi, "virtuoso to his Imperial and Royal," etc. I have heard the steam spout from the numerous minor vents of this ever-ready cauldron—it boils on the slightest provocation—in the form of no end of impertinent inquiries as to what "spite" I have against Mr. Remenyi, what he had done to me that should induce me to "pitch into" him, etc., etc., and I know the thing is boiling. I wish to say, then, that I had no intention whatever of "pitching into" Mr. Remenyi or anybody else, and am not conscious of ever entertaining any such intention. I said about this gentleman's violin playing precisely what (in the light of somewhat of experience in such matters and—what will perhaps be conceded to me—some accurate knowledge of the subject) I supposed to be true, and what I thought it might be useful to the public to know. That my remarks about Mr. Remenyi's playing were perfectly just, and that their correctness will be admitted by competent authority, I am fully convinced. Regarded from any critical standpoint—treated as the work of one who claims to be an artist, and who endeavors to make good that claim by seeking to belittle the good name of a gentleman and artist like Brahms—Remenyi's playing deserves, perhaps, no consideration whatever. But, unless one regarded it (properly enough) as the performance of a mere mountebank, one must tell the truth about it. That Mr. Remenyi has an abundant crop of newspaper notices that read very differently from mine can not concern me. I think I know something of the manner in which these are obtained and by whom they are written. That a large class of the soi-disant professionals disagree with me, and, judging probably from their own manner of treating such matters, ascribe what I have found it necessary to say to "personal malice," etc., is also a matter to which I am perfectly indifferent. As I said before, this is a case for the judgment of competent authority; the gabble about such matters of the loud-mouthed dilettanti may overtake the speech of those who know, but it remains gabble after all. There is a world-wide difference between knowing about a thing and merely talking about it.

It seems as though it were about time that our musical community should begin to discriminate between newspaper criticism and mere newspaper notices. Of the latter they have certainly had their fill any time these past years; the supply is not yet exhausted. It still remains possible for any aspiring tenorino or gasping soprano to get all the "good notices" he or she may desire, by a little clever management or the assistance of some friend who has "influence," and, so long as these notices are understood to emanate from no authority, but are merely the good-natured act of a reporter who does not lay claim to an opinion, I will not say that they do much harm. But such notices are not criticism, nor, as far as I know, do they claim to be such. Precisely what they are supposed to represent I do not know; perhaps about the same thing that is meant by the fadaises that pass current in so-called "good society," where one is compelled to talk, but is indisposed to say anything lest one should not be understood. There are very respectable people and very clever litterateurs who know nothing of music. They are not to blame, nor to be blamed, for it. But certainly when the proprietors of a respectable paper engage for the special work of musical criticism a person who has some knowledge of the subject and a high regard for his art, this musical small-fry that hangs on to the salvage of the profession can not expect that the matter is to be treated from their standpoint, or that it is opinion of the calibre that they accustomed to deal out among themselves and their satellites that is to be dignified with a place in a critical column. The fact is, that in a community in which, like this, the profession is so largely made up of people who have not the remotest claim to a place in it, and where the competent authority (with knowledge and experience) is limited to a meagre half-dozen, criticism necessarily—and naturally—addresses itself to that circle of cultivated amateurs in which music is cultivated as an art and con amore; where, along with somewhat of general culture, there is intelligent study and a genuine love of it; where there are no broad-and-butter considerations dragging it down to the level of a mere money-getter, and no petty meannesses to belittle it; where in short it remains pure, clean, and undefiled. To the real musician my criticism can have no value; my opinion on any given subject, though we may differ on points of taste, etc., must in the main agree with his. To the professional small-fry I do not care to talk. Ignorance is only another term for prejudice, and to this they have generally added an amount of conceit, as well as small personal feeling, that will not permit them to receive fully the judgment of one of whom they know that he has accurate knowledge where they have but a smattering and empty vocabulary. I can not teach them anything—there is no room for that—and hold I myself above argument with them. What I write is for amateurs and students, and is written with the sole view of aiding such in discriminating between the good and bad in art in which the bad has learned how to render itself attractive and to have its praises sung by the full choir of newspaper reporters. This I hold to be my duty; it is certainly a pleasure. But the manufacture of notices and gossip for the edification of this or that member of the profession and his clientèle of friends is neither, and need never be looked for in these columns.

OSCAR WEIL.

Count Telfener, the Italian millionaire, and the brother-in-law of Mrs. J. W. Mackey, has rented from the Roman Government the mausoleum of Augustus, or the Corea, which he proposes to turn into a theatre. He binds himself to expend upon it 570,000 francs, and to pay a rent of 8,000 francs per annum for the first ten years, 10,000 francs per annum for another ten years, and 12,000 francs per annum for a third period of ten years, after which the Corea reverts to the Government. An amphitheatre for equestrian and other spectacles is to be built of wood in the Prati del Castello, over the Tiber, to which the new bridge leads.

Astride a log sat Sam and another sinner, engaged in a little game of seven-up, when a minister approached, who, after a solemn contemplation of the game, laid his hand upon Samuel's shoulder and said: "My friend, is that the way to save your soul?" "Perhaps not," answered Sam, who, having just played a card, was attentively considering the hand; "perhaps not, but it seems about the best thing I can do to save my Jack."

The very latest way to fight a duel, and one of the most satisfactory, has been discovered by the St. Louis Post-Dispatch: "Let each one of the combatants swallow a dose of poison, and then toss up for the emetic."

A NOB HILL ENGAGEMENT.

The reputation of Clarence Hebbard carried more virtue to the square inch than that of any other member of "Gideon's Band." He did not swear, he did not drink, he did not gamble, he did not even smoke; and all his feminine entanglements admitted of drawing-room discussion. Yet the most thoroughly blase of his acquaintance was his nearest confidant, and the correct Hebbard did not always frown at his friend's uncanny wit, nor always cough down his daring suggestiveness. But womenkind, in the abstract, was to Clarence Hebbard a sacred subject. To him all women were virtuous and fair to see; if chance compelled him to notice that certain women were otherwise, he merely said they had unsexed themselves, and dismissed the unpleasant picture. In brief he was a sort of modern Dennis of Burgundy—the demi-hero of that incomparable medieval journey, in the "Cloister and the Hearth." The rustle of approaching frou-frou set his brain a-bubble just as the flutter of a distant farthingale inflamed the ardent heart of Girard's bold comrade.

Hebbard's love affairs had been practically numberless, and not less varied than various; but somehow the barb had always glanced from his buoyant youthfulness, and as yet the iron of actual heart-ache had not entered his butterfly soul. His friends knew his penchant and humored his foible, for the young man's social qualities won him welcome wherever he went; and while matrons smiled indulgently and maidens laughed caressingly, men like Brownwell Brown pulled down their vests, and said frankly:

"He's a deuced sight better off than we, if he is a trifle flaccid."

So when Hebbard nudged Brownie's arm at the California one evening, the senior knew by instinct that his impressive friend had caught the flash of unfamiliar eyes, liked the glitter thereof, and wanted his judgment thereon.

"Where does she sit?" he asked.

"Second row, fourth from the box, hat covered with peacock feathers."

"It is my cousin from Boston, by Judas!" said Brownie, putting down his glass. "She has been in the State nearly a year, and I've not called on her yet. I must find where she is staying to-morrow—they'll never forgive me at home if I don't—pretty late in the day, as it is. I'll present you, if you like."

"Yes, I should like."

"I don't know the people she's with, do you?"

"I don't know the gentleman at her left. That is Miss Fessenden at her right, and Perry Fanytre this side of her, I think you know Fanytre."

"Yes, and know no good of him either. I'll see where she stops to-morrow. I should not have recognized her if I had not seen her photograph at my brother-in-law's, in Vallejo."

The careless pedestrian, who saunters through the park of an afternoon, oblivious of vehicles, and reckless of the hazards which hedge in the rights of the road, is fortunate in his folly if he be not run over. Clarence Hebbard happened to be in the park on the afternoon following the theatre incident already noted above. Undoubtedly the young man's thoughts were more or less romantic, for he arose from his seat near the Villa entrance, and blindly started to cross the drive, just as old John Fanytre's four-in-hand swung around the curve into the stretch. Perry Fanytre was driving, and driving at the rattling "well-in-hand" gait he always affected, a little less than the regulation limit, but fast enough to bowl the mortal into eternity who chanced to happen in the direct plane of its momentum.

The occupants of the approaching vehicle saw Hebbard's danger before he did, and Fanytre—with the laudable desire of escaping the boredom of a trial for manslaughter—attempted to check his horses and shouted to the pedestrian, "Look out!" At that instant Hebbard had reached the middle of the drive, and Fanytre's leaders were less than twenty feet away. A vigorous spring in either direction might have cleared the danger, and under ordinary circumstances the young man would have bottled his dignity and secured the safety of his precious neck. But Fanytre's brusque tone of warning nettled him, for as he glanced towards the sound he noted the shadow of startled dread on a remarkably pretty feminine face, and saw that the lady on the box-seat was the lady he had so admired the night before. Without even measuring with his eye the chances of escape, he stopped short in the path, and the next moment the leaders were upon him.

A less agile man would have been ridden down despite the driver's efforts to bring the team to a standstill. As it was Hebbard swung from the bit of the near leader, swaying just out of reach of the horse's knees, and dragged the animal out of his course.

By a violent effort Perry curbed the excited horses to a walk, and Hebbard loosened his grasp on the near leader's bit. His hat had fallen off in the struggle; but he bowed to the frightened ladies in his best manner, and, halting for an instant beside the box, said quietly to the scowling whip:

"I'll apologize for this detention at your convenience, Fanytre."

In another instant the drag was whirling on toward the main entrance, and Hebbard was standing on the hillside lawn, dusting his brown crush hat.

"Are you sorry you did not kill him?" asked Miss Macaire, under her breath.

"No: they would have had us all at the inquest. 'Twould have been deucedly awkward, you know."

"So it would. You are a man of rare forethought. I fancied you knew him."

"Yes—theatrical cub. He's a society man—and actually likes it."

"Now, that is unpardonable. What a relief not to know him. He never comes to Emily's, I think?"

"I believe not—he's in another set. Is literary, in a way; thinks he can act; is amateurish generally; goes to church Sunday evenings, and would rather walk than drive. His name is Hebbard—Clarence Hebbard—a nice name for a nice man."

Fanytre said this with an inimitable society drawl, which lapsed into good natured fluency under the inspiration of congenial detraction. Miss Macaire had her own opinion concerning the exact justice of Mr. Pericles Fanytre's social judgments; but she was Emily Fessenden's guest, and young Fanytre was Miss Fessenden's very good friend and obedient cavalier. Besides, one must smile pleasantly over a great deal of burnt pudding, in society.

"California is not a very good place for the growth of cousinly kindness, I think," said Freitas Macaire, after Brownie had asked his pretty relative the conventional questions about the dead and married and bankrupt, at home.

"I am afraid not. A man falls in a rut and stays there, especially if he's too lazy to crawl out. To tell the truth, I've been shy of making myself known for fear you would disown me. You have doubtless heard what a graceless scamp I've turned out to be."

"Yes, I have heard some 'rather dreadful' stories about you; but then I heard even more dreadful ones about Californians generally—you all gambled, and none were habitually sober—"

"And it wasn't far from the truth either," interposed the truthful Brownwell.

"But I wanted to see the Sierra and Yosemite, so I came. I shall not require any catechism of your cousin. If you will promise to be more friendly, I shall stay another year, if nothing happens."

"Well, as a proof of how friendly I mean to be, I'll bring a young fellow—a gentleman—here to-morrow evening—"

"No, please do not. I have seen more than one San Francisco young gentleman, and I don't fancy the personage. I'm quite content as I am. Emily takes me everywhere, and then I can have you when I need an escort."

"Oh, no, you can't; I'm too much your friend for that. But I really wish to introduce Clarence Hebbard to you; he's the best fellow in the world."

Cousin Freitas flushed, imperceptibly to her companion, and said quietly: "How can he be the best fellow in the world if he's your particular friend? But I have met Mr. Hebbard, and I don't think I should like to know him."

"Not my Hebbard. He saw you for the first time in the theatre last night, looked at you half the evening, made me look at you, and that's why I am here—to be frank with you."

"I'm sure I'm very proud of Mr. Hebbard's distant attention, and grateful for his instrumentality in this family call; but I don't see why I should undergo the martyrdom of wearing out a new acquaintanceship. Do you?"

"Yes I do, and I shall bring him here to-morrow evening; so please be at home. I have an engagement in ten minutes. Good night."

Hebbard went to dinner with Brown the following evening; and it was amusing to note the little gourmand's parting sigh over the half spent bottle of Burgundy, as his tall junior hurried him off to keep their engagement with Miss Macaire.

Miss Fessenden and her friend were very glad to meet Mr. Hebbard, but Freitas quietly absorbed herself in her disingenuous cousin and left Hebbard to the blandishments of billiards and the mercy of Miss Fessenden. There was premeditated method in Miss Freitas's cousinly interest quite unmistakable and very uncomfortable, and Hebbard wished himself elsewhere at once. But Emily Fessenden was the brightest of companions and the most entertaining of hostesses. She and Clarence knew each other a little, and did not especially like each other; yet she disdained to do things by halves, and her companion of the evening could not but respond to her social advances in the same generous spirit. They played a few careless games of billiards, in which the lady accused the gentleman of "throwing off," and the gentleman, in the same breath, protested his innocence and his unproficiency. Then the lady recalled the adventure of the day before, told how frightened they all were, how much they admired his bravery, how enthusiastically Mr. Fanytre spoke of his "nerve" (which was Miss Emily's little white lie, silent as to the exact significance of Mr. Fanytre's pet expression), how providential the escape had been, how extremely reckless of their lives young men were, to be sure. And then—either in a spirit of mischief or out of genuine kindness of heart—Miss Fessenden declared that Freitas should not indefinitely monopolize Mr. Brown, and skillfully rescued that long-suffering relative from the web of his cousin's tantalizing small talk.

"I fear my introduction of yesterday was an unfortunate one," said Hebbard.

"Now I thought it exactly otherwise. It gave me an insight into the cool Californian daring of which I have read so much," said the young lady.

There was no dissecting the meaning of such a sentence as that. The young lady might be excessively gracious, or she might be cruelly chaffing him. He was a young man of experience, but he was too generous to have learned wisdom at that price; yet, though he burned to accept Miss Macaire's check at its face value, something quenched his mounting hopefulness, and he was fain to let the conversation drift into commonplace.

"I like him," said Miss Fessenden, quibblingly, as the door closed behind the two gentlemen and the ladies turned into the empty drawing-room.

"So do I," said Freitas, rather sadly it seemed; "but I flatter myself he did not discover the liking. I am a prude from the staunchest of principles, a horror of scene; yet I have been a victim all my life from my earliest school-days—poor Mr. Potts!"

She spoke the last sentence reflectively, as if to herself. Miss Fessenden, who understood the allusion, looked sympathetically grave, but said nothing, and Freitas continued: "I know from experience it is safest not to become too friendly with any gentleman. I hope I seem to say this in all humility, dear!"

The sentimental hopes of Mr. Clarence Hebbard were not easily dashed, and his calls at Miss Fessenden's were continued and prolonged; but after the second or third time he was obliged to go alone. The good Brownie—not a good brownie in the household fairy sense—excused himself from further cousinly attention, pleading his incapacity for society and his dread of losing the full enjoyment of dinner. So Master Clarence went alone, and found Miss Macaire always polite and always entertaining—never distant, yet never familiar. And after a while he was permitted to escort her to the amusements, and she and he made one couple of several yachting parties before the summer's breath was spent.

Hebbard's relations with Miss Macaire were altogether novel. Hitherto he had rushed into avowal blindly—like the English steeple-chaser at a "bullfinch"—but in this new experience the veteran in declaration found himself held in check by a subtle something in the lady's manner which defied analysis, yet was not to be trifled with for an instant.

As Perry Fanytre said, Hebbard would rather walk than drive. (The initial San Francisco Walking Club was an outgrowth of his energetic example.) But until one June morning, almost a year from the evening he first saw her, when the low-lying vapor was taxing the brazen throat of the Yerba Buena fog-horn and the climbing sun was gilding the park hills, it did not occur to the young man that Miss Macaire might enjoy a ramble in the fields, with himself as guide and all outdoors to minister.

Would Miss Macaire go? She would consult Miss Fessenden. Miss Fessenden would be charmed to accompany them if she might be permitted to ask her friend, Lynette Rook. Certainly Miss Rook would be an accession to their number. Could she walk? Yes; she was an active member of the Arcadian Cliff-Climbers. Would Mr. Fanytre—who was present at an unusually early hour for him—make one of the party? No, he wasn't in training, but he would meet them with the drag at any point they might designate.

Skirting the park on the south are green pasture fields, sloping upward to the abrupt Dolores hills, which stretch toward the south as far as San Miguel. These fields were bright with flowers, but Miss Macaire, with true Bostonian hatred of dilettanteism, did not botanize. The other ladies, however, gathered industriously; retaining of course, only the flowers—so that their collections might have that beautifully fragmentary appearance which the amateur scientist seems to love, merely because it is so thoroughly unscientific.

The zeal of the others left Clarence and Freitas somewhat to themselves. Their ramble led them in advance of the others to the shade of some stunted willows, fringing a narrow gulch. Tempted by the grateful coolness they sat down to wait for their companions. The situation was infectious. Before them stretched the unclaimed dunes of the park which is to be, rolling in jagged sand-waves down to the ocean breakers. They could see the majestic reaches of green wave sweeping grandly inshore, and turning from shattered emerald to drifted snow as they broke in writhing crinkles on the beach. Behind, the Dolores hills loomed sheer above them, gleaming without a shadow in the splendor of high noon. A canopy of delicate green leaves, upheld by fragile, amber-tinted branchlets, screened them from the intrusive sun. Miss Macaire looked receptive, and Hebbard felt inspired.

"I should like to tell you something," he ventured.

"Very well, I am always athirst for knowledge. Are you about to quote 'What so rare as a day in June?'"

"No. Have you ever heard about my love experiences?"

"What an abrupt question. No—yes; not any particulars, though. I scarcely thought you would enjoy talking about them."

"They are not unpleasant, Miss Macaire, for none of them were genuine. I only fancied myself in love, played at the tender passion in the most juvenile manner. You should have seen the fair creatures. Nice girls, every one of them. I don't blame them for trifling with my suit, because the suit was itself a trifle, and manifestly absurd. In only one instance was there anything like serious danger in the pastime. She was tall, lissome, statuesque, a face like Modjeska's, and eyes like Edwin Booth's."

"Was she an actress?"

"Yes; but off the boards. She was a society miss, in her teens, with all the wisdom of Ouida at her tongue's end, and all the blandishments of Circe in her repertoire. She made me believe myself beloved; she made me think myself in love, until—until it suited her purpose to undeceive me."

"Are you sure you only thought you loved her?"

"Sure! I have courted just as earnestly half a dozen other women, with almost identical experiences. But I have been like a man walking blindfolded in a garden of roses, imagining every scented petal red, like the roses of his childish remembrance. I thought all women honest because I found all women fair. Perhaps I have not changed greatly, perhaps I might repeat the same blunders at the slightest provocation. Yet for nearly a year I have silently looked into one pair of steadfast eyes, whose honesty I have never been tempted to question for an instant."

The young man paused and looked at the young lady's face searchingly. There was a shadow of amusement there, and no other emotional quality discernible. Should he go on in his fluent circumlocution, or plunge into avowal with the swift elan of previous disaster? A glance at their approaching, luncheon-seeking companions decided him.

"I mean to add one more attempt to the long list—for woe or weal—Miss Macaire. I have waited a year to tell you that I have been mistaken, that the only woman I ever loved is yourself."

Freita's amused expression had turned to a look of almost wild alarm. For months she had feared this thing, yet had dismissed her fears almost as soon as they were formed, because of the surface success her assumed self-poise had brought her. For, quite apart from the high esteem in which she held the young man's manly qualities, the consciousness that somehow her life since she had met him was a different, a sweeter life, made her preference play with her better judgment until she found herself caring a dangerous deal for a man she could not thoroughly respect, and dared not say—even to herself—she did not love.

"My life is a riddle of opposites," she said hurriedly; "I also have had my experiences. If I loved you, Mr. Hebbard, I would not marry you; I am too great a coward. Let us consider all this unsaid; let us be friends—let us be conventional; they are almost here."

"Very well," he said, scarcely above a whisper, and then he fell a thinking. Men who are good for something "hate to be beat," and Hebbard, as he ground his teeth over the vexatious pain the refusal brought him, was resolving in his mind's eye a kaleidoscope of schemes—each gorgeous and altogether flawless—by means of which the unpleasantly positive Miss Macaire might be made to negative her resolve.

The four walked back to the park, slowly, pensively—for four distinct and individual reasons. Perry Fanytre whirled them home in the drag; and, at last, Hebbard was alone.

There was nothing of the cowed spaniel in the way the young man ate his dinner. The sirlin and strong black tea disappeared with a vigorous celerity, born of the dauntlessness which makes bull dogs dangerous and lovers invincible. Brownie Brown sauntered into the restaurant where Hebbard sat glowering over his bachelor meal, and the first words of the man who knew the world like a book—like a cash book—expressed something of admiration and something of disgust:

"By George, Clarence," he said, "you eat like a working-man, and scowl like a bull in the middle of a rainy market. What the mottled deuce is up?"

"Stox, old Brown; stox is up. Go to the devil and tell him I sent you. I'm d-d-dreadfully disgusted with everything."

"Except your dinner!"

"Yes, except my dinner. Will you go with me and call on your cousin? You haven't been there for three months. Come along—I don't want to go alone."

"No, I will not."

"Yes, you will!" said Hebbard, and he dragged the over-modest man of the middle world into the clearer gas light of the upper circles.

Miss Macaire sat by the library drop light, trying to find nepenthe in the pages of Lucile. Hebbard entered, unannounced and noiselessly. The young lady yawned—just sufficiently to afford the intruder a glimpse of the red and white harmony of her exquisite mouth. He stood in motionless enjoyment of the pretty picture. He had come to ask Freitas to give him a new lease of life-purpose and human trust, or else to say good-bye for always. He had come with the high hopefulness of youth, trusting to receive in full the measure of his asking; yet dreading, like the most sanguine of men, the inevitable chances of mischance—that the cards may lie on the other side of the baize.

Hebbard's first impulse was to do something rash—to take her in his arms and call her his very own—to kiss her lips into submissive silence—to be desperate, and Paul-Cliffordish, and altogether awful. But his wiser second thought suggested a safer, if less heroic, plan. He stood motionless until Freitas's appearance assured him that her drowsy unconsciousness was not assumed; then he took a scrap of paper from his note-book and wrote a few sentences; then he folded the slip of paper, and approached the chair in which the young girl, half reclining, slept the sleep of the tired. The neglected Lucile lay half opened in her lap. He slipped the little note within the loosened leaves of the book, and stole stealthily behind the heavy curtains of a friendly embrasure.

She did not move, and Hebbard, peering with glistening eyes through the narrow crevice between the curtain and the wall, thought the passing seconds were hours, and his vigil half a life-time. With forced philosophy he took out his watch and timed his galloping pulse. It was beating one hundred and twenty. He peered through the crevice again, and for a moment he thought his heart had stopped; and then the pulsations surged on as before—she was awake.

At first she did not see the note. With one white hand she swept the fringes of her sleepy eyes, and then, unmindful of her neglected author, rose slowly to her feet. The Lucile fell to the floor, and as she bent to pick it up she saw the folded paper. She held it a moment in her hand, unopened; and Hebbard watched her blush as she recognized the handwriting. Then she slowly unfolded it, and all color—except two spots of fire on her cheeks—faded out of her joyless face.

She read the note two or three times, as if she did not quite understand its real meaning. Then she looked wildly around the room, and, almost falling into her chair, began to sob with all a woman's suppressed abandon.

Hebbard took a step forward. In another moment he would have been by her side, telling her, with a lover's eager eloquence, that he did not mean his hasty words, and that this was not "good-bye for ever," that he understood her tears and pallor, that between them, henceforth and for always, there should be no divided thoughts. But, as he moved, his ears, abnormally acute, heard the creak of footsteps; and he stood still in shamefasted hesitancy. It was Miss Fessenden coming from the humdrum drawing-room, to call the truants in the interests of anti-monopoly.

Freita also heard the approaching footsteps, and like a startled hind she sprang to her feet. In an instant she had turned out the gas, and stolen, trembling, to the embrasure curtains, and was in Hebbard's arms.

"Don't scream," he whispered, rather grimly, she thought afterward. "It is I—Hebbard."

She did not scream, nor struggle, nor faint; but stood passive with his arms about her, until the footsteps passed beyond their hearing; and then she quietly tried to move away. But he did not let her go so easily.

"I can not spare you so soon," he said. "I have drawn the prize so recently that I do not purpose to risk its loss yet. Do you insist on being free. Am I mistaken then—after all?"

There was no remnant of tears in her voice, but merely a trace of piquant malice as she replied:

"No, Mr. Hebbard, I shall not insist. It would not be proper, until you have put in the light. I shall not say you are wrong or right; but I will be very humble and admit that I was wrong—this afternoon."

Ten minutes later they rang the front door bell, and, when they had entered the drawing-room, Freitas went and stood by her cousin, and said in a low tone, yet so that the other two heard:

"I believe he is one of the best fellows in the world, cousin Brownwell; and, as I have just promised to become his wife, I apologize for lack of instant appreciation, and you must give me away."

THE SILVER WEDDING.

BY JOSEPH W. WINANS.

Out of Void sprung Form and Order, out of Chaos Being sprung, At the will of the Creator, while the stars of morning sung— Sung a hymn whose grand vibration, through its carol and its chime, Solemnized the joyous nuptials that united Earth to Time. O the grandeur, O the glory, of that consecrated rite— Earth transcendent in her beauty, Time tremendous in his might! Seraphs sounded in the chorus, angels glittered in the train; Could such joy be ever shrouded in the cold eclipse of pain? Answer ye who oped the portals, let the subtle tempter in, Girt the promise of that union with the Nessus-robe of sin. So the eras as they flitted only emphasized the care That in denser volumes gathered round that tempest-driven pair; All the bloom and verdure teeming in their early bridal path Fled as fly the leaves of Autumn scattered by the whirlwind's wrath. While their wedded life still journeyed through its first progressive stage.

It was buoyant with the gladness of the happy Golden Age, Out upon the change that followed! Each new era traced its way Through a route more drear and rugged, through disaster and decay. Followed next the Age of Silver, then the lurid Age of Brass— Stunning with its horrid clangor, crushing with its ponderous mass, Till the ruthless Age of Iron, closing grimly over all, Merged the sequence of the æons in its lethargy and thrall; So that union dawned the eras, through its melancholy scope, Found but dirges for its pæans, disappointment for its hope. From this sombre Rembrandt picture, illustrating all the woe. All the wreck, and all the ruin which from Sin's wild havoc flow, Turn we to Agrippa's mirror, where, within the magic glass, A contrasted pageant glimmers as the vivid figures pass. There the spirit of redemption, in the image of a dove, To the eye of faith appearing, crowns the mystery of love; There a festive throng is gathered, and the man of God imparts Benediction to the union of two fond and faithful hearts. Starting forth upon their mission, interpledged through weal and woe, Down the rifted paths of duty these two youthful pilgrims go. Stern the struggle at the outset in the very nuptial dawn; On their heads the tempest hurries, at their feet abysses yawn; Trials task supreme endurance; cares, like spectres, grimly rise; Griets consume and courage falters; bitter tears bedim the eyes. Then, alas! the fear creeps o'er them, waking from the passion-dream. What they once unto each other seemed they ne'er again shall seem. So the course of the first wedding in its order was reversed. By this wedded life before us, where the iron age came first, And the tears wrung from their sorrows in the penitential past Will congeal to sparkling jewels that shall crown them at the last. Now another marriage epoch cometh with the gliding years, And another changeful vision in those mirrored depths appears. To our gaze the scenes unfolding in the nuptial "age of brass," In the mystic panorama of that incanted glass. Life is still to them a struggle, though sustained with firmer will; Still their hearts but join in contact—kept from interfusion still. Bleak the landscape shivers round them, shrill the sharp wind whistles by:

Loud the din of battle rages, yet they scorn to flinch or fly; For they know, though sorely tested, they shall conquer at the close, And the wave that threatens shipwreck shall but wait them to repose. Lo! upon the magic mirror darkness draws its murky veil Ere that mystic personation to its ending brings the tale; But anon a burst of splendor more effulgent than the day, Through the dusky vistas piercing, chases every cloud away. Then another epoch flitteth in the swift revolving years, And another scene before us in the mirrored depths appears: On those wedded hearts, triumphant o'er the primal curse and ban, O'er the violence of nature and the cruelty of man, Schooled by care, annealed by trial, and by wisdom rendered sage, Glows the omnipresent brightness of the joyous "silver age." While the currents of their being, turned into a single stream, Cause each soul and pulse to mingle in a unity supreme. Olive branches clothe with verdure the prolific parent tree; Children sporting through the household, children climbing on the knee;

Those of larger growth upholding by their solace and support, Like the temple's shafted column glancing through the marble court. How the conscious mirror brightens as it shows reflected there What a happy fate was destined for that fond and faithful pair! Yet they can not 'scape life's burthen, even though its pain is past, For the common lot of mortals is to bear it to the last. But a patient resignation and a trusting faith assuage All the evils that yet linger in the placid "silver age." Lo! a brilliant concourse gathers in its stateliest array To commemorate the advent of the Silver Wedding-day: Clear and jocular on the midnight peal the animating chimes, While the revel gaily speedeth 'mid the resonance of rhymes— 'Mid the flow of congratulations warmly showered upon those Who have reached this happy haven of connubial repose. There the fairest of Eve's daughters through the festal chambers throng In the lustre of their beauty and the music of their song; There the tapers, and the garlands, and the goblets flashing bright, Crown the banquet with a halo of convivial delight.

Gone is now that magic mirror, but the sequel is foretold: When the "Age of Silver" endeth there shall come the "Age of Gold;" Not the fine gold of the furnace, wherewith alloy doth blend, But the gold that will not tarnish nor grow dim unto the end.

SAN FRANCISCO, June, 1878.

Would You Care?

All day on my pillow I wearily lay,
With a stabbing pain at my heart,
With throbbing temples, and a feverish thirst
Burning my lips apart.
If I longed for a touch of your soft, strong hand,
For you one little minute there;
For a smile, or a kiss, or a word to bless,
Would you blame me, love?—would you care?

When the long, long, lonesome day was done,
And you never for a moment came,
If I tried to shut you out of my heart,
Impatient at your name;
If disappointment's bitter sting
Was harder than pain to bear,
If I turned away with a doubting frown,
Would you blame me, love?—would you care?

Should I die to-night, and you saw me not Again till my soul had fled
With its vain request, and my features wore
The white hue of the dead,
Would you place just once, in a last caress,
Your hand on my death-damp hair?
Would you give me a thought, or a fond regret?
Would you kiss me, love?—would you care?

SAN JOSE, June, 1879.

MAOGE MORRIS.

A Song.

Although shut out from thee, my love, my own,
Yet neither day nor night am I alone;
In neither day nor night I fail to know
The sweetness that thy presence doth bestow.

In night the faint, far stars of misty gold
Look down upon me with thy love untold;
In day the softest breezes gently blow
With but to say, that thou wouldst kiss me so.

THE LATEST SOCIETY VOLUME.

ON THE VERGE. By Philip Shirley. 1879. San Francisco: published by Bancroft & Co.

Hugh Miller, commenting on some of Dr. Johnson's unacknowledged works—for instance, Taylor's Sermons—says: "We feel assured of good authority in pronouncing Johnson their author, in consequence of the character of the thinking displayed, the style, tone, and the incidents of composition." In the work under comment, if I were to follow such reasoning, I should judge the author to be deeply versed in a fast social world, and, through great experience, enabled to draw a hard, and yet true sketch, not "on the verge," but almost beyond what society recognizes as right and proper. Or, on the other hand, I should be more charitable, and suppose that a long course of French novels of a questionable type, and the "beau ideal" of a hero à la "Ouida," and a heroine after Miss Braddon, have caused the authoress to believe the world worse than it really is. The story is centered in New York, where the young wife heroine falls madly in love with "Don Giovanni," and in the most marvelously mysterious manner allows him and his friend to believe her a widow. Both fall in love with her. One is refused, and comes back to his fiancée in San Francisco, who during this time has been in correspondence with him. The other man meets the injured husband just as he has prepared an elopement.

The style is spoiled by voluminous quotations, and the book is, or professes to be, a social sketch, being quite innocent of any well-concocted plot. The hero is, to put it plainly, a roud, a snob, and a villain. There is, of course, every excuse for his falling in love with another man's wife in this case, aided by the extraordinary misconception that he is addressing a widow, but there is little to say for the "matter of course" manner in which every character in the tale seems to accept this condition of things.

One is hardly surprised to find the heroine une petite diablesse, after hearing her speak to her uncle of her approaching marriage thus:

"Men love, women respond. If men are very kind for a long time together, habits makes their wives affectionate. Then married people quarrel, and are divorced, or lapse into well-bred indifference. Isn't that about it, uncle?"

Of course this book is written by a woman. The women are too severely handled in its pages for its author to have been a man; and yet I think one true, or noble, or I will even add, honest woman might have been added to this string of vicious, worldly, and unwholesome throng. The hero is of the sensational novel class—a god to look at, a devil to act; though, with all due deference to our authoress, I very much doubt if the devil would often succeed in obtaining his due if he acted so grossly. Vice is oftenest successful under the mask of virtue and the plausible exterior, not the headlong audacity and presumptuous manner in which this Lothario flaunts his hopes, and, so to speak, "states his case" on the first introduction to his victim.

However, one can not bring sentiment to cover the seventh commandment, or its approaches. Poor Lord Chesterfield, of all men the pink of social etiquette, is dragged in and quoted in order to bolster up an intrigue. This gay lady, who converses with "Don Giovanni" as mein Schatz, is answered in this manner:

"You are bored, désœuvré, listless, or else feverishly in spirits. You don't know what you want, but I do."

"Get it for me, then," she returned, laughing at him; "you are wiser than I if you know what I want."

"It is not so much something you want as that you have something you don't know what to do with," said Matt, with his slight laugh.

"Remove the monster," said Theodora.

It is charitable to suppose the monster referred to must be her affections, and I merely quote the passage to justify my previous remarks. Later on in the book, as if by some happy afterthought, or repentant wish, or for some numerous reasons that the fruitful brain of sensationalism has brought forth, "Don Giovanni" thinks of marrying "Thendora," and his soliloquies on the subject are certainly startling. As far as she is concerned, she acts as if she never heard of such a being as a certain husband she possesses, who is waiting to close the scene and save "on the verge" from being "beyond the pale."

But enough of abuse; I have done with it, and shall add a few words, and I fear only a few, in praise. The book is full of good hits, sly raps—so to speak—as when "Theodora" receives the railway clerk's love letter, though despising both the effort and its author, yet she leaves it where her lady friend can see it.

"Women are proud of the pettiest conquest. Are men?"

Another:

"George lost a good deal of this, as men always do of long speeches without epigrams from women with whom they are not in love."

The conversation is chatty and good, in many instances brilliant, and were it not for the continual mass of quotation would be in easier style. Speaking of style, there are some little descriptions of style that are very happily drawn:

"Miss Lethbridge's style was the inspired. In animated discourse, and she continued to make most discourse assume that spirit, she was accustomed to press her hand upon her chest as if she would still her heart's wild pulsations, or else as if she would force herself back into her chair—typifying the earthly fetters—lest she should incontinently fly upward, and passing easily through the ceiling, evaporate into pure essence, and seek her native stars then and there."

The descriptions are sometimes very good, the young girl's sketch of the ball is a particularly refreshing chapter, but a sentence is often spoiled by long words. For instance, an eyeglass is called a "vitreous medium." There are also some odd opinions and smiles that have been expressed through the agency of "Matt": "Cary as the ideal singer," and a brunette's complexion to be likened to the coloring on a meerschau pipe. But it is hardly fair to destroy "Matt's" identity and make the writer responsible for these utterances. Few who read this work (few, I mean, of any worldly experience) but must feel that the book is a terribly true sketch—a sad, hard tale without one redeeming, wholesome character of any prominence to refresh and to remind us of the few fortunate, and of the few happy, and I may add, of the few good. It remains a disagreeable sketch of everyday life, strong and forcible; but as a book, notwithstanding its power and the evident talent that has produced it, had better not have been written.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 21, 1879.

The Republican Convention, after a harmonious and altogether satisfactory session, adjourned on Thursday, having nominated the following ticket for the ratification of the people at the September election:

For Governor—George C. Perkins, of San Francisco.
 For Lieutenant-Governor—John M. Mansfield, of Los Angeles.
 For Secretary of State—D. M. Burns, of Yolo.
 For Treasurer—John Weil, of Sacramento.
 For Controller—D. M. Kenfield, of Tuolumne.
 For Surveyor-General—J. W. Shanklin, of Alameda.
 For Attorney-General—A. L. Hart, of Colusa.
 For Superintendent of Public Instruction—F. C. Campbell, of Alameda.
 For Clerk of the Supreme Court—Frank W. Gross, of San Francisco.
 For Chief Justice—A. L. Rhodes, of Santa Clara.
 For Associate Justices—A. P. Catlin, of Sacramento; James E. Hale, of Placer; I. S. Belcher, of Yuba; Garret E. Richards, of Yolo; M. J. Myrick, of San Francisco; E. D. Wheeler, of San Francisco.
 For State Board of Equalization—First District, —; Second District, M. M. Drew, of Sacramento; Third District, Warren Dutton, of Marin; Fourth District, James A. Clayton.
 For Railroad Commissioners—First District, Joseph S. Cohn, of Tehama; Second District, —; Third District, C. H. Phillips, of San Luis Obispo.
 For Congressmen—First District, —; Second District, H. F. Page, of El Dorado; Third District, Joseph McKenna, of Solano; Fourth District, Romualdo Pacheco, of Alameda.

With this ticket the delegates and the community appear to be entirely satisfied. It is well distributed, well balanced, and, all things considered, a credit to the convention that made it. Mr. George C. Perkins, the nominee for Governor, is well known throughout the State, is personally popular, has a good political and business record, and the firmness of purpose and intelligence of opinion so necessary in an executive. As for the rest of the nominees, their records and pedigrees have been so fully given pro and con by the dailies that it is not necessary at this writing to particularize as to their virtues. Suffice it to say that the ticket is acceptable, and a fairly good selection of candidates. The convention has been a harmonious one, and has done its work honestly and intelligently.

The Republican leaders at Washington seem to be dividing upon the question how best to conduct the coming Presidential election. All desire success, but all are not united upon the policy of the next campaign, nor in accord as to what manner of Republican shall be nominated. To us, upon this side of the continent, it looks as though more attention was just now being given to politics than to legislation. The "stalwart" Republicans are for making an aggressive, bloody-shirt campaign. It seems as though Chandler, Logan, Blaine, and their associates, were dragging their political coat-tails behind them, daring the Southern brigadiers to step on them, and that this wing of the Republican party has a chip on its shoulder for a solid South to knock off, if it dare. Then there is a more moderate wing of the Republicans—"conservatives"—who think they see an easier and a better solution of our political problem than by again reviving the passions of the civil war. All the "stalwarts"—not themselves ambitious to be the Presidential candidate—demand the nomination of General Grant, that we may have a firm government. One cause of irritation to our stay-at-home statesmen of the North, is that the South has sent so many of its military men to Washington. This seems to us to be not only natural, but a necessity. The South sent nearly all its best citizens to the battle field; nearly all were in the military employ; so, when the war was ended, it had presented to itself the alternative of sending to Congress its military men or those who shirked and stayed at home. Its best talent was in the army. There is nothing, therefore, that ought to surprise Northern men, that the most eminent Generals of the South are honored by being chosen to represent that section in the national Congress. As we read and interpret the speeches, and note the political conduct of Bayard, Hampton, Hill, Lamar, and other representative Southern men, we are forced to admit that they seem more consistent, and more rational, and—using our strongest word—more patriotic, than the Republican "stalwarts" who are bent on mischievous party success. One of the bad signs is, the way the Associated Press has commenced lying. Perhaps, as we are Republican, and as these lies are being told in the interest of our party, we ought, instead of the word lying, to say exaggerate; but it is really painful to observe how enthusiastically vicious the Associated Press dispatches have become under the inspiration of a coming Presidential election. Rather than see a bigoted, one-eyed, partisan, Republican, Northern idiot nominated as the Presidential candidate, whose purpose shall be to revive the animosities and passions of the civil war, we shall greatly prefer the nomination and election of a conservative, moderate Southern Democrat. Rather than either, would we prefer a moderate, broad-minded, Northern, Republican statesman, who shall command the respect of both sections of a country whose best interests demand peace. We are not at all desirous to see the issues settled on the battle-field revived in Congress or dragged into our civil administration.

Archbishop Hughes made a speech at the Tabernacle in New York in 1857 in opposition to the proposition to establish Catholic Irish colonies in the West. This project was advocated by the Rev. Mr. Tracy, a Catholic priest from the West. Archbishop Hughes attended the lecture, muffled in his cloak to escape observation. After Mr. Tracy's address, says the New York Herald, he stood up in his place, laid off his cloak, and made a trenchant speech combating the views of the lecturer. His argument was that all such schemes were "all nonsense." He objected to the idea of building up Irish towns in the West. It would be a mistake to establish settlements exclusively Irish, for by and by they would become as distinct as the Mormons. It would be a detriment to the Irish to be segregated from the mass of American citizens. It is their interest to mingle with the common American life of the country, and to suffer their character to be moulded by the free institutions of the American republic, to which their descendants must assimilate if they are to prosper. Nothing could be worse, either for our immigrant population or for the country, than to have our territory parceled out among the old nationalities, in which each division would be a conservatory of exotic sentiments. The effete passions and prejudices, the old strifes and hatreds, would be kept up and transmitted, and the third or the fifth generation would be as un-American as the first. This is contrary to the American idea. The American idea is that all our immigrant citizens and all our native citizens stand on the same footing; that they are equal participants in the same national life; that by the intercourse of business, politics, and social life, and by intermarriages in the second, third, and succeeding generations, all distinctions of previous nationality are to be obliterated, and that all national pride is to be merged and concentrated in the proud sentiment, "Civis Americanus sum." Wherever the experiment has been made on American soil of bringing the people of a foreign country to this, and keeping them together in such a way as to preserve their national customs and habits, and to preserve their language and religion, it has been hurtful to the immigrant, and, carried to a large extent, would be destructive to the country. Dutch in Pennsylvania, Swedes and Norwegians in the Northwest, Mennonites—any and every nationality and religion that has undertaken to live together—have demonstrated that the idea is a mistaken one. It is un-American, and ought to be most severely discouraged. Kindred to this mistake is that Irish blunder that the original immigrant still adheres to in the celebration in our public streets of St. Patrick's birthday. The parading of the shamrock and the harp, and of images of saints and soldiers, popes and Irish patriots, Irish flags and Irish flummery, is a stupid—perhaps thoughtless is a better word—insult to Americans. Irishmen ought to know better, ought to be ashamed of themselves, and ought to know that it angers Americans and keeps alive a national prejudice to see foreign soldiers, of regiments with foreign names and in foreign uniforms and under a foreign flag, marching to the music of foreign national airs, with open barouches filled with priests, to celebrate the birthday of St. Patrick. It is all the more absurd and Irish when we reflect that it is quite hypothetical if there ever was any St. Patrick, and quite doubtful, if there ever was, that he was an Irishman. This St. Patrick business is the more contemptible when we know, and everybody knows, that it is mere politics. We should respect the Irish a great deal more if they would forego this annual exhibition of their folly, and the church a great deal more if it would not give the sanction of its organization to an offensive display of Irishmen. We may congratulate ourselves that the sons—native born—of Irish parents are wiser than their fathers, and that this absurd pageant will dwindle and die out in time, because the boys whose native sod is American are never found in a St. Patrick's procession strutting themselves to death with a trumpery sash and a rosette of green.

Kindred to this question also is that of teaching German and French in our free public schools. Absurd and extravagant as our school system has become in teaching music, drawing, calisthenics, higher mathematics, Latin, and all that sort of nonsense, the teaching of German and French is absolutely wicked. It is stealing; it is robbery; it is official malfeasance. Independent of the crime of taxing American citizens to instruct German and French children in the German and French languages, it is indecent, and unpatriotic, and un-American. It is insolence for Germans to demand it. It is cowardice and demagogism for Americans to concede it. If any rich American desires his children to be instructed in German, let him pay for it. If any German wants his boys and girls educated in German, either let him go back to Germany or pay for it himself out of his own pocket. To take it out of the tax-payers is simply cold, naked, inexcusable stealing. Our free common school system has gone wide of its original design. It was intended to educate the children of the poor in rudimentary English branches at the expense of the public. New England sentimentalism, Boston culture, has run away with the idea, and we are now in San Francisco practically submitting to the extortion of half a million of dollars from our tax payers under the pretext that we may educate the children of the working poor. Under this pretext we have schools of so superior a character that all private schools are destroyed, and our wealthy classes are charging the education of their children to those tax-payers who have no children to educate; to Catholics who educate their children in parochial schools; to non-resident property-owners, who have no families in the State. The whole business needs reform, retrenchment, reduction of expenses, and revision of studies. The schools are run for politics and by politicians; but the meanest and wickedest feature of the whole absurd system is to allow the teaching of German, to Germans, by Germans, in cosmopolitan schools, because we are afraid of the German vote. It would be just as proper, and just as contemptible, for the Irish to demand the teaching of the Irish tongue—we mean the old Celtic Irish—in the schools; and it would be just as contemptible and cowardly for Americans to yield to the request as it is to teach German to Germans or French to French. Why not teach Slavic, Spanish, Hungarian, Italian, Danish, or Portuguese in the public schools? Because there are not so many Slavonian, Spanish, Hungarian, Italian, Danish, or Portuguese voters. The discussion of this question only shows how contemptible, degenerate, and cowardly Americans have become under the laying on of this foreign lash. And now, as usual, we must again, as always, declare that we write from no prejudice against birth or religion, and with the single idea that we desire our country, our laws, our institutions, our politics, our schools, our language, our literature, our everything, to become Americanized.

Having a sincere and disinterested desire to make of our people one people, we are perhaps somewhat impatient at the sentiment which prompts our immigrants to cling to their old traditions, habits, and superstitions—to endeavor to plant upon our soil the germs of institutions from which they were glad enough to flee. As we have no State religion, we claim that no foreign faith and no foreign church has the right to offensively swing its incense-burning censers under our noses, nor to parade its vestments in our public places; that the study of all foreign tongues in our common schools and the preservation of all foreign languages in our political or business circles should be discouraged; that the local settlement and colonization of foreign people should not be encouraged in our midst, because it is un-American and injurious both to the immigrant and the country; that journals published in foreign languages—German, Spanish, Italian, French, or Hebrew—ought to be discontinued. The English is the language of the United States of America, and in it all political discussions should be carried on. There should be no military organizations with foreign names and foreign flags; no Irish or German regiments; no Sarsfield nor MacMahon guards; no Prussian helmets; no Austrian uniforms; no green above the red; no Garibaldi business in red shirts; no French communism in blue blouses; no marching to the music of "Boyne Water," or "God Save the Queen," or the "Marseillaise," or "Partant pour Syrie," or "Wacht am Rhine," till, with drum, and fife, and bugle call, every foreign-born musician had been compelled to play "Yankee Doodle" and "The Star Spangled Banner." Social clubs, private schools, literary journals, benevolent societies, national festivities, business associations, family reunions, theatrical representations, concerts, and such kindred things are not embraced in the scope of our discussion. All religious festivals, ceremonies, or pageants confined within church walls, are not within the line of our criticism. We are considering public and political questions with a view to Americanize America.

We should be very glad indeed to have our next Fourth of July celebration conducted with a view to exclude the exhibition of all foreign displays, and the rejection from the procession of all that is un-American. We should be glad to see but one banner thrown to the breeze, and that the banner of the Stars and Stripes. If there is in this city any person who could not enjoy the parade under the American flag we would commend him to the curbstone. If the exhibition must be under the control—the exclusive control—of the militia, which we regard as very objectionable, let it be at least American. Only a year or two ago the literary exercises were conducted exclusively by Englishmen. We had an English reader of the declaration, an English orator, an English poet, and an English female to sing the "Star Spangled Banner." As a rule our orators, readers, poets and marshals are gentlemen of foreign birth. And while we are discussing this question of celebrating the Fourth of July we should like to suggest to this year's committee the propriety of some new departure from the old stereotyped formula. We are tired of that never-ending triumphal car, with its blonde Goddess of Liberty up aloft in a cotton temple of liberty, surrounded with freckle-faced girls, as representatives of sovereign States, in calico and sashes. We are altogether out of conceit with the military display of nerveless warriors, at the head of bloodless columns, who would turn pale passing a butcher shop and faint at the smell of a slaughterhouse. We do not want to see General John McComb on his war charger, nor Major Backus, nor any other of General Grant's comrades—and, by the way, isn't it just a little bit comical to hear these militia fellows talk about "Comrade Grant?"—until the next centennial. Regiments of voluntary militia, with more musicians than officers, more officers than privates, infantry with sore feet, cavalry on dray horses, artillery on hose carts, mixed uniforms of all sorts of nationalities, flags of every device, do not somehow stir our patriotic heart. We have lost our admiration of triumphal arches of blue and white cambric, with daubs of Washington and Lafayette. We are no longer interested in a procession of butchers' carts, and grocers' wagons, with the advertising devices of their trade, and when we see his Honor the Mayor, the president of the day, twelve supervisors, and Philip A. Roach riding in an open barouche after a brass band playing "Pop goes the municipal weasels," we wish the $3,000 was back in the municipal treasury, and the United States of America had never revolted against his majesty, George III—that we were again a dependency of the British crown, with no Irish to molest and no Germans to make us afraid.

The Kearney Municipal Convention took the bull fairly and squarely by the horns in its specific salary pledge and the neat and economical little pay-roll it made out for the sand-lot servants of the people. The schedule of the compensation the nominees solemnly swore to receive is compared as follows:

	Present Salary.	Kearney Salary.
Mayor.....	$3,000	$2,400
Sheriff.....	8,000	4,000
Auditor.....	4,000	2,400
Treasurer.....	4,000	2,400
Recorder.....	4,000	2,400
County Clerk.....	4,000	2,400
Tax Collector.....	4,000	2,400
Assessor.....	4,000	2,400
Coroner.....	4,000	2,400
Superintendent of Streets.....	4,000	2,400
Superintendent of Schools.....	4,000	2,400
Judge Superior Court.....	4,000	2,400
City and County Attorney.....	5,000	3,000
Judge Police Court.....	4,000	2,400
District Attorney.....	5,000	3,000
Justice of Peace.....	2,400	1,800
Presiding Justice.....	3,000	2,000
Chief of Police.....	4,000	2,400
Surveyor.....	$500 and fees.	$200 per month.
Public Administrator.....	Fees.	$200 per month.

And further than this the Convention provided that clerical and subordinate services shall be rated within $1,600 per annum. This is a rugged, but honest, plank in the sand-lot platform. If carried out there will be a saving of nearly half the amount now paid out to the mob of officials for the privilege of being further plundered. The new salaries are sufficient for the service rendered; they are fully up to the compensation for such services allowed by business establishments, and there is no reason why politicians should be any better paid. This a species of reform which has often been attempted by the older political parties, but one which has always been heard more of before than after an election. Kearney's idea is a good one, and the only objection that can possibly be urged is: Are the services of his nominees worth half the money that he has set for them? Don't you think, Denis, that you had better crowd them right down to your old standard of a dollar a day, and then cheat them out of the money?

We are glad to see that Chicago, thoroughly aroused to the danger that threatens, has taken measures to disarm all military companies that have no license from the State. This will deprive the communists of their muskets, which they stacked by hundreds at their last ball, and will leave them powerless to carry out the insolent threats of violence they have lately been so numerous making. We commend the action of the Chicago authorities to our own Supervisors, who may remember the resolutions, and threats, and bayonets of the battalions of the W. P. C.

Here upon the western slope of the great Sierra, far from our Eastern homes and the loved friends whose early teachings would seem to have pointed the way to heaven, our hearts are stirred by the fact that a new prophet has arisen in Israel; one whose outpourings are so utterly unintelligible to the understandings of the "baser sort" that only a "Boston audience" can comprehendingly be led to the footstool of his Deity and bear a hope for salvation—a deity so environed with bioplasms, trilobites, and "the anthropophagi, or men whose heads do grow beneath their shoulders," that a simple follower of the meek and lowly One can scarcely expect successfully to thread the mazes of abstruse theological, not to say geological, treatises in order to find a clue to the watchword giving him admittance through the gates of the heavenly city. Why, and for what Christian purpose, is Huxley's bathybius, shaking, as he advances, the sea foam from his mane, evoked from his watery lair by the prophet, Joseph Cook? And what, we ask, is bathybius? Is it he who,

"With head uplift above the wave, and eyes
That sparkling blaz'd; his other parts besides Prone on the flood, extended long and large?"

Or is he the only and original sea-serpent, in whose favor the assertions and legal affidavits of mariners since the flood have been employed? We are told, and our enthusiasm is raised to fever heat, that "Edinburgh is looking upon Boston; London watches this city; Glasgow, Liverpool, Philadelphia, New York, Chicago (and, for aught we know, all the way stations) ask what San Francisco will do to bring herself into an attitude in which God can walk up and down the streets as He has walked up and down the streets of other cities." We are told in Holy Writ that in the old garden by the Euphrates God did indeed walk in the cool of the day, but that was at a time when the birthday of sin through our fallen Adam had only just dawned, the days of innocence just ending, and a long and dreary era approaching when bathybiuses, bioplasms, scientific theisms, and Joseph Cooks should arise to vex poor humanity to the bitter end. May we be permitted with humility to say we are "not for Joseph" appreciatively. We are so imbued with the teachings of the worthy Bunyan that we prefer to encounter his Apollyon to Cook's bathybius; his Giants Pope and Pagan to Cook with his "monstrous, structureless matrixes, and amazingly strategic and haughtily trumpeted substances." Nay, give us Cotton Mather, with his Magnolia, Poundtext, or Muckle-wath, with their outpourings, and we can see our way clearer than by the light of Joseph Cook. Here, in far off California, sometimes we "sit by the waters of Babylon and weep when we remember Zion"—the Zion of our fathers and the Book we understood. We are impressed, and with due reverence be it spoken, that Mr. Cook is fully aware that until his advent the world was clothed in ignorance as with a garment, and that henceforth the term "B. C." should become diverted of its wonted sacred significance, and that all mankind should now look upon it as having but one interpretation, viz: Before Cook.

A miracle called the "frozen trance" has been wrought in the South Seas. A botanist, named Signor Rotura, who has made a special study of South American flora, has invented a process of suspending animation in animals indefinitely, and of restoring it at pleasure. In connection with Mr. James Grant, who has a freezing chamber on one of the headlands of Sydney Harbor, he has been operating on dogs, cats, lambs, and other domestic animals. A slight puncture is made in the dog's ear, and two drops of a South American vegetable poison are injected. In three or four minutes the vital functions are suspended; the frame becomes rigid, the heart ceases to beat, the tail no longer wags, the dog is dead—so dead, that decomposition would set in if the body were not frozen into the hardness of stone and the brittleness of glass. The dog is laid away on a shelf in the refrigerator, and remains there for weeks and months, until it is the pleasure of Signor Rotura to resuscitate him. Then the subject is immersed in a tub of warm water for ten minutes and brought back to blood heat. A few drops of the antidote to the poison are injected with a silver syringe. In five minutes intelligence returns to the eye, rigidity leaves the limbs, the tail is gently wagged, and the dog barks and trots off as though nothing had happened. We must have that drug here for the Democratic dog before the Chronicle drags him out of the pound and puts on the collar. An injection in the H. B. ear, as above mentioned, would be productive of good results.

General W. T. Sherman evidently believes in Americanism, for in his latest letter to a young man of New Orleans, he writes: "The great sin of the South, the 'great cause of all her woes,' has been the 'localism' of her brilliant minds. To love one's country, one's place of birth, is universal and natural, and actually seems intensified in the inverse ratio of the advantages of the location from a common-sense view. The natives of Scotland and Switzerland are famous for their love of birthplace, although in either country it calls for a life-struggle to eke out of the earth food enough to keep body and soul together. So in South Carolina and Vermont the natives are most boastful of their birthplace, whereas, in fact, they are the poorest States in our Union; whereas, the natives of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Kentucky—rich in soil, beautiful in landscape, and prolific in food—migrate like the bees from an overcrowded hive. Instead of boasting of the spot where one is born by an accident over which he has no control, I should suppose every American would be proud of his whole country rather than of a part. Therefore I hope and pray that the new men of the South, with whom I class you, will cultivate a pride in the whole United States of America, instead of the mere State and locality of birth."

The same logic applies to the foreign line of argument, and the same common-sense principles prevail. What creates bad feeling and bad blood between different sections is aggravated when applied to nationalities.

Now that the Republican Convention has adjourned, it will be interesting to note the attitude of the Chronicle toward its bête noir, the W. P. C. and Kearney. It has been so busy of late in abusing the workings of what it is pleased to call "the railroad's political machine shop," that the Municipal Convention has been bereft of its usual stimulus and stock of select billingsgate and slander. But gossip gives a very plausible excuse for this sudden let up on the part of the Chronicle. It is rumored that it is paving the way by its peace for a compromise with Kearney. Having failed to crush, it is forced to coax, and may be compelled to cringe, before the autocrat of the sand-lot in order to carry out its present plan of Democratic fusion and H. B. compromise. Hence nothing said about Kearney's nominee for Mayor; hence the absence of abuse of Kearney himself; hence the slanderous headlines for the Republican nominees.

On the 29th of May General Joseph W. Johnston, of Virginia, rose in his place in the House of Representatives and moved an adjournment of the House over Decoration Day. It was a graceful and proper thing to do. It was a manly act. It indicated a generous sentiment. It shames the disgraceful oration of a distinguished Republican party leader from Ohio, who, in his address on Decoration Day, reproached the custom of scattering flowers upon the graves of the Confederate dead. It is a base and cowardly heart that treasures resentments against the misguided soldiers who died upon Confederate battle fields.

Some months since a writer of the ARGONAUT narrated a fictitious incident alleged to have occurred in Nevada, and made an imaginary gambler lay down the following as the rule that governed him in life: "I do not care a damn what happens so long as it does not happen to me." The Nation in a recent issue has formulated the following maxim: "That nobody exists for anybody else's benefit, and that every man is entitled to a fair opportunity of making the most of himself." We respectfully suggest that ours is the original idea, and that it is more briefly and forcibly expressed.

The true test of a nation's civilization, once remarked a caustic Frenchman, is the way in which it commits its murders. Judged by this standard California was far and away ahead with the Troy Dye affair, till the recent New York horror, which rivals the Wheatland assombrir, and which in its turn, in artistic execution, is outdone by a murder recently discovered in Russia, in which a young girl deliberately intoxicated her husband until he was perfectly helpless, and then laid him on the floor with his face in a dishful of water, thus stifling him as effectually as if he had been drowned, and producing the symptoms which misled the examining physicians into pronouncing it a case of apoplexy. The guilty widow talking in her sleep alone revealed the crime.

That was a nice little spat that Conkling and Lamar had in the Senate Chamber the other midnight, and it must have been very amusing to see the Southern Senators standing round the next morning expecting that Conkling would flame out with a challenge, or at least take some notice of the fact that Lamar had called him a liar first. But it seems Conkling don't deal in the code, and concludes that honors are pretty easy considering that he added "blackguard" and "coward" to the original "liar" of Lamar. Was it a disgraceful affair? Undoubtedly, for they were both disgraced.

Ex-Governor R. D. Hubbard, a Democrat of Connecticut, actually favors the bridging of the bloody chasm, for he recently said: "While the battle and confused noise of our great civil conflict were in my ears, I could only interpret their meaning very blindly. More and more, as the years go by, the event takes significance and clearness to my mind. And so I unite—forgetting for this purpose all other differences—I gladly unite with all men of all parties in rendering honor and homage to those who fought or fell for the Union."

So the Prince Imperial has at last found that the path of glory leads to eighteen assagai stabs in the back. His first "baptism of fire" should have taught him a lesson, and that would have helped him to avoid those Zula spears, and saved his mother's heart-strings and his own ambitious, adventurous life. And now it is reserved to the other branches of the Napoleon family to give France unrest.

There does not appear to be much activity among the Democratic workers of the primaries as yet, but business will liven up materially now that the Republicans have named their men and the conditions of the race. Now it behooves the Democracy to show their hand—to be lovingly taken by the H. B.'s—that is unless the Bourbons buckle, which they have hardly the strength to do.

The Burial of Moses.

"And he buried him in a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor; but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day."—Deut. xxxiv, 6.

By Nebo's lonely mountain,
On this side Jordan's wave,
In a vale in the land of Moab,
There lies a lonely grave;
But no man built that sepulchre,
And no man saw it e'er,
For the angels of God upturned the sod
And laid the dead man there.

That was the grandest funeral
That ever passed on earth;
But no man heard the trampling
Or saw the train go forth.
Noiselessly as the daylight
Comes when the night is done,
And the crimson streak on ocean's cheek
Grows into the great sun;

Noiselessly as the spring-time
Her crown of verdure weaves,
And all the trees on all the hills
Open their thousand leaves;
So without sound of music,
Or voice of them that wept,
Silently down from the mountain's crown
The great procession swept.

Lo! when the warrior dieth,
His comrades in the war,
With arms reversed and muffled drum,
Follow the funeral car;
They show the banners taken,
They tell his battles won,
And after him lead his riderless steed,
While peals the minute gun.

Amid the noblest of the land
Men lay the sage to rest,
And give the bard an honored place,
With costly marble dressed,
In the great minster transept,
Where lights like glories fall,
And the choir sings and the organ rings
Along the emblazoned hall.

This was the bravest warrior
That ever buckled sword;
This the most gifted poet
That ever breathed a word;
And never earth's philosopher
Traced with his golden pen,
On the deathless page, truths half so sage
As he wrote down for men.

And had he not high honor?—
The hillside for his pall,
To lie in state while angels wait,
With stars for tapers tall—
And the dark rock-pines, like tossing plumes,
Over his bier to wave,
And God's own hand, in that lonely land,
To lay him in his grave;

In that strange grave without a name,
Whence his uncoffined clay
Shall break again—O wondrous thought!—
Before the judgment day.
And stand, with glory wrapped around,
On the hills he never trod,
And speak of the strife that won our life
With th' incarnate Son of God.

O lonely tomb in Moab's laod!
O dark Beth-peor's hill!
Speak to these curious hearts of ours,
And teach them to be still.
God hath his mysteries of grace,
Ways that we can not tell;
He hides them deep like the secret sleep
Of him he loved so well. C. F. ALEXANDER.

The Water Mill.

Listen to the water mill
Through the live-long day;
How the clanking of the wheels
Wear the hours away!
Loquidly the autumn wind
Stirs the greenwood leaves;
From the fields the reapers sing,
Binding up the sheaves.
And a proverb haunts my mind,
As a spell is cast:
"The mill will never grind
With the water that has passed."

Take the lesson to thyself,
Loving heart and true;
Golden years are fleeting by,
Youth is passing, too.
Learn to make the most of life,
Lose no happy day;
Time will never bring thee back
Chances swept away.
Leave no tender word unsaid,
Love while love shall last—
"The mill will never grind
With the water that has passed."

Work while yet the daylight shines,
Man of strength and will;
Never does the streamlet glide
Useless by the mill.
Wait not till to-morrow's sun
Beams upon the way;
All that thou canst call thine own
Lies in thine to-day.
Power, intellect, and health
May not, can not last—
"The mill will never grind
With the water that has passed."

Oh, the wasted hours of life
That have drifted by!
Oh, the good we might have done,
Lost without a sigh!
Love, that we might once have saved
By a single word,
Thoughts conceived, but never penned,
Perishing unheard.
Take the proverb to thy heart—
Take—oh, hold it fast!—
"The mill will never grind
With the water that has passed."

—From the German.

A DISTINGUISHED DINNER PARTY.

Cassery paused at the top of the broad, brown-stone steps, undecided whether to ring for admission or to retire ignominiously. It was already dark. No one was stirring on the street. To the right or to the left there opened a tempting avenue to escape. He found his pocket handkerchief, and wiped away the perspiration from his forehead. He put his hand upon the bell-knob and stopped to think.

A policeman slowly passing cast at him a look of surly inquiry. Cassery did not stir. The policeman passed on, tossing his club and catching it when it reached the end of the leathern tether that attached it to his wrist.

For ten or fifteen minutes Cassery stood on the stoop, leaning against one of the brown-stone pillars of the portico, reviewing the circumstances of his career of imposture. He felt that part of the blame belonged to himself, part to his environment, part to the cursed Law of Heredity. He remembered his father, the auctioneer, glibly rattling off his professional stock of falsehoods. He remembered his mother, the bluestocking, pretentiously discussing matters which she did not understand. He saw himself, a boy at school, copying compositions out of books and passing them off as his own. He saw himself a man, led from deceit to fraud by a weak hunger for adulation, building up an undeserved reputation for learning, recklessly appropriating the thoughts of other men, writing scientific articles for the local periodicals, lecturing before the lyceums in his native State, overshadowing with his plagiarisms and impudent pretensions the merit of honest scholars, seeking always to satisfy his vanity with homage to which he had no claim. He saw himself in the city at last, continuing on a larger scale the system of imposture which had succeeded so well in the country. Days spent in the libraries, pillaging the thoughts of the dead and absent; nights at his desk, arranging the plunder for sale or display; the fame won by his stolen essay on the Extinct Pachyderms; the excited controversy started by his stolen paper on the Triangular Theory of Light; the social position which he was gaining by virtue of his supposed acquirements; the newspaper notices which flattered his vanity while they excoriated his conscience; the complications of deceit and fraud into which he was plunging deeper and deeper—all these things came up to confront and terrify him as he stood at the door of the house to which he had been invited to meet four of the most eminent specialists of the age.

A slight noise across the street recalled his vagrant senses. The policeman stood there watching him with undisguised interest. Dizzy and sick at heart Cassery rang the door bell and was admitted.

Mrs. Walter Hewey arose to meet her guest, politely concealing her annoyance at his tardiness. Everybody had long been there. The four eminent scientists had yawned in each other's society, while the hostess and her husband were undergoing an agony of suspense lest the young man should fail her. He was the grand flat, the principal dish which she expected to serve up at her entertainment. His entrance set affairs in proper train.

At the announcement of the butler, the hostess took the arm of Professor Cadder. Her husband and Mrs. Professor Hemmingshaw led the way into the dining-room. Cassery came next, escorting Mrs. Doctor Thwing, a dainty blonde with spectacles. Her plump white hand rested proudly on Cassery's arm. Professor Flamway, a bachelor, and the greatest entomologist of the western hemisphere, gave his arm awkwardly to Mrs. Cadder, and Professor Hemmingshaw and Doctor Thwing followed with Miss Rideout and Miss Crooker, two maidens of robust intellect. Mrs. Walter Hewey and Professor Cadder made the rear.

A slight mishap occurred at the outset. Professor Flamway, who found his card without difficulty when he had anticipated much embarrassment in the search, was so charmed with his success that he seated himself before the others, and planted his elbow squarely in the midst of the wine glasses set at his place.

"I assure you I did not intend—it was purely accidental," stammered Professor Flamway, addressing himself to the butler, who had promptly come to the rescue.

The celebrated entomologist moodily applied himself to his oysters. Miss Crooker, who prided herself on her wit, spoke in a low tone to Miss Rideout, who laughed. Professor Flamway took it for granted that the ladies were deriding his embarrassment, and he blushed redder than before. "Miss Crooker was remarking," said Miss Rideout, with a sidelong glance at Cassery, "that we are rapidly adding to the list of Extinct Pachyderms."

"But, my dear," said Mrs. Hewey, "are you quite sure that the oyster is a pachyderm? My impression is that it's a polyp."

"Perhaps it is a pachydermatous polyp," suggested Miss Rideout.

Cassery felt that all eyes were turned upon him. He imagined that Doctor Thwing's face wore a cynical smile. So he nervously remarked:

"Let us not look too closely into the pedigree of such capital oysters. I am disposed to accept them on their merits."

As the dinner went on, the servants passing noiselessly behind the savants, exchanging plates and filling glasses, the ladies flushing in the heat of the gas jets and under the subtle influence of the wine, and Professor Flamway gradually recovering his self-respect by means of copious draughts, the conversation became steadier and more animated. Cassery did his utmost to keep it from drifting toward the topics which he dreaded. In this effort he was indirectly assisted by the four eminent specialists. They showed no eagerness to approach the fields in which they were so thoroughly at home. Cassery was grateful to them for this forbearance, and tactfully gave them credit for modesty and good taste.

But Mrs. Walter Hewey did not intend that her dinner should lose the clat of profoundly scientific discourse. At the first opportunity, over an entrée de ris de veau aux champignons, she leaned forward, and raising her voice to reach the ears of Professor Cadder, who sat half the length of the table away, she remarked:

"And the great work, Professor? Does it advance?"

"Slowly, madam," said he, casting a quick look at Cassery. "It is the work of a life-time."

"You must know, Mr. Cassery," said the hostess, "that the Professor is engaged on an exhaustive treatise on Chinese literature of the sixth century before Christ."

"And it will be delightful," cried Miss Rideout. "I am longing for its appearance."

Professor Cadder bowed in acknowledgment, and Cassery put on an expression of politeness.

"I am sure, Mr. Cassery," continued Mrs. Hewey, "that you can appreciate the value of his labors."

Cassery blushed. He was rather nervous, but felt called upon to say something. "It is a subject," he ventured, "in which I have taken some interest."

The eminent sinologist eyed him askance.

"I have thought," Cassery desperately continued, seeing that he was expected to make further remark on Chinese literature of the sixth century before Christ, "that a version of the philosophical poems of the great Kwang-Hi, preserving the original metres, would—" He stammered and stopped, for he saw that Professor Cadder was regarding him with a curious smile.

"How straight he goes to the heart of the subject!" said Miss Crooker in an audible whisper to Miss Rideout.

"He has caught me," thought Cassery. "What a confounded fool I am to compromise myself by attempting details."

The dinner went on. The intense yellow light from the blazing chandelier overhead poured down in an unrelenting flood upon the coiffures of the women and the bald heads of the scientists. The guests perspired. Mrs. Dr. Thwing's face was red. Bead-like drops, distilled by the heat and the wine, stood glistening upon her forehead and upon her fat white arms. She took her napkin, and, in shelter of the secrecy afforded by the table-cloth, stealthily wiped her arms up to the elbows. Cassery, who sat beside her, saw the deed. She perceived that he saw it, and her face grew rosier still.

Mrs. Hewey persistently directed the conversation to themes which she hoped would draw out Cassery. Like a strategist executing a flank movement, she approached his intellectual works under cover of a feigned assault upon Dr. Thwing. She led that celebrated microscopist to tell about the wonderful floriated follicle from the small intestines of a pig, which he had discovered yesterday under a binocular lens of 255 diameters. He compared the spectacle to a round bed of magnificent pansies. He became enthusiastic, and launched into a brilliant description of the Malpighian bodies in the splenic pulp.

The hostess was enchanted. She glanced from Dr. Thwing to Cassery, who listened with a frozen smile, and then from Cassery back to Dr. Thwing. The dinner had taken a truly scientific turn.

"And what is your theory of ciliary motion, sir?" asked the celebrated microscopist, turning to Cassery.

"I deny it, sir," boldly replied Cassery, who felt that that was his safest course.

"Deny it!" gasped the microscopist, turning pale. "And may I ask upon what grounds?"

"This is charming," whispered Miss Crooker to Miss Rideout. The butler opened the window at the top.

"I deny it," continued Cassery, growing reckless in the hopelessness of his situation, "because in the first—"

Fortunately, at this crisis, Professor Flamway created a diversion by upsetting a glass of wine upon the mauve silk overskirt of Miss Crooker. To relieve his pitiable confusion Mrs. Hewey politely inquired about the lepidoptera in his collection, and everybody talked of insects.

The desert had been put in place. The various wines had had their effect upon Cassery. He no longer avoided the topics which the indefatigable hostess urged upon his attention. Apprehension had given way to a sort of sardonic joy in involving himself deeper and deeper in difficulty. He plied Professor Flamway with questions, and assailed him with arguments on controverted points in entomological science. He recklessly combated the positions which Professor Hemmingshaw maintained in geology. He politely sneered at Professor Hemmingshaw's favorite theory of the Trenton limestone. He perceived with singular pleasure an evident disinclination on the part of the four eminent specialists to prolong the conversation on their respective subjects. He saw his wilder and wilder statements received by them in silence, while a peculiar expression grew upon their faces. He knew that he was suspected—more than suspected, detected—hemmed in by a square, at each corner of which sat a judge who could blast him with a word. He floundered on with the abandon of a man who has nothing to lose.

The dinner was over at last. The women, fanning themselves vigorously, swept into the drawing room. The men passed into the smoking room and lighted their cigars.

Professor Hemmingshaw drew Cassery aside from the others. Both gentlemen were nervous and embarrassed.

"A man's scientific reputation is his most precious treasure," began the Professor, significantly.

Cassery assented. He did not care now what happened. "And a man who has been sailing under false colors deserves to be exposed," continued the Professor.

"He does," said Cassery.

"Yet mercy is a noble quality," added the Professor, who showed much more agitation than his victim.

Cassery bowed his head and waited. They looked into each other's eyes. The Professor lowered his lashes.

"May I trust to your discretion?" he stammered.

A few minutes later Dr. Thwing, who was standing at a portfolio, turning over prints of Greek statuary, beckoned slyly to Cassery.

"You must have observed," he whispered.

Cassery nodded.

"I will be frank," the Doctor went on, "I place myself wholly on your forbearance."

"You have nothing to fear from me," replied Cassery, with a calm smile.

As they walked toward the drawing-room, to rejoin the ladies, Professor Cadder laid his hand appealingly upon Cassery's arm.

"We really know very little about Chinese literature of the sixth century before Christ," he tremulously remarked. "Very little!" said Cassery, in a severe tone.

The eminent sinologist shrank humbly away.

And as Cassery wished Professor Flamway a very good-night on the brown-stone steps of the house which they had just left in company, the great entomologist bent tearful eyes upon him.

"Pray don't expose me to the others," he said, in a piteous voice.

INTAGLIOS.

Le Roi est Mort.
And shall I weep that Love's no more,
And magnify his reign?
Sure never mortal man before
Would have his grief again.
Farewell the long-continued ache,
The days a-dream, the nights awake;
I will rejoice and merry make,
And never more complain.

King Love is dead and gone for aye,
Who ruled with might and main,
For with a bitter word one day
I found my tyrant slain;
And he in Heavens was bred,
Nor ever was baptized, 'tis said,
Nor is of any creed, and, dead,
Can never rise again.

To a Dragon-Flv.

You hail from Dream-land, Dragon-fly?
A stranger fither? So am I.
And (sooth to say) I wonder why
We either of us came.
Are you (that shine so bright 'i' the air)
King Oberon's state messenger?
Come tell me how my old friends fare.
Is Dream-land still the same?

Who won the latest tourney-fight,
King Arthur or the Red Cross Knight,
Or he who bore away the bright
Renowned Mambino's casque?
Is Caliban King's councillor yet?
Cross Mentor jester still and pet?
Is Suckling out of love and debt?
Has Spenser done his task?

Say, have they settled over there
Which is the loveliest, Guinevere
Or Gloriana, or the fair
Young Queen of Oberon's Court?
And does Titania torment still Mike Drayton and sweet-throated Will?
In sooth, of her amours 'twas ill
To make such merry sport.

Ah, I have been too long away!
No doubt I shall return some day.
But now I'm lost in love and may
Not leave my lady's sight.
Mine is (of course) the happier lot,
Yet—tell them I forget them not,
My pretty gay complot,
When you go home to-night.

A. M. F. ROBINSON.

Cupid Swallowed.

The other day, as I was twining
Roses for a crown to dine in,
What, of all things, midst the heap,
Should I light on, fast asleep,
But the little, desperate elf,
The tiny traitor, Love himself!
By the wings I pinched him up
Like a bee, and in a cup
Of my wine I plunged and sank him;
And, what d'ye think I did? I drank him!
Faith, I thought him dead. Not he!
There he lives with tenfold glee;
And now, this moment, with his wings,
I feel him tickling my heart strings.

LEIGH HUNT.

The Faddless Flower.

In our checkered journey through the world
There is a flower which greets our eye,
Like that on desert sands unfurled
To cheer the traveler passing by.
That flower is not of earthly mold;
'Tis opened by the voice of heaven;
'Twill weep, but yet 'twon't cry grow cold,
Even when the touch of scorn is given.
It blooms alike on desert sands,
As well as in the fertile plain;
And when 'tis crushed by cruel hands,
'Twill weep, then softly smile again.
'Tis found in darkest midnight gloom,
As well as in the noonday sun;
In pleasure's throng, and at the tomb,
It's fragrant life has just begun.
It is a gem that glitters bright
When all things else corrode and die;
To pity is its sole delirium—
Its fragrance to embalm a sigh.
Though rude winds blast its gentle folds,
Or earth's simoons may dry its leaves,
Yet for those cruel winds it holds
The heart that for another grieves.
When cares oppress and men forsake—
'E'en when a parent's love is dead—
Its hold around the heart 'twill take
And shelter there the outcast head.
Its smile reflects another's pleasure—
Its tears embalm another's woes;
To friends it proves a golden treasure,
A balsam to the wrath of foes.
'Twill live and bloom at heaven's gate,
On the cold, gray day of death;
And round the throne 'twill gently wait
To give the angel spirit breath.
Then cultivate that heavenly flower,
In storm or sunshine, tenderly,
It lives with calm yet holy power—
The fadless flower of SYMPATHY.

HENRY C. MANER.

False and True.

The false is fairer than the true. Behold
Von cloudy giant on the hills supine—
The figure of a falsehood that doth shine,
Armored and helmeted, in such a gown
As in the marts was never bought or sold—
Giant and armor the exalted sign
Of shapes less glorious and tints less fine,
Of forms of truth outmatched a thousand fold!

Ah, Poesie! thou charmer and thou cheat!
Painting for eyes that fill with happy tears,
In tints delusive, pictures that repeat
Dull, earthly forms in heavenly atmospheres!
How dost thou shame the truth, till it appears
Less lovely far than thy divine deceit!

The New Moon.

What gold-hued shallop in the western skies
Sinks to the distant hills when day has fled?
It is the new moon; and to paradise
It bears, with belling sails, the last month dead!

Erythronium (Dog's-Tooth Violet).

Of all the sweet surprises of the spring,
Each year renewed, yet each year new again,
None sends a gladder thrill through every vein,
None speeds the fancy on a swifter wing,
Than the first vision of thy loveliness,
O lily of the woods, stray child of June!
Dear runaway, thy sisters will come soon:
Meanwhile I take thee to my heart. Confess
Thy pranks. Why didst thou steal my violet name?
Why smirch thy pretty robe? Didst thou surmise
Feigned name or motley cloak could 'er disguise
Thy beauty? Lily art thou all the same.
Yet little heart have I thy task to blame:
I love thee; thou art here; let that suffice.

ABOUT WOMEN.

Eve was the first woman who went to the devil.
Woman's sphere—that she will never get married.
A woman under fifty should have eight hours of sleep.

Clocked stockings should never be allowed to run down.

One girl in the kitchen is worth two at the front gate.

It was the freckled-face, red-nosed girl who seidlitz powder.

In Zululand the women wear more clothes than the men do.

Eve's court dress would have tickled the Princess Louise half to death.

"I like to make sponge cake," she said innocently; "it makes my hands so clean."

One of the novelties with the Great Eastern Circus is a female clown—Adah Isaacs.

The true way to secure a friend is to mistake an elderly lady for her daughter.

Youth and beauty don't amount to much unless backed by wealth and wardrobe.

A Davenport lady is about to sue for a divorce on the ground that her husband "has no style about him."

If a lady wants a favor of a boy she praises him; of a young man, she hires him; of an old man, she flatters him.

An axiom in the philosophy of the young lady whose dresses are a little too thin: "There's no effect without gauze."

The Persians say that "ten measures of talk were sent down from heaven and the women took nine." The first Persian caught on the street will do doubt suffer for this.

The fellows are all in love with the landlady's daughter, and since the old lady heard that "love can level rank," she lets her daughter serve the butter to the guests.

Adoring one in lavender gloves and a blue scarf.—"Oh, how I wish I were that book you clasp so lovingly!" She.—"How I wish you were, so that I could shut you up!"

The New York Herald states positively that the reason why Vassar girls slide down on the bannisters is because there are so many slices of bread and golden syrup on the golden stairs.

A disobedient little girl being told by her mother that it was necessary that she should be whipped, said: "Well, ma, then I suppose I must; but won't you give me chloroform first?"

A French widow is bewailing the recent loss of her husband. "I have at least one consolation," she sobs out, drying her tears. "At all events, I know where he spends his nights now."

Ladies are like watches—pretty enough to look at; sweet face and delicate hands; but somewhat difficult to "regulate" after they are set going.

A Michigan girl coaxed her lover to take her carriage riding, and the horse ran away and killed her. Showing this paragraph to the girls will be thousands of dollars in the pockets of our young men.

When you see a woman going toward the river with a good-sized pole in her hand, and a wrinkle across her nose, you needn't think she's going fishing. Not much; she's got a boy down that way who promised her with tears in his eyes, he wouldn't go in swimming.

Aunt—Well, love, did Mr. McSiller propose? Edith—No, Aunt; but he was on the verge of it when— Aunt—When what, darling? Edith—When the clock struck and reminded him that there was only time to catch the last cheap train, and he had a return ticket.

An English journal commenting on the annoyances with servant girls, describes America as a country "where the 'domestic service' difficulty assumes proportions as far beyond our little troubles of the same kind here in England as the volume of the Mississippi is beyond that of the Thames."

Mrs. Hayes went into executive session the other day: Introduced a bill providing that her husband should wear his flannels until the first of July, suspended the rules, moved its third reading, had it engrossed, demanded the previous question, passed it by one majority, and sent it to Mr. Hayes for approval.

Scene on Columbus avenue, at a house where a great many rehearsals of Pinafore have taken place for private representation: The little child, who has just broken out with the chicken pox, is asked by the mother, "What do you think your papa will say when he sees his darling little girl in such a plight?" "Oh, I s'pose he'll say, 'Why, damme! it's too bad.'"

"My little seven-year old girl," writes a friend, "was in the sitting-room alone with her uncle, and dreamily looking from the window. Without turning her head, she said 'Uncle Horace, eight and seven make fifteen, don't they?' He replied that she was right. 'Then,' said she, in half soliloquy, 'it is only eight years before I shall have a bean, and O! I dread it.'"

At last a witty woman has built a "God bless 'em" toast to the men. Mrs. Dunnway, at a literary reunion at Salem, Oregon, toasted them in these words: "God bless 'em. They halve our joys, they double our sorrows, they treble our expenses, they quadruple our cares, they excite our magnanimity, they increase our self respect, they awaken our enthusiasm, they arouse our affections, they control our property, and out-manceuvre us in everything."

Mrs. Jennie Stirling publishes a poem beginning, "Where shall I find my boy?" Well, we can tell you. You want to run straight down the Agency road, past the first farm outside the city limits; and then, if you trot along pretty lively, when you get about twenty-five feet ahead of the man and about, say, eleven feet ahead of the dog, you will find your boy, with a paper bag full of strawberries crushed under his arm, doing his level best to increase his lead on the dog. But you want to hump yourself, for when we last looked at the procession it wasn't standing still—not by about eighty-five miles an hour.—Norristown Herald.

AN INTERCEPTED LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 10, 1879.

MY DEAR MADGE:—Theatrical management in San Francisco has all the delicious uncertainty of a bet on a roulette ball or a venture in Bodie. It is said of us out here that we are hypercritical—iconoclastic to a degree in the oftentimes scurvy manner in which we shatter the footlight idols from beyond the Sierra; that the bonbon of our enthusiasm, richly flavored though it be to the artist hicky enough to taste its sweetness, is crusted with sugar so hard that only genius can penetrate through it to the richness within. And it is true, Madge, though the cavaliers erroneously attribute it to our dramatic culture instead of the circumstances of our daily life. We are a peculiar people, and the atrophy of our enthusiasm is a disease for which our society and Pine Street are alone responsible. With Gold, Love, and Death, the three grand caterers to our love of the sensational, daily producing the old dramas with new casts from among our acquaintance, the mimic agonies of theatrical display become insipid enough beside the horrid realism that makes us shudder daily, if we are not too blasé. With a dozen Messalinas in our parlors, and a hundred Marguerites on our pavements, the simplicity and triteness of the Faust story induces a yawn, however well it be told. Stage "asides" have but little interest beside Souchoong gossip and club scandal, and to view the dramatic villain relegated to obliquity while his society, political, commercial, or clerical brother is laden with honors and riches, is a satire of which we are weary, and a farce that becomes a bore. We live too fast for idealism. We are too blasé to use the eyeglass of imagination in viewing the life-pictures—badly enough drawn, as a rule, on our stage—when the lognet of experience has a lens perhaps a trifle less seductive as far as delusion goes, but sublimely more truthful and gratifying to our shrewder sense. I should like to see one drama wherein the antique folly that stolen bread turns bitter in the unrighteous mouth does not prevail; one stage picture wherein virtue toils to the tomb amid the rags and crusts of a garret, while vice fattens on champagne and truffles amid the velvet richness of gilded chambers; one story in whose denouement unprincipled scheming and selfish savoir faire obtains the ruddy ripe fruitage of position and place, and righteous self-denial perforce contents itself with shriveled windfalls and discarded cores. And I should like above and beyond all things to hear haut monde call it a shame and bas monde dub it an outrage, while a virtuous daily press, with one eye on public opinion and the other on the money-drawer, held up its chaste hands in holy horror, and wept in the "gamy" odor of journalistic sanctity. In fact, Madge, we are a people whose ideas, whose social structure, and whose press have taught us to see behind the masks, and when this standpoint has been reached, that stage and that artist will alone awake enthusiasm whose ideas are true enough to nature, and whose art is near enough to realism to awake the wearied sympathy and ennuye interest that are continually called into play by surroundings that are dramatic to a degree that the romancers do not dream of, and the comedy-writers do not know. The inspiring cause of this possible irrelevancy is the reception accorded Lester Wallack on Monday night. One would have thought that his name and fame would have won him a full house, but it was not so. On the contrary, six rows of empty seats in the dress circle, and a meagre fringe of spectators in the balcony, proved a satirical commentary on the announcement of "Free List Suspended," and made the ten thousand dollars to be paid the star for his four weeks disagreeably evanescent to the California management. I don't know, though, as the public is to be blamed for not paying a dollar and a half per head to bow down at a shrine where the altar picture of St. Wallack is illumined by such sputtering rush lights as Belle Chapman and Mr. Bock. I might as well include Mr. Keene, too, as far as society acting goes, for never having seen him dress like a gentleman, I can't expect him to act like one, and his performance in a Robertson comedy has all the sadness of a playful jumping-jack doomed to the tyranny of a fastened string, whose pitiless inelasticity prevents its achievement of those eccentricities which are alike its enjoyment and pride. Mr. Wallack was superb. His art is all studied, yet seemingly the apparent perfection of ease and naturalness. His "Hugh Chalcoete" was a quiet picture in subdued half tones, exquisite in ensemble and perfect in details. A multitude of little touches made a complete and rounded thing, who lived before us and whose every motion seemed to have been planned. It was very near perfect art, Madge, only there was a far-off shadow of the has-been upon it—a feeling, born of a voice that has forgotten some of its fullness, and an action that has lost some of its primitive vivacity and grace, that crept in upon our admiration and interest, and made us wish that we had seen him when he was younger, before the setting sun clothed in partial shadow the bright glories of the earlier day. In his own theatre, supplemented by artists trained after his own artistic fashion, the old comedy would be a rare treat; but played as it was, it was no wonder that its familiarity grew wearisome when he was off the stage, and the audience rapturously applauded a military march and some red-coated supers as a solemn preventive. Mrs. Saunders was good, as usual, and la petite Gilman's "Mary Nettley" was strong and forcible, though not sufficiently raffine. As for the others, they betrayed a magnificent lack of the society drama finish and the subtlety of resource that a comedy like Ours implacably demands. Of his "Adonis Evergreen," which I hear is charming, and his "Elliot Gray," in Rosedale, underlined for next Monday, I will tell you next week. In Ours he was a real picture framed in artificial unreality, and in this respect not unlike Denman Thompson at the Bush Street Theatre. I went there on Tuesday night, Madge, and looked up at the painted Shakespeare above to wonder—if the sightless eyes could have been given vision and the canvas brain perceptive qualities—if the great creator of the stage would not have been carried back to his own sweet days, when the sturdy burghers of London warmed with the passion and wept with the woes of a "Juliet" who sat sorrowing under a bare sign-board saying, "This is Verona;" for a crude play said, "This is New England," and crude characters came and went before me, and amid it all, there moved an old man called "Josh Whitcomb," who almost made me believe that he was a veritable growth of the Vermont hills, wandering with a lot of people who adapted their actions to delude him with stage trickery and exhibit him in his pristine freshness and bucolic veridancy. Perhaps I might have thought so had I not seen the impulsive, energetic, and right-minded old man who believed in his son firmly, settle down to weep and wail the moment the boy was arrested, without taking any further interest in the affair. But the incongruity only proves that the creature is the actor's, and not the playwright's. It is a queer thing, Madge, this genius that takes the semblance of an ignorant farmer and yet beguiles us into that sweetest homage to art, delusion. There was genius in the very set of his pants, and his art, from the cow-hide boots on the feet to the mask of rugged good nature on the face, was wonderful. He is not merely a type; he is a phenomenon. "Josh Whitcomb" is a long step in advance of "Fritz" and its compeers on the pathway that eads in the goal of all dramatic ambitions, and a goal which a refining and keenly perceptive age is coming to demand—realism. It was rather a risky thing for the Baldwin people to bring out The Danicheffs with the richly colored pageantry of heroic action that the Union Square Company presented still vivid before our eyes—risky as it always is to offer a chromo to him who has viewed the glory of the original, or a Strakoschian aria to one who has drifted off into the cloud-world of harmony amid the magic melodies of La Scala. And so it proved. Kate Denin only served to remind us of Fanny Morant—whom we recalled, with her haughty pride of centuries, and her loyalty to the Danicheffs, that scorned the maternal yearnings which threatened the sovereignty of a queen in her domestic empire. The part is a great one, and a touch of weakness ruins it, for only the stern fixed devotion to noblesse oblige, the creed of a great race cut in the granite of her disposition, pardons the baseness of the "Lady Danicheff's" conduct, and wins her the sympathies. And Kate Denin wrestling with this grandeur was a crow attempting to carry off a sheep, or an ambitious mouse embezzling an ostrich egg, for it was beyond her scope. Her rendition was unique in one respect, however, for she dodged the stage manager in the third act, and appeared on the stage in a wealth of hues comparable only to a box of colors struck by lightning, or a picture by Norton Bush gone mad. And so with "Osip." The ruling idea of the character is strength. The grand manliness of the serf must first be impressed in the strongest possible way, in order that the self-denial and mental struggle be duly effective. But O'Neill's rendition was from the first humble and sorrowing, its manly bloom deepened with the pallor of a manifest destiny, and the result was a sort of Gethsemane idyl adapted from the Russian. Nina Varian did "Anna" in the prescribed style, bubbling over with emotion like a hot spring at pericardial times, and subsiding into placidity and a good pose immediately afterward. She is finely trained, and would have well carried off a rôle altogether too heavy for her, if she could have only convinced us for a moment that she was feeling instead of acting. Forcing has its beauties for both actresses and asparagus, though unfortunately it always develops flavorless results. Miss Coghlan had little to do as the "Princess Lydia," and did not exert herself to do that; the houses were too light. Jennings' "Zakaroff" was admirable. The Pinkflore cases have been reduced to one, the Melville party, who have had full houses through the week past, and doubtless will through the next. Mr. Chas. Dungan took Mr. Goodrich's place as the "Captain" on Wednesday night, and after his nervousness in a new and ill-rehearsed part wears off will do it nicely, and make the performance more charming than ever. Du reste, there is nothing in particular to announce, and so I bid you, for a week, au revoir. AMELIA A., proxy of Betsy B.

A MORAL DRAMA.

The Secret of Joshua Whitcomb's Success.

Last Monday evening I drifted down from the California, where Lester Wallack—New York's dramatic idol—bad bowed his opening to barely half a house, and dropped curiously into the Bush Street Theatre, where a crowded audience, in orchestra, parquet, dress circle, and overflowing gallery, were giving an enthusiastic, and hearty, and honest welcome back to old "Uncle Joshua Whitcomb," as personated by Denman Thompson. And, as I stood there and saw the performance progress, and heard the laughter that bubbled right up and out at each quaint and homely saying, and noted the faces and the characters of the people present, I naturally began to cast about for an explanation of this wonderful phenomenon. Was it that the plain, unpretending sketch of Uncle Joshua overshadowed and overwhelmed the brilliant comedy of Ours? Was it that Denman Thompson was more famous as an actor than Lester Wallack, with all his announcement and reputation—the man whom the New York Herald in its enthusiasm recommended to us as "the boss brilliant in the coronet of stars who preceded him"? Was it that the plain, unpretentious dressing and acting and ensemble of the support of "Uncle Josh" was more attractive than the trains, and diamonds, and drawing-room surroundings of the handsome New Yorker? Was the dingy and ill-ventilated little Bush Street Theatre more comfortable than the frescoed auditorium higher up the street? None of these reasons, evidently. What then? A non-appreciation of the art of the gentleman, and a preference for the dialogue of the bucolic boor? No. A freak of the fickle public to desert one actor and demonstrate over another—an accident of an evening? Most certainly not, for the attendance and verdict of subsequent evenings were stronger and more pronounced than the first. What answer, then? Is it sweet simplicity versus the shimmering sham of the drama, realism against romance, modesty preferred to morbidness, that wins? Yes; yes, without a doubt. The sketch of Uncle Joshua Whitcomb is a homely picture, but it is clean and healthful to look at. It teaches a moral lesson that a whole library of Sunday-school books could not expound. It preaches a sermon of practical religion that not one of the cloth could so thoroughly illustrate, and under this sign it conquers and captures us all. For who—no matter what his moral or religious belief—can fail to sympathize with the sentiment that animates "Uncle Josh" when, in the great city, he comes face to face with a poverty, and a destitution, and a degree of degradation that he may have beard of, but had never before seen or known. How we duplicate his indignation when he encounters the drunken and worthless husband, the brutal step father; and how the average heart goes out with his when he promises the dying woman that she and her child shall be cared for "just as though they were his own," and taking the body to his own homestead, buries it in a little grassy meadow where "Little Tot," when she "feels lonesome, and blue, and discouraged, and tired, can go and sit down on mother's grave and have a good cry, and feel better for it!" The little dialogues between "Roundy," the boot-black, and "Little Tot," both in the city and when they meet again on the farm, are instructive as well as interesting, and replete with telling points for the young. In their homely but straightforward and pointed remarks and discussions there is more logic than is written in any moral law, and in Eastern towns where "Uncle Josh" has played people have brought their children for the express purpose of having them listen in all seriousness and appreciation to this little conversation between the two regarding the Sunday-school. And it is just this sort of thing—this religious and moral quality—that makes the play so successful. It gets right under the public vest at once, and creeps right into the popular heart in that sunny, silent, and confiding way that the child seats himself on the visitor's knee. It wins a species of appreciation and applause that it is not difficult to place, because it is honest. The laughter comes broad, and hoarse, and hearty from an unmistakable source, and the moistened eyes during the pathetic parts, and more particularly when the confiding old farmer hears, without having his faith shattered, that his boy has gone wrong, tell of tears direct from the well of a common feeling. It is the same material, and the same patronage and appreciation that have made Uncle Tom's Cabin, with its "Little Eva" and its pious "Uncle Tom," and its prayers, and songs, and sorrows, and homelike scenes, the marvel of dramatic managers, and a play that brings out the conservative element—people who seldom or never attend the average theatrical performance, but who go to an entertainment of this description very much as they would go to church or Sunday-school—for its moral atmosphere, and the instruction and the example to be obtained. These people are no friends of the romantic and more artistic school; they get no satisfaction from a plot that begins with deceptive love, develops into disbonnet marriage, and ends in disagreeable divorce details, or a dreadful though deserved death. They are not keen in their appreciation of dialogue that dances continually on the verge of indecency, with situations that are questionable, with scenes that expose and shake in one's very face all the heartless details of unhappy, unwholesome, and unhallowed life.

They do not believe this morbid food is fit to eat. They do not think it a proper mental dish to set before the young. They do not recognize the exposure as an entertainment, and if by accident they should go, they refuse to be fascinated by its dressing and drawing-room details, to smile at its broad suggestions, or to laugh at its questionable wit. But in a bit of realism, strong and sturdy in the right, they revel. They are uproarious in their mirth, keen in the appreciation of a joke, strong in sympathy. They live in the stage picture. They forget they are in a theatre. They sing in spirit the plaintive little songs whose unembellished notes are better than any opera music that was ever composed, and they follow the common-place text with an earnestness that keeps them close up to every situation, and holds them impassible and interested till the very drop of the curtain. And it is not to be questioned that clean, healthful plays of this description do a world of good. They deal so closely with fact that you can not get away from the moral by pleading that it is fiction. The sweet little pastoral sketch of Fanchon the Cricket, that I saw when a boy, impressed me more thoroughly regarding the temptations of life than all the dramas in imaginary or real life that I have since seen. The horrors of drunkenness as depicted in Ten Nights in a Barroom have saved more brevet toppers than all the temperance lectures and blue-ribbon brigades that ever labored. The piously-upturned and angelic face of little "Eva," and the simple story of "Uncle Tom's" suffering, have done more for the cause of the oppressed than ever did the golden rule; and the honesty of purpose, and character, and philanthropy of "Uncle Josh" and attendant characters teach a lesson that in our swirling and selfish life we need. And so I feel safe in advising an evening with "Uncle Josh" as equally beneficial to the ordinary religionist as a prayer-meeting. In fact, at Greeley, Colorado, on the way hither, a prayer-meeting was actually adjourned to see the Denman Thompson troupe, the minister and the whole flock attending, to enjoy the performance bugely, and to go away with the satisfaction of a hundred concentrated sermons. I advise it for the young, the old, the grave and the gay, the unsophisticated and the blasé. I advise it for the dyspeptic, the disappointed, to those dissatisfied with their lot, to those whose hearts are hardened and whose chords of sympathy are unstrung. I commend it to the church, the school, the home circle, as an entertainment that no one can afford to miss, and something that will always be a pleasant remembrance and a pleasure to speak of. Especially do I entreat to an audience with the New Hampshire farmer, "every mother's son" and daughter born in old New England, or within sight of its cloud-capped granite hills; for with this quaint old character they will live over again their early life. They will have recalled the barn "raisings," the "logging bees," the "corn huskings," and locate those "pepper and salt" pants and broad-gauge boots on many an old chap they have known whittling away and discussing the weather and the crops in the horse shed of a country church of a Sunday afternoon. It is wonderful how perfect and realistic the picture is. It affects one with almost the force of the actual scene, and there comes at times an impulse to step up to "Josh" on the stage and greet him as an old acquaintance, and have him grab your hand and exclaim, "Well, I'm real glad to see you, by gosh!" You breathe again with him the country air, you see through the painted perspective of his stage home into the meadows of the old homestead where you caroled away your own childhood's happy days: the fields fringed with sombre stone walls, and the waving grass interspersed with the red clover blossom, and the white daisy, and the golden buttercup; the cattle in the pasture beyond, and the brook beside the wood. There stands the house, and the barn, and the old well-sweep, and the picture as you left it to stray away out here to the outer fringe of the continent, and mix in other scenes, and gradually forget the joys and the associations of youth. But memory is a swift reminder when such a picture as "Uncle Josh" is presented, and every detail comes back so vividly that you finally sigh that the bit of realism is not reality in fact. But enough of the old farmer and his naturalness. I started in wondering why he drew such audiences, and now I wonder no longer. It is not his art—it's his artlessness.

"Nature is made better by no mean,
But nature makes that mean; so o'er that art
Which, you say, adds to nature, is an art
That nature makes."

"This is an art
Which does mend nature—change it rather—but
The art itself is nature."

And those who appreciate this are those who love "Uncle Josh"; and those who love him, love him for his homely and honest worth; and this is a sufficient explanation of his wonderful and steadily increasing popularity. OUT.

The last scores of the archery tournament will be shot to-day at the Oakland cricket grounds, where the club flags are now flying over the picturesque tents on the pretty sward. Among the features of to-day's shooting will be the contest for "The ARGONAUT Arrow," the ladies' prize for the best score at the twenty-yard range. To reach the Oakland cricket grounds take the half-hour Oakland boats, changing to the Berkeley train at the Point. Next week we shall publish the full score of the tournament.

"FROM UP NORTH."

He had put in about thirty years on this mundane sphere, distant 90,000,000 miles from the sun, and his clothing had that limpsy, limber look that gives a man away at once. Yes, he was a little knee-sprung, and when he braced up, took a direct line for a lamp-post and missed it by four feet, he looked back and said:

"Well, I didn't wao' you anyhow! I'm able stan' up, jus' er same, 'bout any your help, an' you go er Texas!"

He came to this office. He has something to do with a newspaper up North, and a sort of fraternal feeling drifted him down Griswold Street. He came up stairs on seventeen different angles. People who were going down as he came up were satisfied that he was an angle-Saxon. After recovering his poise he made a dive into one of the editorial rooms and said:

"H'lo! Come 'er shee you! Been wa'n shee you morn' year."

He was asked to sit down. He walked over to a chair, carefully seized the arms, turned himself slowly around, and then suddenly fell backward into the chair, with a look of relief spreading clear back to his ears.

"Zhas way I allus sit down," he explained, as he took out his watch and looked at the back of it to see the time.

"You shee, I got shtiff leg, an' I fall on floor 'n doan' look out. Ish 'er big press run'n ter-day?"

"Yes."

"Well, let 'er run. I can't shtop 'er, can I? How many 'pressions now does 'er run off?"

"Oh I about fifteen thousand."

"Zhat all! Why, I can beat zhat on han'-press! Yes shur, fi' can't beat zhat on han'-press I'll give you shen dollar bill."

He started to rise up, but a sudden thought restrained him, and after settling back he said:

"How many col'mns mazzar can you write up in one day?"

"Not over ten."

"Can't you? Why, you must be awf' slow! I can write forty col'mns a day jus' like nozzings. I wouldn't hav' such a slow man 'roun' me—no shur!"

There was silence for a moment, and then he confidently inquired:

"You beez drinking?"

"No."

"Nor I, eizher. I'm zhust shober's dook. You own zhis town?"

"No."

"Nor I, eizher. I doan' own nozzing. You got any money in y'r pozzet?"

"No."

"Zhas me again! I hav'n't got red shent to my name. You goin' to walk home on dirt road!"

"Yes."

"Soam mi—shake! You are bes' fell'r I ev'r shaw my hull life. You goin' down shtairs now?"

"Yes."

"By Shorge! you mus' be my twin bruzzer! You fink shames I do."

When he got to the head of the stairs his "stiff leg" suddenly weakened, and the man went down stairs in a heap—in three or four heaps. It is a long stairs which has no end, and when he finally reached it he carefully sat up on the floor, felt of his head, and called out:

"Did er hurt you any?"

"No, not a bit," replied the man at the head of the stairs.

"And didn't hurt me, eizher—not one shingle hurt!" he chuckled, and carefully clutching the wall, he steadied himself out of doors, and took the middle of the street as he started for the Post-Office.—Trois Free Press.

A PLUNGE IN THE BAY.

Get up early in the morning, all you enervated, and limp, and lifeless toilers at sedentary pursuits, and take a header from the spring-board at North Beach. It will send new and vigorous blood coursing through your contracted veins. It will give you a new lease of life. It will enable you to drink in the champagne of the early morning air, and sit you down to your breakfast with an appetite like the roaring young lion. It will make you feel good-natured when you go down to business, and you can knock off more hard work in one hour than before you could stagger through with in a whole forenoon. Try the experiment and keep trying it till you have thoroughly tested the effect. It will not cost half the trouble that it is worth. It will get you at your office earlier in the morning, and will send you to bed sooner at night. The expense is but a trifle: five cents car fare if you don't walk, and three tickets for twenty-five cents at the Neptune and Mermaid baths at the foot of Larkin or Hyde streets. Within the last month ladies have taken to the beach in great numbers to bathe, and special arrangements have been made by the management for their accommodation. There is a competent instructor in swimming and obliging attendants, and perfect safety with the graduated depth of water on the sandy beach. Try an afternoon bath, say at or after four o'clock, and you will better enjoy your dinner. At this season the water is crisp and sparkling, and as bracing as the ocean breeze.

FASHIONABLE PHOTOGRAPHS.

For finely finished photographs our swell people are still giving their patronage to the firm of Bradley & Rulofson, for in execution and perfection, in likeness, and style, and finish they still stand foremost. Bear in mind that it is no economy to have a cheap picture; the best are always the cheapest, and the better the artist the better the picture. Remember this, and patronize the establishment that gives the greatest satisfaction to the greatest number. This is the best recommendation of excellence you can get. It is a recommendation of this description that the firm of Bradley & Rulofson pride themselves on.

OH! BOYS!

A CHANCE FOR THE BOYS.

Boys wanted to sell the ARGONAUT on Saturday of each week.

Business for the boys.

Money for the boys.

From 50 cents to $5 profit made in a single day.

One thousand boys wanted to work up ARGONAUT routes for themselves, and get from $1 to $5 per week for a few hours' labor.

A steady thing when once started.

25 subscribers will guarantee to each boy $1 income per week.

50 subscribers $2 income per week.

75 subscribers $3 income per week.

100 subscribers $4 income per week.

And all for an hours' work of a Saturday.

Boys in this city have started with only three or four subscribers, and now have from one to two hundred each, and gaining every week.

One boy has a bank account of $135; another has saved up over $50, as the result of trying this experiment.

Let every boy desirous of earning a little spending money make his friends help him start a list.

Boys always have plenty of friends in their first business venture.

A single half-dollar is sufficient to make a beginning.

This is all the capital needed.

The very first week a profit, though ever so small, comes in.

The second week the profit increases.

Then the increase becomes a steady thing, and the boy is independent.

TRY IT, TRY IT.

Count up the relations, friends, and acquaintance, whom you think would take the paper.

Then start on next Saturday and deliver to as many subscribers as you can get.

You will be pleased with the result.

You will have independent spending money.

You will have a little business of your own.

You will have lots of fun.

If you conclude to try the experiment, try it at once.

This is a good time to begin.

Start on Saturday next.

Don't be discouraged at a small beginning, for tall oaks from little acorns grow.

The profit is well worth the time spent.

Success is a sure thing.

Nothing ventured nothing gained.

Show this to some gentleman friend and ask him to capitalize you for a start.

You can pay back the capital advanced the first week.

Then you are under no obligations.

Then you are a full fledged man of business.

For price of papers and further particulars inquire at this office.

REMEMBER, this is a chance for every boy.

One thousand boys wanted to try this experiment in every city, town, and village on the Pacific Coast.

There is money in it, and no possibility of failure or loss.

COMPOUND

FLUID EXTRACT

BUCHU.

PHARMACEUTICAL.

A SPECIFIC

REMEDY FOR ALL DISEASES

....OF THE....

BLADDER AND KIDNEYS.

FOR DEBILITY, LOSS OF MEMOry, Indisposition to Exertion or Business, Shortness of Breath, Troubled with Thoughts of Disease, Dimness of Vision, Pain in the Back, Chest, and Head, Rush of Blood to the Head, Pale Countenance, and Dry Skin. If these symptoms are allowed to go on, very frequently Epileptic Fits and Consumption follow. When the constitution becomes affected it requires the aid of an invigorating medicine to strengthen and tone up the system, which

HELMBOLD'S BUCHU

Does in every case.

HELMBOLD'S BUCHU

IS UNEQUALED

By any remedy known. It is prescribed by the most eminent physicians all over the world in

Rheumatism,
Spermatorrhoea,
Neuralgia,
Nervousness,
Dyspepsia,
Indigestion,
Constipation,
Aches and Pains,
General Debility,
Kidney Diseases,
Liver Complaint,
Nervous Debility,
Epilepsy,
Head Troubles,
Paralysis,
General Ill Health,
Spinal Diseases,
Sciatica,
Deafness,
Decline,
Lumbago,
Catarrh,
Nervous Complaints,
Female Complaints, etc.

Headache, Pain in the shoulders, Cough, Dizziness, Sour
Stomach, Eruptions, Bad Taste in the Mouth, Palpitation of the Heart, Pain in the region of the Kidneys, and a thousand other painful symptoms, are the offspring of Dyspepsia.

HELMBOLD'S BUCHU

INVIGORATES THE STOMACH

And stimulates the torpid Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys to healthy action, in cleansing the blood of all impurities, and imparting new life and vigor to the whole system. A single trial will be quite sufficient to convince the most hesitating of its valuable remedial qualities.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

WRIGHT C. KING, plaintiff, vs. MALISSA KING,
defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth
Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to
MALISSA KING, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days
(exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served
out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be
taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.
The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds
set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference
is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and
answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.
Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court
of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this twenty-fourth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE BUTTERCUPS AND HEBES OF SOCIETY.

BY CHARLES WARREN STOODARD.

It was festival night at the manor-seat of the Great Mogul. Six hundred guests arrived by special train from the metropolis. The high road that winds from the station to the estate through one of the indigenous parks of California was hung with a thousand lanterns; carriage wheels rolled noiselessly over beds of fern and cedar, the dust was happily laid, the air sweetened with the expressed perfumes of bruised boughs. The tented lawn rang with the laughter of women; the illuminated pavilions were thronged with the elect; the tribe of Jenkins was in the midst of them, busy as the summer flies that fatten in the shambles. It was but recently that the Great Mogul decreed his pleasure dome; it was but recently that he found leisure in which to dream; then, having set his heart upon the soil from which he gleaned his wealth, this fabric huge rose like an exhalation. It is a home, the memory of which might cause the charming Josephine to hesitate between love and luxury. It is of an inexplicable order of architecture, a conglomeration of bay-windows and balconies set in clysian shades. The fungous shell is of wood, arabesqued and elaborately parqueted. Marble columns support the fragile roof; the ancestral armor is imported, and came over in the same ship with the carved oak from distant Rome, rich oriental rugs, rare blue and white Venetian finger-glasses. There was a smell of varnish pervading the establishment, which even the pastiles could not smother. The guests wandered through the many chambers of the mansion, from the pink room, a boudoir with fantastic furniture flushed like the peregrinal strawberry, through rainbow-tinted apartments, to the picture gallery with its colossal orchestration. That ingenious instrument ground out at intervals its mechanical harmonies. The melodious confusion was increased by the shrill piping of a myriad of caged canaries, hidden among palm thickets and flowering jungles. Scores of attentive waiters were constantly in motion, liberally dispensing the choicest wines. What more could be desired? Fascinating women, in suggestive costumes, crouched among golden cushions in voluptuous repose, or floated in the embrace of some stalwart hero of the "Ouida" type through the delicious mazes of the Dance of Death. These living pictures reminded one forcibly of the delectable "Guy Livingstone" era; they were studies upon which our popular modern fiction is founded. Is it any wonder that the tribe of Jenkins foraging in such society should secure in a single night spoils sufficient for the upholstery of forty novels? But we haven't yet been presented to the Great Mogul and his consort. In truth, we have never met him. It is not likely that a tenth part of the six hundred who have so bravely responded to his call ever before laid eyes on him, or will again repeat the act unless by order of the authority invested in the secret invitation committee. We are conducted to the throne-room and formally announced. Having assured the host and hostess that their fête outshines the fabulous splendor of an Oriental dream, we withdrew; but not till we have been introduced to a select few of those privileged retainers—

"His sisters, and his cousins, and his aunts."

With as little delay as possible we return to the conservatories, where one may smoke in peace. In this exceptional clime the crowded chambers are uncomfortably warm, the garden is chilly; between the two one sneezes in the draught. Left comparatively alone for a few moments (the ladies were discussing archery upon the lawn), I began to philosophize on the social problem; possibly my mood was aggressive. Probably, had the Great Mogul, whose sentiments are vociferously echoed by the admiring crowd of female relations who attend him, ever heard my soliloquy, never again would his ample pasteboard, addressed in text-hand, have surprised me at the club. I said to myself of this demi-god: Take him for all in all, he could not have become more suddenly conspicuous had he been mixed in infancy by some perfidious but repentant Buttercup; now, at a moment's notice does he not lord it like a regular patrician? Chorus:

"And so do his sisters, and his cousins, etc."

On the other hand, why should he not lord it with any lord in any land? What are titles to him unless he has won them by the sweat of his brow? He knows well enough how sad a fate it is to be squeezed out of the small end of an illustrious pedigree. Who is the seventeenth earl of What's-name? A young fellow whose remote ancestor achieved honor though he was the son of no one of consequence. The Mogul of California is not willing to allow that the first earl's blood suffered any chemical change on receipt of a title from the throne. He knows that the blood has been flowing in various courses and has been diluted from generation to generation ever since; how much of it, think you, remains in the seventeenth remove from the fountain-head—the only Simon Pure? The palace of the Great Mogul is perfect in every part; it supplemental modern conveniences are unknown in the antiquated castle of the earl. His revenues are imperial; his charities that begin at home seldom go abroad unless trumpeted, but at home they are published in every shape, from chromos to crown-diamond. You and your admiration are invited; you may ogle his wares, you may feast with the pecunious at a board resplendent with a service of gold. Hebe is at your side by virtue of a fortunate marriage; likewise little Buttercup, who mated with her Captain, the vicarious Corcoran, who still sails under his complimentary title with at least three sheets in the wind. There is an idolized Baron, who is anon rusticated, and merely because he of all of us is used according to his deserts. We are touching glasses with the representatives of the arts, the sciences, and the trades. On these state occasions the Mogul welcomes any one, from a clerk to a foreign ambassador; the modish loungeur of unknown and unquestioned antecedents is one of the chief ornaments of this unconventional convention. Can any earl in Christendom assemble so interesting, because so numerous, a congress? I should say not? Hence the charm of our peculiar society—a social solecism for which our extreme youth is ample apology, though heaven knows we were never yet in an apologetic mood. Do not vex us with fallacious arguments, Mr. Oldfamily; are we not the architects of our own fortunes?—may we not employ them as seemeth to us best? We draw the line, inasmuch as a line must be drawn somewhere, for hospitality depreciates in proportion to the demand—unfortunate anomaly! We draw the line at ducats. We go into the highways and the byways, and bid guests to the marriage table; there is nothing more flattering than the willing vassalage of those whom you serve at pleasure; but our asides are all whispered into the ear of the fortunate few. We may dine Tom, Dick, and Harry publicly and pretentiously, but we can not make friends and confidants of them. Of course love levels all ranks, and we love our fellow-men, but in the language of Sir Joseph Porter, K. C. B., it doesn't level them as much as that. By this time, having soured in the semi-tropical temperature of the conservatory, I extinguish my Havana, and am about to withdraw. Enter Cupid, with bow and arrows, followed by a brace of sweethearts in close communion. While the latter are cooing, under the rose, I interview the little god of love. I find that archery is dull; I find that few arrows are driven home, save such as are golden tipped, and even these seldom, if ever, penetrate farther than the pericardium. The night waned. We sat at Belshazzar's feast, and spent the hours in riotous living. In vain I looked for the handwriting on the wall; it is evidently out of print. After supper the waltz maddened us; the heavy air throbbed with rhythmical pulsations. It was a crisis delicious beyond expression; but it was followed by the customary anti-climax, with its attendant miseries. The last words in the garden with the Hebe who cozened you so charmingly; what is sweeter than taffy from the lips we love? A panic ensued; the crush in the palace was insufferable; one could not take respectful leave of the Mogul and his consort. Perhaps it mattered nothing, for not sixty of the six hundred are likely to revisit the suburban paradise until the annual recurrence of the eventful night. The train rolled back to the metropolis laden with crushed finery and repentant heads. Nothing in the line of fashion can touch us further, for the Queen of Sheba comes not to Solomon in these days, and the fate of the asp-stung Cleopatra was too hideous to be emulated. Have I said little of the Buttercups and Hebes of society? It is because I am too delicate to be disagreeable. But they are the bone and sinew of the social organism, and without them we would return again to the chaotic system of morality which disfigures the annals of '49. Ah! does the Great Mogul, luxuriating in the shade of his miraculous gourd, or flying, as if pursued by sharp and bitter memories, from Europe to Asia, and home again, or perchance dawdling in his yacht—does he recall the primitive days of his career, when he ate his bread in sweat and polished up the handle of the big front door, in which perfectly honorable occupation he was ably seconded by those excellent and deserving parties, his sisters, his cousins, and his aunts? Why did all this flash upon me at the moment when I was receiving a one-fingered farewell that made my blood curdle? Was it because your one-fingered people are intolerable?—or because he looked vulgar and out of place in shining raiment?—or because he seemed to be unconscious of the gospel according to daily experience, which teaches every man that riches take unto themselves wings and fly away, and that the glory of the hour may depart as suddenly and unexpectedly as it came? Servilius serves his master well in the sunshine, but in the dark day Hostilius heeds him not. Therefore, when the Mogul of Mushroom Hall showed an offensive spirit of patronage, and condescendingly murmured come again, I answered coldly:

"If what?"

"If it don't rain," quoth he, in some surprise.

It was not that, though the thermometer is a motor not to be ignored in such a case.

"If Providence permits," he added perplexedly.

Nor that either, Monseigneur Money Bags.

"Then, damme, if what?"—he said "damme" out of all patience.

If you please, Cræsus, old boy.

For I hold that in your case
It is said with particular grace,
Inasmuch as we're mindful of your rather recent haunts,
And those of your sisters, and your cousins, and your aunts.
Your sisters and your cousins,
That you reckon by the dozens,
And your Aunts!

Everything was admitted to the ark by pairs, and they were "good," for there were not three of a kind in those days.

NUT-CRACKING.

A Short but Very Satisfactory Little Story.

In the city of Algammon resided the Prince Champou, who was madly enamoured of the Lady Capilla. She returned his affection—unopened.

In the matter of back-hair the Lady Capilla was blessed even beyond her deserts. Her natural pig-tail was so intolerably long that she employed two pages to look after it when she walked out; the one a few yards behind her, the other at the extreme end of the line. Their names were Dan and Beersheba, respectively.

Aside from salaries to these dependents, and quite apart from the consideration of macassar, the possession of all this animal filament was financially unprofitable: the hair market was buoyant, and hers represented a large amount of idle capital. And it was otherwise a source of annoyance and irritation; for all the young men of the city were hotly in love with her, and skirmishing for a love-lock. They seldom troubled Dan much, but the outlying Beersheba had an animated time of it. He was subject to constant incursions, and was always in a riot.

Although the Lady Capilla was unwilling to reciprocate the passion of Champou the man, she was not adverse to quiet interviews with Champou the Prince. In the course of one of these, as she sat listening to his carefully-rehearsed and really artistic avowals, with her tail hanging out of the window, she suddenly interrupted him:

"My dear Prince," said she, "it is all nonsense, you know, to ask for my heart; but I am not mean; you shall have a lock of my hair."

"Do you think," replied the Prince, "that I could be so sordid as to accept a single jewel from that glorious crown? I love this hair of yours very dearly, I admit, but only because of its connection with your divine head. Sever that connection, and I should value it no more than I would a tail plucked from its native cow."

This comparison seems to me a very fine one, but tastes differ, and to the Lady Capilla it seemed quite the reverse. Rising indignantly, she marched away, her queue running in through the window and gradually tapering off the interview, as it were. Prince Champou saw that he had missed his opportunity, and resolved to repair his error. Straightway he forged an order on Beersheba for thirty yards of love-lock. To serve this writ he sent his business partner; for the Prince was wont to beguile his dragging leisure by tonsorial diversions in an obscure quarter of the town. At first Beersheba was sceptical, but when he saw the writing in real ink his scruples vanished, and he chopped off the souvenir demanded.

Now Champou's partner was the Court barber, and by the use of a peculiar hair-oil which the two of them had concocted, they soon managed to balden the pates of all the male aristocracy of the place. Then, to supply the demand so created, they devised beautiful wigs from the Lady Capilla's lost tresses, which they sold at a marvelous profit. And so they were enabled to retire from this narrative with good incomes.

It was known that the Lady Capilla, who, since the alleged murder of one Beersheba, had shut herself up like a hermit, or a jack-knife, would reënter society, and a great ball was given to do her honor. The beauty, rank, and fashion of Algammon had assembled in the Guildhall for that purpose. While the revelry was at its fiercest, the dancing at its loosest, the rooms at their hottest, and the perspiration at spring-tide, there was a sound of wheels outside, begetting an instant hush of expectation within. The dancers ceased to spin, and all the gentlemen crowded about the door. As the Lady Capilla entered, these instinctively fell into two lines, and she passed down the space between, with her little tail behind her. As the end of the latter came into the room, the wigs of the two gentlemen nearest the door leaped off to join their parent stem. In their haste to recover them the two gentlemen bent eagerly forward, knocking their shining paws together with a vehemence that shattered them like egg-shells. The wigs of the next pair were similarly affected, and in seeking to recover them the pair similarly perished. Then, crack! spat! pash!—at every step the lady took their were two heads that beat as one. In three minutes there was but a single living male in the room. He was an odd one, who, having a lady opposite him, had merely pitched himself headlong into her stomach, doubling her up like a lemon-squeezer.

It was merry to see the Lady Capilla floating through the mazy dance that night, with all those wigs fighting for their old places in her pigtail.

"Mistakes in Courtship," was the subject of a clergyman's discourse. It seems to us that it isn't so much in courtship that people make mistakes. Courting is all right. It is the sad awakening from the rosy dream that hurts. Moral—Keep on courting.

Scandal-mongers may learn this lesson from the frog: once overpassed the season of his adolescence, he gives up all tale-bearing.

The saddest words of tongue or pen—"I'm not to pay, but I can't tell when."

L'ASSOMMOIR--THE LOADED BLUDGEON.

Emile Zola's Famous French Novel.

TRANSLATED FOR THE ARGONAUT BY J. C. WARD.

[To prevent tediousness we are obliged to summarize a portion of the story. The last chapter left Gervaise and Coupeau betrothed. Well, in due time they were married in a quiet way, with a wedding dinner, to which mutual friends were invited. Four years of hard and incessant toil followed this day. Gervaise and Coupeau were wise and prudent. They worked hard, and took a little relaxation on Sundays. The wife worked twelve hours of the twenty-four with Madame Fauconnier, and yet found time to keep her own home like waxwork. The husband was never known to be tipsy, but brought home his wages and smoked his pipe at his own window at night before going to bed. They were the bright and shining lights—the good example of the whole Quartier; and as they made jointly about nine francs per day, it was easy to see they were putting by money. They prospered beyond their most sanguine expectations. A little girl—Nana—was born, and they had saved up almost money enough to purchase a little home of their own, when one day Coupeau accidentally fell from the roof of the hospital where he was working and crashed down into the street like a bundle of wet linen. He was not killed, but for weeks his life hung on a thread, and it took all their little savings to pay for food and medical attendance. But against this great misfortune Gervaise struggled nobly. From a friend she borrowed five hundred francs, purchased the right and title to a little laundry in the great house in the Rue de la Goutte d'Or, a description of which was given with the fullest details in the last chapter. In this venture she prospered and had all her ambitious dreams fulfilled. She had "plenty to eat, a little home all to one's-self, a chance to bring up her children, was not beaten," and had a fair prospect of "dying in her bed," as she so much desired. But disaster came. Her husband, Coupeau, when he recovered from the terrible fall, gradually began to drink, and then became a drunkard. Every day he sunk deeper in his degradation. Finally he brought Lantier, the old lover, to the house. Gervaise was demoralized. Step by step she went downward, having struggled as no woman ever before struggled to reverse the engine of fate. The little laundry passed into the hands of big Virginie, whom Gervaise had so unmercifully beaten in the wash-house, and she was turned from her own door. Her bright little daughter, Nana, grew up to be a vicious woman of the town. Lantier again became the lover, to once more discard her. After accomplishing her life's happiness and hopes, everything by the liquor of l'Assommoir became a wreck; and descriptive of this desolation we introduce the reader to the closing chapters:]

It must have been the Saturday after quarter day—perhaps the 12th or 13th of January, Gervaise couldn't tell exactly, for she had lost the run of it; but it seemed to her as though ages had passed since anything warm had gone inside her. What an infernal week it had been, and with what a raking down of things! She had had two four-pound loaves on Tuesday, which had lasted until Thursday; then a dry crust, found the night before that; and now, not a crumb for thirty-six hours. What a dance before the cupboard! What she did know, however—what she felt in her back—was the weather; the cold was terrible, and the sky as black as the stove, and almost bursting with snow which still refused to fall. It will not help one much to tighten one's belt when one has the cold besides an empty stomach to contend with. Maybe Coupeau would bring home some money that night. He had said that he was working, and it might be so, mightn't it? And Gervaise, though often caught before, ended again by counting on the money. After all the tales which they had told about her, she couldn't find even a dish cloth to wash in all that quarter. And an old lady, whose work she had been doing, had just turned her away because she said that she drank up her cordials. Nobody wanted her anywhere. There seemed to be a blight upon her. But she didn't care, for she had fallen to that brutal condition where one would rather die than use their fingers. If Coupeau only brought his wages home it would be all right, and they would get something warm to eat again. But it wasn't noon yet; so, while waiting, she stretched herself on the mattress, because she didn't feel so cold or so hungry when she was stretched out. Gervaise called it the mattress, but it was in truth only a pile of straw in the corner. Little by little the bed things had passed into the hands of the old clothes dealer. On the first days of want, she had cut open the mattress, and taken from it handfuls of wool and carried it to Rue Belhomme and sold it for ten sous a pound. One morning, when the mattress was empty, she got thirty sous for the ticking to pay for her coffee. The pillows had followed it, and then the bolster, and the wood of the bedstead only remained. She couldn't carry that off under her arm, for the Boches would have aroused the house if they saw all the proprietor's security going in that manner. Nevertheless, one night while the Boches were quarreling together, with Coupeau's help, she moved the bedstead quietly, bit by bit: first the sides, then the head boards, and at last the frame. And on the ten francs received from this turn out, they feasted for three days. And wasn't straw just as good for them? Even its ticking had gone to join that of the bed. And in this way they finished eating their bedding, and got an indigestion after stuffing themselves for twenty-four hours. Now they pushed the straw about with the broom, so the dust was always turned over.

On this pile of straw Gervaise remained all dressed, and in the position of the dog on the lock of a gun—her feet drawn up under her rag of a skirt so as to keep them warmer. And thus, during that day, all in a heap, with wide open eyes, her thoughts, which were not amusing, were passing through her brain. Ah, no, sacré matin! One can not continue to live in this way, without eating. And yet she did not now feel hungry, for her stomach seemed full of lead; it was only her skull that appeared empty. Certainly it was not in the four corners of this hole that she could find anything to make her cheerful. It was a perfect dog kennel. Her pale eyes looked around the naked walls. Everything had long since been taken to her "uncle's." The bureau, and a table, and a chair only remained. But the marble top and the drawer of the bureau had gone in the same way as the bedstead. A fire would not have more completely swept it. The little nicknacks had melted away as well, beginning with a ticker, which cost twelve francs, and going even to the family photographs, whose frames a shopkeeper bought. A very obliging woman, to whom she carried a saucepan, a flat iron, and a comb, shoved toward her five sous, three sous, two sous, according to the worth of the object, and these gave her bits of bread with which to build herself up again; and now there remained only an old pair of broken snuffers, on which the woman refused to lend even a sou. Oh! if she only could find some one who would buy the dust, and dirt, and filth, she might then open shop herself, for the room was indeed pretty dirty. To be sure, she could see spiders' webs in the corners, and they are good for wounds, but no one buys them. Then, turning her head round, after giving up all hope of that business, she curled closer up on the straw, and looked through the window at the sky, so charged with snow; but the very marrow of her bones was chilled by the sadness of the scene.

What a bother! What good to go over these things again and trouble her head about them? If she could only have known. And now the fear of their expulsion worried her. Monsieur Marescot came himself the day before, to tell them that he should turn them out, if they didn't during that week pay the two terms for which they were behindhand. Well, suppose he did; they certainly wouldn't be worse off in the street. Think of that ape dressed in overcoat and woolen gloves to come all the way up stairs to talk in that way to them, just as though they had a purse hidden somewhere! Nom d'un chien, if they had, instead of paying him she would have put something in her inside. Ah, the room had become a real boxing saloon; Coupeau had a club, which he called his jackass fan, and he fanned his woman with it, too; you ought to see him! And then the abominable sweats she swam in. She, not too good either, biting and scratching him; sometimes they drove away their longing for bread by fighting and stamping away in that empty room. But she had arrived at that point when she didn't bother herself about cold or thaws or anything else. Coupeau might have Holy Mondays for weeks together, spree for months—come in crazy with drink and wish to beat her; she was used to it. It seemed only like teasing her a little, and that was all.

But unfortunately, if one was getting used to everything else, one couldn't get the habit of going without food. That alone took her down. As for being the lowest of the low, at the very bottom of the stream, and seeing people brush themselves when she touched them, she laughed at all that. Bad manners no longer put her out while hunger was twisting her entrails. Oh, she had long since bade good-bye to nice little dishes, and had come down to anything she could get. On great occasions she was too glad to buy refuse meat of the butcher at four sous the pound, such as was tired of being shown and had grown black in the plate. She put that with a few potatoes on the stove. Or sometimes she fricasseed a beef's heart, a tid-bit which it made her mouth water to think of. Formerly when she could get wine, she bought soup, two sous of Italian cheese, bushels of white apples, quarts of dried beans cooked in their juice. Ah, those were feasts which she couldn't give herself often, and she fell back upon arlequins in the blind alley chop houses, where she had cups of fish bones mixed with shreds of spoiled roast meat; and she went lower and begged at a charitable restaurateur's for the crusts of bread left by his customers; these she made a porridge of by letting them stew as long as possible on a neighbor's stove. And at last on hungry mornings she would prowl with the dogs about the shop-doors before the scavengers passed, and sometimes got nice rotten melons, spoiled mackerel, and cutlets, whose bones she looked well after for the maggots. Yes, she had reached that point. Delicate people might be disgusted at the idea; but if delicate people had not taken anything for three days they'd see if they could pout at their bellies; they would go on all fours and eat dirt like the rest of them. Ah, the starvation of the poor, with their empty entrails crying with hunger, their teeth snapping with animal wants, and then their gulping down such unearthly things, in this great, gilded, Paris! And to think that she had eaten bellfuls of big fat geese, and that now she might blow her nose for them. One day Coupeau, having stolen two good loaves from her to sell them for drink, she came near killing him with the shovel, so hungry was she, and so enraged by the robbery of this bit of bread. She looked at the dull sky until she went off into a little troubled sleep. She dreamed that the sky charged with snow burst upon her, to such an extent did the cold pinch her. Suddenly she sat up, awakened by her painful shiverings. Mon Dieu! was she about to die? All haggard and cold she saw that it was still day. Would the night never come? How long the time is when one has an empty stomach, and that was awakened, too, and began to torture her. Sinking on a chair, and putting her hands between her thighs to get warm, she began to plan for the dinner as soon as Coupeau would bring her the money: A loaf of bread, a litre of wine, two bits of gras double à la Lyonnaise. Three o'clock struck by the cuckoo clock of Père Bazonge. 'Twas three then, and she cried because she feared she would never have strength to last till seven. Her whole body trembled, and she rocked to and fro as a child does when nursing some sorrow, almost bent in two, crushing her stomach so as not to feel it. But then, not getting the relief that she wanted, she jumped up in a fury and began to pace the floor as though trying to put her hunger to sleep as one does an infant, by walking it up and down. For a half hour at a time she squatted in the corners of the room, and then all at once she jumped up, and with fixed eyes, cried out:

"So much the worse! They might say what they would; she would lick their feet if they wanted, but she was going to borrow ten sous of the Lorilleuxs."

During the long winters, on these stairs (the "lousy one's" stairs) the borrowing of ten sous and twenty sous was the usual custom—these were little services that the starved ones rendered each other, but they would have died rather than have asked the Lorilleuxs, because they knew they were "too sharp on the trigger." Gervaise showed great courage in going to knock at their door, and she was so much afraid while standing in the entry that she felt the same kind of relief that one does at the dentist's, when the sharp voice of the chainmaker cried:

"Come in!"

How good it felt in there! The furnace illumined the narrow room with its flame, while Madame Lorilleux opened it to put in a little ball of gold wire to bake again. Lorilleux, sweating, so warm was he before his bench, was soldering rings with the blowpipe; and it smelt so good, for a cabbage soup stood simmering upon the stove giving out an odor which turned Gervaise's heart, and almost made her faint.

"Oh, it's you," growled Madame Lorilleux, without ever asking her to sit down. "What do you want?"

Gervaise did not answer. She was not on very bad terms with the Lorilleuxs that week, but the request for the ten sous stuck in her throat when she discovered Boche squarely seated near the stove just preparing to talk, and looking as though he set the world at defiance, the animal.

"What do you want?" repeated Lorilleux.

"You haven't seen Coupeau?" She added, stammering: "I thought he was here."

The chain-makers and the conciierge sniggled. No, very certainly, they hadn't seen Coupeau. They did not offer enough little glasses of liquor to have Coupeau like that. Gervaise made another effort, and said:

"He promised to come home. Yes, and was to have brought me some money; and as I am absolutely in want of something—"

No one spoke. Madame Lorilleux fanned the fire while Lorilleux held his nose over the end of a chain which he was drawing between his fingers, and Boche almost laughed, with his mouth stretched from ear to ear.

"If I had ten sous," said Gervaise, in a low tone.

But the silence continued.

"Couldn't you lend me ten sous? Oh, I will return them to-night."

Madame Lorilleux turned and looked fixedly at her. There was a friloteuse to come to empaumer them! To-day she tapped them for ten sous, to-morrow it would be twenty, and there would be no reason for stopping. No, none of that.

"But, my dear," cried she, "we have no money. Look at my empty pocket. You may search. We would willingly, you know."

"The heart is there always," growled Lorilleux, "only when one can not, one can not."

Gervaise very humbly bowed, but she did not go; she stood squinting at the gold from the corner of her eye. There were strings of gold which were hanging on the wall, the thread of gold which the woman drew through the thread-cutter with all the strength of her little arms, the rings of gold in heaps under the knotty fingers of the husband, and she thought that only one small end of that blackened metal would pay for a good dinner. The room might be dirty with its old iron, its charcoal dust, its grease from oil badly wiped up, but to her eyes it was resplendent with riches like the office of a gold broker; and so she repeated, gently:

"I will return them; I'll return them surely. You might spare ten sous." Her heart was so full, for she did not like to say how hungry she was, and with trembling limbs, repressing the tears which almost filled her eyes, she stammered again: "You will be so good. You don't know—oh! I am in that position. Mon Dieu, I am just there where—"

Then the Lorilleuxs pressed their lips together and exchanged looks. The cripple was begging at last. Well, the wreck was complete. But they didn't like it. If they'd have known they'd have barricaded the door, for one must always look after beggars—people who introduce themselves into apartments under pretenses and then run off with precious things; and with them there was so much to rob. They could run their fingers all around and carry off thirty or forty francs' worth by just shutting the fist. And when noticing Gervaise's strange expression when she was planted before the gold they had mistrusted her. This time at least they would watch her. As she got her foot nearer and nearer the wooden screen, the woman, without answering, cried, rudely:

"Say, take care, you are again going to carry off bits of gold on your soles. Really, one would say you had greased them expressly."

Gervaise slowly drew back. She had leaned for an instant against a shelf, but seeing Madame Lorilleux look at her hands, she opened them wide and showed them to her, saying, in her soft voice, and in the tone of a woman so fallen that she is prepared for any thing:

"I've taken nothing. You may examine me." But then she turned away, for the odor of the cabbage soup and the warmth of the shop made her sick.

Ah, the Lorilleuxs did not detain her. Pleasant journey. Devil take them if they opened their door to her again. They had seen enough of her, and they didn't want others' misery brought to their door, when that misery was well earned, too. And they enjoyed their selfishness supremely in all the comforts of their warm room, and with a famous soup looming up in the distance. Boche, too, blew out his cheeks so full that his laugh became improper. And they all felt well revenged upon the cripple of the blue stove, with its manners, and crammings, and all. Hadn't it too well succeeded, and proved where gormandizing would bring one? Away with them, lazy, vicious gluttons as they were!

"And what style, too, to come and ask for only ten sous," cried Madame, behind Gervaise's back. "Oh, yes, of course I'd lend her ten sous right off, so that she could get a drink."

Gervaise, with her shoulders bent, heavily dragged her slippers along the entry; but when she reached her door she couldn't go in, for her room made her afraid. It was just as well to walk along, she would acquire patience and keep warmer. In passing she stretched her neck into Père Bru's nook, under the stairs; another one who ought to have a good appetite, for, for three days, he has breakfasted and dined by heart. But he wasn't there, there was only his hole left; and she felt jealous, thinking that he might have been invited somewhere. Then as she came in front of the Bijard's room she heard moans, and entered, the key being always in the lock.

"What's the matter?" asked she.

The room was very clean. One could see that Lalie had swept it and put it in order that very morning. Misery might blow there as it listed, carry off whatever was nice, and leave its filth behind; Lalie always came after, restoring things and giving them a genteel air.

If she wasn't rich, she managed well. The two children, Henriette and Jules, had found some old pictures that morning, which they were quietly cutting in a corner. But Lalie she was surprised to find abed, in her narrow cot, with the sheet drawn over her chin, and looking very pale.

"She to be abed, for example! She must be very sick!"

"What's the matter with you?" repeated Gervaise, much troubled.

Lalie did not complain; she raised her pale lids slowly, and a smile tried to come from her lips, which were trembling with convulsions.

"Nothing," whispered she; "oh, truly, nothing at all."

Then she closed her eyes again, and said with difficulty: "I got too tired these days, then I got lazy; so I thought I would indulge myself, as you see."

But her childish face, all covered with livid spots, took on such an expression of intense grief, that Gervaise, forgetting her own agony for the moment, clasped her hands and fell upon her knees by the side of the bed. For a month she had noticed that she leaned against the walls for support in walking, and that her cough seemed to be leading to the grave. But now she was even beyond coughing. She hiccuped, and threads of blood were trickling from the corners of her mouth.

"It is not my fault, I do not feel very strong," whispered she as though comforted. "I exerted myself, and put things a little to rights. It's pretty clean, isn't it? And I wanted to wash the windows, too, but my legs gave out. How stupid, wasn't it? And then when I got through I went to bed."

And after resting she said:

"Please see that the children don't cut themselves with the scissors."

And then she stopped short, trembling, for she heard a heavy step mounting the stairs. Père Bijard roughly pushed open the door. He had had his customary dram, and his eyes flamed with his brandy craze.

When he saw Lalie in bed he slapped his legs sneeringly, and taking down the big whip, growled:

"Ah! this is too much! We'll see who'll laugh! Go to roost at noon, do you! You want to quiz the parish, do you, you d—d lazy thing! Come, houp! out of bed with you!"

He was already snapping the whip over the bed. But the child supplicated:

"No, papa, I beg, don't strike; for you'll be sorry for it if you do. Don't strike."

"Will you jump?" screamed he, "or shall I tickle you? Will you jump out, you jade?"

Then she said gently:

"You see I can't, for I am going to die."

Gervaise flew at Bijard, and took the whip from him. He stood stupidly before the little cot.

"What did she say, the little slut? Can one die so young when one is not sick? What a force to get sugar with. Ah! he would inquire, and if she lied!"

"You will find that it is true," continued she. "I have kept this trouble from you as long as I could. Be gentle now, and say good-bye to me, papa."

Bijard twisted his nose for fear of being taken in. It was true, however, that her face did look queerly. It was long and serious, like that of some great personage. The breath of death which was breathed into the room sobered him. He looked around him with the air of a man just awakened from a long sleep, and saw that the room was in order, and the two children clean, and just in the midst of their play, and laughing; and he fell into his chair, uttering:

"Our little mother! oh! our little mother!"

They seemed to be the only words he could find; and they were very sweet to Lalie, who had never been so spoiled before. She tried to comfort her father, and told him how troubled she was at leaving thus, before having completely brought up the children. He would take care of them, wouldn't he? And with her dying breath she gave him instructions as to how they should be cared for and kept clean. He, beast as he was, overcame again by the fumes of intoxication, only rolled his head as he saw her spirit passing through those large, round eyes of hers. He was moved, it is true; but he found nothing more to say, and his mind was too much baked for him to weep.

"Listen to me," continued Lalie, after a short silence. "We owe four francs, seven sous to the baker, which you must pay; and Madame Gaudron has a flat iron of ours, which you'll get. I was not able to make the soup for this evening; but there's bread, and you will put the potatoes on the stove to warm."

And thus to her last death-rattle did this poor little kitten continue a mother to her family. There was one whom they could never replace very certainly. She died for having at her age the sense of a real mother, and for having a bosom still too tender and too small to hold so large a portion of maternity. It was the fault of that beast, its father, that the family lost this treasure. After killing the mother with a kick, had he not massacred the daughter? His two good angels were in the grave, and he was left to die like a dog in his kennel.

Gervaise governed herself so as not to burst into sobs. She held the child's hands, in the hope of comforting her. And, as the torn sheets were not in place, she wanted to turn them down and arrange the bed. Then she saw the poor little body of the dying one. O Lord! what a sight. How miserable! How pitiful! The very stones would have wept. Poor Lalie was almost naked; only at her shoulders, in guise of chemise, were the remains of a gown. Yes, she was naked, and with all the bleeding and suffering nakedness of a martyr. She had no flesh, and the very bones were making holes in her skin. On her sides violet stripes, the imprints of the whip, went down even to her thighs. A livid mark encircled her left arm, as if the jaw of a vice had bruised this tender member, not much bigger than a match. There was a torn place unhealed on the leg, which had come from a blow, which reopened every morning when she trotted around to put the house in order. From head to foot she was black and blue. Oh, this massacre of the infants—the heavy paws of men crushing the love of children! Oh, the abomination of such weakness and suffering, under such a cross, while one adores in the churches the scourged saint whose nakedness is far less pure. Gervaise kneeled again, giving up the thought of taking down the sheets, and upset by the sight of the pitiable little figure which lay flattened at the bottom of the bed, and her trembling lips began to utter a prayer.

"Madame Coupeau," whispered the little creature, "I beg you"—and with her two short arms she sought to replace the clothes, being ashamed for her father's sake, while Bijard, stupid, with eyes resting on the corpse which he had made, rolled his head about in the way an animal does when it is plagued. When she re-covered Lalie, Gervaise could remain no longer. The dying child grew weaker every moment. She could no longer speak, but her look—the old, deep look of the resigned and thoughtful child—rested with yearning upon the two little ones still cutting out the pictures. The room was filling with shadows, and Bijard cooled down during her agony. No, no! life was too abominable. What a vile thing it was! Ah, what a vile thing it was! Gervaise went down stairs without knowing how. She was so lost, so heartbroken, that she felt like casting herself under the wheels of an omnibus to end it all.

As she went on grumbling about her cursed luck she found herself before the door of the master with whom Coupeau pretended to work. Her limbs carried her there, but her stomach again commenced its song—hunger's complaint in ninety stanzas—a song which she knew by heart. And now if she could only catch Coupeau as he came out she would clap her hand on the money and buy provisions with it. One little hour to wait longer at most; she could swallow that, she who had been sucking her thumbs ever since the night before. It was the Rue de la Charbonnière where it crosses Rue de Chartres, a beastly four corners where the wind blew in every direction. Nom d'un chien! measuring the sidewalk was not warm work. If one only had fires! The sky kept its villainous lead color, and the snow collected there put a head-dress on the quarter. None fell, but there was silence in the air, and a complete disguise—a handsome new ball dress—was preparing for Paris. Gervaise raised up her head and prayed God not to let his muslin fall immediately. While tapping with her feet she looked a grocery store in the face, then turned on her heel because it was useless to give herself too much hunger in advance. The four corners didn't offer much amusement. The passers-by went straight ahead, well protected with cache-nez. Gervaise, however, perceived four or five women who were mounting guard like herself at the zinc-worker's door. More unfortunates. Wives watching for their husband's pay to prevent it going at the wine merchant's. One tall jade, who looked like a gendarme, stuck under the wall all ready to jump on the back of her man. A small, dark-complexioned woman, with a meek, delicate expression, walked on the other side of the street. Another, a fat person, had brought her two brats along, and was dragging them, sobbing and crying, to the right and to the left. And Gervaise, as well as her companions, passed and repassed without speaking, looking askance at each other; an agreeable rencontre! You bet it was not necessary for them to be introduced to know each other's number, for they all lodged under the same sign at Misery & Company's. It made one colder still to see them stamp and cross themselves silently in that terrible January temperature.

As yet not a cat had come out from the patron's. But at last one workman appeared, then two, then three, but they were doubtless good zigs who carried their wages faithfully home, for they shook their heads on seeing the shadows prowling about the shop. The tall jade stuck closer to the door, and all at once fell upon a little pale man who prudently poked out his head. Oh, it was soon settled. She searched him and took his money away. He was caught, and had not a sous left—not enough to buy one drop. Then the little man seemed desperate, and followed his gendarme crying big tears like a child. The workmen still continued to come out, and as the stout godmother with her two brats came near a tall, brown fellow, he went in quickly to warn the husband.

When he came dancing along he had stuffed two new pieces of one hundred sous, one in each shoe. He took one of his goslings in his arm, and went off cracking jokes with his woman, who was quarreling with him. Some of the fellows jumped with a bound into the middle of the street, and ran off to spend their fortnight's allowance with a friend. Then there were gloomy ones, with stormy mien, pressing in their fists the proceeds of three or four days in fifteen which they had made, feeling that they had been lazy, and making the usual oaths of drunkards for the future. But what was most sad of all was the grief the small dark woman, who was so meek and delicate in her appearance. Her man, a good-looking fellow, had just come out, and struck her so brutally that she went off tottering along by the stores, and weeping as though her heart would break.

Gervaise stood in the middle of the street watching the door, but no more came. It began to look bad. Two belated workmen at last showed themselves, but still there was no Coupeau. And as she asked the men if Coupeau wasn't coming, they, being of the same stripe, said that he had just gone with Lantimeche, by a back door, to take the chickens to water. Gervaise understood. And this was another of Coupeau lies. She might look now to see if it rained. And slowly dragging her slipshod shoes, she went down the Rue de la Charbonnière. Her dinner ran on ahead of her, and she saw it running on in the yellow twilight with a shiver. And this was the end—nothing; not even a hope—only night and hunger. Ah! what a night of ruin was the nasty night now coming upon her. She was heavily strolling along the Rue des Poissonniers when she all at once heard Coupeau's voice. Yes, there he was at the l'etite-Civet, just getting Mes-Bottes to treat him. That joker, Mes-Bottes, at the end of the summer had had the luck to marry for good a lady somewhat fussée, but still with remains of beauty. Oh! a lady of Rue des Martyrs; not of the vulgar barrière lot. And you should have seen that happy mortal, living en bourgeois, with his hands in his pockets, well dressed, and well fed. One could scarcely recognize him, he had grown so stout. His comrades said that his wife had as much work as she wanted at the houses of gentlemen of her acquaintance. A wife like that and a country house is all one could wish to make one happy. And so Coupeau looked with admiration upon Mes-Bottes. Hadn't the fellow even a gold ring upon his little finger?

Gervaise laid her hand on Coupeau's shoulder just as he was coming out of the Petite-Civet.

"Say, I'm waiting—I'm hungry."

But he clinched the nail in fine style for her:

"You are hungry? Eat your fist, then, and keep the other for to-morrow!"

He finds it smart to act his comedy before the world, does he? yet won't work for his daily bread.

"You want me to steal, then," said she in a low voice.

Mes-Bottes, rubbing his chin with a conciliating air: "No, for that is forbidden," said he. "But when a woman knows how to manage—"

And Coupeau interrupted him, crying:

"Bravo! Yes, a woman ought to know how to manage, but his had always been a drag and a stupid. It would be her fault if she died on the straw." Then he began again to admire Mes-Bottes. Didn't he look polished, the animal? Like a rich man, with white linen and stylish boots. Fichtre! It wasn't slipshod! Here, at least, was one whose woman knew how to sail the ship well.

The two men went toward the outer boulevard, Gervaise followed them. After a little she went behind Coupeau and said:

"I am hungry, do you know? I counted on you. You must find me something to chew upon."

He made no reply, and then in a tone heart-rending in its agony, she said:

"Is that all you can do?"

"But I've nothing!" roared he, turning round, furious.

"Let me alone, or I'll hit you."

He raised his fist; she stepped back and seemed to be deciding about something.

"Well, go on, I'll leave you. I'll find a man somewhere."

The zinc-worker laughed and pretended to take it as a joke, and pushed her on without having the appearance of doing so. And as she went on to the outer boulevard, wan and wild, he cried out again to her:

"Say, listen, bring me some dessert. I would like some cake."

Gervaise, driven by this infernal talk, walked on quickly, and when she found herself in the midst of the crowd slackened her steps. She was very determined—when one is starving one does not philosophize, but eats the first bread that comes along. She had reached the Chaussée Clignancourt. The night no longer stopped coming, and, while waiting for it, she strolled along the boulevard as any lady might who takes the air before going to dinner.

That quarter, which was improving so much that she felt ashamed to be seen there, was taking on a more important air in all directions. The Boulevard Magenta, leading up from the heart of Paris, and the Boulevard Ornano, running out toward the country, had perforated the old barrière by tremendous down-pullings of houses; two vast avenues, still white with plaster, which retained at their sides the streets of the Faubourg Poissonnière and the Poissonniers, whose ends were chipped, broken, mutilated, wrenched apart, and looking like some gloomy bowel of the earth. The demolition of the Octroi wall had already enlarged the outer boulevards, with their sidewalks, and their walks in the middle planted with four rows of little plane trees. It was now an immense place emptying afar off, through unending ways, alive with crowds, and swamped in the very chaos of its reconstruction. Among the new tall houses many tottering ruins remained; besides sculptured façades, black holes were scooped out, and kennels were yawning, displaying their rags from the windows. Under the increasing luxury of Paris, the misery of the suburb burst, and soiled this beginning of a new and hastily constructed city. Lost in the crowd on the long walk under the little plane trees, Gervaise felt herself alone and abandoned indeed.

Those escapements of avenues clear away there, seemed to empty her stomach the more. And to say, that among that flood of people, where there were some certainly in easy circumstances, there was not a single Christian that divined her situation or who would slip ten sous in her hand! Yes, it was too large, too fine; her head turned and her limbs gave way under the immeasurable face of gray sky extended over the vast space. The twilight had the dirty yellow tinge of Parisian twilights—a color which makes one want to die, so ugly does the street life appear under it. The hour was becoming ambiguous; the distance became blended with the muddy tinge. Gervaise, tired out, found herself in the midst of the homebound work people, at the hour when ladies in hats and well dressed gentlemen, inhabiting the new houses, were engulfed in the crowds of the masses—in those processions of men and women still sallow from the vitiated air of the workshops. The Boulevard Magenta and the Rue des Faubourg Poissonnière let out these exhausted hordes. In the deadened roll of the omnibuses and carriages, among the drays and the carts of the upholsterers and painters, which were returning home empty and in a gallop, the always increasing swarms of blouses and frocks covered the sidewalks. The commissaires were returning home with their crochets (frames for carrying packages) on their backs. Two workmen, talking loud and with many gestures, walked side by side, taking great strides; others, alone, in great coats and caps, went along on the edge of the walk; and then came parties of five or six, following each other without exchanging a word, with hands in their pockets, and lack-lustre eyes. Some had unlighted pipes in their mouths. Masons in a cart filled full, and on which their troughs danced, passed, showing their white faces to the portresses. Painters, carrying their pots; a tinsman, carrying a long ladder with which he just missed putting out people's eyes; while the lemonade man, late, with his fountain at his back, played the air of Bon roi Dagobert on his little trumpet—a sad air in the midst of that heart-rending twilight. Ah, the mournful music which seemed to accompany the tramping of these beasts of burden, dragging themselves, hard pressed, along! Another day gone! It was true that the days were long, and that they came too often. Hardly time to fill one's self and digest one's food, when it was daylight, and the yoke of misery again went on. They whistled, however, tapping with their feet, and marching straight on toward the soup. And Gervaise allowed the crowd to pass on, indifferent to the shoves she got; pushed to the right, and pushed to the left, and rolled in the midst of the flood; for men have not time to be polite when broken in two by fatigue and run down by hunger.

Suddenly raising her eyes the washerwoman saw before her the old Hôtel Boncourt. The little house, after being a suspected café, which the police had closed, was deserted; the shutters were covered with advertisements, the lantern was broken, it was crumbling and rotting from top to bottom from the rain, and its ignoble color of wine-grounds was all stained with mould. Around about it nothing seemed changed. The stationer and the tobacconist were still there. Behind and above the lower buildings the legs of five-story houses raised their big dilapidated balconies. But the ball-room of the Grand-Balcon was not.

istence. In the room of the ten flaming windows a sugar-mill was just established, of which the continued whistlings were heard. It was nevertheless there in the depths of that hole, the Hôtel Boncœur, that all this cursed life began. And she remained standing and looking up to the first story window, where a torn-off blind was hanging, and thinking of her youth with Lantier, of their first quarrels, and of the disgusting way in which he had quitted her. No matter, she was young then; and it all seemed pleasant as she looked back to it. Only twenty years, and now she was falling to the pavé! O God! The sight of it made her sick, and she went off again up the boulevard toward Montmartre.

On the heaps of sand between the benches boys were still playing as the night came on. The crowd continued; the work-women were passing, trotting, hurrying to make up for their lost time. A tall one, delayed, was holding a young man's hand, and he accompanied her to within three doors of her own; others, in taking leave of each other, made assignations for the night at the Grand Salon de la Folie, or at La Boule Noire. In the midst of the groups were dress-makers with bundles of dresses under their arms. A bricklayer, harnessed in a breast collar, dragged a cart filled with plaster, and came near being run over by an omnibus. And yet, more rare however, among the crowd, women were running bareheaded, who had come out after lighting the fire, and were hurrying for the dinner. They elbowed their way through the crowd, throwing themselves into the baker's and the butcher's, and leaving them without delay with provisions in their hands. There were little girls, too, of eight years of age, sent on errands, who went along the rows of stores pressing on their chests four-pound loaves of bread as tall as themselves, and looking like handsome yellow dolls, and who for five minutes at a time would forget themselves before a picture store, with their cheeks pressed against the loaves. And then the flood spent itself, the groups were farther apart, working people had gone in, and in the blaze of the gas, when the day was over, came the idlers' turn, with their interminable fêtes and balls.

Yes, Gervaise had finished her day! She was more tired than all those work-people whose passing had so jolted her. She might as well stay there and die, for work wanted no more from her, and her existence had been troubled enough for her to say, "Whose turn now? I have had mine." Everybody must be eating now. Was this really the end? The sun had blown his candle out, and how long the night would be! Mon Dieu! only to go out at one's ease, and not to wake again!—only to know that one had put by one's tools forever, and then might sleep eternally! After being tired for twenty years, how pleasant that would be. And then, in spite of the cramps which were gripping her stomach, Gervaise thought of the fêtes, and of the fun and amusements, of her life—of one time above all others, in mid-lent, on a very cold Thursday, when she had enjoyed herself so much. She was young and pretty, blonde and fresh, in those happy days. Her wash-house companions in Rue Neuve had made her queen, notwithstanding her lameness, and they went on to the boulevards in cars decked with green, in the midst of all the beau monde, which looked at her so. Gentlemen looked at her through their glasses as they would in looking at a real queen. And then at night they had a smashing ball, and danced until daylight next morning. Queen?—yes, queen, with a crown and a scarf, during twenty-four hours, twice round the dial! Then heavy with the pangs of hunger, she looked around upon the ground, as though seeking for the stream wherein she had allowed her fallen majesty to glide away.

Again did she raise her eyes, to find herself in front of the shambles which they were demolishing. The gutted façade showed its dark yards behind still sinking and damp with blood. And when she went down the boulevard again she saw the Hospital of Lariboisière with its great gray wall, above which, unfolding like a fan, came the mournful wings pierced regularly with windows; one door in the wall was the terror of the quarter—the door of death, whose solid oak, without a seam, had all the silence of a gravestone. Then to escape she pushed on farther and went down to the railway bridge. Its tall parapets of bolted iron plates shut out the view, so that she could only distinguish on the luminous horizon of Paris the enlarged angle of the dépôt, a vast roof black with coal dust. She could hear in the large clear space the locomotive's whistle, the rhythmic shake of the moving plates, a hidden but colossal activity. Then a train leaving Paris passed, coming with its rolling and its respiration, distended little by little. But all that she saw was a white plume, a sudden puff which passed over the parapet and disappeared. But the bridge trembled, and she remained in all the vibration of its departure. She turned to follow the invisible machine whose dying groans she heard, imagining that the country was on that side, with its clear sky, at the bottom of a valley, with high isolated buildings planted right and left without order, presenting façades of unplastered walls—walls covered with big placards, and stained by the soot of the engines with the same yellow tinge. Oh, if she only could have left and gone down there, away from these houses so full of suffering and misery, maybe she might have begun again to live! Then she found herself stupidly reading the advertisements posted on the iron plates. They were of all colors—one, a small one of a pretty blue, offered fifty francs reward for a lost slut. The animal at any rate must have been loved!

And again she walked slowly along. In the midst of smoky colored fog, which was falling all around, gas-jets were being lighted, and those long avenues, which little by little were becoming drowned in the darkness, reappeared all brilliant, extending and cutting into the night as far as the lost shadows of the horizon. A great blast seemed passing over, and the enlarged quarter spread its cordon of small flames under the immense moonless sky. It was the hour in which, from one end of the boulevard to the other, the wine shops, the low ball-rooms, and the drinking saloons began to blaze gayly in file in the midst of the fun of the first drinks and first chahut of the cancan. The fortnight's wages filled the sidewalk with the noisy bustle of jolly fellows on a spree; the very air was full of it—a cursed spree—gentle as yet, a mere beginning, nothing more. And in the depths of the eating-shops they sat cramming themselves. Through the brightened windows one might see people eating with their mouths full, laughing without taking even the trouble to chew. The sots were already about the wine-shops, talking and calculating violently, and a noise like distant thunder arose from the coarse, howling voices and the rumbling of feet along the sidewalks. "Say! Come take a drink. Come, old fellow, I'll pay the shot. Look, there's Pauline. Oh, well, no twisting out of it." The doors swung to and fro, letting out the odor of wine and the puffs of cornets-à-pistons. There was a line before l'Assommoir of Père Colombe which was as bright as a cathedral at grand mass, and one might have taken it for some ceremony, for the good sigs were singing in there, looking like the singers in the choir, cheeks puffed out and bellies rounded. They were celebrating Saint Touche, a very amiable saint, who is to keep the cash in Paradise. On seeing with what zest it began, the petits rentiers, walking out with their wives, remarked, shaking their heads, that there would be a tremendous lot of drunken men in Paris that night. The night was freezing, the four quarters of the heavens hung sombre and dead over the clamor, perforated only by the fiery lines along the boulevards.

Planted before l'Assommoir, Gervaise was thinking that if she had two sous she would have gone in for a drop. Maybe a drop would have stayed her hunger. Ah, she had drunk so many drops, and it did seem so good after all! And at a distance she contemplated the intoxicating machine, feeling that all her troubles came from there, and yet dreamed of ending them with brandy the day that she was able. But a shiver passed through her, for she saw that the night was dark. And suddenly she perceived her shadow on the ground. When she approached a gaslight, the vague shadow collected itself distinctly—an enormous shadow, squat, grotesque, so round had she become. It showed the belly, breast, and hips, floating and mingling together. She limped so much that on the ground the shadow fell over at each step. She thought it resembled a pair of scales. And when she moved away the scales grew taller, and became a giant, filling the boulevard, and bowing, and hitting its nose against the trees and the houses. Mon Dieu! how queer and frightful it was! Never had she so well realized her deformity. She could not help looking at it as she passed the gaslights, nor following with her eyes the dancing figure. Ah, what a slattern walked by her side!—and with what a step! It must be very late, however. Everything was spoiled in that quarter, the eating-shops were closed, the gas was getting redder at the wine merchants, whence came voices fat with drunkenness. Fun had changed to quarrels and to blows.

Gervaise kept always on the go, kicking about, going up and coming down again, her only thought being to walk without stopping. Sleepiness overcame her, and she slept resting on her legs; then she started and looked about her, and found she had gone a hundred steps, without knowing it any more than if she had been dead. Her feet, from sleeping standing, swelled in their torn slippers. She didn't know herself at all, she was so tired and empty. The last clear idea which occupied her thoughts was that her daughter at that moment might be eating oysters. Then everything became confused, and she stood with eyes open, but it would have required too great an effort for her to think. And the only feeling which remained in the midst of the annihilation of her being was that of fierce cold—bitter, mortal, such as she had never experienced in her life before. Surely the dead and buried are not so cold. She heavily raised her head, and received in her face an icy blow. It was the snow which at last decided to fall from the smoky heavens, a fine, sharp, snow, which a light wind blew in eddies. For three days it had been expected. It came in good time.

Fully awakened by the squall, Gervaise walked quicker. Some of the men were running, hurrying to get home, their shoulders already white with snow; and as she saw one who was approaching slowly under the trees she went toward him. He extended his hand and said, in a low tone of voice: "If you please, for charity's sake."

They each looked at the other. Ah, mon Dieu! Père Bru a beggar! They remained gaping for a moment, and might have given each other the right hand of fellowship. All the evening the old workman had roved about fearing to approach any one, and the first one that he begged from was a starveling like himself. Lord! was it not pitiful to have worked for fifty years and come to begging at last; to have been considered one of the best washerwomen of the Rue de la Goutte d'Or, and to be landed on the bank of the stream at last! They continued gazing on each other for a while, and then, without a word, went their way through the pelted snow.

It was a perfect tempest. On those heights, in the widely open spaces, the fine snow whirled about, seeming to blow from the four quarters of the heavens. It was impossible to see ten steps ahead, and everything was submerged in the flying dust. The quarter had disappeared, the boulevard seemed dead, as the squall came to throw the silence of its white pall over the last drunken hiccough. Blinded and lost, Gervaise stumbled on with difficulty, as she touched the trees with her hand. The gaslights came out of the discolored air like quenched torches, and then, all at once, as she was crossing the corner, even these lights were wanting. She was caught and whirled about in the bleak whirlwind without distinguishing anything which might guide her. The ground seemed to go from under her in its indistinct whiteness. Gray walls seemed to shut her in, and when she stopped, hesitating, and turned her head, she discovered behind this veil of ice the immensity of the avenues, the interminable files of gaslights, and all the infinite blackness and desertedness of sleeping Paris.

She had come to the spot where the outer boulevard and the boulevards of Magenta and Ornano meet, and was thinking of lying down upon the ground, when she heard steps approaching. She went toward them, but the snow blinded her eyes, and the steps were going off without her being able to make out whether they passed to the right or to the left. But at last she perceived the broad shoulders of a man, a dark moving figure forcing itself into the fog, and she rushed forward and came up with it, and took it by its blouse. The man turned. It was Goujet.

Ah, what had she done to the good God to be tortured thus to the very end? It was indeed too horrible to throw herself thus in the way of the blacksmith, and to be seen by him, pale, suppliant, in the ranks of the vile ones of the barrière; and it happened under a gaslight, too, so that he could see her deformed figure dancing on the snow, a perfect caricature. One would have said she was a drunken woman. Mon Dieu! not to have a crumb of bread nor a drop of wine in the stomach, and yet be taken for a drunken woman! But it was her fault, for why had she ever got drunk? Very surely Goujet thought she had drunk, and that she was on a spree. He gazed at her as the snow shed its daisies on his handsome yellow beard, and held her as she bowed her head and drew back.

"Come with me," said he.

He went first; she followed him. Both traversed the silent quarter, skirting along quietly by its line of walls. Poor Madame Goujet had died in October of acute rheumatism. Goujet continued to live solitary and alone in the little house of Rue Neuve. That day he had been delayed by watching at the bedside of a wounded comrade. When he had opened the door and lighted a lamp, he turned toward Gervaise, who waited meekly on the landing place. He said in a low tone, as though his mother might still have heard him, "Come in."

The first room, that of Madame Goujet, had been piously kept in the condition in which she had left it. On a seat near the window, the cushion was placed by the side of the large arm chair, which seemed still to be waiting for the old lace-maker. The bed was made, and she might have gone to it, if she could have left the cemetery, to have passed the night with her child. The room was full of sacred memories, retaining its odor of goodness and of honesty.

"Come in," repeated the blacksmith, louder. She entered timidly, and with the feeling of a child who is drawn into some respectable place. He was very pale, and trembled for having thus introduced a woman into his dead mother's room.

They crossed the room on tip toe, as though to avoid the shame of being heard; but when he had pushed Gervaise into his own room, he closed the door. There he was at home. It was the same narrow room which she so well remembered, about the size of a boarding scholar's room, with its little iron bedstead with white curtains. On the walls pictures, cut from the papers, were stuck, reaching nearly up to the ceiling. Gervaise shrank from all this purity, and drew herself away from the light, when, without saying anything, he tried to seize her and hold her in his arms. But she almost fainted, and only murmured:

"Oh, mon Dieu! Oh, mon Dieu!"

The stove, filled with coke, still burned; and the remains of a ragout, which the blacksmith had left to warm when he went out, steamed before the ashpans. Gervaise, revived by the great heat, would have gone on all fours to eat from the stove itself. It was too much for her; her stomach yearned, and she stooped forward with a sigh. Goujet seemed to understand, for he placed the ragout on the table, cut some bread, and turned out something for her to drink.

"Thanks, thanks!" said she. "Oh, how kind you are! Thanks!"

She stammered; she could no longer pronounce her words. When she took hold of the fork she trembled so that she let it fall. The hunger which was strangling her caused her head to shake so that she had to use her fingers. As she put a potato to her mouth she burst into sobs, and big tears rolled down her cheeks and fell upon her bread. But she ate—yes, ravenously devoured—the bread her tears had wet, breathing very hard, and her chin trembling all the while. When Goujet forced her to drink to prevent her suffocating, the glass rattled against her teeth.

"Will you have more bread?" asked he, in a low tone.

She wept. She said no; she said yes; she did not know. Ah, Lord! how good and sad it is to eat when one is starving!

Goujet sat before her and meditated. Now that he saw her perfectly under the bright light of the lamp how old and faded she had become. The heat had melted the snow on her hair and clothes, and she was dripping. Her poor shaking head was all gray—gray locks which the wind had blown about. Her neck had settled between her shoulders; she had become squat, ugly, gross enough to make one weep to look at her; but he remembered their love, when she was so blooming, tapping her flat-irons, and showing le pli de bébé, which made such a pretty collar for her neck. He went on those days for hours together only to catch one glimpse of her, and was satisfied; and later, when she had visited the forge, what great pleasure he had had while pounding the iron to see her wondering at the dancing of his hammer. And then how many times he had longed for her in those days! And now she was here and he might take her. She finished her bread, but her tears still fell. She arose, and remained an instant with her head bowed down, and feeling awkwardly indeed. Goujet took her hand in his, and said gently:

"I love you, Madame Gervaise; oh, I love you still. I swear it, notwithstanding all. Will you let me kiss you?"

She was surprised and overcome by emotion, and could find no words by which to express herself. She said yes with her head. Mon Dieu! she was his, and he could do what he chose with her. But he merely put out his lips.

"That is enough between us, Madame Gervaise," murmured he. "It is all friendship, isn't it?"

He kissed her on the forehead, on one of her gray locks. She was the first one he had kissed since his mother died, for his sweetheart, Gervaise, alone remained to him in the world; and he fell back on his bed and sobbed. Gervaise could no longer stay there. It was too sad, it was abominable, to find oneself in such a condition when one loved. She cried out:

"I love you, Monsieur Goujet, I also love you. Oh, but I understand how impossible it all is! Adieu, adieu."

She hastened through Madame Goujet's room, and was soon on the pavement again. When she came to herself she had already rung at the house in Rue de la Goutte d'Or. Boche pulled the cord. The house was very dark. She went in as though she was in mourning. At that hour of the night the porch, all shattered and gaping, seemed like an open mouth. To think that she had ever wished a corner in that carcass of a barrack! Her ears must have been stopped to prevent her then hearing that cursed music of despair which groaned behind its walls. From the day when she first put her foot there she began to run down. Yes, to be stowed one above another in those great beggarly tenement-houses was sufficient to bring one bad luck. The cholera of misery was indeed caught there. That night every one seemed dead. She could only hear the Boches snoring on the right, while Lantier and Virginie, at the left, were making a purring noise, like cats who have shut their eyes without sleeping. The yard seemed like the middle of a cemetery, the snow making a white square upon the ground; and the tall façades running up in their livid gray without a single light, like the face of a ruin. Not even a sigh was heard. It seemed the shrouding of a village stiff with hunger and with cold. She had to step over a black stream—a brook made by the dyer—which smoked and opened a muddy bed for itself through the whiteness of the snow. But this water had the color of her thoughts, for the beautiful, tender blues and rose colors had long since passed away.

While mounting the six stories in all their darkness she couldn't help laughing—a wicked laugh, which made her ill; for she remembered her ideal of other days—to work quietly, eat her daily bread, have a hole clean enough to sleep in, bring up her children well, not be beaten, and to die in her bed. Well, really, it was funny how all that came to pass. She no longer worked, she no longer ate, she slept on filth, her daughter was on the town, her husband whipped her; it only remained for her to die on the pavement, and that would be immediately if she had but the courage when she reached her room to jump out of the window. Wouldn't one have said that she had demanded of heaven thirty thousand francs income and much consideration? Ah, it is but too true that one may have very humble desires in this life and yet fail to obtain them. Not even bread and bed is the common lot, and what increased her unpleasant laugh was to remember her great longing to be able to retire to the country after twenty years of washing. Well, she was going to the country, and she wanted a green corner in Père la Chaise. When she reached the entry she was quite crazy. Her poor head was quite turned. The most of her grief came from having said an eternal adieu to Goujet. It was all over between them now—they would never meet again; and on top of that came all her other troubles, which completely broke her down. She put her head into Bijard's room as she passed, and gazed upon the dead Lalie, who looked contented as she lay stretched out for her long rest. Well, children had a better chance than grown people! And as there came a ray of light from Père Bazouge's room, she went in, taken with a strong desire to go on the same journey as the little one.

The old undertaker, Père Bazouge, had returned home that night in extraordinary good humor. He had taken such a dose that, notwithstanding the cold, he lay snoring on the floor, and that did not hinder him from having pleasant dreams, for he seemed to laugh while sleeping. The candle remained lighted, and illuminated his old effects, his old hat flattened in the corner, and his black coat, which he had drawn over his knees like a bit of coverlet. Gervaise, on seeing him, began to cry so hard that it waked him.

"Nom de nom! Do shut the door—it is terribly cold. Hein! it's you. What's the matter? What do you want?" Then Gervaise, with extended arms, not knowing what she uttered, began to beseech him ardently:

"Oh, do take me away. I have had enough of this. I want to go. Don't bear me any grudge. I didn't know, mon Dieu! One never knows when one is not ready. Oh, yes; one is always glad to go some day. Carry me off, carry me off, and I will thank you."

And she went on her knees completely overcome with the idea. Never before had she rolled at the foot of man. Père Bazouge's phiz, with his twisted mouth and his skin incrustured with the dust of interments, seemed to her as beautiful and resplendent as a sun. But the old man, half awake, thought it was a joke.

"Carry me away," repeated Gervaise, more earnestly. "You remember one night I knocked at the closet. Then I said I hadn't, because I was stupid then. But come; give me your hands; I'm not afraid now. Carry me off to sleep; you'll feel if I move. Oh, that's all I care for. Oh, I'll love you if you only will!"

Bazouge, gallant as he was, thought he ought not to push off a lady who seemed to have such devotion for him. She was passing away fast, but she had the remains of beauty when she showed them.

"You are perfectly right," said he, with a look of conviction; "I packed up three to-day, who would have given me a famous treat if they could have got their hands to their pockets. Only, my dear little mother, it can't be arranged so easily."

"Carry me off, carry me off," cried she always; "I want to go."

"Dame! there must be a little operation beforehand. Couic! you know." And he seemed to be trying to swallow his tongue; then, finding the joke too good, he sniggered.

Gervaise arose slowly. Even he could do nothing for her. She went to her room, and threw herself upon the straw, regretting that she had eaten anything; for, after all, misery did not kill quick enough.

LXXXV.—Sunday, June 29.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Green Corn Soup.
Rock Cod, au Gratin.
Beef a la Mode. Potato Croquettes.
Fried Egg Plant. String Beans.
Roast Pigeons.
Tomato, Mayonnaise dressing.
Ambrosia (see Vol. I, No. 17). Whipped Cream. Orange Cake.
Fruit-bowl of Peaches, Apricots, Plums, Green Gages, Cherries, Pears, Apples, and Nectarines.

ROCK COD, AU GRATIN.—The cod after being cleaned is placed in a bakepan, having butter, chopped parsley, mushroom, salt, and pepper, both under and above the fish. For a fish weighing three pounds, add one gill of broth and half as much white wine. Dust the fish with bread-crumbs, and put in a pretty quick oven. Fifteen minutes after, examine it. When done, dish the fish. Put a little broth upon a sharp fire; stir with a spoon or fork so as to detach the bread; pour this over the fish and serve warm. The gravy must be reduced to about four tablespoonsful, and great care must be taken in dishing in order to avoid breaking the fish.

When a woman buys a kettle of paint for, say, the kitchen door, she doesn't let what's left after covering the door dry up. No, she paints everything paintable in the house with it, till the last drop is exhausted, until all things about the premises—tubs, boxes, and barrels, flower-pots, wheelbarrow, and hoe handle—have put on the kitchen door tint, be it green, yellow, or brown, black, purple, or crimson. She does this to save the paint. Only this, and nothing more.

There is no good way to keep a lawyer from talking. If he has no real case he will suppose a case, and continue the argument.

GLIMPSES OF CALIFORNIA.

BELLOTA.

It is a dreamy realm of quiet hills
And forests pierced with sunset's arrowy gold.
Here creeps the murmurous sound of hidden rills,
Until each weird ravine with music fills;
Then swift and sweet the twilight, as of old,
Hides in the valley, full of mystic thrills,
And, wavering as a song, climbs, fold by fold,
Till the heights fade, the stars grow dim and cold.
The chilly dew its gentle gift distills.

CAPAY.

One morn the sunrise touched with glorious light,
The windless summits of the ancient pines:
And, looking south, I saw the hillside vines,
The golden wheat, the barley silver white,
The pleasant, sloping fields which lay
At quiet rest in hid Capay.

Mount John uplifts his shining northern crag,
The far-off Buttes are billowy floods of flame;
And how shall any mortal language name
The white Sierra's lonely, breathless flag?
Or how describe the lights which lay
Among the oaks of wide Capay?

Miles down, beneath the reach of human sound,
I see the winding river's pebbly shore
Gleam white through spotted trunks of sycamore,
And lake-like glimpses at sight's utmost bound—
Cache River, on its arrowy way
Along the vale of fair Capay.

PLEASANT VALLEY.

O river, singing in the woods
Through livelong nights in June,
I wonder if you have your moods,
Or always keep in tune?

Our duller senses in your song
No worry may discover;
And yet, perchance, 'tis grievous wrong,
You may be loved—or lover!

For mountain lilies, leaning trees,
The grasses on the brink,
Wood-creatures all, and belted bees,
And birds which stoop to drink—

Are all in love with thy sweet ways;
So lightly touch the fern,
And lightly thread the woodland maze,
And sing at every turn!

The Breath of June.

Across the hills, on perfumed wings,
Soft comes the gentle breath of June.
It greets the fairies in the dell,
And sets the wind-harps all in tune;
It steals into the woodland glen
And covers o'er the rabbit's trail,
Then sweeps adown the long, white beach,
And sets the tiny shells a-sail.

It whispers to the waiting heart
That all is well far out at sea,
And waits a message o'er the wave
From underneath the old roof-tree;
Its dewy wings a love-song bear
When low the sun is on the wane,
And soft the maiden, unperceived,
Goes wandering down the locust lane.

It floats into the shadowed room
Where eyes no more with health-light shine,
And pours into the fevered heart
The cooling honeysuckle wine;
Across the sweet verberna beds
It drags its garments, all a-trail,
Then creeps into the twilight room
Its dewy fragrance to exale.

It wafts the tired heart far away
Into some old-time clover-nook,
And bids us dream the hours away,
While sweetly sings the moss-bound brook;
It whispers tales of by-gone days,
It bids life's roses bloom anew,
And on the garden of the heart
Pours down sweet memory's starlit dew.

The winter wind, enrobed in snow,
Still brings the merry Christmas-tide;
The autumn gale, with fingers chill,
Bedecks the woodland as a bride;
The spring-time zephyr wafts the flowers—
But oh! it is the breath of June
That steals from out the summer's heart,
And sets the earth and heaven in tune.

PETALUMA, June, 1879.

CLARENCE T. URMY.

Beside the Sea.

What hast thou seen or heard,
Thou sad and lonely bird,
With tired, drooping wing incoming from the sea?
Has that brave ship gone down,
That sailed far from the town,
Speeding my blue-eyed love away from me?

"Down among waves so dank,
Down among sea-weed rank,
Ah, I fear that good ship lies beneath the sea."
Thus spake the lonely bird,
To all the world unheeded,
Save I and the troublous, restless, and cruel sea.

What hast thou seen, blue wave,
Thou that went out so brave,
That thou rushest headlong to the rocky shore?
Why haste thou in affright,
Making such rapid flight,
Looking back to the slumberous seas no more?

"Down among pearl and shell,
Down where sea-maidens dwell,
Oh, I fear thy lover lies beneath the sea;
I saw his face so wan,
With blood and foam-fleck on,
And I hastened fast to tide the news to thee!"

THE ARCHERY TOURNAMENT.

The archery tournament of 1879 has been shot and won. The silver cup has been removed to its final resting place at the headquarters of the Bow Club, and the gold arrow will adorn the right side of the hat of Mr. Frank C. Havens, who is now the champion archer of the Pacific Coast.

The tournament was a grand success. True, the attendance was not as large as might be expected from the novelty of the event and the interest that archery has awakened in this State; but those who did come enjoyed themselves thoroughly. When, on the first day, the tents were pitched and the targets set upon the easels, it was announced in an unofficial manner that the "man from Santa Cruz" had arrived. Be it remembered that some months ago a middle-aged gentleman walked into Albert Haven's office, told that individual that he was an archer from Santa Cruz, that he had some bows and arrows with him which he had manufactured himself, and that he would like to try a flight with a San Francisco or an Oakland bowman. Unfortunately, the weather was so bad that the "man from Santa Cruz" returned without having his wish gratified; but the wise archers of this vicinity made many jokes about the home-made bows and arrows—which they had never seen. Therefore, when a quiet, middle-aged gentleman and his son were introduced as the gentleman from Santa Cruz, a great curiosity possessed the heart of every archer to examine the bows and arrows of Santa Cruz manufacture. They were the prettiest, and, I should say, the quickest and the best bows on the ground, with perhaps one or two exceptions. Made of locust, and of what is known as the Robin Hood pattern, the Santa Cruz bows, and the long, thirty-one-inch, eagle-feathered shafts, were the admiration of all the archers, and Mr. Button was duly complimented on the skill and taste displayed in his workmanship. The arrows made by Mr. Wight, of Oakland, which were also used with good effect at the tournament, proved that we are not altogether dependent on the importers of archery tackle for good shafts.

Friday, the 20th, was a delightful day for archery. The wind was light, the air clear, and no glare rested on the targets. On Saturday the weather was not at all as pleasant or as favorable for shooting as on the preceding day. A strong chill wind was blowing over the range, which shook tents and targets at their moorings, and when an occasional gust caught a well directed arrow it sent it far away from where its destination would otherwise have been. The following tables represent the scores made, all of them being below the average the same clubs have accomplished at their practice games:

The next archery event on the tapis is a club picnic—a gathering of the clubs and their friends—and a mild contest for a few mild prizes on some shady plain lying near the route of the North Pacific Coast Railroad.

THE POCKET-MINER.

BY SAM DAVIS.

In the person of the pocket-miner one finds a fair exemplification of the ups and downs of a Pacific Coast fortune-hunter. Old Slug was one of this class. I never knew his right name, and furthermore was never so fortunate as to meet anyone who did.

I first met him on California Street, some six years ago, standing in front of a bulletin board with his chin turned up toward the quotations. His mouth was firmly set, one eye half closed, and his hands were in his pockets. He scanned the list carefully without a change of countenance, and walked away stroking his chin whiskers, which were red.

He was next seen in a two-bit saloon circumventing a pretty good sized horn of brandy, while the barkeeper sipped a little Seltzer at his invitation. Slug threw down a $20 piece, and it was evident that he was long on the market.

He was seen frequently on California Street, walking up and down, saying little or nothing to anybody, and drinking often. When the market rose he was extravagant in his expenditures, and with a depression he was correspondingly economical. I soon became aware of the fact that to see Old Slug blind drunk indicated a deal in Ophir.

He came by the nick-name of "Old Slug" from the habit he had of maintaining that a $50 slug of '49 was the only true coin of the realm.

Old Slug was a pocket-miner. Such men pin their faith on finding stowed away in the hills fortunes which nature has placed in out-of-the-way places, and to which she has forgotten to leave any clue.

Old Slug always insisted that these deposits of gold in pockets existed mainly in Nevada County. There the hills were dotted with pine and hemlock, and the underbrush is thickened with creeping vines. Beneath this covering of verdure are quartz ledges, gravel deposits, and pockets of gold.

Experience had taught Old Slug where to look for pockets. He despised the plan of mining practiced upon the Comstock. He cursed the sage-brush country, and had a hearty contempt for "croppings," such as are stamped upon the topography of Nevada. To mine by means of deep shafts, to take out rock to be milled, to follow plans, surveys, methods, and forms, all this smacked of a ceremonial which Old Slug loathed. To know that a ledge had a certain angle, and pay-rock could be struck by running exactly 235 feet from the winze on the 1750 foot level, was reducing mining to a mathematical basis, which was to Old Slug what photography is to a painter. Chance was his goddess, and he spent the best years of his life serving her.

I picked up a good deal of his history along the street. Almost everyone knew something about him. He had periodical appearances and disappearances, and, like Richard, would stake all upon the hazard of a die. He delighted in desperate ventures, and possessed the astonishing nerves which are born in gamblers. He doated on tremendous odds, and lost more coolly than most men would win.

One day I entered into conversation with him:

"Will there be a break?"

"Get 'em lower if there is."

"Will we have a market?"

"Cost yer more if we do."

While I was revolving in my mind the best method of turning this information to any practical account on a capital of $30, Old Slug sauntered off to a bulletin board, scratching his chin-whiskers reflectively.

During the same week there were feverish symptoms observable in the market. The crowds on California Street thickened daily, and signs were not wanting to the observing that San Francisco was on the eve of its periodical speculation debauch.

Something of more than common interest was afoot in the Big Board room; and when this great financial heart began to pulsate with stronger throbs, there was a responsive quickening in the blood which moved through the commercial arteries of the State. Ophir, the bell-wether of the market, climbed up a little higher every hour, and the lesser stocks followed in its wake. The city responded to the excitement, and a hoarse yell went up from the throat of speculation.

Yesterday, fever.

To-day, delirium.

To-morrow, madness.

Men saw fortunes accumulating on their hands without any effort of their own. The outsiders wanted to devour the whole list; the insiders fed the famished multitude in driblets, in quantities to suit, in big blocks to order—for cash. In the midst of all this turmoil Old Slug maintained his equilibrium. Nothing could disturb the knowing quiet which always held possession of the man. When the street was like a battle-field Slug was as undisturbed as a rye-patch. He simply watched the market, stroked his chin-whiskers, and drank mechanically. He was exactly the same as when a few months ago the market lay like a water-logged ship becalmed in the doldrums.

The break came.

There was a breath of panic on the street, and the big structure which took $45,000,000 to rear began to topple.

"They want to get hold of our stock," said one of the wise ones.

"They'll pay higher when they get mine," said another, equally wise.

"They can't put 'em down after to-morrow."

"Some of the timid bolders are selling."

Spring, of the Post, author of all the spring rises, invested his stock articles with a flavor of humor that took off the edge of care, and advised people to beware of combinations to break the market temporarily.

The public whistled merrily as it entered the grave-yard. The papers still had a cheery tone, and predicted a stronger market for the coming week. They showed how Eastern capitalists were just getting interested in the Pacific Coast market.

Keene was buying heavily. (Taking in one hundred shares with a big flourish, and letting out a thousand quietly.)

McDonald had broken the market for a couple of days to the south.

McDonald.

The public were about to get control of the market, and would cinch the bears.

Bless the public.

A syndicate of bulls, backed by millions, were about to do something immense.

For all these crumbs which fell from the editorial and reportorial tables the public were profoundly thankful.

Everybody felt that the big magnates were sorry that they had sold, and they determined to make them pay like the devil for everything they got.

The insiders have a habit of selling stock for little or nothing, and then paying a big price for it in thirty days.

The break continued.

Margins melted away like a line of foam disappearing upon the sand. There was a frantic call for "mud" from the brokers, who had thrown their customers' stock upon the market weeks before. Another case of an eagle who found a shaft quivering in its breast guided by a feather dropped from its own wing a few days before.

Everybody wanted to sell and nobody wanted to buy. The insiders had unloaded a few days before, and when the panic had touched bottom they bought back their stocks about seventy-five per cent. cheaper. The people found consolation in reading the newspapers which fearlessly exposed the job. These newspaper articles were written with great force and ability. The public at least had the consolation of knowing who got the money.

In the midst of this crashing market I noticed Old Slug stroking his chin-whiskers as calmly as ever, and pouring two-bit whisky down his throat.

"What do you think of the situation?" I asked one morning.

"They've got us again."

In the afternoon I saw him minus his heavy gold watch and chain—"Uncle" Harris. Next day he had disappeared.

A few days later found him back again in the hills of Nevada County looking for a pocket. In the little cabin in the grove he had a cat, a few mining and cooking utensils, a side of bacon, and a sack of flour. He had passed through a few weeks of turmoil and excitement, and dropped $15,000. This was his vacation. Next followed a season of industry.

He toiled away for months, pushing his little tunnel into the hill-side. Ten, twelve, and sometimes fifteen hours a day he delved and sweated in this lonely spot. He wallowed in red clay, and burrowed like a mole through the uninviting stratifications of barren quartz. Misfortunes spurred him from behind, and hope beckoned him from before. At night he rested his weary limbs on his hard bed, having accomplished nothing. He would have despised to have worked for wages at $5 a day.

It was sad to reflect that this poor devil was slaving his life away in order to help pay for a palatial mansion on Nob Hill, from the doors of which he would have been kicked had he tried to enter. His broker had begun the erection of the building with the expectation of meeting several hundred of just such men. Winter passed on, and spring opened. Old Slug got anxious when he saw the snows stealing down to the streams and the flowers budding upon the hills.

"I must be down for the spring rise."

His provisions were getting low, and his little store of cash could be counted with a few movements of the fingers. He worked longer hours, and his toil was beginning to tell. There might be gold just beyond, and there might be nothing but barrenness for rods ahead. More exasperating still, he might have passed a rich pocket a few inches to the right or left. He began to feel that Providence would never throw another pocket in his way, and despondency took the place of hope.

One afternoon, just at sundown, he struck his long-sought pocket. A blow of the pick revealed the shining treasure, and, at the next, a mass of quartz flecked with free gold rolled at his feet. He scratched his red chin whiskers, now developed into a full beard, and said softly to himself:

"She's just blistered with it."

That night he was speering royally in Grass Valley. After his debauch he settled down to business, and, for the next week or so, it was almost like taking honey from a hive. He cleaned up some $15,000—just about enough to pay for the last four-in-hand his broker had bought.

Old Slug was now equipped for the spring rise. Grab-all & Co., of California Street, was ready for Old Slug.

He was soon in San Francisco, and on California Street, his native heath. His big watch chain once more stretched across his vest front. His face—all but the chin whiskers—was cleanly shaven, and a diamond pin blazed in his hickory shirt front.

He left $10,000 with his broker, and took the balance to go round and see the town. He at first contemplated a spree, but recollected that his old partner, who was caved on in a tunnel at Dutch Flat, had a widow somewhere on North Beach, and he went down there to inquire. "Have you seen any woman round here they call Jack Hardy's widow?" He bored hundreds with this question, and at last his patience was rewarded.

He found her with two little children, in a hand to hand battle with poverty and an exacting landlord.

He left some money there; no one knows how much, but it was a comfortable sum.

Mrs. Hardy, when she saw the coin—but why mangle up these scenes with a pen which can only mechanically record the bursting forth of a woman's sympathy. Old Slug gave the money with no flourish. He simply laid down the sack on the table, remarking: "I prospected with Hardy. You stow that away," and got out of the place at once, because he hated to see a woman cry. She never knew who left the money.

That night he turned himself loose, as he called it.

When he started on his spree the spring rise began.

Old Slug's doings kept pace with the market in which he had invested. He smashed up a team coming in from the Cliff, at four o'clock in the morning. He made a pandemonium of all the fashionable and bad resorts at night, and thrashed several of his old enemies by day. His fines one morning at Louderback's levee were $150. He paid his fines, kept up his spree, and otherwise enjoyed himself.

Bracing up, he went down to California Street, to find he was worth $20,000 and the market boiling.

Assuring his broker that he was still on deck, he drew a thousand dollars from his winnings and plunged again into midnight hilarity and heavy tussels with the tiger. In a week Ophir was $280 and booming.

Old Slug was worth $100,000.

"Now, Slug," he said, reflectively, "don't make a blasted ass of yourself again. Sell out and quit."

Old Slug's broker was on the verge of ruin. A combination of men had vowed his financial downfall—and that sort of fall embraces all the rest—and now they had him in their toils. He was struggling in a net-work which a gang of shrewd speculators had woven about him. These highway-men of California Street were calling upon him to stand and deliver. Nothing short of the Bank of California could have saved him. He went over to that little brown building and implored for help. He little knew just then that the weapon held by his enemies was forged in that same place. He got no assistance, cursed himself for shorting at the wrong time on such a market, and then began sacrificing his customers' stock.

Next day he was a dead cock in the pit. The afternoon papers gave detailed accounts of his failure, and the clique who engineered his ruin had a sumptuous spread at the Poodle Dog that night. The broker of shattered fortune improved the opportunity of being alone a few moments that evening by blowing out his brains.

Old Slug was again a pauper. He simply remarked: "Got me again, by Jove!" soaked his watch, and started for the foot-hills to find another pocket.

On the Stockton boat that afternoon, a man who had been acting quite strangely in the cabin was suddenly observed to spring upon the wheel-house and shout:

"Sixty-five for any part of a thousand!" All looked up. It was Old Slug.

"Sixty-six—seller thirty."

There was no response, and, waving his hands aloft, he sprang into the bay.

The boats were promptly lowered, the poor devil picked up, and, a few days afterward, he was duly installed inmate of the lunatic asylum.

He was very quiet for a few weeks, but one morning he glanced at the clock; it was on the stroke of eleven. Mounting a chair he called everybody to order by rapping on a table in front, and the throng of madmen and women about him paused and crowded to the front. Old Slug leaned over and shouted:

"Ophir!" in a voice which rang through the building.

"Seventy-five for a hundred shares!" yelled a man springing from the corner of the room.

"Eighty for any part of a thousand," was echoed back. The last voice sounded so business-like that the motley crowd caught up they cry at once and began to bid uproariously.

None bid stock to sell. All were anxious to buy.

The crazed creatures crowded about Old Slug, and, with glaring eyes and screeching voices, they beat each other's breasts, and bid for the stock in lots ranging from ten shares to a hundred thousand.

The women grew wilder every instant. The crowd of some score or more who began the deal were soon joined by others, who came flocking in from all sides, and melted into the excitement.

Frenzied men and decrepit old women clutched each other's rags, and fought for place as they bulled the stock, and it rose spasmodically $20,000 per share in three minutes. Thus the poor devils went down the list, raving of fortunes lost and won.

The market closed with a deal in the wild cats, which left Phoenix at $800, and Picton at $650 a share.

After that the authorities of the asylum kept Old Slug by himself that the excitement might not be repeated. Each day at eleven, however, even when the poor fellow had no timepiece to go by, he would rise solemnly to his feet, and call the list in regular order. After a few weeks he became quiet, and one day he was missing.

He had escaped.

A few months later some miners found a skeleton in an old, deserted tunnel.

It was the same one in which Old Slug had struck his last rich pocket.

The tunnel had been worked a few feet beyond. The fleshless hand of the skeleton still grasped the pick. Where the quartz had fallen away the glittering ore was in sight. The poor lunatic had died while drifting for a pocket.

He is still drifting—drifting into that unprospected country beyond the grave, where the theological expert assures us the ore is rich with gold of divine forgiveness, and where the market of everlasting happiness booms without a single break. If Old Slug locates in that district, let us hope that the work of charity he performed when he left a sack of gold upon the widow's table, will enable him to hold his claim for ever.

VIRGINIA CITY, June 20, 1879.

M. de Jordanes, a sexagenarian roué, is at a ball masqué. In the course of a "sparkling" conversation with three dominoes unknown to him:

"Is it true, Monsieur de Jordanes," wickedly inquires one of them, "that you are sixty years old?"

"No, madame; twenty only—that is to say, twenty at the service of each of you," was the ready retort; "and I mean what I say."

The sphynx of the Evenement says that Messrs. A. and B. fell out at their club not long ago and came to blows. The following morning Dr. C. was asked to attend on the two adversaries.

"Is the affair likely to result in anything serious, Doctor?" was the first question put to him.

"Oh, no," answered the physician, with a few good compresses.

The following comes from the country:

"Well, Peter, this continual rain must be very injurious to your crops."

"So they are, madame; but there is a God above us, and my neighbors' fields are as much hurt by it as my own."

A man coming out of a Texas newspaper office with one eye gouged out, his nose spread all over his face, and one of his ears chewed off, replied to a policeman who interviewed him: "I didn't like an article that 'peared in the paper last week, an' I went in ter see the man who writ it, and he was there!"

OUR OWN POETS.

Tree Lore.

Ancient lore of Druid teachers
Blends with Saxon thought and skill;
Spoken words of Druid counsel
Live on lips of mortals still.

In the past, fierce Roman legions
Quenched the Druid fires in blood;
Ages since, the Roman eagles
Fell before a Gothic flood;

Still, through Time's wild revolutions,
Living lips have borne the tales—
Canticles of roving minstrels,
Legend lore of Cymbrian vales.

Woven in the woodland stories,
Greenwood song of nymph and faun,
Gleams a silver thread of reason,
Spun in wisdom's early dawn.

Pleading for the dryad sisters
Harpers swept their plaintive strings;
In our Saxon thought and feeling
Still the Druid lesson rings:

"Spare the trees! The woodland dryads
Tremble when the forests fall;
When the fays forsake the mountain,
Evil comes to field and stall."

Living lips take up the story—
Vocalize the old refrain:
"Save the trees—the streams are failing;
Spare the pledge of winter rain."

Druid teachers knew of ruin,
Famine, and encroaching sands,
Wasted plains, and rainless winters—
Tidings from Phœcean lands.

Through the seeming superstition
Guarding mountain crests from spoil
Gleams a ray of thoughtful reason,
Sign of care for lowland soil.

Spoken words of Druid counsel
Live on lips of mortals still,
Sound through dim Sierra forests,
Rise from groves of lowland hill—

Pregnant words of Druid counsel:
"Mountain forest—lowland grain."
Spare the Californian woodlands—
Nature's pledge of winter rain.

MERCED, June, 1879.

ANGLE.

A Tornado.

Darkness rested like a pall over all,
Black and dreary as a tomb in its gloom.
Such a night as shall befall from the wall—
Grandly awful—that will loom round our doom.

Silence entire did abound. Not a sound
Broke the quiet; but did leave fear to weave Ghosts and goblins dread around. Courage drowned—
Gulfed in fears it must receive and believe.

Then a faint and whisper tone that, alone,
Came from sea and rocks that merge on the verge;
Warning soft—a feeble moan gently blown—
Sung a solemn, tearful dirge in the surge.

Nearer, louder did it swell, till it fell
Threat'ning plain on list'ning ear; sending fear
Through the soul, and seems a knell-tolling bell
O'er the hopes that disappear—leave all drear.

Booming loud along the shore, up it bore
Through the vale, with giant blow lying low
Trees and homes, and on it tore with a roar—
Savage, fear-inspiring foe, scatt'ring woe.

From his ruined home a bowed, silent crowd
See him lifted, stained with red blood he shed.
Young, and fair, and noble-browed, in his shroud
Now is laid on stranger's bed, pale and dead.

Near the open grave so drear rests his bier.
Lifts a mother's broken cry up on high
For the lifeless one so dear lying here:
"Father Mighty, tell me why should he die!"

Neither weeps she all in vain of her pain;
Clouds from sun are blown, and bright, glorious light,
As his body down is laid, answers plain
That his soul is with the right clothed in white.

Killed by storm his body lay 'neath the clay;
On its wings his soul doth rise to the skies;
Hopeless clouds it blows away. Brightened ray,
Filled with hope, now kindly dries grief-filled eyes.

Thanatos.

When Nature, chill with misty shades and clouds,
Seems to her dark funeral vestments wrapped,
And no glad brightness glimmers through her gloom,
'Tis fit, I thought, O mightiest and most dread
Of Phantoms! on by sway to muse—to call
Thee up from out thy caverns, and to look Upon thee, grim and ghastly as thou art,
Crowned with sad cypress in triumphal wreaths,
Betokening thy victories o'er Hope,
Truth, Beauty, all the smiling train of Joy.

As oft amid the flowers and the bright Foliage of Spring we wander—drinking in
The joyous sounds that burst from every chord
Of Nature's lyre, and blend their harmonies
In one sweet strain of grateful offering
To the pure source from whence their being came—
Thy dark form rises in the distance dim,
And with gigantic stride approaches us;
By thy tempestuous breath each chord is broken
Of that melodious lyre; the notes of joy
Are changed to wild unearthly sounds, that grate
Upon the soul, and in its shattered cells
Will echo long.

But Phantom still art thou:
Though thou hast made us journey through a vale
Where weeping willows, dripping with their tears,
Shut out the sun, and every breath of air
Comes burdened with the weight of sighs, thy rule
Must end. The tearful willows soon shall bloom
With heaven's brightest flowers, each tear-drop
Beaming with purest rainbow radiance;
The winds that sighed with vain regrets,
And bore along the notes of woe, shall waft
Upon their perfumed gales the voices clear
Of the long lost, but now for ever regained.

As thy more ancient brother—Chaos—fled,
When from the night of Time the morn arose,
So shall the second and more glorious Rising of Beauty's brilliant sun dispel
Thee, shadowy wanderer, in the vale of tears!

OMNIUM GATHERUM.

TWO OUTSIDES.

And the Misunderstanding Between Them.

BY E. H. CLOUGH.

The clerical looking gentleman and the bearded borderer were the only passengers on the Carson stage, seven hours out, en route to Bodie. They occupied the upper seat behind the driver, and the tenor of their conversation indicated that there was a slight misunderstanding between them—a misunderstanding that neither of them seemed capable of gathering up the threads of a skein that was momentarily becoming more and more tangled as some new phase of the subject under discussion was broached.

"When I was there," the clerical gentleman was remarking, "the vineyard was in a deplorable state."

"The vineyard!" interrupted his bearded companion.

"Yes, the Lord's vineyard, I mean, the weeds were—"

"Hold on a minute, stranger," exclaimed the other, hitching in his seat, and turning so as to face his companion, "hold yer hosses. I aint much on this parable palaver, an' I come mighty nigh givin' ye the lie on thet vineyard bizness, 'cause ye see thet aint no sech 'ithin five mile o' the camp. Maybe there's a few down to Salt Lake, but nobody ever was fool 'nough to think o' speculatin' in vineyards 'round my neighborhood. But it's all right now, I've cottoned to the rights o' the case, an' I'm drawin' my sights onto Lord's vineyards."

"As I was saying," resumed the other "outside," "I found the field of labor in a deplorable condition. The weeds had long since choked the wheat, and tares were flourishing with a luxuriance that might well sadden the heart of the most earnest husbandman. Human sacrifices were frequent in the interior, and barbarous executions for the most trivial offenses were of weekly occurrence along the coast. I attended one of these executions, and if I am not too tedious in my narration I will relate the circumstances of the horrible affair. Are you agreeable?"

"Go ahead, ol' man, I'm listenin'. I like to hear a man tell a good one while he's at it," and the bearded passenger hitched back to his former position and asked the driver for "a chaw o' thet nigger heel."

"Well, it appears that the unfortunate man was condemned to death for poaching on the king's preserves. They had adjudged him guilty and sentenced him to be beheaded, and a more pitiable wretch it has never been my misfortune to contemplate, as he passed out of the prison into the open court where he was to be executed. He was made to kneel and bend his neck; after which the executioner dipped his hand in a tub of water, and drawing his middle and fore finger through the sand upon which the doomed man was kneeling, applied them to the naked neck of the shivering wretch, leaving a broad and distinct mark at which to strike. He then raised his great double-edged sword, and with one blow the head fell from the trunk, while the great stream of blood crimsoned the sand."

The clerical gentleman paused in astonishment. His fellow-passenger was staring at him with a strange expression upon his sun-browned features, which the narrator at first imagined was the result of intense interest, but which he gradually observed was produced by a disgusting disbelief in the statements which he had just been making. He cut himself short for the purpose of allowing his hearer an opportunity of relieving his over-charged mind, knowing full well that if he did not the bearded man would explode, and render the situation decidedly unpleasant to say the least. The man of the border made a great effort to control himself, and in a tone plainly indicating that he forced a calmness he was far from feeling, simply to "cinch" the man who sat beside him, and prove to the grinning driver that no man could with impunity "put up a josh on him."

"The't's the frozen truth, is it, stranger?" he asked.

"Every word I have uttered is the truth. I witnessed the sickening spectacle in the broad glare of a tropical sun, and I did not lose a single movement in the barbarous tragedy," answered the other "outside."

"What's your line?" he abruptly asked the man with a beard.

"My profession?"

"The same."

"I am an evangelist—a missionary."

"Oh, you're a preacher, eh?"

"A minister of the gospel—yes."

"What shop?"

"Shop?"

"Yes; w'ich track are ye travelin'—how's yer baggage checked?"

"I don't believe I understand you."

"No? Well, what church are you swearin' by?"

"I am a Baptist."

"Good enough; Baptist goes. You say you was on the missionary racket w'en you saw all this?"

"I was engaged in the task of attempting to convert the heathen from blindness, and teaching him the path he should follow to attain everlasting glory."

"Heathen is good, too, but wait a minute an' I'll tackle thet remark. What I want to know, was you givin' those heathens, ez ye call 'em, the true bizness on the ten commandments?"

"I was inculcating the divine law which Moses received amidst the thunders of Sinai."

"Kerrect; an' maybe ye give 'em the bizness about lifin' a man w'en he calls ye a liar?"

"I did not counsel violence upon any pretext whatever; on the other hand I taught them that lying was sinful."

"Kerrect again, stranger, yer workin' 'round to my side o' the shanty, an' I guess I'll fetch ye into camp purty soon. Ye told 'em lyin' wasn't a squar' game?"

"I told them that a liar could not hope to be saved."

"Tol' 'em a liar couldn't hope to be saved? You saw thet duck git down on his marrer bones?"

"I saw the criminal kneel down—yes."

"Ye saw the other sharp 'ith a two-edged sword make mud an' plaster the back o' the 'doomed wretch's' neck?"

"I did."

"Ye saw the sword-sharp chop his head off?"

"Yes."

"Say, stranger, look here. I reckon I've got you tight'n' a Mexican cinch. I'm thinkin' you're tangled yerself up in yer own lariat. What year was you out thar, anyhow?"

"I went out in 1874; but, my friend, I can't see what you are endeavoring to accomplish by this question and cross-question."

"I'll show ye afore I git through 'ith ye. I'm agoin' to prove to this yer driver o' this yer stage thet you can't show down the hand yer claimin' ye hold. I'm agoin' to show thet yer givin' me a game."

"I don't understand you, sir."

"No? Well, s'pose I give ye dead away on the sword racket fust? S'pose I was to say thet thet ain't nothin' bigger'n a sixteen-inch Bowie in the hull camp! S'pose I was to come down to cases, an' said ye lied about thet mud bizness? S'pose I was to bring proof thet no man in the camp ever hed his cabesa cut off below the ears? S'pose I was to bring a hundred men to back me in the statement thet hangin' was all the go, w'en it was a vigilante racket, an' thet nobody ever died out thar 'ceptin' from hot lead an' col' steel? S'pose I was to do all this, what kind of a game would ye gi' me then? I tell ye, stranger, I've bin thar, an' I'm posted, I am. I'm the best posted man this side o' Denver, an' ye can't play it very low down on me, much!"

"Do you doubt my word, sir?"

"No, I don't doubt yer word; but ef ye'd put a little more solid stuff into what yer sayin', I'd be more likely to take stock in yer yarns."

"My friend, I fear you are attempting to beguile me. I fear that you are imposing upon a stranger in a strange land. I am not accustomed to your peculiar manners and customs, and you should not take advantage of me in this abrupt and unceremonious way."

"I thought you 'lowed ye'd bin thar."

"Where?"

"In Shyann."

"Cheyenne! Not at all. I never saw the place. I thought you understood from the first that I was a missionary to Siam."

"What! Siam? Well, I swear, I take it all back, stranger; I throw up my hand. Shake, stranger, an' we'll call it squar. Shyann—Siam. They do sound alike, don't they?"

Noises of the Night.

It was of old supposed by some people that the night was made for sleep. There were times and places in which a measure of correctness characterized this supposition. Applied to city life it is largely based on error. The city is noisy both by day and by night, and the people who can sleep through the noises are indeed fortunate. There are some whose profession turns night into day and day into night. Even to those who stay awake at night there are noises to which the ears can not be closed. Prominent among these is that of the night-hawk. This creature must not be confounded with the night-owl, which is a bird of the country. The night-hawk of the city is a predatory bird, and roosts on top of a hack. He is on the look-out for anybody whom he can induce to take passage in his vehicle, but prefers those who are gently inebriated. Hour after hour he drives his vampire-like steeds, with slow and measured tread, along the pavement. A foot pilgrim with hand luggage is a boon to him, if from the country, and unlearned as to hack rates; but a drunkard is a god-send, especially if with full pockets and too far gone in inebriety to resist illegal taxation. In sections of the city where the night-hawk plies not his trade there are noises of various grades and styles. Street-cars keep up their racket till after midnight, and begin again so early in the morning that the sleeper is unconscious of any intermission. Cats lift their lofty voices and entertain whole communities with free concerts. In the old days of the volunteer department the fire-bells would arouse the sleepers of a whole city to tell them that somebody's chimney was on fire. Happily that clangor no longer disturbs us, and when there is a conflagration we hear only the rumble of the engines along the streets. To the weary sleeper who wants a good night's rest, it is a nuisance to be disturbed an hour past midnight by the intoxicated neighbor who can not make his night-key fit the hole in the door. After struggling a while, and profanely soliloquizing in his loudest and thickest tones, he kicks the front door several times with all his might. This brings a night-capped head from an upper window, and a demand for information as to who is there. The response, "itsh mee—lemme in," brings forth an angry remark to the effect that the inebriate has come to the wrong house. Then the upper window is shut with a slam, which brings several more heads to other windows in the vicinity, each intent on knowing who is firing guns in the street. The tipsy outsider tries several other doors without achieving marked success, and after worrying his neighbors out of more sleep is taken care of by the police and clubbed into peaceful quietude. As the night progresses the ice-carts furnish their contribution of racket. A procession of them bangs its noisy way along the street, and the drivers hold trumpet-tongued conversation with each other, which they hurl from cart to cart as they ride. Their rumble is hardly done before the milk-men begin. The noise of the ice-cart is solid and solemn, but that of the rattling contents of the milk wagon is ten times as worrisome. The milkman drives along in hot haste, and his tin cans knock against each other as if each were bent on shattering the empty head of all its fellows. After giving weary attention to the milk cans until almost ready to drop asleep from exhaustion the sleeper is startled by another and even more outrageous noise. It is the noise of singing birds. The neighbors keep fowls. The ostentatious rooster mounts a fence and officiously declares to all within reach of the blast of his awful voice that he thinks he begins to discern symptoms of approaching dawn, and that according to his belief it will soon be time to get up. It is in vain to protest. The rooster must have his way. Bootjacks and inkbottles may be thrown at the midnight cat, who will be silent for a few moments while dodging these missiles. The wicked rooster, whose noise is more penetrating than the combined doxology of forty cats, will not pause for all the missiles of the neighborhood, but keeps right on spaking his little piece, and will not stop until he has faithfully executed his whole contract. And yet we will not ask for refuge in the deaf and dumb asylum. If the noises of the nights are frightful with objectionable elements, there is much by day to regale the ears as sunshine does the eye. Some of these nocturnal noises are inseparable from the blessings of civilization. That we are civilized, and take comfort.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 28, 1879.

The senior editor of the ARGONAUT, after a non-political interval of eight years, finds himself unexpectedly in near relation to the Republican party. Unless it is understood by our readers that the incident of his chairmanship of the Republican State Convention was an accident, entirely unsought and unexpected by him, it might prove an embarrassment in his writing. It might be supposed that having sought such an honor, he would be estopped from any adverse criticism to a party over whose State Convention he had presided, and opposition to any nomination he had helped to make. While he is not indifferent to the compliment that placed him in the chair of a party convention, and which seems to restore him to the organization from which he had been so long and so unwillingly estranged, this incident must not be regarded by his party friends or readers as a restraint to his entire independence in the expression of his political opinions. He became a member of the Convention to serve his party by serving his friend, the Hon. John F. Swift, in endeavoring to secure for him the nomination as Governor of the State of California. He was placed in the chair as presiding officer of the Convention, and Mr. Swift was not nominated. It was a misfortune to the party. Mr. Swift was among the ablest and best of all the named candidates; he was the only man who had an unimpeachable and honorable anti-corporation and anti-monopoly record, he was available and popular, he would have been able to have made a bold and aggressive fight against the insolence and abuse of corporate powers, and at the same time would not have been put upon the defensive to explain away any intention to destroy vested rights, disturb property, or overthrow government and social order. His defeat was a mistake; it was a political blunder. It will always be a mistaken policy for the Republican party, which is the party of intelligence and moral worth, to ignore brains.

The personnel of the Convention was of the highest order. It was a Convention of intelligent and respectable gentlemen. It was representative of the best material of the Republican party, and when the Chronicle undertakes to impugn the character of the Republican State Convention it becomes a libeler. When it represents the gentlemen who composed its membership as the slaves of corporations, or charges that they had any other end in view than the good of the community and welfare of the party, it departs widely from the truth. This it does, in malicious envy, that it may destroy the Republican party, and on its ruins build up one that shall illustrate its own power and be its slave. The ticket nominated represents a high order of respectability, and is favorably comparable with any that was ever presented to the people of California. The nomination of Mr. George C. Perkins was fairly and honorably attained. His mode of securing his nomination leaves no stain upon him or his partisan friends. No convention ever held carried from it less resentments or more good feeling. Mr. Perkins is a strong candidate. He is entitled to the full support of his party. As a citizen and business man he is up to the full average of intelligence and moral worth. He will be the friend of the people against the encroachments of monopolies or corporations. We see no evidence that he is the partner of the Pacific Railroad. His company navigates the great ocean highway of commerce. He has no monopoly of it. He has no exclusive right of way over God's broad ocean. He has no gate barring the golden entrance of our harbor at which he may exact tolls. His company existed long before the railroad was built. If he has an arrangement between his line and the railroad to prevent a ruinous rivalry, it is but plain sense and business prudence. In saving himself from competition by land he does not prevent the free navigation of the sea, or inhibit any merchant or business man from dealing with him for the carrying trade of our Pacific coast. The Chronicle, of course, knows this, and to make an argument against the candidacy of Mr. Perkins for this cause is simply dirt-rooting for the ground-hogs of the new party it is attempting to create. The other candidates for State officers are men of character, and there is not one of them for whom we may not claim the distinction of being good citizens. The candidate for Chief Justice is unexceptionable. He is entitled to the position by his judicial experience, his learning, his integrity, and the purity of his private life. No less compliment can be paid to Messrs. Belcher and Catlin, and for the other Associate Justices; while it may be admitted that they are not distinguished for their eminent learning, they are at least of average integrity, industry, and respectability of attainments. We reserve to ourselves the privilege of voting for the best men for judges, entirely independent of the party that may place them in nomination. We await the action of other conventions, and challenge them to present a better bench than that nominated by the Republican party.

There is one thing we regret: We regret that custom has sanctioned it, and we regret that it becomes necessary for us to mention names and declare that, in our opinion, certain persons desiring judicial positions have been guilty of gross impropriety in personally soliciting from party delegates a seat upon the bench. We were pained to observe that the Hon. A. L. Rhodes, John Dwinelle, John Reynolds, E. D. Wheeler, L. D. Lattimer, M. H. Myrick, E. D. Sawyer, and Walter Van Dyke so far forgot the dignity of the positions to which they aspired as to allow themselves to attend the Convention at all. We were ashamed to see some of these gentlemen drifting around hotels and saloons, and either by themselves or friends personally soliciting a judicial nomination. We were disgusted at the conduct of one or more who most shamelessly buttonholed and buzzed delegates. It is not necessary to say that it was the most ignorant and entirely incompetent who exhibited the most brazen impudence. We hope this will not occur at the other conventions; and if it ever occurs again at a convention of which we are a member we will make them regret it, if they have any personal respect or any regard for the dignity of the bench. The lobby, as we were informed, log-rolled for the judicial ticket, and it was openly said that one individual wanted a bench sound upon the debris question, and did not hesitate to ascertain the opinions of judicial candidates as preliminary to his support. If it is true that there was an attempt to pack the Supreme Court, we would be criminal not to declare our utter detestation of the practice. Unless we can keep the courts out of the mud of party politics, we had better abandon government and civilization, and go back to barbarism. No gentleman of nice sense of honor, who appreciates the dignity of the judicial office, will be personally officious in seeking it, and no citizen who values his name and wants an impartial tribunal will ever promote the appointment of a candidate for the bench who is weak or wicked enough to foreshadow his opinions. We wish it could be established as part of our judicial ethics that the selection of judges could be taken out of the political scramble. We wish their choice could be solely because of their learning, integrity, and judicial temperament.

The platform expresses in temperate language the opinion of the Convention upon topics of leading interest. Platforms are, in our judgment, very unimportant parts of the political structure. Unless the issue is a burning one the report of the committee passes as a matter of course, and, as a matter of course, is a mass of platitudes intended to catch flies. We seldom find a party adhering very closely to its resolutions, and, excepting in the case of Mr. John F. Swift, we rarely find a candidate who has the boldness to declare to a convention before whom he is a candidate that he is a platform in himself, and that the party must conform to his record if it desires him to serve it—a declaration more frank than politic. Mr. Gorham's minority report, instructing the Railroad Commissioners, and demanding pledges of them as to their duty, was deemed to be an injudicious interference with them, and was objectionable as standing upon the same moral ground as to instruct a judicial candidate in reference to the decision of a question deemed of public importance in event of his election. The Railroad Commissioners are charged with the investigation of facts concerning railroad fares and profits, and, upon a finding of those facts, to exercise a wise discretion and a sound judgment in reference to regulating them—or fixing them. To accept Mr. Gorham's preamble for facts, to reduce by what he calls a "horizontal" reduction of twenty-five per cent. the railroad charges, was regarded as of questionable policy and of doubtful propriety. It would have made the office of Railroad Commissioner a very simple and easy one; but whether their acts, performed in obedience to an iron-clad pledge, dictated by a party convention, and in anticipation of an election, would stand the test of judicial investigation, is very doubtful. At first the committee stood six to two in favor of their embodiment in the report, while Mr. Sanders, of Tulare, was tenacious to insert the figure of reduction at thirty-three and one-third per cent., and reduce to this extent their whole line of profits. This minority report was, by a close vote, referred to the district conventions, and a resolution of Mr. Houghton, of Santa Clara, prevailed, declaring in simple form that those railroads receiving State and national aid should reduce their charges not less than twenty-five per cent. This resolution expresses the opinion of the Republican Convention, that the Pacific Railroad Company is earning too much money, and pledges the Republican party to a reduction of fares and freights by legislation and through Railroad Commissioners, in accordance with the provisions of the new Constitution.

We remember the old political axiom of "measures, not men." We have learned to distrust it. Experience has demonstrated that principles and measures depend very much upon the men who entertain and enforce them. Our motto would be, "Men and not measures." Honorable, independent, honest, and intelligent men—as candidates of a party—are the only safe guarantees that the people can rely upon for honest and intelligent legislation, and for earnest, practical administration. We believe the Republican nominees are good, and we shall sustain them until better men are placed by other parties in nomination. In illustration of our views let us instance the Workingmen's party in San Francisco. It is led by a leather-lunged, Irish blunderbuss, who has apostatized from the Catholic Church and the Democratic party. It professes a desire to reduce taxes and promote the interest of labor. Its rank and file is presumed to be composed of workingmen; it is largely made up of foreign Irish and German Catholic apostates. This party has nominated for Mayor of San Francisco a Protestant Yankee—a hard-shell Baptist preacher not in good standing with his church; one who has been an active Republican politician in Kansas, and who, as we are informed, never did an honest day's physical labor in his life, and whose palms are only callous by Bible pounding; who has not a dollar's worth of property, and pays no taxes except upon his own head at a valuation which produces only two dollars per annum. The nomination of the Reverend I. S. Kallach to be Mayor of San Francisco seems to us to be a travesty of politics, and conclusive evidence that Denis Kearney is an unprincipled idiot, and that the rank and file of his party is composed of brainless asses. It turns the whole movement into ridicule and contempt. The reverend political hard-shell Baptist will not get one thousand votes in this city. At the same time we are constrained to admit that the reverend gentleman has brains and an honest streak in him, and we are sorry that, being a preacher, he should turn politician; and being a politician, should have fallen into the hands of Denis Kearney.

And now a word in reference to our municipal administration. We have in our midst an organization styled the Real Estate Protective Association. It is composed of good citizens, and has for its leading purpose the reduction of taxes and the enforcement of economies in the city government. Its object is not political—so much the better. It is not politics to put out a fire, nor to eject a burglar from the house; nor is it politics to rescue our city from thieves and make an exertion to reduce expenses. Rents are down, real estate values are depreciated; and it must follow that salaries must be reduced, extravagances must be cut off, supernumeraries dropped from the pay-roll, fancy schools closed up, street department expenses diminished, clerks discharged. The city must begin to economize. The tax levy is too high. Every department is extravagant. We despair of any relief from any political party. Hence we suggest to this organization to give us a municipal ticket. Let it be "cut and dried." Let the leaders of this real estate party call to their council a few intelligent property owners, get together at the round table, and, with careful deliberation, select candidates for all our city offices. Let them choose for Mayor some man who, first having the ability, the integrity, and the leisure, has the nerve to play the municipal tyrant. Let them choose this man first, and then ask him who he wants for his associates in office. Let him choose his own Supervisors, and his own surroundings; give to him the City Hall as his palace; let him be its sovereign, dictator, and autocrat; and then let the citizens hold him responsible for honest work. When this ticket is matured, let it be indorsed as a whole at a public meeting. Let those who do not like it oppose it. It will have upon it men of character, resolution, and ability, chosen with reference to performing the duties of their offices, and not with reference to their party affiliations, their birth, or their religion. Such a ticket can save one million of dollars this year, and make the saving of another million possible next year. The Mayor should be some ill-natured, long-headed, unpopular citizen—some one who is too brave to be intimidated, too mean to be coaxed, too rich to be bribed. We need a Horace Hawes. Let him and his ticket be nominated without reference to politicians or newspapers. Let them have but one plank in the platform, and that "Economy, honesty, and reduced taxation." Such a ticket at this time will win.

The Honorable B's have nominated for Railroad Commissioners, Henry Larkin of El Dorado, Gen. George B. Stoneman of Los Angeles, and Samuel Soule of San Francisco. Both Larkin and Stoneman are named by the W. P. C.'s, and being Democrats, will be indorsed by the Democratic party. In San Francisco there will be a triangular duel between Soule, Beerstecher, and the Republican candidate.

AFTERMATH.

The very earnest opposition of Mr. Gorham to the Central Pacific Railroad has this suspicion attached to it: He was once the very willing servant of the company and its earnest friend. His partner and political fidus Achates, William B. Carr, Esq., was, as it is understood, for many years upon the pay roll of the company—did its political work. When Mr. Gorham's connection with the company expired, and Mr. Carr was no longer in its employ, he became the very active friend of the people, and his indignation at the oppressive exactions of the monopoly waxed warm. During the discussion of the Thurman bill he was diligent and zealous at Washington. When Congress adjourned he kindly accepted a free pass over the line, and turned up at the Republican State Convention as a proxy to denounce the aggressive wrongs of the corporation against the people. When labor is championed by this horny-handed son of toil, it reminds us of the aid that Hercules gave the wagoner; when political wrongs are denounced by this innocent-minded gentleman, we think we smell a mice. Mr. Carr has, as we are informed, invested his large fortune acquired in the honest service of the railroad company in Kern County lands; and, in the absence of special rates, he feels the exactions of the railroad tyrant in his transportation bills. This is an instance of retributive justice—Arab chickens coming home to roost. To compel an officer, clothed with judicial powers and under his oath required to investigate the question of fares and freights, to pledge himself in advance seems to us neither lawful nor just; and if Mr. Gorham was less the enemy of the railroad, we think his friendship to the Republican party would be more apparent. The true position for all honorable and high minded men to take in reference to railroad matters is to be just and impartial; bold enough to treat the company justly, and honest enough to demand fair treatment to the community with which it does business. There is room enough in the Republican party for all honorable men, even if they differ in opinion. The railroad must not be permitted to either control or destroy the Republican party, and the Republican party must not be used by the enemies of the railroad to destroy it.

We sometimes indulge ourselves in the luxury of calling our friend Denis an idiot. Just read this example of the ignorant Irishman's arithmetic. It is in his organ, the Call: "He [Perkins] has a contract with the Spring Valley Water Company to furnish water at a few dollars per 1,000 gallons, which he sold to poor sailors at from $30 to $40 per 1,000 gallons." The highest price of water furnished by the company is 75 cents per 1,000 gallons. Of course, the Call knows this; of course, Denis knows it; but it suits the Call to thus misrepresent the Spring Valley Water Company in order to increase its circulation among the prejudiced and the ignorant. It suits Kearney to so misrepresent Mr. George C. Perkins in the interest of his party candidate in order to mislead the gang of ignorant foreigners who follow him. Very contemptible journalism, and very contemptible politics, it strikes us.

We give another example of arithmetical prophecy by Kearney: "The Republican machine will poll 25,000 votes; the H. B.'s will poll 12,000 votes; the Democrats will poll 15,000 votes; while the patriots, the producers, and the industrious classes will poll 75,000 votes, on the 7th day of next September. This I know to be a fact. About the 8th of July I am going into the State. I am going to take in the Third Congressional District. I may get thrashed before I get back, but I shall make an aggressive fight." Of course we shall feel badly if the prophet should get thrashed. If there are four tickets in the field—and there will not be—the Workingmen's Piece Club will not begin to get the 12,000 assigned to the Honorable Bilks.

The "new party," recently sitting at Sacramento, and engineered by Messrs. Charles de Young, Alexander Campbell, Leonidas Hamilton, and Mr. Wagmire, all employees of the Chronicle, assisted by the Hon. David S. Terry, Hon. Volney E. Howard, Hon. William B. Norman, Hon. Calhoun Benham, Dr. O. M. Wozencraft, Hon. John C. Burch, Hon. Mr. Irving, and other honorables, all chivs., with Senator Cole and Johnny O Lord! Love for horrible examples of Republican depravity, has erected its party scaffold, and placed its candidates on the trap. They will be swung into political eternity on the 3d of September. We are sorry for them, because they have been heretofore men of good character, and this is the first political offense of which they have been proven guilty.

To be serious, this new Constitution movement seems destined to be of no consequence unless the Democratic party in Convention indorse it. The nominees are not strong in a direction to produce this result. There is no prominent Democrat upon the ticket. Indeed there is no prominent man upon it, and no one who has ever attained any distinction in the State, or who is known as possessing any marked ability. It is emphatically a ticket of respectable nobodies, and not at all in harmony with the Democratic party organization. It is not in harmony with the Grangers, whose candidate was overslaughed by the chivalry element that ruled the Convention. If the Democracy shall nominate a straight ticket, this Honorable Bilk and political sorehead business will cut but a small figure in the politics of this State at this time, and never be heard of again. We are all of us playing a cut-throat game at politics—four hands, three of them are now dealt. Kearney holds neither ace, face, nor trump.

The Republicans have a good, fair winning hand. The Honorable Bilks have dealt themselves no strong cards. The Democracy has not received its hand, but it may be a strong one. If the game is fairly played the Republicans will win. If the Democracy and the Bilks confederate and play their hands together, the Republicans will have a hard game but not a desperate one. The stakes are large, and the temptation would be a strong one for the Democracy to pool with the Bilks, but there is another and a better game to be played next year, and one in which the Democracy hold strong cards. We await the Democratic Convention, and then we shall see what we shall see.

Doctor Glenn, the largest practical farmer in the world, is nominated by the New Constitution party as its candidate for Governor. Doctor Glenn is a native of Virginia; is a gentleman by birth and education, and cultivates 60,000 acres of land in Colusa County. We have seen a newspaper paragraph that says he is a graduate of Harvard College; whether true or not we do not know. He is a Democrat, sympathized with the slave-holders' rebellion, and from all we know of him we have no right to say he will not make an honest administration of the duties of the office. His nomination by an anti-monopoly party, clamorous for reform, is illogical, and, in view of his large landed estate, savors somewhat of inconsistency. Still we must do him the justice to remember that, broad as are his acres, he cultivates them, and there is great difference between a large farmer and a large land monopolist and speculator. His nomination was a Chronicle defeat, as Charles preferred Mr. E. V. Webster, the other Granger.

If the Democracy and New Constitution party agree upon Dr. Glenn for their candidate, what becomes of the monopoly cry? The owner of 60,000 acres of God's broad earth can not very well cry out monopoly against Perkins, who only makes a track upon God's broad ocean that the next wave wipes out. Dr. Glenn fences in half a county, which he cultivates by machinery. Commodore Perkins only drives his vessels over the sea. Anybody may follow in the track of Goodall, Perkins & Co.'s steamers, and may rival them in carrying freight; but no one can come within the inclosure of this Duke of Colusa without trespassing upon his domain. So Kearney's is after all the only anti-monopoly party.

A very quiet but very resolute political contest has been going on for a few days past within the Democratic party in San Francisco. Dr. Gwin, Governor Irwin, and Frank McCoppin may be regarded as the leaders of one wing; Mayor Bryant, Dr. Shorb, and other stalwarts lead the opposition. Opposition wins, and it looks as though Bryant and his friends had seventy-two delegates to the State Convention—solid San Francisco—with Bryant chairman of the delegation. It is not improbable, as we are advised at the last moment before closing our forms, that Dr. Glenn for Governor, Mr. Larue for Comptroller, and General Stoneman for Railroad Commissioner, will be indorsed by the Democratic Convention. If Dr. Glenn is indorsed, it will be a Gwin victory over the old Broderick Democracy. If Judge Terry is nominated by one or both conventions, it will be a blow in the face to the Northern wing of the Democratic party. It is probable that Wm. A. Piper will be the Democratic candidate in this district for Railroad Commissioner. Democratic policy now looks to the absorption or destruction of the New Constitution party. It will ignore the Workingmen, and offer its organization, both State and local, as the machinery to work out a defeat to the Republicans.

The gentlemen of the bar in San Francisco are endeavoring to secure the nomination of Superior Judges of their choice. The lawyers ought to be the best judges of the learning, integrity, and fitness of a judicial candidate. They ought to have influence in the direction of judicial nomination, and they would if they could be disinterested and unselfish enough to suggest only the best names. The bar meeting of yesterday was too late for us to know what action was taken. Next week will be time enough for comment. We are in favor of a non-partisan judicial ticket. We desired this action in the State Convention, and we desire it in this county, and all the counties of the State. We would be very glad indeed if when all the party nominations are made the tickets are so revised as to give us the best talent and the best men for Judges.

When Mr. A. J. Bryant was first nominated for Mayor we took pleasure in supporting him, and saying that he had executive ability of the highest order, and would make an honest administrator. When he was a candidate for reelection, we took pride in the fact that he had made a good Mayor, and that he was entitled to renomination and reelection.

When he carried us safely through the dangers that threatened our city from the upheaval of the sand-lot, we sustained him because we knew the secret history of that perilous time, and knew that Mr. Bryant carried himself bravely and properly through a critical period, and brought the city safely out of what might have been a serious disaster. When the Tibbey disclosures were made, and every personal and political enemy of the Mayor bounced him, and tried to indict, disgrace, and dishonor him, we knew, and so declared, that he would come out of the investigation without a stain; and so he has, and so he will, because Andrew J. Bryant is not only an honest man, but he has too great a business capacity and too great a pride ever to do a mean, dishonest, or dishonorable act.

And now the tide of popular favor turns again, and with combing wave brings Bryant in upon the top, because he has vetoed the tax levy, and had the nerve to set himself in opposition to dishonest and extravagant government. We are not surprised. We have an abiding faith that an intelligent man who has the courage to do right will in the end be vindicated. We have seen a great many popular revulsions in this State. We have seen bold, excellent men struck down by popular passions. We have seen dishonest and incompetent knaves exalted. We have seen excitements in which good men have suffered and bad men been honored; but somehow the wheel turns round, and the man who clings to principle, and dares to defy the envious, jealous, ignorant, and unthinking mob, is sure to come to the top. We have seen politicians, and newspapers, and individuals flourish in iniquity, but for them all there is an inexorable accounting. Popular opinion always comes out right in the end, and final justice triumphs.

The Chronicle has its columns so full of abuse against the Republican party, its candidates, and its convention, that it has no time to abuse the W. P. C. It has given Kearney a rest and laid down its gong. Even the Reverend Kalloch is accepted in silence. The Chronicle is indeed a bold paper. When we reflect that seven-tenths of its circulation and nine-tenths of its advertisements are among and from Republicans, it is indeed a bold act to denounce them all, indiscriminately, rank and file, leaders and followers, candidates and private persons, as "suborned wretches," "machine politicians," "corrupt slaves," "servants," "henchmen," as men devoid of principle, intelligence, integrity, honor, and self-respect. It is certainly a bold act to denounce all Republicans as bought and sold, driven and intimidated by wealth and power, the creatures of corporations, and the bondmen of monopolies. It seems to us all the bolder because it is false and untrue. If the Republicans should desist from reading the Chronicle and advertising in it, there would be no Chronicle. The Chronicle boldly defies a commercial community, and says it can live on quack medicine and cheap dry goods advertisements. Perhaps it can; but if so, it will be the first instance in journalism where prosperity followed the denunciation of and opposition to all that is good in society.

The New York Nation says: "One of the most marked and unmistakable signs of the revival of business is a strike on a great scale among the spinners at Fall River. A reduction of fifteen per cent. in their wages was submitted to in April, 1878, on the understanding that it would be restored with the return of better times. They have now decided, in view of the rising market, that the better times have come." It is apparent that the hard times are passing away from the East, trade is reviving, and there is every indication of a prosperous period. It was a long time before the tidal wave that came from the civil war reached our shore. When it came its force was nearly spent. We shall very speedily recover from our business depression. In one year from now our troubles will be over, and we shall set out on a new and more healthy and more encouraging career than ever before. It will be a blessing when we are done with politics. We look forward with pleasure to the time when our community shall get over this political fever and get back to honest toil. This too frequently recurring political fever is injurious and hurtful. It interferes with all legitimate industries.

Our Board of Supervisors will fail to comprehend the temper of the people if they do not recognize an earnest determination to reduce taxes. The expenses of our municipal government may be reduced $2,000,000 annually without serious embarrassment to the administration. The school, street, public building, police, gas, and salary figures may all be halved and no injustice done. Real estate values have declined, and rents been reduced. Our municipal expenses must come down, and he is either a dishonest or incompetent official who does not do all he can to contribute to retrenchment and economy in our municipal administration.

The Workingmen's party still adheres to its organization with great tenacity, and is steadily perfecting its organization throughout the State. It has more assured strength today than the Honorable Bilks can ever have.

ABSENTEEISM IN AMERICA.

The condition of the Irish people has, from time to time during the past thirty years, excited the commiseration of the more humane classes in our own country. Much of their poverty has been ascribed to the fact that they were compelled to toil from daylight till dark to increase the rent rolls of wealthy land owners residing in England or on the continent of Europe. Certain it is that their condition has been materially retrograding, and that crime has increased in like ratio with beggary and destitution.

If a man in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, or even San Francisco, were told that a similar state of affairs existed to-day in free America, even though on a smaller scale, he would open his eyes in astonishment. But such is the actual fact, and matters will grow worse before they are ameliorated.

Sail out of the Golden Gate of San Francisco, steer in a northwesterly direction till you make the frowning promontory called Cape Flattery, the outguard of the Straits of Fuca. Sail up those straits, with their grandly picturesque shores, for sixty miles, and, on the right, a low, sandy point juts out into the whirling tide. On your left is the beautiful San Juan Island, with the Vancouver shore in the dim background. Turn to your left, and enter Admiralty Inlet. Here you behold the unrivaled harbor of the world, Puget Sound—sometimes called the "Mediterranean of the Pacific." There is about as much sense in that appellation as there would be in calling Niagara the Velino of America—just about. The vast harbor, of which Port Townsend is the toll gate, far surpasses the stormy Mediterranean, whose shores are strewn with the wrecks of centuries. The treacherous bays of Genoa, Spezia, and Naples, are but vast cemeteries of the toilers of the waves. Puget Sound, on the other hand, has no treacherous gales to swamp the fisher's frail argosy, nor reefs, nor quicksands. There are three parallel passages—the one from Bellingham Bay, through the Swinomish Pass, to Olympia, 128 miles; the main sound, from Port Townsend to Olympia, 108 miles; and Hood's Canal—the quaintest of all Pacific scenery on its banks—extending from near Port Gamble to a point near Arcata, 87 miles. In either of these two latter might float all the fleets now in Pacific waters with ease. The Bellingham Bay route is more shallow and less adapted to the requirements of commerce. The vast hills which tower above this unparalleled yachting course are clad with timber such as no other country ever saw. The clipper ship Wildwood, built at Port Madison in 1871, was the thing that opened John Bull's optics when she arrived at Liverpool, and let him see what he lost when he signed the treaty which ceded to America the territory inclosing that vast inland sea. Her hull was planked with planks from 202 to 212 feet in length, without a butt or joint in her hull. No other fair land of earth could produce such timber.

Nor is that all. Beginning at a point fourteen miles back of Elliott Bay, where stands the town of Seattle, lies the largest bed of lignite, or semi-bituminous coal, on the Pacific coast. It can be mined so cheaply as to render cordwood, at $2.25 per cord, expensive by comparison. This black bonanza can be traced distinctly for a distance of twenty-eight miles in a southeasterly course, and, though the veins narrow as you move away from Seattle, the quality of the coal increases in value. And here are fisheries of salmon, herring, and halibut, in great profusion. The salmon of Puget Sound is inferior to his brother of the Columbia River, but the halibut of Puget Sound is the finest in the world. Add to these an abundance of shell-fish, and the bill is filled. The soil is rich, though cut up into small parcels; y^e: for potatoes, oats, and apples, it can not be surpassed. All the esculents thrive, but wheat-growing is comparatively a failure. Beef and mutton, too, are brought across the Cascade Range from the white-sage plains of Yakima. You say this country must be rich, for it possesses all the natural elements of wealth. That is very true as a simple assertion. There are facts, however, to militate against it.

More than a quarter of a century ago a company was incorporated in a small lumbering port on the coast of Maine to carry on similar operations on the Pacific coast. Two resident partners in San Francisco had about two-fifths of the stock, the majority being owned in Maine. This was called the Puget Mill Company, and its headquarters were at Teekalet Bay, now called Port Gamble. In the past eighteen years this great corporation has been shrewdly and cautiously managed. The building of Harry Meiggs' railroads in South America caused five or six vessels of the largest size to be constantly loading at their mills for years, for the ports of Chile and Peru. The reciprocity treaty with the Hawaiian Government gave them a chance to sell their lumber for sugar, and make a profit on each. Everything was fish that came to their net. In the midst of all this they took the bonanza fever when the tide was at the flood—no pun intended, my lords of the Nevada Bank. Fortunes already amassed were doubled by successive dividends. The crash came, but they had unloaded, and stood from under the toppling ruin that pauperized Van Ness Avenue. By dint of corrupting a political parson, they succeeded in getting a vast tract of timber land at one-tenth of its actual value; and thus an educational institute, more liberally endowed by the Government than any in America, was pilfered of its just inheritance. In fine, nothing escaped their shrewdness or their rapacity. They seemed to turn to shining gold everything that came beneath their touch. In 1869 died one Lawrence Grennan, at Vallejo. He was a man of remarkable energy, an Irishman by birth. Coming to Puget Sound at an early day, he cut spars and piles, which he shipped to Toulon, in France, for the navy yards of that Empire. With the profit of these ventures he built a mill. When he died his estate could easily have been wound up in a year. It was kept dragging through the courts for nine years, to cripple his heirs, and prevent them from resuming that important business he once had enjoyed; and then when a hungry gang of lawyers had absorbed (nothing is stolen in these days) the lion's share, this corporation was allowed to purchase his property, known as Utsalady.

The purchase of that property gave this mammoth concern the control of the vast grain trade of the Swinomish flats, lying between Bellingham Bay and Puget Sound proper; nearly equal in area to the whole kingdom of Holland, and not a whit behind it in fertility. Ninety bushels of wheat per acre is by no means a miracle in that section.

The cost of reclaiming the land, however, from the encroachment of the tide is somewhat expensive. Scarcely had they acquired this important strategic point of commerce when another incident occurred, which they were not long in turning to account. The owner of the Port Ludlow Mills, Arthur Phinney, a man whose courage was equaled only by his lofty sense of honor and sympathy for all who suffered, was taken sick and died before it was scarcely known that he was ill. There are those readers of the ARGONAUT who can remember him as I remember him twenty-five years ago, when he drove a water-cart, which he used to fill at the Clay spring on Pine Street, just opposite the present abode of the board of brokers. Eleven steamers followed his bark to sea, a procession never seen before on the coast, and all that was earthly of this great hearted and good man was borne from the scenes of his stubborn struggles and dearly earned triumphs. In less than a year the little port which owed its name and fame to his industry fell likewise into the hands of the Puget Mill Company.

Since that time two other milling corporations have tottered into bankruptcy, and will be swallowed up by the Puget Mill Company whenever that corporation deems their property worth possessing, or the antagonism of their successors worth overcoming. We also hear that another large concern, hitherto one of their most successful rivals, is nodding on the brink of the abyss, and liable at any time to fall into their clutches.

All the other milling companies on Puget Sound have built fleets of fine vessels—floating trophies of our progress as a people. This rich and grasping company have built nothing but a small stern-wheel steamboat in all their twenty-five years of unbroken prosperity. They buy old and worn-out ships, condemned for every other purpose, and keep them afloat by the rafts of lumber within their holds. How soon will they own it all?

The remaining companies engaged in milling lumber for export are those at Seattle, Seabeck, Tacoma, Port Blakely, and Port Madison, the first of which is the only one carried on by home capital. It is loaded down with debt, however, and liable to be closed out at any time. The one at Port Blakely is partly owned by a good old man who resides there, and looks after the business as well as one so afflicted can do. He is blind. All the others are owned by men living in San Francisco, who do not see their mills on an average of once a year. The business is entrusted to some clerk, the hands are paid in drafts on San Francisco, which they are compelled to sell at a vexatious discount, and the profits of all these industries are spent in the California metropolis. The great coal mines back of Seattle are in the same condition. The original holders of stock in them, residing in Washington Territory, were "frozen out" by the assessment dodge, and by directors voting themselves fat transportation contracts. The hands were paid off in silver at par, silver which these absentee lords had purchased in San Francisco at ninety cents on the dollar, when selling their coal for gold.

The picture is not a pleasing one, but now the curtain is up and we may as well show the whole of it. A sort of Chinese wall exists in all the Puget Sound towns, save Seattle, Tacoma, Olympia, Steilacoom, and Port Townsend. At Utsalady, Ports Madison, Blakely, Ludlow, Gamble, Discovery, and Seabeck, the mill company exercises the exclusive privileges of trade; and whoever trades with them has to do so at their price. Let a man employed at one of these mills come home with a suit of clothes purchased at Seattle or Townsend, and his place is filled by some one else within a week. To give you an idea of the heavy oppression practiced there I will instance a Seattle house which sells no cheaper than any other, and does not cutting under to please anybody. The freight on merchandise to that place from San Francisco is four dollars per ton. This same house has a branch in Walla-Walla, where freight is twenty-five dollars from Portland, and five more from San Francisco, yet goods can be purchased cheaper at their store in Walla-Walla than Seattle, notwithstanding a difference of twenty-five dollars per ton freight paid to the Oregon Steam Navigation Company. This combination enables the mill companies to charge what they like, by combining with two or three of these large firms.

I read somewhere, a few days since, the causes leading to the negro exodus from the cotton States, as set forth in an elaborate and well written article. One chief cause was that the negro never received anything but a bare living in return for his labor. He was obliged to buy at a plantation store at such prices as they saw fit to sell their goods, and then the interest on what went into his stomach ate off his head, figuratively speaking. This has awakened the sympathy of northern humanitarians more than any other thing in the category.

Is this what excites the sympathy of Cooper Institute and Faneuil Hall? Scented darlings of the fragrant metropolis, why don't you seek for something new? This system of affairs, as practiced upon your own color and kindred—Yankees from Maine and "blue-noses" from New Brunswick—has been going on for twenty-five years on the Pacific coast. The men who practice these same impositions, as, when practiced upon negroes, are telegraphed to the daily press with sensational headlines, reside on Rincon Hill, Van Ness Avenue, or at the Palace Hotel. The five per cent. discount on mill drafts is probably divided by them with the local banker on the Sound, and thus the system of plunder is perpetuated. Do you realize what the Puget Sound logger is? He has all the courage and generosity of the early California miner, and suffers twice his exposure. Half the time he works in the water up to his waist, getting his "boom" of logs in readiness for the mill; the other half he is in the trackless forest, risking his life amid the falling timber. At night the cougar snarls about his cabin, and his "roasting ears" are carried off by the brown bear from his corn-patch. The life of a coal miner is even more dangerous than that of the logger. He has the prematurely exploded blast to dread; the caving wall-rock; the suffocating fire-damp, and the hidden reservoir of water ahead of him. Should these men be always compelled to toil in danger and peril that some one else may live in affluence a thousand miles away? Are the diamonds, that blaze in the loges of the opera house, and the carriages rolling in stately elegance along the Cliff House road, always to be as now, purchased by the semi-starvation, the super-peonism of the dwellers by the great Northern Inland Sea?

The man who tills God's broad acres is the world's primary producer. "Any country must in time grow rich that produces abundance of breadstuffs," remarked the senior ARGONAUT to me, one week ago this evening, at my home beside the vast, foaming river which bears the snows of Manitoba to the sunset ocean. If, then, the tiller of the soil is the world's primary benefactor, what must be the man who hews the silent forest that the trenchant plow may follow in his trail. It is not the writer's boast that he has painted a flowery picture; but those who have lived in the western portion of Washington Territory will not deny that he has drawn one faithful enough to have come from the photographic lens of Daguerre himself. Feeling that he had no hand in begetting the abuses alluded to, he does not even venture to suggest a remedy.

The senior ARGONAUT made a hurried visit to Oregon last week, and saw enough to attract his admiration; but that he saw, or that any man can see, enough to engender correct criticism of the situation in the brief space allotted to him I emphatically deny. Let him come up again next year and I will show him the "Ireland of America" fast sinking into atrophy by the evils of absenteeism, and then he can see for himself the reasons why Oregon has advanced, while Washington Territory, with vastly superior commercial advantages, has retrograded in every particular.

In this fair land of picturesque scenery I would fain see all sections prosperous, and none reaping the benefit of another's misfortune. I would see the profits of the carrying trade (as is the case in Portland), or the lumbering or coal mining, expended on the ground where they are earned. I would see the farmer live on his farm or stock-ranch instead of at a city hotel, while his employes wallow about in dirt and cockroaches. I would see the coal-miner's earnings go for something besides bread, beef, and beer; and I would see the men who live neighbors to the logger reap some little advantage of traffic in his earnings.

The writer has lived among these men of soft hearts, rough hands, sharp axes, and sound timber. He has never seen them turn a deaf ear to the prayer of the hard-faring poor. What little they had to give they gave "for sweet charity's sake," and in that blessed secrecy with which the right hand conceals its doings from the left. And for the day when that class can be socially advanced, as is deserved richly by their pluck and their patience, your petitioner, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

A Mere Fable.

[With no Reference to Anything in Particular.]

A village dame possessed a little son,
And he was spoiled, because the only one.
He lied, he stole, he threw away his book,
And what he could not fairly get, he took.
When'er she sent the urchin forth to school,
With thumb at nose he scorned her as a fool.
And though she laid him oft across her knees,
Her gentle spanks did not affect his ease.

At last the kindly dame asserts her rule,
And tells the youngster he must go to school.
"Unless you promise me this thing to do,"
She said, "no breakfast in this house for you."
Quoth he: "I don't feel hungry, anyhow,
And to the river I shall go right now;
There will I fish and swim, the time to pass,
And you and school alike may go to grass."

He fished and swam till noon, then homeward came,
To meet the growing anger of the dame.
Said she: "You disobeyed me without fear,
And you shall have no bit of dinner here."
Quoth he: "Twill surely drive the neighbors wild,
If you attempt to starve your only child;
For your commands I don't pretend to care,
And now deny me dinner if you dare."
The dame in sorrow wipes her tearful eyes,
Gets out the meal, and mournfully replies:
"I grieve to see you growing up a dunce,
But you shall have your dinner, for this once;
Yet, if this afternoon to school you go not,
You shall not have for supper e'en a doughnut."

Again the boy, well pleased to disobey,
Goes forth to spend the afternoon in play.
He steals her cord, and robs her of her pins,
Wherewith to tickle fishes' gills and fins;
But comes up smiling, with a joyful yell,
Attracted homeward by the supper bell.
On him the dame then bends her eyes severe,
Though in the left one glistens still a tear,
And says: "My son, so badly you behave,
That you will bring your mother to the grave;
And, should I do as righteous parents do,
No bite of supper would there be for you;
But that my temper you may justly dread,
When coils of fire I heap upon your head,
I now decide, though you are much to blame,
That you shall have your supper all the same."—N. Y. S.

"Now, John," said a father to his gawky son, "it's about time you got married and settled down in a home of your own." "But I don't know any girls to get married to," whined John. "Fly around and get acquainted with some; that is the way I did when I was young. How do you suppose I ever got married?" inquired the old gentleman. "Well," said John, pitifully, "you married mother, and I've got to marry a strange girl."

"What shall I preach about?" said a minister to a pastor of a colored flock which he was about to address. "Well, mos' any subject will be 'ceptable," was the reply, "only I'd like to gib you one word ob caution." "Ah! what is that?" "Well, ef I was you I'd tech wery light on de Ten Commandments." "Indeed! and why?" "Oh, cos I hab notice dat dey mos' always hab a damp'nin' effect on de congregation."

A party met at a public table, and the conversation turned on the subject of transmigration. Mr. K. was a firm believer in the doctrine, and was expatiating largely upon its points. He was interrupted by a gentleman with: "K., what do you suppose yourself to have been before you were K.?" "I do not know," replied K.; "I might have been a pig for aught I know." "Well," rejoined his friend, "you have not altered much—only got upon your hind legs."

Sin always begins with pleasure and ends with bitterness. It is like a colt, which the little boy said was very tame in front, and very wild behind.

ABOUT WOMEN.

Marrying in haste is equivalent to marrying in Chicago.

Girls who want to economize on shoes must wear "lasting" gaiters.

The London beauty is a Circassian lady who belongs to the Russian Embassy.

A Long Island wife is suing her husband for a divorce because he goes to sleep before she does.

It was of a dear girl who doted on onion salad that it was written, "She carried her ruling passion strong in breath."

New York society belles have exact portraits of their favorite dogs sketched and painted on their fans. A sign of softening of the brain.

"Well, you'll own she's got a pretty foot, won't you?" "Yes, I grant you that, but then it never made half as much impression on me as the old man's."

A man who loved at first sight, married, and was divorced within a year, calls his divorced wife "Money," because "A fool and his money are soon parted."

Trying at the same time to drink in the beauties of the bonnets of two ladies, who are walking in opposite directions, has made many females cross-eyed for life.

"Detroit ladies practice archery for the purpose of scaring away tramps." This is news from a salad source. Archery is practiced to transfix beaux, some of whom are scamps.

A lady recently appeared at a fancy-dress ball at Richmond as a mushroom, and as ornaments over her cream-colored dress, and fan, and gloves she had little mushrooms.

A Cleveland lady who has lately passed a few weeks in Paris always refers to her kitchen girl as her fille de cuisine. Her son will insist on referring to the worthy domestic as "our pot rassler."

"Nature may color a maiden's cheek," observes the New York Express. But it seems that the most of our ladies are a little impatient with Nature, and take the responsibility upon themselves.

"Tell me," exclaims Doctor Mary Walker, "how would Venus have looked if she had worn corsets?" Dear Mary, if she hadn't worn anything else she would have looked ridiculous—especially at an evening party.

You never can calculate on women. A Berlin prima donna refused to sing recently because there was too much dust in the house; and a Californian prima donna declined to sing because there was not enough "dust" in the house.

A pretty little maiden had a pretty little fan;
She engaged in a flirtation with an ugly little man;
He won her young affections, which she gave to him for life;
But the honeymoon was busted by the feller's other wife.

A Washington correspondent who knows not fear says that the ladies belonging to the riding clubs of the Capital know how to dress better than how to ride, and that the general effect which they give when in the saddle is that of intense holding on.

Three girls of the Methodist persuasion having met together, concluded to pray for the welfare of their lovers; but the first one had not got very far along in her petition when it was discovered that they were all engaged to the same man. The religious exercises were at once terminated.

A town in western New York has a woman undertaker. She complains bitterly of the fickleness of the opposite sex. She says she used to be quite a belle, and had scores of admirers who declared they were willing "to die for her," but since she commenced business not one has been as good as his word.

Mrs. A.—Somebody's in the next room. I wonder what they're doing? [Looking wistfully at the keyhole.] I've a good mind to peek. Mrs. B.—Oh, I wouldn't; 'tisn't right. Mrs. A.—I don't care; I'm just dying to know. [Puts eye to keyhole, but immediately takes it away, disconcerted.] Hm! the key is in it. Mrs. B.—Yes, so I found before you came in.

Soon the love-lorn maiden will hie to the meadows, and pluck the dandelion that has run to fluff, and, as she blows the "feathers" off, will murmur alternately, "He loves me," and "He loves me not." And the chances are one in two that the oracle will decide as pleaseth her best. But, if it prove obstinate, then she will say, "Surely, I counted not correctly," and will give herself another show.

Shyly he bent o'er the dainty head,
And, "Won't you; won't you?" he softly said.
Begging from the saucy miss
Just the loan of one sweet kiss.
The maiden tossed her pretty head,
And, "No, I won't you," she saucily said.
"How foolish he is," thought the little miss,
"He should not ask for, but steal, the kiss."

A woman in a Kansas Pacific Railroad car sat facing a man who, with one eye at least, seemed to be staring fixedly at her. She became indignant and said, "Why do you look at me so, sir?" He said that he was not aware of having done so, but she insisted. "I beg your pardon, madame, but it's this eye, is it not?" lifting his finger to his left optic. "Yes, sir, it's that eye." "Well, madame, that eye won't do you any harm. It's a glass eye, madame—only a glass eye. I hope you'll excuse it. But, upon my soul, I'm not surprised that even a glass eye should feel interested in so pretty a woman." The explanation and the compliment combined put the woman in a good humor.

No actress is better advertised than Mile. Sarah Bernhardt. She has just enrolled half a dozen secretaries, to whom she dictates simultaneously the various articles she sends to the different newspapers of Paris, the departments, and abroad. In order the better to complete her resemblance to Napoleon, she wears a hat of the same shape as that worn by the first Emperor, and she holds her hand behind her back. It is in this attitude that she will be represented in her one hundred and twelfth full-length portrait, which will figure at the Salon next year. This indefatigable lady is going to write her impressions of England for more than one newspaper in Paris.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

When the Cows Come Home.

When klinge, klange, klinge,
Far down the dusky dingle,
The cows are coming home;
Now sweet and clear, and faint and low,
The airy tinklings come and go,
Like chimings from the far-off tower,
Or patterings of an April shower
That makes the daisies grow;
Ko-ling, ko-ling, kolineglele,
Far down the darkening dingle,
The cows come slowly home.
And old-time friends, and twilight plays,
And starry nights and sunny days,
Come trooping up the misty ways,
When the cows come home.

With jingle, jangle, jingle,
Soft tones that sweetly mingle,
The cows are coming home;
Malvine, and Pearl, and Florimel,
DeKamp, Red Rose, and Gretchen Schell,
Queen Bess, and Sylph, and Spangled Sue,
Across the fields I hear her "loo-oo"
And clang her silver bell;
Go-ling, go-ling golineglele,
With faint, far sounds that mingle,
The cows come slowly home.
And mother-songs of life-long years,
And baby-joys and childish fears,
And youthful hopes and youthful tears,
When the cows come home.

With ringle, range, ringle,
By twos and threes and single,
The cows are coming home;
Through violet air we see the town,
And the summer sun a-slipping down,
And the maple in the hazel glade
Throws down the path a longer shade,
And the hills are growing brown;
To-ling, to-rang, toringlelele,
By threes and fours and single,
The cows come slowly home.
The same sweet sound of wordless psalm,
The same sweet June day rest and calm,
The same sweet smell of buds and balm,
When the cows come home.

With tinkle, tankle, tinkle,
Through fern and periwinkle,
The cows are coming home;
A-loitering in the checkered stream,
Where the sun-rays glance and gleam,
Clarine, Peachbloom, and Phoebe Phillis
Stand knee deep in the creamy lilies,
In a drowsy dream;
To-link, to-lank, tolinklelele,
O'er banks with buttercups a-twinkle,
The cows come slowly home.

And up through memory's deep ravine
Come the brook's old song and its old-time sheen,
And the crescent of the Silver Queen,
When the cows come home.

With klinge, klange, klinge,
With loo-oo, and moo-oo, and jingle,
The cows are coming home;
And over there, on Merlin hill,
Sounds the plaintive cry of the whip-poor-will,
And the dew drops lie on the tangled vines,
And over the poplars Venus shines,
And over the silent mill.
Ko-ling, ko-lang, kolineglele,
With ting-a-ling and jingle,
The cows come slowly home.
Let down the bars; let in the train
Of long-gone songs, and flowers, and rain,
For dear old times come back again
When the cows come home.—Christian Weekly.

Memories of the Old Kitchen.

Far back in my musings, my thoughts have been cast
To the cot where the hours of my childhood were passed;
I loved all its rooms to the pantry and hall,
But that blessed old kitchen was dearer than all.
Its chairs and its tables, none brighter could be,
For all its surroundings were sacred to me—
To the nail in the ceiling, and the latch on the door,
And I love every crack on the old kitchen floor.

I remember the fire-place, with mouth high and wide,
The old-fashioned oven that stood by its side,
Out of which, each Thanksgiving, came puddings and pies,
That fairly bewildered and dazzled my eyes.
And then, too, Saint Nicholas, silent and still,
Came down every Christmas, our stockings to fill;
But the dearest of memories I've laid up in store,
Is the mother that trod on that old kitchen floor.

Day in and day out, from morning till night,
Her footsteps were busy, her heart always light;
For it seemed to me, then, that she knew not a care,
The smile was so gentle her face used to wear;
I remember with pleasure what joy filled our eyes,
When she told us the stories that children so prize;
They were new every night, though we'd heard them before
From her lips, at the wheel, on the old kitchen floor.

I remember the windows, where mornings I'd run
As soon as the daybreak to watch for the sun;
And I thought, when my head scarcely reached to the sill,
That it slept through the night in the trees on the hill,
And the small tract of ground that my eyes there could view
Was all of the world that my infancy knew;
Indeed, I cared not to know of it more,
For a world of itself was that old kitchen floor.

To-night those old visions come back at their will,
But the wheel and its music forever are still;
The band is moth-eaten, the wheel laid away,
And the fingers that turned it lie mould'ring in clay;
The hearthstone, so sacred, is just as 'twas then,
And the voices of children ring out there again;
The sun through the window looks in as of yore,
But it sees stranger feet on the old kitchen floor.

I ask not for honor, but this I would crave,
That when the lips speaking are closed in the grave,
My children would gather their round by their side,
And tell of the mother who long ago died;
'Twould be more enduring, far dearer to me,
Than inscription on marble or granite could be,
To have them tell often, as I did of yore,
Of the mother who trod on the old kitchen floor.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

The following is fresh from the lips of one of the most attractive of the Paris actresses:

"What!" said a young dandy to her the other day, "you turn me adrift—I, who have always been so kind, so attentive?" "Oh, I admit that, my dear fellow; but then I never promised to be eternally false to you."

M. Durand, on his return from the Observatory, where he went to consult an illustrious savant on the kind of weather that might be expected during the coming summer, is met by his family, who anxiously inquire what answer he brings back. "Tranquillisez vous, mes enfants," he replies; "I have been told that by the end of July we might, perhaps, have four or five hot days."

A remark overheard in the Champs Elysées during the late rainy weather:

"Do look at the trees. What a pitiful sight!"
"Well, instead of being in bloom, they are in gloom; that's all."

A new servant is being engaged, and his master points to the livery worn by his predecessor, saying:

"You are just about the same size, and the suit will fit you nicely. Try to be as careful of it as he was. Look at those trousers—he wore them ten years."

A beggar with a taste for dainties has gathered thirty-two tickets for soup, which he takes to the sister of charity who superintends the kitchen, saying:

"Is there no possibility of exchanging these thirty-two soup tickets for one ticket of truffles?"

Count Escarbonnier has but lately received his titles of nobility, and he is bringing up his five-year-old heir in the worship of the title deeds. But the little sinner was caught the other day by his governess in the act of sticking pins in his father's chair, for which she soundly rated him, telling him he should show greater respect for his parent, the Count.

The child, who had not forgotten the paternal lessons, at once replied:

"I owe no respect to my father. It is he, on the contrary, who should show respect to me."

"What do you mean?" asks the governess, astounded.

"I mean that I, at least, am the son of a nobleman."

A Paris bourgeois inquires of a friend, who is recommending a suitor for his daughter, as to the respectability of the person proposed.

"Tell me, has he a good income? Is his position secure?"

"Humph! Well, I believe so."

"You do? Would you be astonished to hear to-morrow morning that he is completely ruined?"

"To-morrow morning I certainly should. I don't say in the afternoon—"

When Arsène Houssaye directed the Comédie-Française, a dramatic author submitted to the company a new play, which, he was convinced, would, etc.

Before beginning to read it to the assembled sociétaires the author made a brief explanatory speech, as follows:

"The better to comprehend and enter into the spirit of my play, it will be necessary for you to transport yourselves to England."

"S that so?" cried Houssaye briskly; "then we must take time to pack up if we have such a journey before us, and in the meantime we will hear read some other plays which do not demand such extensive journeying. Le prochain! (Next!)"

Jean Baptiste announces to his mistress that he is about to leave her service.

"Well, if you had any intention of leaving your place you might at least have given me warning," says the lady.

"How could I?" says the servant, in an injured tone. "I couldn't throw out the dirty water till I had the clean, and I only got the new place this morning."

"Ah," says one gentleman to another at the club, "so you've had the misfortune to lose your poor nephew?"

"Yes, poor fellow. He would gamble in spite of all the doctors told him about avoiding excitement when he was subject to heart disease; and the other night while he was playing un petit jeu de tire (a little game of draw), and there was about 90,000 francs on the table, he suddenly dropped his cards and fell over on the table, dead."

"Poor fellow! How sad!"

"Aye, you may well say 'how sad!' He had four kings and an ace in his hand."

From Le Solcil's obituary of General Dix: "His dispatch is famous—'Si quelqu'un ose toucher au drapeau national, fusillez-le sur-le-champ—shot him in the spot!'" Which translation is outdone by the print merchant of the Rue Châteaudun, who inscribes beneath an old English engraving this line from the divine Williams:

"Like a worm It bud feedinher Damask scheeck."

At a watering-place ball:

Stranger to lady—Madame, will you dance the cotillion with me?

Lady to stranger—I am sorry, sir, but I'm engaged.

Stranger (in disgust)—Confound it, it's as bad here as in good society.

Lady—How do you know?

The height of abstemiousness:

A cannibal who would dine on Sarah Bernhardt and leave some for the next day.

Examining a candidate for the gendarmerie:

"Suppose you were going along the road with two prisoners and one of them ran away, what would you do?"

"What would I do? Why I'd shoot the other one and pursue the fugitive."

He was at once admitted to the force and to the Twenty-ninth Arrondissement.

M. Sardou may be credited with a more profound knowledge of the effects of the infraction of the seventh commandment than any man living. Perhaps I may accept Henry Ward Beecher. They are both among the "Immortals;" but their immortality is different, though the pecuniary result of their experience has been the same. Both have made money out of the broken decalogue. Sardou has prospered by drawing pictures of the sufferings of others. Beecher has suffered, and he has found the investment remunerative. These observations are made in connection with the play of Seraphine, produced at Baldwin's during the last week. It is another of those intense pictures, to which French authors have accustomed us, of weak female nature, posturing in agony on the ragged edge. It looks as if Sardou's brain were a kaleidoscope, into which he had thrown the prismatic fragments of the seventh commandment; and when the public have gotten tired of one view, a fresh turn of the instrument immediately presents them with another. It is still the same familiar sin, though occasionally one sees the flash of a different color. In The Mother's Secret, or Seraphine, the turn which he has given to the kaleidoscope has obscured everything but the unfortunate commandment. Nothing but its lurid fragments flame in the picture. It is there in all stages of fracture. The mother has committed the sin herself, though how or when is not openly explained. The saintly parson says, "Oh, those men! Give me the women!" The pious boy, who acts as spy for the Marchioness, borrows the money raised for the Patagonians to pay the "infernal washerwoman" of the opera-dancer. The son-in-law has absolutely to insinuate that he is indulging in illicit relations with a similar style of female to induce his wife to leave her mother's house and live with him. The nephew is a libertine who enters the daughter's room apparently to outrage her, and, disappointed in finding her pure and virtuous, falls madly into honest love and devotion. The Marquis has evidently been a "hard case" before he was afflicted with gout and religion, and fell madly under the unnatural and ridiculous whims of his austere wife. What he would do if it were not for those afflictions he only hints. The air is full of adultery, and save the young girl, who is only suspected by the libertine of being as bad as the rest, there is not an wholesome character in the play. There is much to admire in French art, and nobody has contributed more to it than M. Sardou. But one can only fancy he wrote The Mother's Secret after an overdose of absinthe. It is redolent of poisonous, unhealthy fumes. It is his very worst work, in every way, dramatically, artistically, and morally. One is almost sorry he has seen it, it points to such an utter recklessness as to moral effect. Of course, it must be remembered that in France it would only be witnessed by grown-up people. But even grown-up people are susceptible of evil influences, and undoubtedly such a play as this is an evil influence. It scoffs at principle in almost every form, and even the parson himself is made out to be a vile hypocrite in a forced and unnecessary way, which leaves one to believe that Sardou is an utter sceptic in the matter of morality. Laying aside the motive of the leading character in the play, which is admissible at the least, the construction is devoid of Sardou's art, the characters are badly drawn, the surroundings not always quite appropriate, and very often far-fetched. The artistic welding of all interests in the story which made Diplomacy such a brilliant work is wanting in Seraphine; and practically the story could be effectively told in two acts and with four characters. The others are mere excrescences, and as arranged in this version embarrass instead of relieving. The plot hinges on the indiscretion of the "Marchioness" with "Admiral Le Port," by which she becomes the mother of a child, who, so far as we learn by the play, passes as the daughter of the Marquis. One would say that there is no trouble about the matter; but the "Marchioness," who has "got" religion in some extraordinary way, apparently by purchase, tries to force the child into a convent, so as to expiate her sin. This is opposed by the real father—that is, he says he is the real father—and the lady agrees with him, so we must believe them. The denouement is that the daughter marries a young libertine, nephew to the Admiral, and so the curtains fall on happiness. In fact, it seems to an audience that things are in a much better position when the play begins than when it ends. The other characters are brought in to fill up, and they do it very badly. There is one strong situation in it; that in which the daughter, after being found in the Admiral's (her own father's) room, saves an exposure of the real state of the case to the Marquis by admitting that she had been taken away by the young libertine out of pure love, when her real father had stolen her in order to save her from the convent. That is all. Miss Rose Coghlan shows herself capable of great things in her impersonation of the extraordinary heroine—a part full of unnatural and spasmodic bursts of alternating despair, anger, and weakness, in forced situations and unintelligible surroundings; it tries the best actress, and I doubt if it could find a much better exponent. It requires a good actress to carry out in English a Frenchman's conception of an emotional lunatic. I do not think there is anything else in the piece demanding special mention, if I except the unusually satisfactory debut of Miss Blanche Thorne, who appeared as "Diane," a pretty, petite figure, a pleasant face, a clear and sympathetic voice, a modest ease and grace upon the stage, and evident intelligence, are qualifications for a successful actress. And the lady is young enough to learn the art of acting. I observe that A Marriage by Moonlight is announced to follow. It is, I understand, about as much the production of Herne & Belasco, whose names appear as authors, as A Millionaire's Daughter (M.S. by Bronson Howard) was. I wonder if Mr. Maguire has no respect for the reputation of his pretty little theatre? What is the use of depriving Baldwin's of the chances of procuring good plays, which are essential to the proper display of the strongest stock company out of New York?

Mr. Lester Wallack's experience at the California has been one which must have mortified both actor and management. Perhaps Mr. Hill took all too sanguine a view of the opinion held of his star in this city; but he was justified at least in supposing that a gentleman, whose family name has stood at the head of the theatrical profession since it was a profession in America, and whose personal connection with it has been the link, in a great measure, that has joined it to the social circle, would at least have been welcomed with some show of interest. Apart from any consideration of a social nature, Lester Wallack is an artist in his special line. He is one of the few who maintain the standard of being a gentleman in every phase of his career, and to see him is almost a liberal education in high comedy. But here he has found himself quite unappreciated. His "Adonis Evergreen" is one of the best pieces of acting possible, in a very funny play. Yet the houses have been so small that one almost feels as if there were some special reason for it. The California management made a little too much, possibly, of the expense, and too little of the merits of the engagement, as an advertisement; and certainly they made a great mistake in playing him first in Ours. If the public are told that a man is being paid $500 a night, and find out that in a piece they know he makes no bit, they are slow to take him in a new play. Mr. Wallack would have pleased and delighted everybody in My Awful Dad, and Ours could have followed successfully. The milk is spilled, however, and there is little use crying over it. The engagement which was looked forward to confidently as being sure of success has proved a disastrous failure, and Mr. Wallack has done what few stars, on a certainty of $500 a night, would do, he has canceled his engagement himself, and saved the theatre a heavier loss. To-night he plays for the last time, and Monday shakes the dust of San Francisco from off his fast-flying feet—not to keep pressing business engagements East, as the dailies so considerably have it, but the quicker to get far and away from the scene of a terrible crusher to his pride. And while admitting that Mr. Wallack's reception and engagement has not been what he had a right to anticipate, there are reasons why it never would or could have been anything like a success. Mr. Wallack, in his own theatre, with his own superb company working up to him as the central figure of a fashionable comedy, is a satisfaction; Mr. Wallack abroad is, and always has been—with the one exception of Chicago perhaps—a failure. He depends on his ensemble. He is not a star in the faintest sense, and has no personal magnetism nor force of genius to make him stand out prominently from such a menagerie as wrestle with the text and allege to be the support at the California Theatre. This fact Mr. Wallack has demonstrated in more large cities than San Francisco. As for his failure here, we do not think that he has drawn more than two or three houses that paid the expenses of support, and not one that would bring him in his magnificent salary of $500 per night. And now Joe Murphy, with his dudden in his mouth and his potheen in his coat-tail pocket, takes the place of the Major with his cigars and his champagne. The coming week will doubtless be a lucky one for Murphy. And after him Aimée appears, to draw the baldheads—aye, even from the springs.

The Pinafore fever, though it can scarcely be said to be violent, has kept the Standard full every night. The company have grown quite at home on the stage and with the music, and there is almost too much clockwork in the performance now. The latest feature is the Children's Pinafore, which has so far been left, as children's pinafores ought to be, to the ladies who patronize matinees. The Standard juveniles gave one of the prettiest and cleverest performances it is possible to conceive. It is worth a good deal to see the little tot who plays "Josephine" come out and sing her sentiments perfectly correct, and with as much intelligence as one can desire even in an adult, yet without the faintest show of that pre-cocity which pains the spectator in the general juvenile performer. She puts her little hand over her little heart, casts down her eyes, and simulates the mixed emotions of the Captain's daughter quite delightfully. I really think that the small "Admiral" is as amusing as Mr. Unger or any of the older people who have appeared in the anomalous uniform. The "Hebe" is equally good, and leads the chorus of cousins and sisters and aunts with a spirit wanting in most of the representations we have had of the character. The "Ralph Rackstraw," "Buttercup," and "Captain" are excellent, and the chorus is admirably trained and very effective. It is a delightful and enjoyable performance throughout, and the music is rendered so well that I can not sufficiently praise Miss Lottie Chissold, who has drilled the little tars. Another Children's Pinafore at the Metropolitan Temple is attracting good houses and is worth seeing. The Standard adults are talking of continuing the career of success which Pinafore has accidentally thrown them into, and propose to follow with comic opera of greater pretensions. It is possible that Les Cloches de Corneville will be produced.

At Bush Street there seems but little falling off in Denman Thompson's houses. Mr. Locke has returned and seems full of confidence as to the coming season. He has engaged Tony Pastor's troupe, to follow Joshua Whitcomb, and says he has no end of attractions. About August the theatre will be closed for two weeks to admit of the postponed alterations. Entirely remodeled and fitted up, it will be one of the prettiest little theatres on the continent. Mr. Locke's head is very level on theatrical matters, and his long Eastern trip has enabled him to make arrangements for the future that will demonstrate his shrewdness as a manager.

Master Richard Levy, who essayed "Hamlet" at Baldwin's Theatre on last Sunday evening, proved himself a youth of uncommon talent, with faults that will undoubtedly give way before judicious training, but enough of the quality of true genius to make it reasonably certain that he will not only overcome those faults, but even some day become a great actor. He needs, first of all, to be taught a proper pronunciation of English; this once accomplished the rest will be easy for him.

Musical matters are at a stand-still, and likely to remain so for the summer. Wilhelmj is not coming; Remenyi is going, or gone, to where he—or his managers—hope they may find better houses and more money; and for the present there is nothing but Pinafore.

It is barely possible that l'Assembleur will be given at Baldwin's. The French dramatization has been an immense success, and the London adaptation by Charles Reade promises to be. The Daly dramatization was a failure in New York, and its fate here is altogether dependent on the degree of realism attempted. The famous wash-house scene, if properly interpreted, would be apt to crowd the house with an appreciative audience.

For the Fourth of July, at the California, we are to have Mr. and Mrs. Williamson, in their favorite, Struck Oil. Their luck is wonderful, and it is certain that the few nights' engagement will be a success.

It is reported that Lawrence Barrett has his eye on the management of the California Theatre.

The Dramatic News has been giving a few figures regarding the late season of Italian opera here. It affirms that Strakosch cleared about $4,000, and further says: "Under his contract with Maguire it was a moral certainty that Maguire could not come out straight. An absurder contract never was signed by a manager. Strakosch had sixty per cent. for the furnishing of nine people. For the forty per cent. Maguire took he was to furnish all the chorus, ballet, and orchestra, the house, the advertising, and all local expenses. That is to say, Maguire was under a nightly expense of about $1,200, while Max had to pay out about half that. So, while the artful Mr. Strakosch was making his $4,000, the dejected Mr. Maguire was losing $20,000 of Lucky Baldwin's money. If Mr. Strakosch could go on making contracts like that all the time, he would soon be past the necessity of taking any further part in operatic management. But, on the other hand, if Tom Maguire does not know more about the business than this, after being in it almost since the days of the Argonauts, then he deserves to get such lessons as this." The contract was an absurd one, and the opera something that reflected little credit on the taste of a people that allowed even $4,000 to be made out of it.

It has been decided to create a Theatrical Order of Merit in France. The ribbon is to be red, but it is not yet settled as to whether it is to be of a darker or a lighter shade than that of the Order of the Legion of Honor. The new order will contain several classes, and the members of the Comédie Française are to receive the first decorations.

Dickie Lingard Dalziel is at his old roguery East. He has ruined three or four theatrical combinations lately. The latest dispatches report him as owing everybody money. He is now going up the St. Lawrence in a yacht, with five people in the troupe, making an occasional raid on shore.

THE OLD DROP CURTAIN.

Yes, I see the paint is cracked and peeling;
The canvas shows at the discolored border;
That dingy streak that spreads from stage to ceiling
Is a dismal evidence, a mute recorder
How the old drop is worn, has had its day—
You're right! 'tis time that it was put away.

We'll have a new one; some more modern topic;
We will not have another classic myth.
I wish my vision could be telescopic
To view our second drop's successes with.
I long to see its fresh, fair breadth unrolled,
But can it know such triumphs as the old?

You recollect that night—our first production
Of Hamlet? What a house to play to, Jack!
When the close plaudits gave us the instruction
So welcome, eh, to draw the curtain back.
Dear curtain! its Greek cars and Ilian towers
Were fairly pelted then with modern flowers.

That was a splendid season; heavy tragic
Could fill the building from pit to dome.
The raising of that curtain had a magic,
It seemed, to draw the populace from home.
Now, they want spectacle and panorama;
This curtain does not sort with modern drama.

Though it has served us even there; when, later,
The quaint old towers of the Ilian town
Have met the dear dimmed eyes of the spectator
"When Camille's dark scene rang the curtain down.
Why not? The moral of our "Led Astray"
Was known too well in Troy, the poets say.

Behind that canvas circled in their orbit
The brightest stars that graced our later day:
The tragic, comic, the intense, the morbid,
Who make the heart's anatomy a play.
But they have faded; with them fades their curtain—
Achilles' shield grows shadowy and uncertain.

Put it away, Jack; we will have a new one—
A fete champetre, or picnic on the Rhine.
The Rhine—that's good—you can throw in a ruin,
Fit emblem of this faded friend of mine.
And paint it brightly—some called this one old.
But will it see such triumphs as the old?

Preludes—In Divers Keys.

In pointing out—last week's issue—some of the more salient objections to a suggestion in the Nation, in which the revival of the now well nigh obsolete form of operatic pot-pourri was advocated as a desirable preparation for the study of the higher forms of chamber music, I referred to the works of certain composers among whose compositions would be found what I considered to be better material for that purpose than that suggested by the writer in the Nation. To enter more fully into the question was foreign to the purpose of my note; it would consume more space than I have at my command, besides taking me over a terrain that is supposed to be gone over by every well-informed and conscientious teacher. In reply, however, to a number of questions that have been addressed to me during the week let me say, briefly—that I do not know of a single well arranged or musically respectable operatic pot-pourri for string quartet, and but very few for the combination of piano forte with strings that can be recommended, or safely put into the hands of an earnest musical student as worthy of study in any light whatsoever, or as in any way likely to recompense him for the time and labor required to practice it into presentable shape. As I said last week, the better composers have totally ignored this form of arrangement; it is outside the barrier of musical respectability. The recommendation of fitting material for study is a different matter, and one which can not be disposed of in general terms or for the general reader. This is a matter that depends largely on the musical status of the student; on his previous training (technical and intellectual), as well as his opportunities for playing in concert with others, and must be left to the teacher. For the study of quartets, however, much excellent material will be found in Pleyel—easy, and consequently available for first studies—Kreutzer, Ries, Viotti, and Onslow. There are other composers of easy quartet music; their names escape me at this writing, but can be found in Hoffmeister's catalogue. Hauptmann, Dussek, Kuhlman, Kücken, Krebs, and many others, have written Sonatas for piano-forte and violin or flute, that can be recommended as sound, healthy music, of pure form, and oftentimes no small degree of beauty, while the list of easy piano-forte Trios is well nigh inexhaustible. I suppose every good teacher to be familiar with it, and to be capable of selecting for his pupils. The greater masters—Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and the moderns—had better be left until the way has been prepared for them by careful study and analysis of their construction of some of the lighter works. Haydn, however, has some easy Sonatas (with violin or flute) as well as Trios and Quartets that are not beyond the technique of many amateurs. The earlier Trios and Violin Sonatas of Beethoven are not difficult to play; those of Mozart are more so, and require not only considerable facility, but also a great degree of finish and refinement of style. One occasionally hears a movement of Beethoven very well played by an amateur; of Mozart, very rarely, and for the stringed instruments never. It is only in the master hand that he finds acceptable translation. O. W.

The refusal of the Parisian parricide, Laprade, to be guillotined recalls the man "guillotined by persuasion" of Chavette.

"But I say, you know," said the executioner, "everybody is waiting. The magistrates are there, the clergy are there, the people are there, the soldiers (who are to present arms to you just as if you were the President of the Republic) are there—everybody is there. All they are waiting for is you—o-only you."

"I don't know," replied the condemned man. "I am a new executioner; you are the first person I've had to guillotine; give me a good send-off now, can't you? Help me to discharge a disagreeable duty. Just put yourself in my place—"

"You just put yourself in mine."

"It can't be any question of expense; don't you know that everything is paid? It won't cost you a penny; the state stands treat."

"I haven't asked the state to stand treat to anything."

"Come, now, old fel, let's understand each other. You mayn't think so, but this resistance doesn't proceed from your own better nature—some one has put you up to it. You have formed a totally erroneous idea of the affair. What, after all said and done, does it amount to? It's a nothing—a mere formality. Let us look into it in detail. You are called and waked early, and given a comfortable breakfast—order whatever you want. Nothing so dreadful about that, is there? Then you have your hair cut—it's healthy, this hot weather, and makes you feel fresher. Then you go calmly and pleasantly out for a ride—on a carriage, understand. While you are driving along you amuse yourself chatting about this, that, and the other thing with the priest, and you never feel the time pass. Well, when you get there they come out to meet you, they open the door for you, they help you out of the carriage, they do everything in their power for you. Then you go up the stairs—only a step or two, and the ascent is so easy that you'd almost think you were going down stairs. You bow to the public, and—well, before you have time to turn round—brrrrrr!—all is over. [Smiling.] And everybody goes home satisfied. That's all there is about it."

WHERE TO
SPEND THE SUMMER.
IF YOU WANT A THOROUGHLY
enjoyable place, go to the
GEYSER SPRINGS.
Medicated Baths for the sick; Swimming Baths, Bowling Alleys, Shooting Gallery; pleasant Picnic Grounds for the well. In remodeling the Medicated NATURAL Steam
Bath, due regard has been observed to give special privacy
to ladies. This Bath removes TAN-FRECKLES, SAL-LOWNESS, BLOTCHES, and all IMPERFECTIONS
from the skin, and is recommended by many physicians who have tested its value. A magnificent Swimming Bath has been constructed at a large outlay.
The house has been completely remodeled since last summer, and now is not surpassed by any in the State. The stage ride to this glorious mountain resort can not be surpassed in the world, while the very atmosphere, rarified and aromatic from the breath of fragrant pines, fir, and laurel,
stimulates the senses like old wine.
For tickets and all information call at No. 2 New Montgomery Street, and 214 and 426 Montgomery Street. Rooms may be engaged by letter or telegraph.
Special arrangements can be made by the week and for families.

PHARMACEUTICAL.
A SPECIFIC

REMEDY FOR ALL DISEASES

...OF THE...

BLADDER AND KIDNEYS.

FOR DEBILITY, LOSS OF MEMOry, Indisposition to Exertion or Business, Shortness
of Breath, Troubled with Thoughts of Disease, Dimness of Vision, Pain in the Back, Chest, and Head, Rush of Blood
to the Head, Pale Countenance, and Dry Skin. If these symptoms are allowed to go on, very frequently Epileptic Fits and Consumption follow. When the constitution becomes affected it requires the aid of an invigorating medicine to strengthen and tone up the system, which

HELMBOLD'S BUCHU
Does in every case.

HELMBOLD'S BUCHU
IS UNEQUALED

By any remedy known. It is prescribed by the most eminent physicians all over the world in

Rheumatism,
Spermatorrhœa,
Neuralgia,
Nervousness,
Dyspepsia,
Indigestion,
Constipation,
General Debility,
Kidney Diseases,
Liver Complaint,
Nervous Debility,
Epilepsy,
Head Troubles,
Paralysis,
General Ill Health,
Spinal Diseases,
Sciatica,
Deafness,
Decline,
Lumbago,
Catarrh,
Nervous Complaints,
Female Complaints, etc.

Headache, Pain in the shoulders, Cough, Dizziness, Sour
Stomach, Eruptions, Bad Taste in the Mouth, Palpitation
of the Heart, Pain in the region of the Kidneys, and a thousand other painful symptoms, are the offspring of Dyspepsia.

HELMBOLD'S BUCHU
INVIGORATES THE STOMACH

And stimulates the torpid Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys to healthy action, in cleansing the blood of all impurities, and imparting new life and vigor to the whole system. A single trial will be quite sufficient to convince the most hesitating
of its valuable remedial qualities.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE
Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
DWIGHT C. KING, plaintiff, vs. MALISSA KING,
defendant.
Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth
Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.
The People of the State of California send greeting to
MALISSA KING, defendant:
You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days
(exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served
out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be
taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.
The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds
set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference
is hereby expressly made, and for general relief.
And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and
answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court to the relief he is lawfully entitled to demand.
Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court
of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this twenty-fourth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.
